Caſſander was lately dead in Macedon, and ſoone after him, Philip his eldeſt ſonne, whoſe two yonger brethren, Antipater and Alexander, ſought for the Kingdome. In this quarrell Theſſalonica the Daughter of King Philip, whom Caſſander had married, ſeemed better affected to Alexander, then to her elder ſonne: who thereupon grew ſo enraged, that moſt barbarouſly he ſlew his owne Mother. The odiouſneſſe of this fact gaue a faire luſtre to Alexanders cauſe: drawing the generalitie of the Macedons to take his part, as in reuenge of the Queenes death, vpon that wicked parricide Antipater. But Antipater was ſo ſtrongly backed by Lyſimachus, whoſe Daughter he had married; that Alexander could not hope to make his party good without ſome forraigne aide. For which cauſe he called in both Pyrrhus and Demetrius; who how they dealt with him, it will ſoone appeare, in the following Tragedie, of him and his brother. Their Father Caſſander had beene one that ſhifted well for himſelfe, at ſuch time as euery man ſought how to get ſomewhat, in the ill ordered diuiſion of the Empire. Hee was cunning in practize, and a good Souldier: one of more open dealing then were his Companions, but withall more impudent, rudely killing thoſe, whom others would more wiſely haue made away. He deeply hated the memorie of Alexander, that had knocked his head againſt a wall, vpon ſome opinion of contempt. With Olympias he had an hereditarie quarrell, deriued from his Father, whom ſhee could not abide. Her feminine malice did ſo exaſperate him, by crueltie, that ſhee vſed againſt his friends, both aliue and dead; as it made him aduenture vpon ſhedding the Royall bloud; wherewith, when once hee had ſtained his hands, he did not care how farre he proceeded in that courſe of murder. His carefulneſſe to deſtroy thoſe women and children, whoſe liues hindred his purpoſe, argues him to haue beene rather skilfull in matters of Armes, than a valiant man: ſuch crueltie being a true marke of cowardize, which feares a-farre off the dangers, that may quietly paſſe away: and ſeekes to auoide them by baſe and wicked meanes, as neuer thinking it ſelfe ſafe enough, vntill there be nothing left, that carries likelihood of danger. Of Olympias and Roxane it may bee ſaid, that they had well deſerued the bloudy end which ouer tooke them; yet ill beſeemed it Caſſander to doe the office of a Hang-man. But Alexanders children had by no law of men deſerued, to die for the tyrannie of their Father. Wherefore, though Caſſander died in his bed, yet the diuine Iuſtice brought ſwords vpon his wife and children, that well reuenged the crueltie of this bloudy man, by deſtroying his whole houſe, as he had done his Maſters.

of PYRRHVS and his doings in Macedon. The death of CASSANDERS children. DEMETRIVS gets the Kingdome of Macedon; preuailes in warres against the Greeks; Looseth reputation in his warre against PYRRHVS, and in his Ciuill Gouernement, and prepares to win Asia. How all conspire against DEMETRIVS. PYRRHVS and LYSIMACHVS inuade him, his Armie yeelds to PYRRHVS, who shares the Kingdome of Macedon with LYSIMACHVS.

PYRRHVS, the Sonne of that vnfortunate Prince Æacides, which perished in warre against Cassander, was hardly preserued, being a sucking Infant, from the furie of his Fathers enemies. When his Fosterers had conueighed him to Glaucias, King of Illyria; the deadly hatred of Cassander would haue bought his life with the price of two hundred talents. But no man can kill him that shall be his Heire. Glaucias was so far from betraying Pyrrhus, that hee restored him by force to his Fathers Kingdome, when he was but twelue yeeres of age. Within the compasse of sixe yeeres, either the indiscretions of his youth, or the rebellious temper of his Subjects, draue him out of his Kingdome, and left him to trie the world anew. Then went hee to Demetrius (who married his sister) became his Page; followed him awhile in his wars; was with him in the great battaile of Ipsus, whence hee fled with him to Ephesus; and was content to be hostage for him, in his reconciliation with Ptolomie. In Ægypt he so behaued himselfe, that he got the fauour of Berenice, Ptolomies principall wife; so that he married her Daughter, and was thereupon sent home, with monie and men, into Epirus; more beholding now to Ptolomie, than to Demetrius. When he had fully recouered the Kingdome of Epirus, and was settled in it, then fell out that businesse betweene the children of Cassander, which drew both him and Demetrius into Macedon.

Antipater, the elder of Cassanders sonnes, was so farre too weake for Pyrrhus, that hee had no desire to attend the comming of Demetrius, but made an hastie agreement, and diuided the Kingdome with his yonger brother Alexander; who likewise felt the aide of Pyrrhus so troublesome, that he was more willing to send him away, than to call in such another helper. For Pyrrhus had the audacitie to request, or take as granted, by strong hand, Ambracia, Acarnania, and much more of the Countrie, as the reward of his paines: leauing the two brethren to agree as well as they could about the rest. Necessitie enforced the brethren to composition: but their composition would not satisfie Demetrius, who tooke the matter hainously, that he was sent for, and made a foole, to come so farre with an Armie, and finde no worke for it. This was a friuolous complaint; whereby it appeared, that Demetrius had a purpose to doe as Pyrrhus had done, and so much more, by how much he was stronger. Hereupon it seemed to Alexander a wise course, to remoue this ouerdiligent friend, by murdering him vpon some aduantage. Thus Demetrius reported the storie, and it might bee true; though the greatest part, and perhaps the wisest, beleeued it not. But the issue was, that Alexander himselfe was feasted and slaine by Demetrius; who tooke his part of the Kingdome, as a reward of the murder; excusing the fact so well, by telling his owne danger, and what a naughtie man Cassander had been, that all the Macedonians grew glad enough to acknowledge him their King. It fell out happily, that about the same time Lysimachus was busied in warre with a King of the wilde Thracians: for thereby he was compelled to seeke peace of Demetrius, which to obtaine, he caused the remainder of Macedon to bee giuen vp; that is, the part belonging to Antipater, his sonne in law. At this ill bargaine Antipater grieuously stormed, though he knew not how to amend it: yet still he stormed; vntill his Father in law, to saue the labour of making many excuses, tooke away his trouble-troubleſome life. Thus in haſte, with a kinde of neglect, and as it were to auoide moleſtation, were ſlaine the children of Caſſander: of Caſſander that had ſlaine his owne Maſters children, in a wiſe courſe of policie, with careful meditation (ſo much the more wicked as the more long) ſtudying how to erect his owne houſe, that fell downe vpon his graue, ere the earth on it was throughly ſetled.

It might be thought, that ſuch an acceſſe of Dominion, added much to the greatneſſe of Demetrius. But indeede it ſhewed his infirmitie; and thereby made him neglected by many, and at length hated by all. For he had no Art of ciuill Gouernement: but thought (or ſhewed by his actions that he thought) the vſe and fruit of a Kingdome, to be none other, than to doe what a King liſted. He gaue himſelfe ouer to Women and Wine, laughing openly at thoſe that offered to trouble him with ſupplications, and the tedious diſcourſe of doing juſtice. He had more skill in getting a Kingdome, than in ruling it: warre being his recreation, and luxurie his nature. By long reſt (as ſixe yeeres raigne is long to him, that knowes not how to raigne one yeere) he diſcouered ſo much of his worſt condition, as made both the people wearie of his idleneſſe; and the Souldiers, of his vanitie. He was freed from care of matters in Aſia, by hearing that all was loſt: though more eſpecially, by hearing that Ptolomie had with great honor, entertained and diſmiſſed his mother and children. This affoorded him the better leiſure, of making warre in Greece: where he vanquiſhed the Thebans, and wonne their Citie twice in ſhort ſpace, but vſed his victorie with mercie. Againſt Lyſimachus he would faine haue done ſomewhat (the peace betweene them notwithſtanding) at ſuch time as he was taken by the Thracians; but Lyſimachus was freely diſmiſſed, and in good caſe to make reſiſtance ere Demetrius came; ſo as this iourney purchaſed nothing but enmitie. Another expedition he tooke in hand againſt Pyrrhus, with no better, or rather with worſe euent. Pyrrhus held ſomewhat belonging to Macedon; which hee had indeede as honeſtly gotten, as Demetrius the whole Kingdome; he had alſo made excurſions into Theſſalie. But there needed not any handſome pretence of quarrell, ſeeing Demetrius thought himſelfe ſtrong enough, to ouer-runne his enemies Countrie, with two great Armies. It is a common fault in men, to deſpiſe the vertue of thoſe, whom they haue knowne raw Nouices in that facultie, wherein themſelues are noted as extraordinarie. Pyrrhus was a Captaine, whom later ages, and particularly the great Hannibal, placed higher in the ranke of Generalls, than either Demetrius, or any of Alexanders followers. At this time, he miſſed that part of the Armie, which Demetrius led, and fell vpon the other halfe: which he ouerthrew, not with more commendations of his good conduct, than of his priuate valour, ſhewed in ſingle combat againſt Pantauchus, Demetrius his Lieutenant; who being a ſtrong man of body, challenged this yong Prince to fight hand to hand, and was vtterly beaten. The loſſe of this battaile did not ſo much offend the Macedonians, as the gallant behauiour of Pyrrhus delighted them. For in him they ſeemed to behold the liuely figure of Alexander in his beſt qualitie. Other Kings did imitate, in a counterfeit manner, ſome of Alexanders graces, and had good skill in wearing Princely veſtures: but (ſaid they) none, ſaue Pyrrhus, is like him indeede, in performing the office of a Captaine.

Theſe rumours were not more nouriſhed by the vertue of the Epirot, than by diſlike of their owne King; whom they began to diſeſteeme, not ſo much in regard of his vnprofitable iourney into Epirus (for he had waſted much of the Countrie, and brought home his Armie in good caſe) as of his inſolence, that grew daily more and more intolerable. His apparell ſeemed, in the eyes of the Macedons, not only too ſumptuous and new-fangled, but very vnmanly; and ſeruing chiefly to be a daily witneſſe, how much he contemned them and their good opinion. Of his Souldiers liues he was rechleſſe: and ſuffered vnwiſely this vn-princely ſentence to eſcape out of his mouth; That the more of them died, the fewer he was to pay. Hee made a mockerie of iuſtice; and (as it were, to publiſh vnto all his Subiects, how little he esteemed it or them) hauing by a shew of popularitie inuited Petitioners, and with a gracious countenance entertained their Supplications, he led the poore suters after him in great hope, till comming to a bridge, hee threw all their writings into the Riuer; pleasing himselfe, in that hee could so easily and so boldly delude the cares of other men. By these courses he grew so odious, that Pyrrhus gathered audacitie, and inuading Macedon, had almost wonne it all with little resistance. Demetrius lay then sicke in his bed: who recouering health, and taking the field, had such great oddes of strength, as made Pyrrhus glad to forsake his winnings and be gone.

At length he beganne to haue some feeling of the generall hate; which to redresse, he did not (for he could not) alter his owne conditions; but purposed to alter their idle discourses of him, by setting them on worke in such an action, wherein his best qualities might appeare; that is, in a great warre. His intent was to inuade Asia, with a Royall Armie: wherein the fortune of one battaile might giue him as much, as the fortune of another had taken from him. To this end, hee first made peace with Pyrrhus; that so hee might leaue all safe and quiet at home. Then did he compose a mighty Armie, of almost a hundred thousand foot, and twelue thousand horse: with a Nauie of fiue hundred saile, wherein were many ships, farre exceeding the greatnesse of any that had beene seene before; yet so swift and vsefull withall, that the greatnesse was least part of their commendation.

The terrible fame of these preparations, made Seleucus and Ptolomie suspect their owne forces, and labour hard with Lysimachus and Pyrrhus, to joyne against this ambitious sonne of Antigonus; that was like to proue more dangerous to them all, than euer was his Father. It was easily discerned, that if Demetrius once preuailed in Asia, there could be no securitie for his friends in Europe; what league soeuer were of old concluded. Therefore they resolued to beginne with him betimes, and each to inuade that quarter of Macedon, that lay next his owne Kingdome. Lysimachus came first, and against him went Demetrius with a great part of his Armie: but whilst he was yet on the way, newes were brought into his Campe, that Pyrrhus had won Berrhæa. The matter was not ouer-great: were it not, that mindes prepared with long discontent, are ready to lay hold vpon small occasions of dislike. All the camp was in vp-rore: some wept, others raged, few or none did forbeare to vtter seditious words, and many desired leaue of Demetrius, to goe to their owne houses, meaning indeede to haue gone to Lysimachus.

When Demetrius perceiued the bad affection of his Armie, hee thought it the wisest way, to lead the Macedonians further off from Lysimachus their owne Countrieman, against Pyrrhus that was a stranger: hoping by victorie against the Epirot, to recouer the loue of his followers, in such sort that hee might afterwards at leisure deale with the other. But herein his wisedome beguiled him. For the Souldiers were as hastie as he, to meet with Pyrrhus; not intending to hurt him, but longing to see that noble Prince, of whom they daily heard the honourable fame. Some spake of his valour; some enquired, others answered, of his person, his armor, and other tokens whereby hee might be knowne; as particularly, by a paire of Goats hornes, that he wore on his crest. It was not likely, that these men should hurt him. Diuers of them stole away, and ranne ouer into Pyrrhus his campe: where the newes that they brought, were better welcome than their persons. For they said, and it was true, that if the Macedonians might once get sight of Pyrrhus, they would all salute him King. To trie this, Pyrrhus rode forth, and presented himselfe bare-headed in view of the camp, whither some were sent before to prepare his welcom. The newes of his arriuall found a generall applause, and euery one began to looke out, with desire to set eye on him. His face was not so well knowne as his helmet; therefore hee was admonished to put it on; which done, all came about him, and proffered their seruice; neither were there any, that spake for Demetrius; only some (and they the most moderate of tongue) bade him be gone betimes; and shift for himselfe.

himselfe. So Demetrius threw aside his maskers habit, and attiring himselfe poorly, did fearefully steale away out of his owne Campe: deseruing well this calamitie, whether it were so, that he would not hearken to the good counsaile of his friends, or whether his behauiour depriued him of such friends, as would dare to let him heare the vnpleasant sound of necessarie truth.

Whilest Pyrrhus was making this triumphant entrie into the Kingdome of Macedon; Lysimachus came vpon him very vnseasonably, and would needs haue halfe: saying, that he had done as much as Pyrrhus in the warre, and therefore had reason to challenge his part of the gaines. The bargaine was quickly made, and the diuision agreed vpon: each of them being rather desirous to take his part quietly, than to fight for the whole; as hoping each of them, to worke his fellow quite out of all, vpon better oportunitie.

§. VIII.

How DEMETRIVS gathering forces, enterprised many things with ill successe, in Greece and Asia. How he was driuen vpon SELEVCVS, and compelled to yeeld himselfe. His imprisonment and death.

THe Athenians, were as vnthankefull to Demetrius in this his aduersitie, as they had beene in former times. For they presently forsooke his friendship, and called Pyrrhus out of Macedon to be their Patron. Demetrius, when he went against Lysimachus, had left a great part of his forces in Greece, vnder his sonne Antigonus. Therfore it is like, that he had soone gotten an Armie; though Phila his wife (who is highly commended for a wise and vertuous Ladie) did poison her selfe, vpon desperate griefe of his misfortune. The first, vpon whom he attempted to shew his anger, were the Athenians, that had well deserued it. Hee beganne to lay siege to their Towne: but was pacified by Crates the Philosopher, whom they made their spokesman; and taking faire words instead of satisfaction, passed ouer into Asia, with eleuen thousand Souldiers, meaning to trie his fortune against Lysimachus, for the Prouinces of Lydia and Caria.

At his first comming into those parts, fortune seemed to smile vpon him. For many good Townes, willingly, or by compulsion, yeelded to his obedience. There were also some Captaines, that fell from Lysimachus to him, with their companies, and treasures. But it was not long, ere Agathocles the sonne of Lysimachus, came vpon him, with an Armie so strong, that it was not for Demetrius his good, to hazard his last stocke against it. Wherefore, he resolued, to passe through Phrygia and Armenia, into Media, and the Prouinces of the higher Asia; trusting to finde a Kingdome somewhere in those remote quarters. The execution of this counsaile was grieuously impeached by Agathocles: who pursued him close, and cut off all his prouisions, driuing him to take which waies he could, without following his intended course. In many skirmishes, Demetrius vanquished this troublesome enemie: neuertheless, hee could not be shaken off, but continued afflicting the poore titularie King, with extreme famine. At length, in passing the Riuer Lycus, so many of Demetrius his men were lost, that the rest could no longer make resistance: but were driuen to trauaile with such speede, as might well be called a plaine flight. So that with famine, pestilent diseases following famine, and other accidents of warre, eight thousand of them were consumed: the rest, with their Captaine, escaped into Cilicia. Seleucus had gotten possession of Cilicia, whilest Demetrius was occupied in Greece: yet was it no part of Demetrius his errand, to lay claime to the Countrie; but with vehement and humble letters he besought his sonne in law, to call to minde their alliance, and to pity him in his great misery. These letters at the first wrought wel with Seleucus, and he condescended to the request: yet considering further how Demetrius had carried himselfe, when he recouered strength after the battaile at Ipsus, he changed his purpose, and went against him with an Armie.

Many treaties were held betweene them; of which none tooke effect, through the jealousie of Seleucus. Therefore, meere desperation enforced Demetrius, to fight like a mad man; and his furie got him some victories, though of small importance. At length sickneſſe tooke and held him fortie dayes, in which time, a great number of his few men, ranne to the enemie. This notwithstanding hee still held out, and once had like to haue taken Seleucus in his bed, had not his comming been discouered by fugitiues, that gaue the alarme. Finally, when all his Armie had forsaken him, and left him with a few of his friends to shift for himselfe, hee was compelled by the last of those adherents (for euen some of those few forsooke him) to yeeld vnto Seleucus.

Seleucus hearing this, was exceeding glad and sent him very comfortable messages. But the approbation of his owne humanitie, by his followers, was such, as renewed his jealous thoughts; and hindred him from admitting Demetrius to his presence, though otherwise he vsed him with as much fauor, as any prisoner could wish. He was kept vnder sure guard in a demie iland, wherein were goodly walks, Orchards, and Parks for hunting. He had all that he asked roially, and friends allowed to visit him, at his, and their pleasure. Only his libertie was reserued vnto the comming of yong Antiochus and Stratonica, out of the high Countries. In this sort he spent three yeres, liuing merrily all the while (as one that now enioyed the happinesse, which with so much trauaile and bloud-shed, he had sought in vaine) and then died, leauing to his sonne Antigonus, the same which his father had left vnto himselfe; that is, friends and hope. His ashes were honourably buried in Corinth; his qualities haue appeared in his actions, and the fortune of his house will shew it selfe hereafter, in times and places conuenient.

The death of PTOLOMIE, of LYSIMACHVS, and of SELEVCVS, that was last of ALEXANDERS Captaines: with other occurrences.

ABout the same time that Demetrius died, died also Ptolomie King of Ægypt; a vertuous Prince, warlike, gentle, bountifull, and (which in those times was a rare commendation) regardfull of his word. Hee had, by many Wiues and Concubines, many children, out of whom he selected Ptolomie Philadelphus, and caused him to raigne together with himselfe, two or three yeares before he died, that so he might confirme him in the inheritance of the Kingdome. At this, Ptolomie Ceraunus (for all of that house assumed the name of Ptolomie) was grieuously incensed. But no man cared for his anger. Therefore he went to Seleucus, who gaue him louing entertainment. There were now only two of Alexanders Captaines left, Seleucus and Lysimachus. These two needes would fight for it, who should be the longest liuer of that braue Companie. The true ground of their quarrell was, their neare equalitie of strength, and want of one to part them. The pretence was the murders which Lysimachus had committed vpon many of his Nobles, together with his poisoning Agathocles his eldest sonne: whose wife and children fled vnto Seleucus for aide.

The Macedons, after seuen Moneths pause, hauing spent their first heat of admiration, beganne to hearken so well to Lysimachus, their naturall Countrie-man, that they forsooke Pyrrhus, vpon none other ground than because hee was an Alien. This they had knowne well enough before: but they did him no great wrong in taking lightly from him, which they lightly gaue him. Lysimachus had raigned about about fiue yeares alone, when the Citie of Lysimachia (built by him, and called after his name) falling by an earthquake, appeared, by euents, to haue foreshewed the fall of his house. His owne iealousie, and the instigation of a mother in law, caused him to poison his Sonne Agathocles, which drew vpon him that warre, wherein (after the losse of all his fifteene children, that were taken away by diuers accidents) he perished himselfe.

Seleucus was encountred by Lysimachus on Asia side, where one battaile concluded the warre, with Lysimachus his death. It pleased Seleucus more than the victorie, that he was the last of all the great Heröes which had followed Alexander. For now he seemed to himselfe, as Lord and Heire of all the conquered world. So he passed ouer into Macedon, to take possession of Europe, where there was none to withstand him. But there he ended his daies, and within seuen moneths followed Lysimachus, and other of his fellows, by a bloudie death: being treacherously slaine by Ptolomie Ceraunus, whose friend and Patron he had beene. Seuentie and seuen yeare old he was, when hee fought with Lysimachus, and Lysimachus was seuentie and foure. With them ended the generation of old Captaines, that had seene the daies, as it were of another world vnder the Persian: yet was there left one equall to any of them, in the Art of warre: euen Pyrrhus the Epirot, of whom we spake before; that is now readie to enter into warre with the Romans, a more warlike people, than Alexander himselfe euer did encounter. Of which warre, and of which people, it is needfull that we here make mention, as of a storie more important, than any likely to ensue in Greece, or in the great Kingdomes, that were held by Alexanders Successors, with lesse (and still decreasing) vertue, than was that, by which they were first purchased.

CHAP. VII.

The growth of Rome: and setling of the Easterne Kingdomes.

§. I.

How the Romans enlarged their Dominion in Italie, from the death of TVLLVS HOSTILIVS, vnto such time as they were assailed by PYRRHVS.

NOw Rome was founded by Romulus; setled in good order by Numa Pompilius; and by many, though small, victories, it gathered strength; vnto such time as it became the head of Latium, by the conquest of Alba, in the raigne of Tullus Hostilius: it hath beene alreadie noted, in due order of time. But whereas now the Roman greatnesse, beginneth to encounter the power of Greece, and extending it selfe out of Italie, to ouer-whelme the Dominions of other States and Princes: I hold it conuenient (as in like cases I haue done) briefly to set downe the growth of this mightie Citie, in a compendious relation, of those many actions, which could not haue been deliuered in the ages, wherein they were seuerally performed, without much interruption of the Historie, that was then occupied in matter more important.

After the death of Tullus Hostilius (who when hee had raigned two and thirtie yeares, was burnt together with his house by lightning) Ancus Martius, Grandchild to Numa Pompilius by his daughter, and not much vnlike him in disposition, succeeded in the Kingdome of Rome. He walled the Citie about; enlarged it with the hill Auentine, which hee enclosed; built a bridge ouer Tybris, and the Citie of Ostia vpon the Sea, sixteene miles distant from Rome. Finally, hauing raigned foure and twentie yeares, he died, and by his last Will he left his children in charge with one Lucumon, the sonne of Damaratus a Corinthian, who auoiding Cypselus King of Corinth his tyranny, had fled into Hetruria, and dwelt in Tarquiny, by the name of which Towne hee was afterwards called Tarquinius. From that Citie in Hetruria comming to Rome, and encouraged by some ominous occurents, together with his wife Tauaquils prophecie, hee grew a fauorite of Ancus Martius; by his Gracian wit humoring the factions of the Roman Court, in so much that after his decease, he became not only Protector to the children, but Gouernour to the Citie. He doubled the number of Senators, and enlarged the Centuries of Horse-men: neither was he lesse eminent in warre, than in peace: for he preuailed often against the Tuscans, and from his victories, the chiefest ornaments of triumph tooke their originall. When this Lucius Tarquinius had raigned eight and thirtie yeares, he was slaine by the sonnes of Ancus Martius, to whom he had been left Guardian. But Tauaquil his wife, perceiuing what was done, enformed the people, from out of an high Turret, that her Husband was wounded, and sicke, but not dangerously. And withall signified vnto them, that in the interim of his sicknes, one Seruius Tullius, whom from his birth she alwaies prophecied to be borne to great hopes, (the sonne of P. Cornículanus and Ocrisia, a well descended, but captiue woman) brought vp in her house, and husband vnto her daughter, should supplie her husbands place, in gouerning the State, vntill his recouerie: which gouernment, being thus at first obtained by cunning, he afterwards vsurped as his right. He first ordained Ratements, Subsidies, and valuations of the peoples wealth; among whom, at that time, fourescore thousand were mustered, of which number consisted their whole corporation; and by distinction of Dignities, Ages, Trades, and Offices, he managed the Kingdome in as good sort, as if it had beene a priuate household. At length, hauing two daughters of different natures, the one milde and gentle, the other fierce and outragious: and finding also that the two sonnes of Tarquinius Priscus, Sextus and Aruns, which had been committed to his tuition, were of different dispositions, proprotionably answering to his daughters; he (willing to adde water, not oile, to fire) gaue the milde daughter to Sextus the hot-headed sonne; and the violent, to Aruns, the gentle, in mariage. But whether by intēded courses, or by accident, it happened; the two milde ones being made away, the furious natures were readily ioyned in marriage: who soone concurring, and calling the Senate together, beganne to lay claime to the Kingdome. Vpon this tumult, Seruius Tullius hasting to the Senate, (where he thought by authoritie to haue bridled insolencie) was throwne downe the staires, and going home sore bruised, was slain by the way, when he had raigned fortie and foure yeare. Then Tullia his daughter, first proclaiming her husband Tarquinius Superbus King; returning home, enforced her Coach-man to driue his Chariot ouer her fathers corpes; whereupon the street had the denomination of wicked street. This Tarquine, exercising crueltie without iustice, and tyrannie without mercie, vpon the people and Senators; hauing tired himselfe and them at home, vsed the same rage of treacherie vpon his borders. He tooke Ocriculum, Suessa Pometia, and the Gabij. The issue of besieging Ardea, a towne eighteene miles distant from Rome, was of bad successe. In the heate of which warre, his sonne Sextus Tarquinius violently rauished that chaste Ladie Lucretia, his kinsman Collatines wife: who in way of expiation for so vnchaste a deed, thought good to wash out those spots of infamie with her owne blood; so (hauing first bequeathed the reuenge vnto her father Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, her husband Collatine, and Iunius Brutus)

ſhe killed her ſelfe: whereupon (chiefly by Iunius Brutus his reſolution) Tarquinius Superbus, with his wife and children, was depoſed and baniſhed; and fled to Porſenna King of Hetruria for ſuccour, in the fiue and twentieth yeare of his raigne, and the two hundred fortie and fourth from the building of their Citie: in which ſpace Rome had ſcarce gotten full poſſeſſion of fifteene miles round about her.

Iunius Brutus by the helpe of Collatine, hauing expelled Tarquine, and freed his Countrey from that heauie yoake of bondage, inforced the people by ſolemne oath, neuer to admit any gouernment by Kings amongſt them: whereupon they ranſacked their Kings goods, conſecrated their fields to Mars, and conferred the gouernment of the State vpon Brutus and Collatine. But becauſe the name of King was odious in their eares, they changed the manner of their gouernment, from perpetuall to annuall, and from a ſingle gouernour to a double; leſt perpetuall or ſole dominion might be ſome motiue to vſurpation; and in ſtead of Kings they called them Conſuls, ſignifying, as it may be interpreted, Prouiders: that their titles might remember them of their place, which was to be alwaies mindefull of their Citizens welfare. And yet was it ſo hard ſetling of troubled waters, that the people, after this innouation of State, ſcarce daring to aſſure themſelues of their owne ſecuritie, enforced Tarquinius Collatine to reſigne vp his authoritie, fearing that tyrannie would be hereditarie, and ſuppoſing that the very name & affinity with the houſe of Tarquin, ſauoured alreadie of their condition. In his roome was ſubſtituted Valerius Publicola, who that he might (as his name reporteth) be gratious in the peoples eies, gaue liberty, in matters of controuerſie, to appeale from the Conſuls to the people: and that he might as well in goods as in perſon, auoyde occaſion of ſuſpition, cauſed his owne houſe to be pulled downe, becauſe it was built in a place defenſible, as if it had beene a Citadell. Neither was Brutus any wayes deficient in matter of greater moment; which concerned as well the peoples ſafetie, as their fauour: for hauing got intelligence, that ſome greener wits, and in the firſt ranke his owne ſonnes, were itching after innouations, hoping to reſtore the baniſhed Kings; he cauſed them, publikely in the Market-place, to be whipt, and then to be brought all vnpartially to the blocke.

Hitherto the Romanes, hauing by the vnblemiſhed integritie of Brutus, well appeaſed all inbred quarrels at home, now hereafter imploy their militarie deſignements, againſt Forrainers; firſt, for their libertie; ſecondly, for inlarging of their poſſeſſions; and laſtly, for defending their confederate Prouinces, and extending their Empire. For Rome, ſituated as it were in the mid-way betweene Latium and the Tuſcans, hauing as yet but narrow bounds, being in her minoritie, could not but giue occaſion of offence to her neighbours; vntill by maine oppoſition, hauing preuailed againſt her borderers, ſhee vſed them as inſtruments, whereby to obtaine the reſt.

Their firſt warre, in the firſt yeare of Conſuls, was againſt Porſenna King of Hetruria: who being ouer-perſwaded by Tarquines lamentation, came to Rome, together with the baniſhed King, and with great forces, to ſeate him againe in his Kingdome.

In the firſt conflict, Horatius Cocles, hauing long time borne the maine brunt of his enemies, on the bridge ouer Tibris; at length, feeling himſelfe too faint to ſtand againſt ſo many, cauſed the bridge behinde him to be broken downe, and with his armour, leaping into the Riuer, like a hunted Stagge, refreſhed his hote ſpirits, and returned ſafe to his fellowes, with the like reſolution to ſuſtaine a new charge. Porſenna, although by this he had well-nigh won the hill Ianiculus, which is the verie entrance vnto the Citie, and found the victorie, in a manner, aſſuredly his own: yet admiring their valour, and terrified by the conſtant reſolution of Mutius Scæuola (who hauing by errour ſlaine Porſenna his Secretarie, inſtead of the King himſelfe, did in ſcorne of torments threatned, burne off his owne hand) hee thought it not any wait prejudiciall, either to his fatetie, or credite, to enter league with them at the worst hand. And yet the edge of Tarquinius his spleene, was not quite abated, though Aruns his sonne, and Brutus his enemie, in single combat, had slaine each other. And here the Romans, although they lost Brutus, got the field; and their Ladies, whose Champion hee was, for their chastitie, not for beautie, mourned the losse of him one whole yeare. Into his place, for the residue of his yeare, was subrogated Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, father to Lucretia: and in his roome (deceasing naturally before the yeare expired) Horatius Pulvillus.

Tarquine, vpon his ouerthrow, feeling the fates disastrous, thought it no boot to striue against the streame, and spent the residue of his time; which was about fourteene yeares, priuately at Tusculum. Yet his sonne-in-law Mamilius Tusculanus, stomaching afresh at those old repulses, because Porsenna had made peace with the Romans, and denied further succour vnto the Tarquines, mustered vp his Latines, and gaue battaile to the Romans, at the Lake Regillum; where the conflict was fierce, and the issue vncertaine, vntill Aulus Posthumius, the Roman Dictator, (for they had created this Magistracy greater than Consulls, purposely for this Warre, when first it was expected) to exasperate his Souldiers courage, threw their owne Ensignes amidst the Enemies; and Cossus or Spurius Cassius (master of the Horse men, an assistant Officer to the Dictator) commanded to take off their bridles, that they might runne with free violence, to recouer againe their Ensignes. This fight was so well performed, that a report went current of Castor and Pollux, two Gods, who came on milke-white Steeds, to be eye-witnesses of their valour, and fellow helpers of their victorie; for the Generall consecrated a Temple to them, as a stipend for their paines. After this the Romans fierce spirits, hauing no obiect of valour abroad, reflected vpon themselues at home; and the sixteenth yere after the Kings expulsion, vpon instigation of some desperate banckrouts, thinking themselues wrongfully oppressed by the Senate and Consulls, they made an vproare in the holy Mount; vntill by Menenius Agrippa, his discreet allusion, of the inconuenience in the head and bellies discord, to that present occasion, they were reconciled to the Senate: with condition, that they might haue some new Magistrates created, to whome they might appeale in cases of variance, and make them Solicitors in their controuerlies, the Consuls authori ie notwithstanding. This was enacted; and they were called the Tribunes of the people. After this attonement amongst themselues, they had continuall Warre with the Latines, concerning their bounds and limits, and with other neighbouring States. Amongst these, the Volsci and Æqui held them longest; who made warre, of themselues, vpon the Romans: whereby they lost the best Citie in their whole iurisdiction, Corioli.

In this conquest, T. Martius got the sirname of Coriolanus: a name honorable then, as deriued from a great victorie: although, by reason of the pouertie of the Towne, a Roman Generall, in after times, would haue beene ashamed of that title. But yet these graces had beene no occasion of disparagement, had hee not afterwards, in a great time of dearth, aduised to sell corne, which they procured from Sicil, at too high a rate, to the people: whereupon, Decius Mus, their Tribune, in their behalfe, accused him, and after iudgement, banished him. Coriolanus flying to the Volsci, whom lately before he had vanquished, incensed them to renue their forces againe; which being committed vnto him, and to Attius Tullus, he preuailed in field, so farre forth, that he was come within foure or fiue miles of the Citie. Incamping there hee made so sharpe warre, and was at such defiance, with his Countrie, that hee would not relent by any supplications of Embassadours, vntill his Mother Veturia, and Volumnia his wife, with a pittifull tune of deprecation, shewing themselues better Subiects to their Countrie, than friends to their sonne and husband, were more auaileable to Rome, then was any force of armes. Hereupon Coriolanus dismissing his Armie, was after put to death among the Volsci, as a Traitor, for neglecting such opportunitie: or (as others surmise) liuing with them vntill old age, hee died naturally.

Not

Not long after this, the Veij in Hetruria, prouoked the Romans; againſt whom the Fabij, three hundred and ſixe in number, all of one Familie, intreated and obtained, that they only might be imploied, as it had been in a priuate quarrell. Theſe Fabij, after ſome good ſeruices, lying incamped at Cremera, were circumuented and all ſlaine: one only of that whole houſe, had beene left, by reaſon of infancie, at home; from whom afterward ſprang Fabius Maximus, who vanquiſhed Hannibal.

In proceſſe of time, the Romans were alſo troubled with the Volſci, at the hill Algidum, two miles from Rome; where Lucius Minucius their Conſull, with his whole Armie, had beene diſcomfited, had not L. Quintius Cincinatus choſen Dictator, and taken from the plough to the higheſt honour in Rome, with ſucceſſe anſwerable to his expedition, diſperſed his enemies, and freed his Countrie in the ſpace of ſixteen dayes. In the continuance of this Volſcian warre it was, that Appius Claudius, one of the ten men, whom they had two yeares before choſen Gouernours of the State, and inactors of Solons lawes amongſt them, procured from Athens (abrogating in the meane while the Conſuls, and all other Magiſtrates) would haue rauiſhed Virginia, the daughter of T. Virginius, Captain of a Companie, and lying then in campe at Algidum. Hereupon the people, in an vproare, tooke the Hill Auentine, and after much variance, enforced the ten men, to reſigne vp their authoritie againe, to new Conſuls.

After this, either new quarrels, or deſire to reuenge old loſſes, drew the Romans into a new warre, againſt the Veientes, and their adherents, vpon whom hauing tried their forces, with diuerſitie of Captains, and varietie of euent, they vanquiſhed the Faliſci, and the Fidenates, and vtterly ſubdued the Veientes. In conquering the Faliſci, Furius Camillus ſhewed no leſſe integritie then fortitude. For when a Schoolemaſter, by trayning forth into the Roman campe, many children of the principall Citizens, thought to betray the Towne, yeelding them all vp as Hoſtages: Camillus deliuered this Traitor bound vnto his Schollers, willing them to whip him back into the Citie; which forthwith yeelded vnto him in reuerence of his juſtice. The ſiege of Veij was tenne yeares, and ſo troubleſome, that the Romans were there firſt enforced to winter abroad vnder beaſts skinnes (to which they were the more eaſily induced, becauſe then firſt they receiued pay) and to make vowes neuer to returne without victorie.

At length winning the Citie by a Mine, they got ſo large ſpoiles, that they conſecrated their tenths to Apollo Pythius: and the whole people in generall, were called to the ranſacking of the Citie. But yet they were no leſſe vnthankefull to Camillus for his ſeruice, then before they had beene to Coriolanus; For they baniſhed him the Citie, vpon ſome occaſion of inequalitie in diuiding the ſpoiles: yet he requited their vnkindneſſe with a new peece of ſeruice, againſt the furie of the Gaules: who being a populous Countrie, and verie healthfull, the fathers (as ſometimes now) liued ſo long, that the ſonnes, deſtitute of meanes, were enforced to roaue abroad, ſeeking ſome place, where to ſet vp their reſt: and withall being a Nation vaſt in body, rude by nature, and barbarous in conditions, wandred as Rouers ouer many Countries. Some of them lighting on Italie, ſet vpon Cluſium, a Towne in Hetruria; whereof Rome hauing information (and being carefull of her Confederate Townes) ſent Embaſſadours, warning them to deſiſt from ſuch iniurious enterpriſes. But the barbarous people, not regarding the meſſage, vpon ſome injurie offered by the Roman Embaſſadours, conuerted their forces from Cluſium towards Rome; and giuing a great ouerthrow to the Romans, by the Riuer Allia, vpon the ſixteenth day before the Calends of Auguſt (which day was after branded for vnluckie, and called Allienſis in the Roman Kalendar) they haſtened towards the Citie. Then was Rome the true map of miſerie and deſolation. For ſome leauing the citie; ſome creeping into holes; Prieſts hiding their reliques; and euery one ſhifting for himſelfe, ere the enemie came; Rome was abandoned, as indefenſible. The Veſtall Virgins, in this tumult, were ſafely conuaied away; the Ancients of the Citie, gathering thering boldneſſe out of deſperate feare, did put on their Robes, and taking their leaue of the world, did ſeate themſelues in Thrones, in their ſeuerall houſes, houre-ly expecting the meſſengers of death, and meaning to die, as they had liued, in State. The younger ſort, with M. Manlius their Captaine, tooke vpon them to make good the Capitoll.

By this, the Gaules were entred the Citie, who ſeeing all quiet, at firſt ſuſpected ſome ambuſh; afterward finding all ſecure, they fell to the ſpoile, committing all to the fire and ſword. As for the old Senators, that ſate in their Majeſtie, with a graue reſolution: hauing firſt reuerenced them as Gods, anon they tryed whether they would die like men. When the Citie was throughly rifled, they attempted the Capitoll: which held them worke for the ſpace of ſeuen Moneths. Once they were like to haue ſurpriſed it by night, but being deſcried by the gagling of Geeſe, M. Manlius did awaken, and kept them from entrance. At length a compoſition was agreed vpon: the Gaules being wearie, and the Romans hungrie. The bargaine was, that the Gaules ſhould take a thouſand pound waight in gold, to deſiſt from their ſiege. Whileſt the gold was in waighing, the Gaules, with open inſolencie, made their waights too heauie: Brennus, their Captaine, caſting his ſword into the ballance, and, with a proud exprobration, ſaying, that the vanquiſhed muſt bee patient perforce. But in the midſt of this cauilling, came Furius Camillus, with an Armie, from Ardea, (where he had liued in his baniſhment) and fell vpon the Gaules, with ſuch violence, that hee diſperſed their troups, quenched the fire of the Citie with their bloud, forcing them to reſtore the ſpoiles with aduantage, and forbeare the gold, in accepting which, they had lately beene ſo nice. Further, hauing rid the Citie of them, he ſo hotly purſued them, through a great part of Italie, that the remainder of their Armie, which eſcaped from him, was very ſmall. Other Armies of the Gaules, which followed this firſt, had the like ill ſucceſſe. They were often beaten by the Romans; eſpecially the victories of M. Torquatus, and of M. Valerius Corui-nus (each of which in ſingle fight, ſlew a Champion of the Gaules) abated their preſumption, and reſtored courage to the Romans. Camillus, for his notable ſeruice, was afterwards accompted a ſecond Romulus:

The people, after this deſtruction of their Citie, were earneſtly bent to goe to the Veij to inhabite; but Camillus diſſwaded them.

About the ſame time, ſomewhat before the ſiege of Veij, they changed their gouernment from Conſulls to militarie Tribunes. The gouernment of theſe alſo, after ſome yeares, was by ciuill diſſenſion interrupted: ſo that one while Conſulls ruled: another while there was an Anarchie: Then the Tribunes were reſtored and ruled againe, till after many yeares expired, the Conſular authoritie was eſtabliſhed; it being enacted, that one of the Conſulls ſhould alwaies bee a Plebeian. This was after the building of the Citie, three hundred ſixtie fiue yeares. And now Rome by ſuppreſſion of her neighbour Countries, creeping well forward out of her Minoritie, dares ſet forth againſt the warlike Samnites, who dwelt almoſt one hundred and thirtie miles off: ſituated betweene Campania and Apulia. Theſe did ſo ſtrongly inuade the Campanians their Neighbours, that they forced them to yeeld themſelues ſubiects to Rome, and vndergoe any conditions of Tribute, or whatſoeuer elſe to obtaine protection: which the Romans, although both Countries had beene their Confederates, yet not willing that the greater, like fiſh, ſhould deuour the leſſe, eaſily allowed off; aiming themſelues at the good ſituation of Campania, the aboundance of Corne and Wine, pleaſant Cities and Townes, but eſpecially Capua it ſelfe, the faireſt Citie then in all Italie.

The Families of the Papyrij and Fabij were moſt imployed in the managing of this warre, which indured the ſpace of fiftie yeares. And in this ſeaſon were the Romans oftentimes dangerouſly encountred by the Samnites, as when T. Veturius, and Sp. Poſthumius were Conſulls, and diſcomfited by Pontius at Caudium, with no ſmall ignominie: and when Q. Fabius Gurges loſt the field with three thouſand men.

But

But for these losses, many great victories made large amends: The greatest whereof were gotten by L. Papyrius, and by Quintus Fabius Maximus.

The Samnites drew the Hetrurians into their quarrell. But the force of the Samnites was well broken, ere the Hetrurians (the greater and richer, but lesse warlike Nation) beganne to stirre. So the one and the other of these two Countries, became at length, tributarie to Rome.

In the continuance of this long warre it was, (though in time of truce betweene the Romans and Samnites) that the Latines beganne to challenge equal freedome in the Corporation of Rome, and right in bearing Office, so that they required to haue one of the Consuls yearely chosen out of them.

This demand, of the Latines, was not vnreasonable. For the Romans themselues were a Latine Colonie; besides all which, they made offer, to change their name, and to be all called Romans. But the Romans were too proud, to admit any such capitulation. So a great battaile was fought betweene them: wherein the fortune of Rome preuailed, by the vertue of the Consulls.

Manlius Torquatus, and the elder Decius, were then Consulls, whom the Soothsayers aduertised, that the side should be victorious, which lost the General in fight. Hereupon, Decius the Consull, exposed his life to the Enemie, and purchased victorie (as was beleeued) by his death. In which kind of deuoting himselfe for his Armie, the sonne of this Decius, being after Consull, did imitate his father, in the Hetrurian warre. But (as Tullie well notes) it was rather the desperate resolution of these Decij, that purchased victorie, by rushing into the midst of the enemies, wherin their Souldiers followed them, than any great commendation of such a religion, as required the liues of so worthie Citizens, to be sacrificed for their Countrie. The discipline of Manlius was no lesse resolute, than the valour of Decius. He forbad any one to forsake his place, and fight single with an enemie. For breach of which order, he caused his owne sonne to be put to death, who had slaine a Captaine of the Latines, being challenged in single fight.

When the Latines, the Æqui, Volsci, Hernici, Campani, Samnites, and Hetrurians, with some other people, were brought vnder obedience; it was a vaine labour for any people of Italie, to contend against the Romans.

Yet the Sabines aduentured to trie their fortune; and found it bad. For Curius Dentatus, the Roman Consull, wasting all their Countrie with fire and sword, from the Riuer Nar and Velia, to the Adriatique Sea, brought them into quiet subjection.

The last of the Italians, that made triall of the Roman Armes, were the Tarentines, and their adherents. These had interposed themselues as Mediatours, betweene the Romans and Samnites; with a peremptorie denunciation of warre, vnto that partie, which should dare to refuse the peace by them tendred. These threats, which discouered their bad affection to Rome, ended in words; but when the Samnites were vtterly subdued, matter enough of quarrell was found, to examine their abilitie of performance.

The Romans complained, that certaine ships of theirs were robbed; and sent Embassadours vnto Tarentum, to require amends. Vpon some wrong done to these Embassadours, was laid the foundation of that Warre; wherein the Lucans, Messapians, Brutians, and Appulians, joyning with the Tarentines, procured the Samnites, and other Subiects of Rome, to rebell, and take their part. But some experience of the Roman strength, taught all these people to know their owne weakenesse. Wherefore they agreed to send for Pyrrhus, by whose aide (being a Grecian, as the Tarentines also were) great hope was conceiued, that the Dominion of Rome should bee confined, vnto more narrow bounds, than all Italie, which alreadie, in a manner it did ouer-spread.

§. II.

§. II.

How PYRRHVS warred vpon the Romans, and vanquished them in two battailes.

PYRRHVS, forsaken by the Macedonians, and vnable to deale with Lysimachus, was compelled a while to liue in rest: which he abhorred no lesse than a wiser Prince would haue desired. He had a strong Armie, and a good Fleet, which in that vnsetled estate of things, was enough to purchase a Kingdome: but the fall of Demetrius had so encreased the power of Lysimachus, that it was no point of wisedome, to make an offensiue warre vpon him, without farre greater forces. Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, held Corinth, at the same time, and some other Townes, with the remainder of his fathers Armie and treasures, left in his hand. Vpon him it is like that Pyrrhus might haue wonne; but it was better to let him alone, that hee might serue to giue some hinderance to Lysimachus.

In this want of imploiment, and couetous desire of finding it, the Tarentine Embassadours came very fitly to Pyrrhus: and they came with braue offers, as needing none other aide then his good conduct, which to obtaine, they would cast themselues vnder his protection. They had in their companie, some of the Samnites, Lucanians, Messapians, and others; which promised, in behalfe of their seuerall Nations, as much as could be desired. This encouraged Pyrrhus, and filled him with hopes of goodly conquests; that he might enlarge his Empire to the West, as farre as Alexander had gotten Eastward; and still by one victorie open the gate vnto another. To which effect it is said, that once he answered Cyneas his chiefe Counsailour, asking what he meant to doe after euery of the victories which hee hoped to get: that, hauing wonne Rome, he would soone be Master of all Italie; that, after Italie he would quickly get the Isle of Sicil; that, out of Sicil hee would passe ouer into Africk, and winne Carthage, with all the rest of the Countrie; & being strengthned with the force of all these Prouinces, hee would be too hard, for any of those, that were now so proud and troublesome. But Cyneas enquired yet further, what they should doe, when they were Lords of all: Whereunto Pyrrhus (finding his drift) answered pleasantly, that they would liue merrily; a thing (as Cyneas then told him) that they presently might doe, without any trouble, if he could be contented with his owne.

Neuertheless, this Italian expedition seemed vnto Pyrrhus, a matter of such consequence, as was not to bee omitted, in regard of any scholasticall disputation. Wherefore he prepared his Armie; of almost thirtie thousand men, well sorted, and well trained Souldiers: part of which he sent ouer before him vnder Cyneas, with the rest he followed in person. At his cõming, he found the Tarentines very prompt of tongue, but in matter of execution, vtterly careless to prouide for the Warre. Wherefore he was faine to shut vp their Theater, and other places of pleasure and resort; enforcing them to take Armes, and making such a strickt muster, as was to them very vnpleasing, though greatly behoouing to their estate.

Whilest he was occupied with these cares, Leuinus the Roman Consul drew near, and beganne to wast Lucania, a Prouince confederate with the Tarentines in this Warre.

The Lucanians were not readie to defend their owne Countrie; the Samnites were careless of the harme, that fell not (as yet) vpon themselues; the Tarentines were better prepared than they would haue beene, but their valour was little: all of these had beene accustomed to shrinke, for feare of the Roman fortitude: and therefore it fell out happily, that Pyrrhus relied more vpon his owne forces, than the issue of their vaunting promises. Hee was now driuen, either to set forward, with those that himselfe had brought into Italy, and the assistance of the Tarentines, wherein wherein little was to be repoſed; or elſe to weaken the reputation of his owne ſufficiencie, which by all meanes he was carefull to vp-hold. In good time a great part of his forces, that had beene ſcattered by foule weather at Sea, were ſafely come to him: with which he reſolued to aſſay the valour of the Romans, againſt whom hee proudly marched.

Lævinus the Conſull was not affrighted, with the terrible name of a great King; but came on confidently to meet him, and giue him battaile, ere all his adherents ſhould be ready to ioyne with him. This boldneſſe of the Roman, and the ſlackneſſe of the Meſſapians, Lucanians, Samnites, and others, whom the danger moſt concerned, cauſed Pyrrhus to offer a treatie of peace: requiring to haue the quarrel, betweene the Romans and his Italian friends, referred to his arbitrement. Whether he did this to winne time, that the Samnites and their fellowes might arriue at his Campe; or whether, conſidering better at neare diſtance, the weight of the buſineſſe, which he had taken in hand, he were deſirous to quit it with his honour; the ſhort anſwere, that was returned to his propoſition, gaue him no meanes of either the one or the other: for the Romans ſent him this word, that they had neither choſen him their Iudge, nor feared him their enemie.

Hereupon, both Armies haſtened their march vnto the Riuer of Siris: Lævinus intending to fight, before the arriuall of the Samnites; Pyrrhus, to hinder him from paſſing that Riuer, vntill his owne Armie were full. Vpon the firſt view of the Roman Campe, it was readily conceiued by Pyrrhus, that he had not now to doe with barbarous people, but with men well trained in a braue diſcipline of warre: which cauſed him to ſet a ſtrong Corps de garde, vpon the paſſage of the riuer, that he might not be compelled to fight, vntill he ſaw his beſt aduantage. But he quickly found, that this new enemie was not only skilfull in the Art of war, but couragious in execution. For the Roman Armie entred the Foord, in face of his Corps de garde; and their horſe, at the ſame time, beganne to paſſe the Riuer, in ſundrie places: which cauſed the Greekes to forſake the defence of their banke, and ſpeedily retire vnto their Campe.

This audacitie forced Pyrrhus to battaile; wherewith he thought it beſt to preſent them, ere their whole Armie had recouered firme footing, and were in order. So directing his Captaines how to marſhall his battailes; himſelfe with the horſe, charged vpon the Romans: who ſtoutly receiued him, as men well exerciſed in ſuſtaining furious impreſſions. In this fight, neither did his courage tranſport him beyond the dutie of a carefull Generall, nor his prouidence in directing others, hinder the manifeſtation of his perſonall valour. It behooued him indeede to doe his beſt; for he neuer met with better oppoſers. Once, and ſhortly after the fight began, his horſe was ſlaine vnder him: afterwards, he changed armour with a friend; but that friend paid his life for the vſe of his Kings armour, which was torne from his backe. This accident had almoſt loſt him the battaile: but he perceiuing it, diſcouered his face, and thereby reſtored courage to his men, and tooke from the Romans their vaine ioy. The fight was obſtinate, and with the greater loſſe (at leaſt of more eminent men) on Pyrrhus his ſide, as long as only ſpeare and ſword were vſed. But when the Elephants were brought into the wings, whoſe vnvſuall forme and terrible aſpect, the horſes of the Romans (vnaccuſtomed to the like) were not able to ſuſtaine; then was the victorie quickly gotten. For the Roman battailes, perceiuing their horſe put to rout, and driuen out of the field; finding alſo themſelues both charged in flanke, and ouer-borne, by the force, and huge bulke, of theſe ſtrange beaſts; gaue way to neceſſitie, and ſaued themſelues, as well as they could, by haſtie flight: in which conſternation, they were ſo forgetfull of their diſcipline, that they tarried not to defend their Campe, but ranne quite beyond it, leauing both it, and the honour of the day, entirely to Pyrrhus.

The fame of this victorie was ſoone ſpread ouer Italie; and the reputation was no leſſe than the fame. For it was a matter very rare to bee heard, that a Roman Conſull, Conſull, with a ſelect Armie, ſhould looſe in plaine battaile, not only the field, but the Campe it ſelfe, being ſo notably fortified, as they alwaies were. And this honour was the more brauely wonne by Pyrrhus, for that hee had with him none of his Italian friends, ſaue the vnwarlike Tarentines. Neither could he well diſſemble his content that he tooke, in hauing the glory of this action peculiarly his owne, at ſuch time as he blamed the Lucans and Samnites, for comming (as we ſay) a day after the faire. Neuertheleſſe, he wiſely conſidered the ſtrength of the Romans, which was ſuch, as would better endure many ſuch loſſes, than he could many ſuch victories. Therefore he thought it good to compound with them, whileſt with his honour he might; and to that purpoſe hee ſent vnto them Cyneas his Embaſſadour; demaunding only to haue the Tarentines permitted to liue at reſt, and himſelfe accepted as their eſpeciall friend. This did Cyneas, with all his cunning, and with liberall gifts, labour to effect: but neither man nor woman could be found in Rome, that would take any bribe of him; neither did their deſire of recouering their captiues, or their danger, by the riſing of many States in Italie againſt them, ſo incline them to peace, as the vehement exhortation of Appius Claudius, an old and blinde Senator, did ſtirre them vp to make good their honour by warre. So they returned anſwere, that whileſt Pyrrhus abode in Italie, they would come to no agreement with him.

Such was the report, that Cyneas made, at his returne, of the Roman puiſſance and vertue; as kindled in Pyrrhus, a great deſire of confederacie, with that gallant Citie. Hereupon many kinde Offices paſſed betweene them: but ſtill when hee vrged his motion of peace, the anſwere was, He muſt firſt depart out of Italie, and then treat of peace.

In the meane ſeaſon, each part made prouiſion for warre; the Romans leauing a more mightie armie than the former; and Pyrrhus being ſtrengthned with acceſſe vnto his forces, of all the Eaſt parts of Italie. So they came to triall of a ſecond battaile, wherein (though after long and cruell fight) the boiſterous violence of the Elephants, gaue to Pyrrhus a ſecond victorie. But this was not altogether ſo joyfull as the former had beene: rather it gaue him cauſe to ſay, that ſuch another victorie would be his vtter vndoing. For he had loſt the flower of his Armie in this battaile: and though he draue the Romans into their Campe, yet he could not force them out of it, nor ſaw any likelihood of preuailing againſt them, that were like to be relieued with daily ſupplies, whileſt he ſhould be driuen to ſpend vpon his old ſtock. Neither could hee expect, that his Elephants ſhould alwaies ſtand him in ſtead. A little knowledge of their manner in fight, would ſoone teach the Romans, that were apt Scholers in ſuch learning, how to make them vnſeruiceable. Wherefore hee deſired nothing more, than how to carrie his honour ſafe out of Italie: which to doe (ſeeing the Romans would not helpe him, by offering or accepting anie faire conditions of peace, or of truce) he tooke a ſlight occaſion, preſented by fortune, that followeth to be related.

§. III.

§. III.

The great troubles in Macedon and Sicill. How PYRRHVS, being inuited into Sicill, forsooke Italie; wanne the most of the Isle; and lost it in short space. PYRRHVS returnes into Italy; where he is beaten by the Romans, and so goes backe to his owne Kingdome.

WHen Ptolomie Ceraunus had traiterously murdered his Benefactor and Patron Seleucus, he presently seized vpon all the Dominions of Lysimachus in Europe, as if they had beene the due reward, vnto him, that had slaine the Conquerour. The houses of Cassander and Lysimachus were then fallen to the ground: neither was there in Macedon any man of strength and reputation enough, to aduance himselfe against Ceraunus. The friends of Lysimachus were rather pleased to haue him their King, that had (as hee professed) reuenged their Lords death; than any way offended with the odiousnes of his fact, by which they were freed from subiection, to one, against whom they had stood in opposition. Many there were, that vpon remembrance of his Fathers great vertue, gathered hope of finding the like in Ceraunus: perswading themselues that his raigne might proue good, though his entrance had beene wicked. These affections of the Macedonians did serue to defeate Antigonus the sonne of Demetrius, that made an attempt vpon the Kingdome. As for Antigonus, the sonne of Seleucus, he was farre off, and might be questioned about some part of Asia, ere he should be able to bring an Armie neare vnto Europe. Yet hee made great shew of meaning to reuenge his fathers death: but being stronger in monie then in armes, he was content, after a while, to take faire words, and make peace with the murtherer. While these three stroue about the Kingdome, Pyrrhus, who thought his claime as good as any of theirs, made vse of their dissention: threatning warre, or promising his assistance, to euery one of them. By these meanes he strengthned himselfe, and greatly aduantaged his Italian voiage, which he had then in hand: requesting monie of Antiochus, ships of Antigonus, and souldiers of Ptolomie, who gaue him his daughter in marriage, and lent him a strong power of Macedonian Souldiers, and of Elephants (couenanting to haue them restored at two yeeres end) more for feare than for loue: that so he might free himselfe from trouble, & quietly enjoy his Kingdom.

Thus Ptolomie grew mightie on the suddaine; and the power that by wicked meanes he had gotten, by meanes as wicked he increased.

All Macedon and Thrace being his, the strong Citie of Cassandria was held by Arsinoe his sister, the widow of Lysimachus, who lay therin with her yong children. Her hee circumuented by making loue to her, and (according to the fashion of those times, wherein Princes regarded no degree of consanguinitie) taking her to wife, with promise to adopt her children: a promise that he meant not to performe; for it was not long, ere he slew them, and draue her into exile.

In the pride of this good successe, which his villanie found; vengeance came vpon him from a farre, by the furie of a Nation, that hee had neuer heard of. Belgius a Captaine of the Gaules, hauing forced his passage through many Countries, vnto the confines of Macedon, sent a proud message to Ceraunus, commanding him to buy peace with monie, or otherwise, to looke for all the miseries of warre. These Gaules were the race of those, that issued out of their Countrie, to seeke new seates in that great expedition, wherein Brennus tooke and burnt the Citie of Rome. They had diuided themselues, at their setting forth, into two Companies; of which the one fell vpon Italie, the other passing through the Countries that lie on the Northerne side of the Adriatick Sea, made long aboade in Pannonia, and the Regions adioyning, where they forced all the neighbour Princes to redeeme peace with tribute, as now they would haue compelled Ceraunus to doe, vnto whose borders they came about an hundred and eight yeares after such time as their fellowes had taken Rome.

When their Embassadors came to Ptolomie, asking what he would giue: His answere was, that he would be contented to giue them peace, but it must bee with condition, that they should put into their hands their Princes as hostages, and yeeld vp their armes; for otherwise, he would neither pardon their boldnesse, nor giue any credit to their words. At this answere, when it was returned, the Gaules did laugh; saying, that they would soone confute with deedes, the vanitie of such proud words. It may seeme strange, that he, who had giuen away part of his Armie vnto Pyrrhus, for very feare; should bee so confident in vndertaking more mightie enemies. The King of the Dardanians offred to lend him twenty thousand men against the Gaules; but hee scorned the offer; saying, that hee had the children of those, which vnder the conduct of Alexander, had subdued all the East. Thus hee issued forth against the barbarous people, with his famous Macedonians, as if the victorie must needs haue followed the reputation of a great name. But he soone found his great errour, when it was too late. For the enemies were not only equal in strength of body, and fiercenesse of courage, but so farre superiour to the Macedonians in numbers, that few or none escaped their furie. Ptolomie himselfe grieuously wounded, fell into their hands, whilest the battell continued; and they presently strooke off his head, which they shewed to his men, on the top of a Lance, to their vtter astonishment.

The report of this great ouerthrow filled al Macedon with such desperation, that the people fled into walled Townes, and abandoned the whole Countrie as lost. Only Sosthenes, a valiant Captaine, animating as many as he could, gathered a small Armie, with which he many times got the vpper hand, and hindred Belgius from vsing the victorie at his whole pleasure. In regard of this his vertue, the Souldiers would haue made him King; which title he refused, & was content with the name of a Generall. But (as mischiefs doe seldome come alone) the good successe of Belgius, drew into Macedon, Brennus, another Captaine of the Gaules, with an hundred and fiftie thousand foot, and fiftrene thousand horse; against which mightie Armie, when Sosthenes with his weake troups made opposition, he was easily beaten, and the Macedonians againe compelled to hide themselues within their walls, leauing all their Countrie to the spoile of the Barbarians.

Thus were the Macedonians destitute of a King, and troden downe by a Nation, that they had not heard of; in lesse then fiftie yeares after the death of Alexander, who sought to discouer and subdue vnknowne Countries, as if all Greece, and the Empire of Persia had beene too little for a King of Macedon.

Very seasonably had these newes beene carried to Pyrrhus in Italie, who sought a faire pretext of relinquishing his warre with the Romans; had not other tidings out of Sicil distracted him, and carried him away in pursute of nearer hopes. For after the death of Agathocles, who ragined ouer the whole Iland, the Carthaginians sent an Armie to conquer Sicil, out of which, by him, they had beene expelled. This Armie did so fast preuaile, that the Sicilians had no other hope to auoide slaueric, than in submitting themselues to the rule of Pyrrhus; whom, being a Grecian, and a noble Prince, they thought it more for their good to obey, then to liue vnder the well knowne heauie yoake of Carthage. To him therefore, the Syracusans, Leontines, and Agragentines, principall Estates of the Isle, sent Embassadors, earnestly desiring him to take them into his protection.

It grieued Pyrrhus exceedingly, that two such notable occasions, of enlarging his Dominions, should fall out so vnluckily, both at one time. Yet whether hee thought the businesse of Sicil more important, or more full of likelihood; or whether perhaps he beleeued (as came after to passe) that his aduantage vpon Macedon would not so hastily passe away, but that he might finde some occasion to lay hold on it, at better leisure, ouer into Sicil he transported his Armie, leauing the Tarentines to shift for themselues; yet not leauing them free as he found them, but with a Garrison in their Towne, to hold them in subiection.

As

As his departure out of Italie, was rather grounded on head-long passion, than mature aduice; so were his actions following, vntill his returne vnto Epirus, rather many and tumultuous, then well ordered, or note-worthie. The Armie which he carried into that Isle, consisted of thirtie thousand foot and two thousand fiue hundred horse: with which, soone after his descent in Sicill, he forc't the Carthaginians, out of all, in effect, that they held therein. He also wonne the strong Citie of Eryx, and hauing beaten the Mamertines in battaile, hee beganne to change condition, and turne Tyrant. For he draue Sostratus (to whom his crueltie was suspect) out of the Iland, and put Thenon of Syracuse to death, being jealous of his greatnesse; which two persons had faithfully serued him, and deliuered the great and rich Citie of Syracuse into his hands. After this, his fortunes declined so fast, as hee serued himselfe, and salued the dis-reputation of his leauing Sicill, by an Embassage sent him from the Tarentines, and Samnites, imploring his present helpe against the Romans, who since his leauing Italie, had well-neare dispossest them of all that they had.

Taking this faire occasion, hee imbarked for Italie; but was first beaten by the Carthaginian Gallies, in his passage, and secondly assailed in Italie it selfe, by eighteene hundred Mamertines, that attended him in the straits of the Countrie. Lastly, after he had recouered Tarentum, hee fought a third battaile with the Romans, led by M. Curius, who was victorious ouer him, and forc't him out of Italie, into his owne Epirus.

A Prince he was farre more valiant then constant, and had hee been but a Generall of an Armie, for some other great King or State, and had been directed to haue conquered any one Country or Kingdome, it is to be thought, that he would haue purchased no lesse honour than any man of warre, either preceding or succeeding him; for a greater Captaine, or a valianter man, hath beene no where found. But he neuer staid vpon any enterprise; which was, indeede, the disease hee had, whereof not long after he died in Argos.

§. IIII.

How ANTIGONVS, the sonne of DEMETRIVS, deliuered Macedon from the Gaules. How PYRRHVS wonne the Kingdome of Macedon from ANTIGONVS.

THe vertue of Sosthenes being too weake, to defend the Kingdome of Macedon; and the fortune which had accompanied him against Belgius, failing him in his attempts against Brennus: the Macedonians were no lesse glad to submit themselues vnto the gouernmēt of Antigonus, than they had formerly beene desirous to free themselues from the impotent rule of his father Demetrius. His comming into the Countrie, with an Armie, Nauie, and treasure beseeming a King, did rather breed good hope in the people, than fill them with much confidence: for he was driuen to vse against the Barbarians, only those forces, which he brought with him, hauing none other than good wishes of the Macedons, to take his part. Brennus, with the maine strength of his Armie, was gone to spoile the Temple of Apollo at Delphos, hauing left no more behinde him, than he thought necessarie to guard the borders of Macedon, and Pannonia; which were about fifteene thousand foot, and three thousand horse. These could not be idle, but thought to get somewhat for themselues, in the absence of their fellowes: and therefore sent vnto Antigonus, offering to sel him peace, if hee would pay well for it; which by the example of Ceraunus, hee had learnt (as they thought) not to refuse. Antigonus was vnwilling to weaken his reputation, by condescending to their proud demāds: yet he judged it vnfit to exasperat their furious choler, by vncurteous words or vsage, as Ceraunus had ouer-fondly done. Wherfore he entertained their Embassadors in very louing and sumptuous maner, with a roiall feast: wherein he exposed to their view, such aboundance of massie gold and siluer, that they were not so much delighted with the meat, as with sight of the vessells, wherein it was serued. He thought hereby, to make them vnderstand, how great a Prince he was, and how able, if need required, to wage a mighty Armie.

To which end, he likewise did shew vnto them, his Camp and Nauie, but especially his Elephants. But all this brauerie serued only to kindle their greedie appetites; who seeing his ships heauy loaden, his Campe full of wealth, and ill fortified, himselfe (as it seemed) secure, and his men, both in strength and courage inferiour vnto the Gaules, thought all time lost, wherein they suffered the present possessors, to spend the riches which they accompted assuredly their owne. They returned therefore to their Companions, with none other newes in their mouthes, than of spoile and purchase: which tale, carried the Gaules head-long, to Antigonus his camp, where they expected a greater bootie, then the victorie ouer Ceraunus had giuen to Belgius. Their comming was terrible and suddaine; yet not so suddaine, but that Antigonus had notice of it, who distrusting the courage of his owne men, dislodged somewhat before their arriual, and conueighed himselfe, with his whole armie and carriage, into certaine woods adjoyning, where he lay close.

The Gaules, finding his Camp forsaken, were not hastie to pursue him, but fell to ransacking the emptie Cabbines of the Souldiers; in hope of finding all that was either lost or hidden. At length, when they had searched euery place in vaine, angrie at their lost labour, they marched with all speed toward the Sea-side; that they might fall vpon him, whilest he was busie in getting his men and carriages a ship-board. But the successe was no way answerable to their expectation. For being proud of the terrour which they had brought vpon Antigonus, they were so careless of the Sea-men, that without all order, they fell to the spoile of what they found on the shore, and in such ships as lay on ground.

Part of the Armie had left Antigonus, where he lay in couert; and had saued it self by getting aboard the fleet: in which number were some well experienced men of warre: who discouering the much aduantage offred vnto them, by the desperate presumption of their enemies, tooke courage, and encouraged others, to lay manlie hold vpon the opportunitie. So the whole number, both of Souldiers and Mariners, landing together, with great resolution, gaue so braue a charge vpon the disordered Gaules, that their contemptuous boldnesse was thereby changed into suddaine feare, and they, after a great slaughter, driuen to cast themselues into the seruice of Antigonus.

The fame of this victorie, caused all the barbarous Nations in those quarters, to re-entertaine their ancient beliefe of the Macedonian valour: by which, the terrible and resistlesse oppressors of so many Countries, were ouerthrowne.

To speake more of the Gaules, in this place; and to shew how, about these times, three Tribes of them passed ouer into Asia the lesse, with their warres and conquests there; I hold it needlesse: the victorious armes of the Romans, taming them hereafter, in the Countries which now they wanne, shall giue better occasion, to rehearse these matters briefly.

Howsoeuer the good successe of Antigonus got him reputation, among the barbarous people, yet his owne Souldiers, that without his leading, had wonne this victorie, could not thereupon be perswaded to thinke him a good man of warre: knowing that he had no interest in the honour of the seruice, wherein his conduct was no better, then creeping into a wood.

This (as presently will appeare) was greatly helpfull vnto Pyrrhus: though as yet he knew not so much. For Pyrrhus, when his affaires in Italie stood vpon hard termes, had sent vnto Antigonus for helpe: not without threats, in case it were denied. So was he sure to get, either a supply, where with to continue his war against the Romans, or some seeming honourable pretence, to forsake Italie, vnder colour of making making his word good, in seeking reuenge. The threats which he had vsed in brauerie, meere necessitie forced him, at his returne into Epirus, to put in practise.

He brought home with him, eight thousand foot, and fiue hundred horse: an armie too little to be employed, by his restlesse nature, in any action of importance; yet greater then he had meanes to keepe in pay. Therefore he fell vpon Macedon; intending to take what spoile he could get, and make Antigonus compound with him, to be freed from trouble. At his first entrance into this businesse, two thousand of Antigonus his Soudiers, reuolted vnto Pyrrhus; and many Cities, either willingly or perforce, receiued him. Such faire beginnings, easily perswaded the courage of this daring Prince, to set vpon Antigonus himselfe, and to hazard his fortune, in triall of a battaile, for the whole Kingdome of Macedon.

It appeares, that Antigonus had no desire to fight with this hot warriour; but thought it the wisest way, by protracting of time, to wearie him out of the Countrie. For Pyrrhus ouertooke him in a straight passage, and charged him in the reare; wherein were the Gaules, and the Elephants, which were thought the best of his strength: a manifest proofe that he was in retrait. The Gaules very brauely sustayned Pyrrhus his impression; yet were broken at length (when most of them were slaine) after a sharpe fight: wherein it seemes, that Antigonus keeping his Macedonian Phalanx within the streight, and not aduancing to their succour, tooke away their courage, by deceiuing their expectation. The Captaines of the Elephants were taken soone after; who finding themselues exposed to the same violence that had consumed so many of the Gaules, yeelded themselues and the beasts. All this was done in full view of Antigonus, and his Macedonians, to their great discomfort: which emboldened Pyrrhus, to charge them where they lay in their strength. Where the Phalanx could be charged only in a front, it was a matter of extreme difficultie (if not impossible) to force it. But the Macedonians had seene so much, that they had no desire to fight against Pyrrhus; who discouered so well their affections, that hee aduentured to draw neare in person, and exhort them to yeeld. Neither the common Souldier, nor any Leader, refused to become his follower. All forsooke Antigonus, a few horse-men excepted, that fled along with him to Thessalonica; where he had some small forces left, and monie enough to entertaine a greater power, had he known where to leauie it. But whilest he was thinking how to allure a sufficient number of the Gaules into his seruice; whereby hee might repaire his losse: Ptolomie, the sonne of Pyrrhus, came vpon him, and easily defeating his weake forces, draue him to flie from the parts about Macedon, to those Townes a farre off in Peloponnesus, in which hee had formerly lurked, before such time as he looked abroad into the world, and made himselfe a King.

This good successe reuiued the spirits of the Epirot, and caused him to forget all sorrow, of his late mis-fortunes in the Roman warre: so that he sent for his sonne Helenus (whom he had left with a Garrison, in the Castle of Tarentum) willing him to come ouer into Greece, where was more matter of conquest, and let the Italians shift for themselues.

§. V.

How PYRRHVS assailed Sparta without successe. His enterprise vpon Argos, and his death.

PYRRHVS had now conceiued a great hope, that nothing should bee able to withstand him; seeing, that in open fight, he had vanquished the Gaules, beaten Antigonus, and won the Kingdome of Macedon; There was not in all Greece, nor, indeede, in all the Lands that Alexander had wonne, any Leader of such name and worth, as deserued to be set vp against him: which filled him with the opinion that he might do what he pleased. He raised therefore an Armie, consisting of fiue and twenty thousand foot, two thousand horse, and foure and twentie Elephants; pretending warre against Antigonus, and the giuing libertie to those Townes in Peloponnesus, which the same Antigonus held in subiection; though it was easily discouered, that such great preparations were made, for accomplishment of some designe more important, then warre against a Prince alreadie vanquished, and almost vterly dejected. Especially the Lacedæmonians feared this expedition, as made against their State. For Cleonymus, one of their Kings, being expelled out of his Countrie, had betaken himselfe to Pyrrhus: who readily entertained him, and promised to restore him to his Kingdome. This promise was made in secret; neither would Pyrrhus make shew of any displeasure that he bare vnto Sparta; but contrariwise professed, that it was his intent, to haue two of his owne yonger sonnes trained vp in that Citie, as in a place of noble discipline. With such colours he deluded men, euen till he entred vpon Laconia; where presently he demeaned himselfe as an open enemie: excusing himselfe and his former dissembling words, with a jeast; That he followed herein the Lacedæmonian custome, of concealing what was truly purposed. It had been, indeed, the manner of the Lacedæmonians, to deale in like sort with others, whom, in the time of their greatnesse, they sought to oppresse: but now they complained of that, as falsehood, in Pyrrhus, which they alwaies practised as wisdome, till it made them distrusted, forsaken, and almost contemptible. Neuertheless, they were not wanting to themselues in this dangerous extremitie. For the old men and women laboured in fortifying the Towne; causing such as could beare armes, to reserue themselues fresh against the assault: which Pyrrhus had vnwisely deferred, vpon assurance of preuailing.

Sparta was neuer fortified, before this time, otherwise then with armed Citizens: soone after this (it being built vpon vneuen ground, and for the most part, hard to approach) the lower and more accessible places, were fenced with walls; at the present, only trenches were cast, and barricadoes made with Carts, where the entrance seemed most easy. Three daies together it was assailed by Pyrrhus, exceeding fiercely; and no lesse stoutly defended. The desperate courage of the Citizens preserued the Towne the first day; wherinto the violence of Pyrrhus had forced entrance the second day, but that his wounded horse threw him to the ground, which made his Souldiers more mindfull of sauing the person of their King, than of breaking into the Citie, though alreadie they had torne in sunder the barricadoes. Presently after this, one of Antigonus his Captaines got into Sparta with a good strength of men; and Areus the King returned out of Crete (where he had been helping his friends in warre) with two thousand men, little knowing the danger, in which his owne countrie stood, vntill he was almost at home. These succours did not more animate the Spartans, then kindle in Pyrrhus a desire to preuaile against all impediments. But the third daies worke shewed, how great his error had beene, in forbearing to assault the Towne at his first comming. For he was so manfully repelled, that he saw no likelihood of getting the place, otherwise than by a long siege: in which tedious course he had no desire to spend his time.

Antigonus had now raised an Armie, though not strong enough to meet the enemie in plaine field, yet able to hinder all his purposes. This made Pyrrhus doubtfull what way to take; being diuersly affected, by the difficultie of his enterprise in hand, and the shame of taking a repulse in his first attempt. Whilest hee was thus perplexed, letters came from Argos, inuiting him thither; with promise, to deliuer that Citie into his hands.

Ciuill dissension raging then hotly in Argos, caused the heads of seuerall factions to call in Pyrrhus and Antigonus; but the comming of these two Princes, taught the Citizens wit, and made them desirous to rid their hand of such powerfull Assistants, as each of the two Kings pretended himselfe to be. Antigonus told the Argiues, that he came to saue them from the tyrannie of Pyrrhus; and that hee would be gone if they needed not his helpe. On the other ſide, Pyrrhus would needes perſwade them, that he had none other errand, than to make them ſafe from Antigonus; offering in like manner, to depart, if they ſo deſired.

The Argiues tooke ſmall pleaſure, in hearing the Foxe and Kite at ſtrife, which of them ſhould keepe the Chickins from his enemie: and therefore prayed them both, to diuert their powers ſome other way. Hereunto Antigonus readily condeſcended, and gaue Hoſtages to aſſure his word: for he was the weaker, and ſtood in neede of good-will. But Pyrrhus thought it enough to promiſe: Hoſtages he would giue none, to his inferiours: eſpecially, meaning deceipt. This made them ſuſpect his purpoſe to be ſuch, as, indeede, it was. Yet he leſſe regarded their opinions, than to hold them worthie of aſſurance, by giuing ſuch a bond, as hee intended to breake ere the next morning.

It was concluded, that a Gate of the Citie ſhould be opened by night vnto Pyrrhus, by his Complices within Argos: which was accordingly performed. So his Armie, without any tumult, entred the Citie: till the Elephants, with Towers on their backs, cloyed the way, being too high to paſſe the Gate. The taking off, and ſetting on againe, of thoſe Towers, with the trouble thereto belonging, did both giue alarme to the Citie, and ſome leiſure to take order for defence, before ſo many were entred, as could fully maſter it. Argos was full of ditches, which greatly hindred the Gaules (that had the Vantgarde) being ignorant of the waies, in the darke night. The Citizens, on the other ſide, had much aduantage, by their knowledge of euery by-paſſage: and ſetting vpon the enemies on all ſides, did put them to great loſſe, and more trouble.

Pyrrhus therefore, vnderſtanding by the confuſed noiſe, and vnequall ſhoutings of his owne men, that they were in diſtreſſe, entred the Citie in perſon, to take order for their reliefe, and aſſurance of the place. But the darkeneſſe, the throng, and many other impediments, kept him from doing any thing of moment, vntill breake of day. Then beganne he to make his paſſage by force, and ſo farre preuailed, that he got into the Market-place. It is ſaid, that ſeeing in that place, the Image of a Wolfe and a Bull, in ſuch poſture as if they had beene combattant, hee called to minde an Oracle, which threatned him with death, when he ſhould behold a Bull fighting with a Wolfe: and that hereupon he made retrait.

Indeede, the comming of Antigonus to the reſcue, the diſorder and confuſion of his owne men; with diuers ill accidents, gaue him reaſonable cauſe to haue retired out of the Citie, though the Wolfe and Bull had beene away. The tumult was ſuch, that no directions could be heard; but as ſome gaue back, ſo did others thruſt forward, and the Argiues preſſing hard vpon him, forced Pyrrhus to make good his retrait, with his owne ſword. The tops of the houſes were couered with women, that ſtood looking on the fight. Among theſe was one, that ſaw her owne ſonne in dangerous caſe, fighting with Pyrrhus. Wherefore, ſhee tooke a tile-ſtone, or ſlate, and threw it ſo violently downe on the head of Pyrrhus, that hee fell to ground aſtoniſhed with the blow; and lying in that caſe, had his head cut off.

Thus ended the reſtleſſe ambition of Pyrrhus, together with his life: and thus returned the Kingdome of Macedon to Antigonus; who forthwith poſſeſſed the armie, the bodie, and the children of his enemie. The bodie of Pyrrhus had honourable funerall, and was giuen by Antigonus vnto Helenus his ſonne; which yong Prince he graciouſly ſent home, into his Fathers Kingdome of Epirus. From this time forwards, the race of Antigonus held the Kingdome of Macedon; the poſteritie of Seleucus raigned ouer Aſia and Syria; and the houſe of Ptolomie had quiet poſſeſſion of Egypt: vntill ſuch time, as the Citie of Rome, ſwallowing all vp, digeſted theſe, among other Countries, into the bodie of her owne Empire.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORIE OF THE WORLD:

INTREATING OF THE TIMES FROM the setled rule of ALEXANDERS Successors in the East, vntill the ROMANS, preuailing ouer all, made Conquest of ASIA and MACEDON.

THE FIFT BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of the first Punicke Warre.

§. I.

A discussion of that probleme of LIVIE; Whether the Romans could haue resisted the great ALEXANDER. That neither the Macedonian nor the Roman Souldier, was of equall valour to the English.

HAT question handled by LIVIE, Whether the great ALEXANDER could haue preuailed against the Romans, if after his Easterne conquest, he had bent all his forces against them, hath beene, and is, the subject of much dispute; which (as it seemes to me) the arguments on both sides do not so well explane, as doth the experience that Pyrrhus hath giuen, of the Roman power, in his daies. For, if he, a Commander (in Hannibals judgement) inferior to Alexander, though to none else, could with small strength of men, and little store of monie, or of other needfull helps in warre, vanquish them in two battailes, and endanger their estate, when it was well setled, and held the best part of Italie, vnder a confirmed obedience: what would Alexander haue done, that was aboundantly prouided of all which is needfull full to a Conquerour, wanting only matter of emploiment, comming vpon them before their Dominion was halfe so well setled. It is easie to say, that Alexander had no more, than thirty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse (as indeede, at his first passage into Asia, he carried ouer, not many more) and that the rest of his followers were no better than base effeminate Asiatiques. But he that considers the Armies of Perdiccas, Antipater, Craterus, Eumenes, Ptolomie, Antigonus, & Lysimachus, with the actions by them performed, euery one of which (to omit others) commanded only some fragment of this dead Emperours power; shall easily finde, that such a reckoning is farre short of the truth.

It were needlesse to speake of Treasure, Horses, Elephants, Engines of batterie, and the like: of all which, the Macedonian had aboundance; the Roman hauing nought, saue men and armes. As for Sea-forces; he that shall consider after what sort the Romans, in their first Punick warre, were trained, in the rudiments of Nauigation; sitting vpon the shoare, and beating the sand with poles, to practise the stroke of the Oare, as not daring to lanch their ill-built vessels into the Sea; will easily conceiue, how farre too weake they would haue proued in such seruices.

Now for helpers in warre; I doe not see, why all Greece and Macedon, being absolutely commanded by Alexander, might not well deserue to be laid in ballance, against those parts of Italie, which the Romans held in ill-assured subiection. To omit therefore all benefit, that the Easterne world, more wealthie, indeede, than valiant, could haue affoorded vnto the Macedonian: let vs only conjecture, how the States of Sicill and Carthage, neareſt neighbours to such a quarrell (had it happened) would haue stood affected. The Sicilians were, for the most part, Græcians; neither is it to bee doubted, that they would readily haue submitted themselues vnto him, that ruled all Greece besides them. In what termes they commonly stood, and how ill they were able to defend themselues, it shal appeare anon. Sure it is, that Alexanders comming into those parts, would haue brought excessiue joy, to them that were faine to get the helpe of Pyrrhus, by offering to become his subiects. As for the Carthaginians; if Agathocles, the Tyrant of Syracuse, hated of his people, and ill able to defend his owne besieged Citie, could, by aduenturing to saile into Africk, put their Dominion, yea and Carthage it selfe, in extreme hazard; shall wee thinke that they would haue beene able to withstand Alexander? But, why doe I question their abilitie, seeing that they sent Embassadours, with their submission, as farre as Babylon, ere the warre drew neare them? Wherefore it is manifest, that the Romans must, without other succour, than perhaps of some few Italian friends (of which yet there were none, that forsooke them not, at some time, both before and after this) haue opposed their valour, and good militarie discipline, against the power of all Countries, to them knowne, if they would haue made resistance. How they could haue sped well, in vndertaking such a match; it is vneasie to finde in discourse of humane reason. It is true; that vertue and fortune worke wonders: but it is against cowardly fooles, and the vnfortunate: for whosoeuer contends with one too mightie for him; either must excell in these, as much as his enemie goes beyond him in power; or else must looke, both to be ouer-come, and to be cast downe so much the lower, by how much the opinion of his fortune and vertue renders him suspected, as likely to make head another time against the vanquisher. Whether the Roman, or the Macedonian, were in those daies the better Souldier, I will not take vpon me to determine: though I might, without partialitie, deliuer mine owne opinion, and preferre that Armie, which followed not onely Philip and Alexander, but also Alexanders Princes afrer him, in the greatest dangers of all sorts of warre; before any, that Rome either had, or in long time after did send forth. Concerning fortune; who can giue a rule that shall alwaies hold? Alexander was victorious in euery battaile that he fought: and the Romans in the issue of euery warre. But forasmuch as Liuie hath judged this a matter worthie of consideration; I thinke it a great part of Romes good fortune, that Alexander came not into Italie: where in three yeares after his death, the two Roman Conſulls, together with all the power of that State, were ſurprized by the Samnites, and enforced to yeeld vp their armes. We may therefore permit Liuie to admire his owne Romans, and to compare with Alexander thoſe Captaines of theirs, which were honoured ſufficiently, in being thought equal to his followers: that the ſame conceit ſhould blind our judgement, we cannot permit without much vanitie.

Now in deciding ſuch a controuerſie, me thinks it were not amiſſe, for an Engliſhman, to giue ſuch a ſentence betweene the Macedonians and Romans, as the Romans once did (being choſen Arbitrators) betweene the Ardeates and Aricini, that ſtroue about a piece of land; ſaying, that it belonged vnto neither of them, but vnto the Romans themſelues. Liuie Dec. 1. l. 3.

If therefore it be demanded, whether the Macedonian, or the Roman, were the beſt VVarriour? I will anſwere: The Engliſhmen. For it will ſoone appeare, to any that ſhall examine the noble acts of our Nation in warre, that they were performed by no aduantage of weapon; againſt no ſauage or vnmanlie people; the enemie being farre ſuperiour vnto vs in numbers, and all needfull prouiſions, yea as well trained as we, or commonly better, in the exerciſe of warre.

In what ſort Philip wanne his Dominion in Greece; what manner of men the Perſians and Indians were; whom Alexander vanquiſhed; as likewiſe of what force the Macedonian Phalanx was, and how well appointed, againſt ſuch armes as it commonly encountred: any man, that hath taken paines to reade the foregoing ſtorie of them, doth ſufficiently vnderſtand. Yet was this Phalanx neuer, or very ſeldome, able to ſtand, againſt the Roman Armies: which were embattailed in ſo excellent a forme, as I know not, whether any Nation beſides them haue vſed, either before or ſince. The Roman weapons likewiſe, both offenſiue and defenſiue, were of greater vſe, than thoſe with which any other Nation hath ſerued, before the fierie inſtruments of Gunne-powder were knowne. As for the enemies, with which Rome had to doe: we finde, that they, which did ouer-match her in numbers, were as farre ouer-matched by her, in weapons; and that they, of whom ſhe had little aduantage in armes, had as little aduantage of her in multitude. This alſo (as Plutarch well obſerueth) was a part of her happineſſe; that ſhee was neuer ouer-laied with too great warres at once.

Hereby it came to paſſe, that hauing at firſt increaſed her ſtrength, by acceſſion of the Sabines; hauing wonne the State of Alba, againſt which ſhee aduentured her owne ſelfe, as it were in wager, vpon the heads of three Champions: and hauing thereby made her ſelfe Princeſſe of Latium: ſhee did afterwards, by long warre, in many ages, extend her Dominion ouer all Italie. The Carthaginians had well-neare oppreſſed her: but their Souldiers were Mercinarie; ſo that for want of proper ſtrength, they were eaſily beaten at their owne doores. The Ætolians, and with them all, or the moſt of Greece, aſſiſted her againſt Philip the Macedonian: hee being beaten, did lend her his helpe, to beat the ſame Ætolians. The warres againſt Antiochus, and other Aſiatiques, were ſuch as gaue to Rome ſmall cauſe of boaſt, though much of joy: for thoſe oppoſites were as baſe of courage, as the lands which they held were aboundant of riches. Sicil, Spaine, and all Greece, fell into her hands by vſing her aide, to protect them againſt the Carthaginians and Macedonians.

I ſhall not neede to ſpeake of her other conqueſts: it was eaſie to get more when ſhee had gotten all this. It is not my purpoſe to diſgrace the Roman valour (which was very noble) or to blemiſh the reputation of ſo many famous victories: I am not ſo idle. This I ſay; that among all their warres, I finde not any, wherein their valour hath appeared, comparable to the Engliſh. If my judgement ſeeme ouer-partiall; our warres in France may helpe to make it good.

Firſt, therefore it is well knowne; that Rome (or perhaps all the world beſides) had neuer any ſo braue a Commander in warre, as Iulius Cæſar: and that no Roman armie was comparable vnto that, which ſerued vnder the ſame Cæſar. Likewiſe, it is apparent, that this gallant Armie, which had giuen faire proofe of the Roman courage, in good performance of the Heluetian warre, when it first entred into Gaule; was neuertheleſſe vtterly diſheartned, when Cæſar led it againſt the Germans. So that we may juſtly impute, all that was extraordinarie in the valour of Cæſars men, to their long exerciſe, vnder ſo good a Leader, in ſo great a warre. Now let vs in generall, compare with the deeds done by theſe beſt of Roman Souldiers, in their principall ſeruice; the things performed in the ſame Countrie, by our common Engliſh Souldiers, leauied in haſte, from following the Cart, or ſitting on the ſhop-ſtall: ſo ſhall we ſee the difference. Herein will we deale fairely, and beleeue Cæſar, in relating the acts of the Romans: but will call the French Hiſtorians to witneſſe, what actions were performed by the Engliſh. In Cæſars time, France was inhabited by the Gaules, a ſtout people, but inferiour to the French, by whom they were ſubdued; euen when the Romans gaue them aſſiſtance. The Countrie of Gaule was rent in ſunder (as Cæſar witneſſeth) into many Lordſhips: ſome of which were gouerned by pettie Kings, others by the multitude, none ordered in ſuch ſort as might make it appliable to the neareſt Neighbour. The factions were many, and violent: not only in generall through the whole Countrie, but betweene the pettie States, yea in euery Citie, and almoſt in euery houſe. What greater aduantage could a Conquerour deſire? Yet there was a greater. Arioviſtus, with his Germans, had ouer-runne the Countrie, and held much part of it in a ſubjection, little different from meere ſlauerie: yea, ſo often had the Germans preuailed in warre vpon the Gaules, that the Gaules (who had ſometimes beene the better Souldiers) did hold themſelues no way equall to thoſe daily Inuaders. Had France beene ſo prepared vnto our Engliſh Kings, Rome it ſelfe, by this time, and long ere this time, would haue beene ours. But when King Edward the third beganne his warre vpon France, hee found the whole Countrie ſetled in obedience to one mightie King; a King whoſe reputation abroade, was no leſſe than his puiſſance at home; vnder whoſe Enſigne, the King of Bohemia did ſerue in perſon; at whoſe call, the Genowayes, and other Neighbour States, were readie to take armes: finally, a King, vnto whom one [a] Prince gaue away his Dominion, for loue; [b] another ſold away a goodly Citie and Territorie for monie. The Countrie lying ſo open to the Roman, and being ſo well fenced againſt the Engliſh; it is note-worthy, not who preuailed moſt therein (for it were meere vanitie, to match the Engliſh purchaſes, with the Roman conqueſt) but whether of the two gaue the greater proofe of militarie vertue. Cæſar himſelfe doth witneſſe, that the Gaules complained of their owne ignorance in the Art of warre, and that their owne hardineſſe was ouer-maſtered, by the skill of their enemies. Poore men, they admired the Roman Towers, and Engines of batterie, raiſed and planted againſt their walls, as more than humane workes. What greater wonder is it, that ſuch a people was beaten by the Roman; than that the Caribes, a naked people, but valiant, as any vnder the skie, are commonly put to the worſe, by ſmall numbers of Spaniards? Beſides all this, we are to haue regard, of the great difficultie that was found, in drawing all the Gaules, or any great part of them, to one head, that with joynt forces they might oppoſe their aſſailants: as alſo the much more difficultie, of holding them long together. For hereby it came to paſſe, that they were neuer able to make vſe of oportunitie: but ſometimes compelled to ſtay for their fellowes; and ſometimes driuen, to giue or take battaile, vpon extreme diſaduantages, for feare, leaſt their Companies ſhould fall aſunder: as indeede, vpon any little diſaſter, they were readie to breake, and returne euery one to the defence of his owne. All this, and (which was little leſſe than all this) great oddes in weapon, gaue to the Romans, the honour of many gallant victories. What ſuch helpe? or what other worldly help, than the golden metall of their Souldiers, had our Engliſh Kings againſt the French? Were not the French as well experienced in feats of VVarre? Yea, did they not thinke themſelues therein our ſuperiours? VVere they not in armes, in horſe, and in all prouiſion, exceedingly beyond vs?

Let

Let vs heare, what a French writer ſaith, of the inequalitie that was betweene the French and Engliſh, when their King Iohn was readie to giue the on-ſet, vpon the Blacke Prince, at the battaile of Poitiers. IOHN had all aduantages ouer EDWARD, both of number, force, ſhew, Countrie, and conceit (the which is commonly a conſideration of no ſmall importance in worldly affaires) and withall, the choiſe of all his horſe-men (eſteemed then the beſt in Europe) with the greateſt and wiſeſt Captaines of his whole Realme. And what could he wiſh more? Iohn de Serres.

IEAN auoit tout l'auantage par deſſus EDOVARD, le nombre, la force, le luſtre, le pays, le preiuge (qui n'eſt pas communement vne conſideration de peu d'importãce aux affaires du monde) & auec ſoi l'elite de ſa Cauallerie, lors eſtimee la meilleure de tout ſon Royaume.

I thinke, it would trouble a Roman antiquarie, to finde the like example in their Hiſtories; the example, I ſay, of a King, brought priſoner to Rome, by an Armie of eight thouſand, which he had ſurrounded with fortie thouſand, better appointed, and no leſſe expert warriours. This I am ſure of; that neither Syphax the Numidian, followed by a rabble of halfe Scullions, as Liuie rightly tearmes them, nor thoſe cowardly Kings Perſeus and Gentius, are worthie patternes. All that haue read of Creſſie and Agincourt, will beare me witneſſe, that I doe not alleage the battaile of Poitiers, for lacke of other, as good examples of the Engliſh vertue: the proof whereof hath left many a hundred better marks, in all quarters of France, than euer did the valour of the Romans. If any man impute theſe victories of ours to the long Bow, as carrying farther, piercing more ſtrongly, and quicker of diſcharge than the French Croſſe-bow: my anſwere is readie; that in all theſe reſpects, it is alſo (being drawne with a ſtrong arme) ſuperiour to the Musket; yet is the Musket a weapon of more vſe. The Gunne, and the Croſſe-bow, are of like force, when diſcharged by a Boy or Woman, as when by a ſtrong Man: weakeneſſe, or ſickeneſſe, or a ſore finger, makes the Long-Bow vnſeruiceable. More particularly, I ſay, that it was the cuſtome of our Anceſtors, to ſhoot, for the moſt part, point blanck: and ſo ſhall he perceiue, that will note the circumſtances of almoſt any one battaile. This takes away all objection: for when two Armies are within the diſtance of a Butts length, one flight of arrowes, or two at the moſt can be deliuered before they cloſe. Neither is it in generall true, that the long Bow reacheth farther, or that it pierceth more ſtrongly than the Croſſe-bow: But this is the rare effect of an extraordinarie arme; whereupon can be grounded no common rule. If any man ſhall aske, How then came it to paſſe, that the Engliſh wanne ſo many great battailes, hauing no aduantage to helpe him? I may, with beſt commendation of modeſtie, referre him to the French Hiſtorian: who relating the victorie of our men at Creuant, where they paſſed a bridge, in face of the enemie, vſeth theſe words; The Engliſh comes with a conquering brauerie, as he, that was accuſtomed to gaine euery where, without any ſtay: hee forceth our garde, placed vpon the bridge, to keepe the paſſage. Or I may cite another place of the ſame Authour, where hee tells, how the Britons, being inuaded by Charles the eighth, King of France, thought it good policie, to apparel a thouſand and two hundred of their owne men in Engliſh Caſſocks; hoping that the very ſight of the Engliſh red Croſſe, would be enough to terrifie the French. But I will not ſtand to borrow of the French Hiſtorians (all which, excepting De Serres, and Paulus Æmylius; report wonders of our Nation) the propoſition which firſt I vndertooke to maintaine; That the militarie vertue of the Engliſh, preuailing againſt all manner of difficulties, ought to be preferred before that of Romans, which was aſſiſted with all aduantages that could be deſired. If it be demanded; why then did not our Kings finiſh the conqueſt, as Cæſar had done? my anſwere may bee (I hope without offence) that our Kings were like to the race of the Æacida, of whom the old Poet Ennius gaue this note; Belli potentes ſunt magè quam ſapienti potentes; They were more warlike than politique. Who ſo notes their proceedings, may finde that none of them went to worke like a Conquerour: ſaue only King Henrie the fift, the courſe of whoſe victories, it pleaſed God to interrupt by his death. But this queſtion is the more eaſily anſwered, if another be firſt made. Why did not the Romans attempt the conqueſt of Gaule, before the time of Cæſar? why not after the Macedonian warre? why not after the third Punick, or after the Numantian? At all theſe times they had good lei-ſure: and then eſpecially had they both leiſure, and fit oportunitie, when vnder the conduct of Marius, they had newly vanquiſhed the Cimbri, and Teutones, by whom the Countrie of Gaule had beene pittiouſly waſted. Surely, the words of Tullie were true; that with other Nations, the Romans fought for Dominion; with the Gaules, for preſeruation of their owne ſafetie.

Therefore they attempted not the conqueſt of Gaule, vntill they were Lords of al other Countries, to them knowne. We on the other ſide, held only the one halfe of our owne Iland; the other halfe being inhabited by a Nation (vnleſſe perhaps in wealth and numbers of men ſomewhat inferiour) euery way equal to our ſelues; a Nation anciently & ſtrongly allied to our enemies the French, and in that regard, enemie to vs. So that our danger lay both before and behinde vs: and the greater danger at our backs; where commonly we felt, alwaies we feared, a ſtronger inuaſion by land, than we could make vpon France, tranſporting our forces ouer Sea.

It is vſual, with men, that haue pleaſed themſelues, in admiring the matters which they finde in ancient Hiſtories; to hold it a great injurie done to their judgement, if any take vpon him, by way of compariſon, to extoll the things of later ages. But I am well perſwaded, that as the diuided vertue of this our Iland, hath giuen more noble proofe of it ſelfe; than vnder ſo worthie a Leader, that Roman Armie could doe, which afterwards could win Rome, and al her Empire, making Cæſar a Monarch; ſo hereafter, by Gods bleſſing, who hath conuerted our greateſt hindrance, into our greateſt helpe, the enemie that ſhall dare to trie our forces, will finde cauſe to wiſh, that auoiding vs, he had rather encountred as great a puiſſance, as was that of the Roman Empire. But it is now high time, that laying a-ſide compariſons, we returne to the rehearſal of deeds done: wherein we ſhall finde, how Rome began, after Pyrrhus had left Italie, to ſtriue with Carthage for Dominion, in the firſt Punick warre.

§. II.

The eſtate of Carthage, before it entred into warre with Rome.

THE Citie of Carthage had ſtood aboue ſixe hundred yeares, when firſt it beganne to contend with Rome, for the maſtrie of Sicil. It forewent Rome one hundred and fifty yeares in antiquity of foundation: but in the honour of great atchiuements, it excelled farre beyond this aduantage of time. For Carthage had extended her Dominion in Africa it ſelfe, from the weſt part of Cyrene, to the ſtreights of Hercules, about one thouſand and fiue hundred miles in length, wherein ſtood three hundred Cities. It had ſubiected all Spaine, euen to the Pyrenæan Mountaines, together with all the Ilands in the Mediterran Sea, to the weſt of Sicil; and of Sicil, the better part. It flouriſhed about ſeuen hundred and thirtie yeare, before the deſtruction therof by Scipio: who beſides other ſpoiles, and all that the Souldiers reſerued, carried thence foure hundred & ſeuentie thouſand weight of ſiluer, which make of our monie (if our pounds differ not) fourteene hundred and ten thouſand pound ſterling. So as this glorious Citie ranne the ſame fortune, which many other great ones haue done, both before and ſince. The ruine of the goodlieſt pieces of the world, fore-ſhewes the diſſolution of the whole.

About one hundred yeares after ſuch time as it was caſt downe, the Senate of Rome cauſed it to be rebuilt: and by Gracchus it was called Iunonia: it was againe and againe abandoned and repeopled, taken and retaken; by Genſericus the Vandal, by Belliſarius vnder Iuſtinian, by the Perſians, by the Ægyptians, & by the Mahometans. It is now nothing. The ſeat therof was exceeding ſtrong: and, while the Carthaginians commanded the Sea, inuincible. For the Sea compaſſed it about, ſauing that it was tied to the maine by a necke of land; which paſſage had two mile and more of breadth (Appian ſaith, three mile, and one furlong) by which we may be induced, to beleeue the common report, that the Citie it ſelfe was aboue twentie mile in compaſſe; compaſſe; if not that of Strabo, affirming the circuit to haue beene twice as great.

It had three walls, without the wall of the Citie; and betweene each of thoſe, three or foure ſtreets, with vaults vnder ground, of thirty foot deepe, in which they had place for three hundred Elephants, and all their food: ouer theſe they had ſtables for foure thouſand horſe, and Granaries for all their prouender. They had alſo lodging in theſe ſtreets, betweene theſe out-walles for foure thouſand horſe-men and twentie thouſand foot-men, which (according to the diſcipline vſed now by thoſe of China) neuer peſtered the Citie. It had towards the South part, the Caſtle of Byrſa; to which Seruius giues two and twentie furlongs in compaſſe, that make two mile and a halfe. This was the ſame piece of ground, which Dido obtained of the Libyans, when ſhee got leaue to buy only ſo much land of them, as ſhee could compaſſe with an Oxe hide. On the weſt ſide it had alſo the ſalt Sea, but in the nature of a ſtanding poole; for a certaine arme of Land, faſtned to the ground, on which the Citie ſtood, ſtretched it ſelfe towards the weſt continent, and left but ſeuentie foot open for the Sea to enter. Ouer this ſtanding Sea was built a moſt ſumptuous Arſenall, hauing their ſhips and gallies riding vnder it.

The forme of their Common-weale reſembled that of Sparta; for they had titularie Kings, and the Ariſtocraticall power of Senators. But (as Regius well obſerueth) the people in later times vſurped too great authoritie in their Councells. This confuſion in gouernement, together with the truſt that they repoſed in hired Souldiers, were helping cauſes of their deſtruction in the end. Two other more forcible cauſes of their ruine, were their auarice and their crueltie. [a] Their auarice was ſhewed both in exacting from their Vaſſals (beſides ordinarie tributes) the one [b] halfe of the fruits of the earth; and in conferring of great Offices, not vpon gentle and mercifull perſons, but vpon thoſe who could beſt tyrannize ouer the people, to augment their treaſures. Their crueltie appeared, in putting them to death without mercie, that had offended through ignorance: the one of theſe rendred them odious to their vaſſalls, whom it made readie, vpon all occaſions, to reuolt from them: the other did breake the ſpirits of their Generalls, by preſenting in the heat of their actions abroade, the feare of a cruell death at home. Hereby it came to paſſe, that many good Cõmanders of the Carthaginian forces, after ſome great loſſe receiued, haue deſperatly caſt themſelues with all that remained vnder their charge, into the throat of deſtruction; holding it neceſſarie, either to repaire their loſſes quickly, or to ruine all together: and fewe of them haue dared, to manage their owne beſt projects, after that good forme, wherein they firſt conceiued them, for feare leſt the maner of their proceeding ſhould be miſinterpreted: It being the Carthaginian rule, to crucifie, not only the vnhappie Captaine, but euen him, whoſe bad counſaile had proſperous euent. The faults, wherewith, in generall, they of Carthage are taxed, by Roman Hiſtorians, I find to bee theſe; luſt, crueltie, auarice, craft, vnfaithfulneſſe, and periurie. Whether the Romans themſelues were free from the ſame crimes, let the triall be referred vnto their actions. The firſt league betweene Carthage and Rome, was very ancient: hauing beene made, the yeare following the expulſion of Tarquine. In that league, the Carthaginians had the ſuperioritie, as impoſing vpon the Romans, the more ſtrict conditions. For it was agreed, that the Romans ſhould not ſo much as haue trade, in ſome part of Africk, nor ſuffer any ſhip of theirs to paſſe beyond the headland, or cape, then called the faire Promontory, vnleſſe it were by force of tempeſt: whereas on the other ſide, no Hauen in Italie was forbidden to the Carthaginians. A ſecond league was made long after, which (howſoeuer it hath pleaſed * Liuie to ſay, that the Romans granted it, at the Carthaginians intreatie) was more ſtrict than the former: prohibiting the Romans to haue trade in any part of Africa, or in the Iland of Sardinia.

By theſe two treaties it may appeare, that the Carthaginians had an intent not only to keep the Romans (as perhaps they did other people) from getting any knowledge of the ſtate of Africk, but to countenance & vphold them, in their troubling al Italie, whereby

b The Turkes, at this day, doe alſo take the one half of the poore mans corne, that labours the earth; yea, they take tribut both of the bodies, and of the ſoules of the Chriſtians their Vaſſals, by bereauing them of their ableſt children, & bringing them vp in the Mahometan Religion. The Iriſh take the fourth ſheafe; & were wont to eate vp with their horſemen, footemen, and dogs, what they pleaſed, of the other three parts remaining. The huſbandman & the yeoman of England, are the freeſt of all the World: And reaſon good; for of them haue the bodies of our victorious armies beene compounded. And it is the freeman, & not the ſlaue, that hath courage, & the ſenſe of ſhame deſerued by cowardiſe. How free the Engliſh yeomen haue beene, in times, not long ſince paſt, Forteſcue hath ſhewed in his praiſe of our Countries lawes. But I may ſay, that they are more free now than euer: and our Nobilitie & Gentrie more ſeruile. For ſince the exceſſiue brauerie, and vaine expence of our Grandes, hath taught them to raiſe their Rents, ſince by Incloſures, and diſmembring of Mannours, the Court Baron, and the Court Leet, the Principalities of the Gentrie of England, haue beene diſſolued, the Tenants, hauing paied vnto their Lords their rack Rent, owe them now no ſeruice at all, and (perchance) as little loue.

* Liuie Dec. 1. l. 7.

whereby they themselues might haue the better meanes to occupie all Sicil, whilst that Iland should be destitute of Italian succours. Hereupon we finde good cause, of the joy that was in Carthage, and of the Crowne of gold, weighing twenty & fiue pound, sent from thence to Rome, when the Samnites were ouerthrowne. But the little state of Rome preuailed faster in Italie, than the great power of Carthage did in Sicill. For that mightie Armie, of three hundred thousand men, which Hannibal conducted out of Africk into Sicill, wanne only two Cities therein; many great fleets were deuoured by tempests; and howsoeuer the Carthaginians preuailed at one time, the Sicilians, either by their owne valour, or by assistance of their good friends out of Greece, did at some other time repaire their owne losses, and take reuenge vpon these Inuadours. But neuer were the people of Carthage in better hope, of getting al Sicil, than when the death of Agathocles the Tyrant, had left the whole Iland in combustion; the estate of Greece being such, at the same time, that it seemed impossible, for any succour to be sent from thence. But whilest the Carthaginians were busie, in making their aduantage, of this good opportunities; Pyrrhus, inuited by the Tarentines, and their fellowes, came into Italie, where hee made sharpe warre vpon the Romans. These newes were vnpleasing to the Carthaginians, who, being a subtile Nation, easily foresaw, that the same busie disposition, which had brought this Prince, out of Greece into Italie, would as easily transport him ouer into Sicil, as soone as he could finish his Roman warre. To preuent this danger, they sent Mago Embassadour to Rome; who declared in their name, that they were sorry to heare, what misaduenture had befallen the Romans, their good friends, in this warre with Pyrrhus; and that the people of Carthage were very willing to assist the state of Rome, by sending an Armie into Italie; if their helpe were thought needfull, against the Epirots.

It was, indeede, the maine desire of the Carthaginians, to hold Pyrrhus so hardly to his worke in Italie, that they might, at good leisure, pursue their businesse in Sicil: which caused them to make such a goodly offer. But the Romans were too high-minded: and refused to accept any such aide of their friends, lest it should blemish their reputation, and make them seeme vnable to stand by their owne strength. Yet the message was taken louingly, as it ought; and the former league betweene Rome and Carthage renued, with couenants added, concerning the present businesse; That if either of the two Cities made peace with Pyrrhus, it should be, with reseruation of libertie, to assist the other, in case that Pyrrhus should inuade either of their Dominions. All this notwithstanding, and notwithstanding that the same Mago went and treated with Pyrrhus, vsing all meanes to sound his intentions (a matter very difficult, where one vpon euery new occasion changeth his owne purposes) yet Pyrrhus found leisure to make a step into Sicill: where, though in fine he was neither getter nor sauer, yet hee cleane defeated the purposes of Carthage, leauing them at his departure thence, as farre from any end, as when they first beganne.

So many disasters, in an enterprise, that from the first vndertaking, had beene so strongly pursued, through the length of many generations, might well haue induced the Carthaginians to beleeue, that an higher prouidence resisted their intendment. But their desire, of winning that fruitfull Iland, was so inueterate; that with vnwearied patience, they still continued in hope, of so much the greater an haruest, by how much their cost and paynes therein buried had beene the more. Wherefore they re-continued their former courses; and by force or practice, recouered in few yeeres, all their old possessions: making peace with Syracuse, the chiefe Citie of the Iland, that so they might the better enable themselues to deale with the rest.

Somewhat before this time, a troupe of Campanian Souldiers, that had serued vnder Agathocles, being intertained within Messana as friends, and finding themselues too strong for the Citizens, tooke aduantage of the power that they had to

doe wrong; and with perfidious crueltie, ſlew thoſe that had truſted them; which done, they occupied the Citie, Lands, Goods, and Wiues, of thoſe, whom they had murdered. Theſe Mercinaries called themſelues Mamertines. Good Souldiers they were: and like enough it is, that meere deſperation, of finding any that would approue their barbarous treacherie, added rage vnto their ſtoutneſſe. Hauing therefore none other colour of their proceedings, than the law of the ſtronger, they ouerranne the Countrie round about them.

In this courſe, at firſt, they ſped ſo wel, that they did not onely defend Meſſena againſt the Cities of Sicil Confederate; to wit, againſt the Syracuſians, and others, but they rather wan vpon them, yea, and vpon the Carthaginians, exacting tribute from many Neighbour places. But it was not long, ere fortune turning her back to theſe Mamertines, the Syracuſians wan faſt vpon them, and finally, confining them within the walls of Meſſana, they alſo with a powerfull Armie beſieged the Citie. It happened ill, that about the ſame time, a contention began, betweene the Syracuſian Souldiers, then lying at Megara, and the Citizens of Syracuſe, and Gouernours of the Common-wealth; which proceeded ſo farre, that the Armie elected two Gouernours, among themſelues; to wit, Artemidorus, and Hieron, that was afterward King. Hieron, being for his yeares excellently adorned with many vertues, although it was contrarie to the policy of that State, to approue any election made by the Souldiers, yet for the great clemencie hee vſed at his firſt entrance, was by generall conſent eſtabliſhed and made Gouernour. This Office, hee rather vſed as a Scale, thereby to clime to ſome higher degree, than reſted content with his preſent preferment.

In briefe, there was ſomewhat wanting, whereby to ſtrengthen himſelfe within the Citie; and ſomewhat without it, that gaue impediment, to his obtayning, and ſafe keeping, of the place he ſought; to wit, a powerfull partie within the Towne, and certaine mutinous troups of Souldiers without, often and eaſily moued to ſedition and tumult. For the firſt, whereby to ſtrengthen himſelfe, hee tooke to wife the daughter of Leptines, a man of the greateſt eſtimation and authoritie among the Syracuſians. For the ſecond, leading out the Armie to beſiege Meſſana, he quartered all thoſe Companies, which he held ſuſpected, on the one ſide of the Citie, and leading the reſt of his horſe and foot vnto the other ſide, as if he would haue aſſaulted it in two ſeueral parts, he marched away vnder the couert of the Towne walls, and left the Mutiners to be cut in pieces by the aſſieged: So returning home, and leauying an Armie of his owne Citizens, well trayned and obedient, he haſted againe towards Meſſana, and was by the Mamertines (growne proud by their former victorie ouer the Mutiners) incountred in the plaines of Mylæum, where hee obtained a moſt ſignall victorie, and leading with him their Commander Captiue into Syracuſe, himſelfe by common conſent was elected and ſaluted King. Hereupon the Mamertines, finding themſelues vtterly infeebled, ſome of them reſolued to giue themſelues to the Carthaginians, others to craue aſſiſtance of the Romans: to each of whom, the ſeuerall factions diſpatched Embaſſadours for the ſame purpoſe.

The Carthaginians were ſoone readie to lay hold vpon the good offer: ſo that a Captaine of theirs got into the Caſtle of Meſſana, wherof they that had ſent for him gaue him poſſeſſion. But within a little while, they that were more inclinable to the Romans, had brought their Companions to ſo good agreement, that this Captaine, either by force, or by cunning, was turned out of dores, and the Towne reſerued for other Maſters.

Theſe newes did much offend the people of Carthage; who crucified their Captaine, as both a Traitour and Coward; and ſent a Fleet and Armie to beſiege Meſſana, as a Towne that rebelled, hauing once beene theirs. Hieron, the new-made King of Syracuſe (to gratifie his people, incenſed with the ſmart of injuries lately receiued) added his forces to the Carthaginians, with whom hee entred into a league, for exterminating the Mamertines out of Sicil. So the Mamertines on all ſides were closed vp within Messana: the Carthaginians lying with a Nauie at Sea, and with an Armie on the one side of the Towne, whil'st Hieron with his Syracusians, lay before it on the other side.

In this their great danger, came Appius Claudius the Roman Consull, with an Armie to the streights of Sicil: which passing by night with notable audacitie, hee put himselfe into the Towne, and sending Messengers to the Carthaginians, and to Hieron, required them to depart; signifying vnto them, that the Mamertines were now become confederate with the people of Rome, and that therefore hee was come to giue them protection, euen by force of warre, if reason would not preuaile.

This message was vtterly neglected; And so beganne the warre betweene Rome and Carthage; wherein, it will then be time to shew, on which part was the iustice of the quarrell, when some actions of the Romans, lately foregoing this, haue beene first considered.

§. III.

The beginning of the fist Punick warre. That it was vniustly vndertaken by the Romans.

WHen Pyrrhus beganne his warres in Italie, the Citie of Rhegium, being well affected to Rome, and not onely fearing to be taken by the Epirot, but much more distrusting the Carthaginians, as likely to seize vpon it in that busie time, sought aide from the Romans, and obtained from them a Legion, consisting of foure thousand Souldiers, vnder the conduct of Decius Campanus, a Roman Prefect; by whom they were defended and assured for the present. But after a while, this Roman Garrison, considering at good leisure, the fact of the Mamertines, committed in Messana, (a Citie in Sicil, situate almost opposite to Rhegium, and no otherwise diuided than by a narrow Sea, which seuereth it from Italie) and rather weighing the greatnesse of the bootie, than the odiousnesse of the villanie, by which it was gotten; resolued finally, to make the like purchace, by taking the like wicked course. Confederating therefore themselues with the Mamertines, they entertained their Hosts of Rhegium, after the same manner; diuiding the spoile, and all which that State had among themselues.

When complaint was made to the Senate & people of Rome, of this outrage; they finding their honour thereby greatly stained (for no Nation in the world made a more seuere profession of iustice, than they did, during all the time of their growing greatnesse) resolued, after a while, to take reuenge vpon the offenders. And this they performed shortly after, when they had quenched the fires, kindled in Italie, by Pyrrhus. For, notwithstanding that those Romans in Rhegium (as men for the foulenesse of their fact, hopelesse of pardon) defended themselues with an obstinate resolution: yet in the end, the assailants forced them; and those which escaped the present furie, were brought bound to Rome, where after the vsuall torments by whipping inflicted, according to the custome of the Countrie, they had their heads stricken from their shoulders; and the people of Rhegium were againe restored to their former liberties and estates.

This execution of iustice being newly performed, and the fame thereof sounding honourably through all quarters of Italie: messengers came to Rome, from Messana, desiring help against the Carthaginians, and Syracusians, that were in a readinesse to inflict the like punishment vpon the Mamertines, for the like offence. An impudent request it was, which they made: who hauing both giuen example of that vilanie to the Roman Souldiers, and holpen them with joynt forces to make it good; intreate the Iudges to giue them that assistance, which they were wont to receiue from their fellow-theeues.

The

The Romans could not ſuddenly reſolue, whether the way of honeſtie, or of profit, were to be followed; they euermore pretended the one, but they many times walked in the other. They conſidered, how contrarie the courſe of ſuccouring the Mamertines was, to their former counſells, and actions: ſeeing for the ſame offences they had lately put to torment, and to the ſword, their owne Souldiers, and reſtored the oppreſſed to their libertie. Yet when they beheld the deſcription of the Carthaginian Dominion, and that they were already Lords of the beſt parts of Africa, of the Mediterran Ilands, of a great part of Spaine, and ſome part of Sicil it ſelfe; whileſt alſo they feared, that Syracuſe therein ſeated (a Citie in beautie and riches, little, at that time, inferiour to Carthage, and farre ſuperiour to Rome it ſelfe) might become theirs; the ſafetie of their owne eſtate ſpake for theſe Mamertines: who, if they (driuen to deſpaire by the Romans) ſhould deliuer vp Meſſana, with thoſe other holds, that they had, into the hands of the Carthaginians, then would nothing ſtand betweene Carthage, and the Lordſhip of all Sicil: for Syracuſe it ſelfe could not, for want of ſuccour, any long time ſubſiſt, if once the Carthaginians, that were Maſters of the Sea, did faſten vpon that paſſage from the maine Land. It was further conſidered; that the oportunitie of Meſſana was ſuch, as would not only debarre, all ſuccours out of the continent, from arriuall in Sicil; but would ſerue as a bridge, whereby the Carthaginians might haue entrance into Italie, at their owne pleaſure.

These conſiderations, of profit at hand, and of preuenting dangers, that threatned from a farre, did ſo preuaile, aboue all regard of honeſtie, that the Mamertines were admitted into Confederacie with the Romans, and Ap. Claudius the Conſull, preſently diſpatcht away for Meſſana: into which he entred, and vnder-tooke the protection of it, as is ſhewed before. The beſiegers were little troubled with his arriuall; and leſſe moued, with his requiring them, to deſiſt from their attempt. For they did farre exceede him in number of men; The whole Iland was readie to relieue them in their wants; and they were ſtrong enough at Sea, to hinder any ſupply from getting into the Towne. All this Appius himſelfe well vnderſtood: and againſt all this, he thought the ſtiffe metall of his Roman Souldier, a ſufficient remedie. Therefore, he reſolued to iſſue out into the field, and to let the enemies know, that his comming was to ſend them away from the Towne; not to be beſieged by them within it.

In executing this determination, it was very beneficiall to him, that the enemie lay encamped in ſuch ſort, as one quarter was not well able to relieue another in diſtreſſe. Hieron was now expoſed to the ſame danger, whereinto hee had wilfully caſt his owne mutinous followers, not long before: only he was ſtrong enough (or thought ſo) to make good his owne quarter, without helpe of others. Againſt him Ap. Claudius iſſued forth, and (not attempting, by vnexpected ſallie, to ſurprize his trenches) arranged his men in order of battaile, wherewith hee preſented him. The Syracuſian wanted not courage to fight; but ſurely, hee wanted good aduice: elſe would he not haue hazarded all his power againſt an enemie, of whom he had made no triall; when it had beene eaſie, and as much as was requiſite, to defend his owne Campe. It may be, that he thought to get honour, wherewith to adorne the beginning of his raigne. But he was well beaten; and driuen to ſaue himſelfe within his Trenches: by which loſſe, he learned a point of wiſedome, that ſtood him and his Kingdome in good ſtead, all the daies of his life. It was a fooliſh deſire of reuenge, that had made the Syracuſians ſo buſie, in helping thoſe of Carthage, againſt the Mamertines.

Had Meſſana beene taken by the Carthaginians, Syracuſe it ſelfe muſt haue ſought helpe from Rome, againſt thoſe friends which it now ſo diligently aſſiſted. Hieron had (in reſpect of thoſe two mightie Cities) but a ſmall ſtock, which it behooued him to gouerne well: ſuch another loſſe would haue made him almoſt bankrupt. Therefore he quietly brake vp his Camp, and retired home: intending to let them ſtand to their aduentures, that had hope to bee gainers by the bargaine. The next day, day, Claudius perceiuing the Sicilian Armie gone, did with great courage, and with much alacritie of his ſouldiers, giue charge vpon the Carthaginians: wherein he ſped ſo well, that the enemie forſooke both field and campe, leauing all the Countrie open to the Romans; who hauing ſpoiled all round, without reſiſtance, intended to lay ſiege vnto the great Citie of Syracuſe.

These proſperous beginnings, howſoeuer they animated the Romans, and filled them with hopes, of attaining to greater matters, than at firſt they had expected: Yet did they not imprint any forme of terrour in the Citie of Carthage, that had wel enough repaired greater loſſes than this; in which no more was loſt, than what had beene prepared againſt the Mamertines alone, without any ſuſpition of warre from Rome.

Now in this place I hold it ſeaſonable, to conſider of thoſe grounds, whereupon the Romans entred into this warre; not how profitable they were, nor how agreeable to rules of honeſtie (for queſtionleſſe the enterprize was much to their benefit, though as much to their ſhame) but how allowable in ſtrict termes of lawfulneſſe; whereupon they built all their allegations in maintenance thereof. That the Mamertines did yeeld themſelues, and all that they had, into the Romans hands (as the Campanes, diſtreſſed by the Samnites, had done) I cannot finde: neither can I finde, how the meſſengers of thoſe folke, wherof one part had alreadie admitted the Carthaginians, could be enabled to make any ſuch ſurrendrie, in the publike name of all their Companie.

If therefore the Mamertines, by no lawfull ſurrendrie of themſelues and their poſſeſſions, were become ſubject vnto Rome, by what better title could the Romans aſſiſt the Mamertines, againſt their moſt ancient friends the Carthaginians, than they might haue aided the Campanes, againſt the Samnites, without the ſame condition? which was (as they themſelues confeſſed) by none at all. But let it be ſuppoſed, that ſome point ſeruing to cleare this doubt, is loſt in all Hiſtories. Doubtleſſe it is, that no companie, of Pirates, Theeues, Outlawes, Murderers, or ſuch other malefactours, can by any good ſucceſſe of their vilanie, obtaine the priuiledge of ciuill ſocieties, to make league or truce, yea, or to require faire warre: but are by all meanes, as moſt pernicious vermine, to be rooted out of the world. I will not take vpon me, to maintaine that opinion of ſome Ciuilians, that a Prince is not bound to hold his faith, with one of theſe; it were a Poſition of ill conſequence: This I hold; that no one Prince, or State, can giue protection to ſuch as theſe, as long as any other is vſing the ſword of vengeance againſt them, without becomming acceſſarie to their crimes. Wherefore, we may eſteeme this action of the Romans, ſo farre from being juſtifiable, by any pretence of Confederacie made with them; as that contrariwiſe, by admitting this neſt of Murderers and Theeues, into their protection, they juſtly deſerued to be warred vpon themſelues, by the people of Sicil; yea, although Meſſana had beene taken, and the Mamertines all ſlaine, ere any newes of the Confederacie had beene brought vnto the beſiegers. The great Alexander was ſo farre perſwaded herein; that he did put to ſword all the Branchiadæ (a people in Sogdiana) and razed their Citie, notwithſtanding that they joyfully entertained him as their Lord and King; becauſe they were deſcended from a Companie of Mileſians, who to gratifie King Xerxes, had robbed a Temple, and were by him rewarded with the Towne and Countrie, which theſe of their poſteritie enjoyed. Neuertheleſſe, in courſe of humane juſtice, long and peaceable poſſeſſion giues ius acquiſitum, a kinde of right by preſcription, vnto that which was at firſt obtained by wicked meanes: and doth free the deſcendants, from the crime of their Anceſtors, whoſe vilanies they doe not exerciſe. But that the ſame generation of Theeues, which by a deteſtable fact hath purchaſed a rich Towne, ſhould be acknowledged a lawfull companie of Citizens, there is no ſhew of right. For euen the Conquerour, that by open warre obtaineth a Kingdome, doth not confirme his title, by thoſe victories which gaue him firſt poſſeſſion: but length of time is requiſite, to eſtabliſh him, vnleſſe by ſome alliance with the ancient inheritors, he can better the violence of his claime; as did our King Henrie the firſt, by his marriage with Maude, that was daughter of Malcolme, King of the Scots, by Margaret, the Neece of Edmund Ironſide. Wherefore I conclude, that the Romans had no better ground (if they had ſo good) of juſtice, in this quarrell, than had the Gothes, Hunnes, Vandalls, and other Nations, of the warres that they made vpon the Roman Empire, wherein Rome her ſelfe, in the time of her viſitation, was burnt to ground.

§. IIII.

Of the Iland of Sicil.

†. I.

The qualitie of the Iland: and the firſt Inhabitants thereof.

THe defence of the Mamertines, or the poſſeſſion of Meſſana, being now no longer, ſince the firſt victories of Appius Claudius, the objects of the Roman hopes; but the Dominion of all Sicil being the prize, for which Rome and Carthage, are about to contend: it will bee agreeable vnto the order, which in the like caſes we haue obſerued, to make a briefe collection, of things, concerning that noble Iland, which hath beene the ſtage of many great acts, performed, as well before and after, as in this preſent Warre.

That Sicil was ſometimes a Peninſula, or Demie-Iſle, adjoyned to Italie, as a part of Brutium in Calabria, neare vnto Rhegium, and afterward by violence of tempeſt ſeuered from the ſame: it is a generall opinion of all antiquitie. But at what certaine time this diuiſion happened, there is no memoriall remayning, in any ancient writer. Strabo, Plinie, and Dionyſius, affirme, that it was cauſed by an earthquake; Silius, and Caſſiodorus, doe thinke it to haue beene done by the rage and violence of the tide, and ſurges of the Sea. Either of theſe opinions may be true; for ſo was Eubœa ſeuered from Bœotia; Atalante and Macris, from Eubœa; Sillie here in England, from the Cape of Cornewall; and Britaine it ſelfe (as may ſeeme by Verſtegans arguments) from the oppoſite continent of Gaule. But for Sicil, they which lend their eares to fables, do attribute the cauſe of it to Neptune (as Euſtathius witneſſeth) who with his three-forked Mace, in fauour of Iocaſtus, the ſonne of Æolus, diuided it from the maine land, and ſo made it an Iland, which before was but a Demie-Iſle; that by that meanes, hee might the more ſafely inhabite, and poſſeſſe the ſame. Diodorus Siculus, moued by the authoritie of Heſiodus, aſcribeth the labour of ſundring it from Italie, to Orion: who, that he might be compared to Hercules (cutting through the rocks and mountaines) firſt opened the Sicilian ſtreights, as Hercules did thoſe of Gibralter.

They which value the Ilands of the mid-land Sea, according to their quantitie and content, doe make this the greateſt, as Euſtathius and Strabo, who affirme this, not only to excell the reſt for bigneſſe, but alſo for goodneſſe of ſoile. As concerning the forme of this Iland, Pomponius Mela ſaith, it is like that Capitall letter of the Greeks, which they call Delta, namely, that it hath the figure of a triangle; which is generally knowne to be true. That the whole Iland was conſecrated to Ceres and Proſerpina, all old writers with one conſent affirme. To Ceres it was dedicated, becauſe it firſt taught the rules of ſetting and ſowing of Corne: to Proſerpina, not ſo much, for that ſhee was from hence violently taken by Pluto, as becauſe (which Plutarch tarch and Diodorus doe report for truth) that Pluto, as soone as shee, vncouering her selfe, first shewed her selfe to be seene of him, gaue her the Dominion thereof.

Of the fertilitie and riches of this Countrie, there is a famous testimonie written by Cicero, in his second Oration against Verres, where he saith, that Marcus Cato did call it the Granarie, and Store-house of the Common-wealth, and the Nurse of the vulgar sort. The same Cicero doth adde in that place; that it was not only the store-house of the people of Rome: but also that it was accounted for a well furnished treasurie.

Strabo l. 6. For without any cost or charge of ours (saith he) it hath vsually cloathed, maintained, and furnished, our greatest Armies, with leather, apparell, and corne. Strabo reporteth almost the same thing of it. Whatsoeuer Sicilie doth yeeld (saith Solinus) whether by the Sunne, and temperature of the aire, or by the industrie and labour of man, it is accounted next vnto those things that are of best estimation: were it not, that such things, as the earth first putteth forth, are extremely ouer-growne with saffron. Diodorus Siculus saith, that in the fields, neere vnto Leontium, and in diuers other places of this Iland, wheat doth grow of it selfe, without any labour, or looking to, of the husbandman. Martianus sheweth, that there were in it sixe Colonies, and sixtie Cities: there are that reckon more, whereof the names are found scatteringly in many good Authours.

Now besides many famous acts, done by the people of this Iland, as well in peace as warre, there be many other things, which haue made it very renowned, as the birth of Ceres; the rauishing of Proserpina; the Giant Enceladus; the mount Ætna, Scylla and Charibdis, with other antiquities, and rarities; besides those learned men, the noble Mathematician Archimedes; the famous Geometrician Euclides; the painfull Historian Diodorus; and Empedocles the deepe Philosopher.

That Sitil was at first possessed and inhabited by Giants Lestriogones, and Cyclopes, barbarous people, and vnciuill; all histories and fables doe joyntly with one consent auerre. Yet Thucydides saith, that these sauage people dwelt onely in one part of the Iland. Afterward the Sicani, a people of Spaine, possessed it. That these Sicani were not bred in the Isle (although some doe so thinke,) Thucydides and Diodorus doe constantly auouch.

Of these it was named Sicania. These Sicani were inuaded by the Siculi; who, inhabiting that part of Latium, whereon Rome was afterward built, were driuen by the Pelasgi from their owne seates, and finding no place vpon the continent, which they were able to master and inhabite, passed ouer into this Iland, three hundred yeares before the Greekes sent any Colonies thither: and (saith Philistus) eightie yeares before the fall of Troy. These Siculi gaue the name of Sicilia, to the Iland; and making warre vpon the Sicani, draue them from the East and Northerne part thereof, into the West and South. At their landing, they first built the Citie Zancle, afterward called Messena; and after that, Catana, Leontium, and Syracuse it selfe, beating from thence the Ætolians, who long before had set vp a Towne in that place. As for the name of Syracuse, it was not knowne, till such time as Archias of Corinth (long after) wonne that part of the Iland from the Siculi; Neither did the Siculi at their first arriuall dispossesse the Ætolians thereof, but some hundred yeares after their descent, and after such time as they had founded the Cities before named, with Nea, Hybla, Trinacia, and diuers others.

After these Siculi came another Nation out of Italy, called Morgetes; who were thence driuen by the Oenotrians. These sate downe in that part of Sicil, where they afterward raised the Cities of Morgentum, and Leontium. For at this time the Siculi were diuided, and by a ciuill warre greatly infeebled. Among these ancient stories, we finde the last voiage, and the death of Minos, King of Creet. Thucydides, an Historian of vnquestionable sinceritie, reports of Minos, that he made conquest of many Ilands: and some such businesse, perhaps, drew him into Sicil. But the common report is, that he came thither in pursuit of Daedalus. The tale goes thus: Daedalus flecing the reuenge of Minos, came into Sicil to Cocalus, King of the Sicani, and during his aboade there, he built a place of great ſtrength, neere vnto Megara, for Cocalus, to lay vp his treaſure in; together with many notable works, for which he was greatly admired and honoured.

Among the reſt, he caſt a Ramme in gold, that was ſet vp in the Temple of Venus Erycina; which he did with ſo great arte, as thoſe that beheld it, thought it rather to be liuing, than counterfait.

Now Minos, hearing that Cocalus had entertained Dædalus, prepares to inuade the Territorie of Cocalus; but when he was arriued, Cocalus doubting his own ſtrength, promiſeth to deliuer Dædalus. This he performes not, but in the meane while, kills Minos by treaſon, and perſwades the Cretans, Minos his followers, to inhabite a part of Sicil; the better (as it ſeemes) to ſtrengthen himſelfe againſt the Siculi. Hereunto the Cretans (their King being dead) gaue their conſent, and builded for themſelues the Citie of Minoa, after the name of their King Minos. After, they likewiſe built the Towne of Engyum, now called Gange: and theſe were the firſt Cities, built by the Greeks in Sicil, about two ages before the warre of Troy; for the grand children of Minos ſerued with the Greeks at the ſiege thereof.

But after ſuch time as the Cretans vnderſtood, that their King had by treaſon beene made away; they gathered together a great Armie, to inuade Cocalus: and landing neere vnto Camicus, they beſieged the ſame fiue yeares, but in vaine. In the end (being forced to returne, without any reuenge taken) they were wrackt on the coaſt of Italie; and hauing no meanes to repaire their ſhips, nor the honor they had loſt, they made good the place whereon they fell, and built Hyria, or Hyrium, betweene the two famous Ports of Brunduſium, and Tarentum. Of theſe Cretans came thoſe Nations, afterward called Iapyges, and Meſſapij.

After the taking of Troy, Ægeſtus and Elymus, brought with them certaine troups into Sicil, and ſeated themſelues among the Sicani; where they built the Cities of Ægeſta and Elyma.

It is ſaid, that Æneas viſited theſe places in his paſſage into Italie: and that ſome of the Troianes, his followers, were left behinde him, in theſe Townes of Sicil: whereof there want not good Authours, that make Æneas himſelfe the founder.

About the ſame time, the Phœnicians ſeiſed vpon the Promontories of Pachinus, and Lilybæum, and vpon certaine ſmall Iſles adioyning to the maine Iland: which they fortified, to ſecure the trades that they had with the Sicilians; like as the Portugals haue done in the Eaſt India, at Goa, Ormus, Moſambiq, and other places. But the Phœnicians ſtaied not there; for after they had once aſſured their deſcents, they built the goodly Citie of Panormus, now called Paletma.

Theſe we finde, were the Nations, that inhabited the Iſle of Sicil, before the warre of Troy, and ere the Greeks in any numbers began to ſtraggle in thoſe parts.

It may perchance ſeeme ſtrange to the Reader, that in all ancient ſtorie, he findes one and the ſame beginning of Nations, after the floud; and that the firſt planters of all parts of the World, were ſaid to bee mightie and Giantlike men; and that, as Phœnicia, Ægypt, Lybia, and Greece, had Hercules, Oreſtes, Antæus, Typhon, and the like; as Denmarke had Starchaterus, remembred by Saxo Grammaticus; as Scythia, Britanie, and other Regions, had Giants for their firſt Inhabitants; ſo this Iſle of Sicil had her Leſtrigones and Cyclopes. This diſcourſe I could alſo reject for fained and fabulous; did not Moſes make vs know, that the Zamzummims, Emims, Anakims, and Og of Baſan, with others, which ſometime inhabited the Mountaines and Deſarts of Moab; Ammon, and Mount Seir, were men of exceeding ſtrength and ſtature, and of the races of Giants: and were it not, that Tertullian, S^t. Auguſtine, Nicephorus, Procopius, Iſidore, Plinie, Diodore, Herodotus, Solinus, Plutarch, and many other Authours, haue confirmed the opinion. Yea, Veſputius, in his ſecond Nauigation into America, hath reported, that himſelfe hath ſeene the like men in thoſe parts. Againe, whereas the ſelfe-ſame is written of all Nations, that is written of any one; as touching their ſimplicitie of life, their meane fare, their feeding on acornes cornes and roots, their poore cottages, the couering of their bodies, with the skins of beasts, their hunting, their armes, and weapons, and their warfare, their first passages ouer great Riuers, and armes of the Sea, vpon rafts of trees tied together; and afterward, their making boats, first, of twigs and leather, then of wood; first, with Oares, and then with saile; that they esteemed as Gods, the first finders out of Arts; as of Husbandrie, of Lawes, and of Policie: it is a matter, that makes me neither to wonder at, nor to doubt of it. For they all liued in the same newnesse of time, which we call Old time, and had all the same want of his instruction, which (after the Creator of all things) hath by degrees taught all Mankinde. For other teaching had they none, that were remoued far off from the Hebrewes, who inherited the knowledge of the first Patriarchs, than that from variable effects they beganne, by time and degrees, to finde out the causes: from whence came Philosophie Naturall; as the Morall did from disorder and confusion; and the Law from crueltie and oppression.

But it is certaine, that the Age of Time hath brought forth stranger and more incredible things, than the Infancie. For we haue now greater Giants, for vice and injustice, than the World had in those daies, for bodily strength; for cottages and houses of clay and timber, we haue raised Palaces of stone; we carue them, we paint them, and adorne them with gold; insomuch as men are rather knowne by their houses, than their houses by them; we are fallen from two dishes, to two hundred; from water, to wine and drunkennesse; from the couering of our bodies with the skinnes of beasts, not only to silke and gold, but to the very skinnes of men. But to conclude this digression, Time will also take reuenge of the excesse, which it hath brought forth; Quam longa dies peperit, longior q. auxit, longissima subruit; Long time brought forth, longer time increased it, and a time, longer than the rest, shall ouerthrow it.

The plantation of the Greeks in Sicil.

WHen the first inhabitants had contended long enough about the Dominion of all Sicil: it happened, that one Theocles, a Greeke, being driuen vpon that coast by an Easterly winde; and finding true the commendations thereof, which had beene thought fabulous, being deliuered onely by Poets; gaue information to the Athenians of this his discouerie, and proposed vnto them the benefit of this easie conquest, offering to become their guide. But Theocles was as little regarded by the Athenians, as Columbus, in our Grand-fathers times, was by the English. Wherefore hee tooke the same course, that Columbus afterwards did. Hee ouer-laboured not himselfe in perswading the Noble Athenians (who thought themselues to bee well enough alreadie) to their owne profit; but went to the Chalcidians, that were needie and industrious, by whom his project was gladly entertained. By these was built the Citie of Naxus, and a Colony planted of Eubœans.

But the rest of the Greeks were wiser than our westerne Princes of Europe: for they had no Pope, that should forbid them, to occupie the voide places of the World. Archias of Corinth followed the Eubœans, and landed in Sicil, neare vnto that Citie, called afterward Syracuse*: of which, that part onely was then compassed with a

* Syracuse, as Cicero relates, was the greatest, and most goodly Citie of all that the Greekes possest. For the situation is both strong, and of an excellent prospect, from euery entrance, by Land, or Sea. The Port was (for the most part) enuironed with beautifull building: and that part which was without the Citie, was on both sides bankt vp, and sustained with beautifull walls of Marble. The Citie it selfe was one of the greatest of the World: for it had in compasse (as Strabo reporteth) without the treble wall thereof, 180. furlongs; which made of our miles about 18. It was compounded of foure Cities, (Strabo saith, of fiue) to wit, Insula, Acradina, Tycha, and Neapolis: of which greatnesse, the ruines and foundations of the walls doe yet witnesse.

wall, which the Ætolians called Homothermon; the Greeks, Naſos; the Latines, Inſula. He with his Corinthians hauing ouer-come the Siculi, draue them vp into the Countrie; and after a few yeares, their multitudes increaſing, they added vnto the Citie of the Iland, that of Acradina, Tycha, and Neapolis. So as well by the commodity of the double Port, capable of as many ſhips, as any Hauen of that part of Europe, as by the fertilitie of the ſoyle; Syracuſe grew vp in great haſte, to be one of the goodlieſt Townes of the World. In ſhort time the Greekes did poſſeſſe the better part of all the Sea-coaſt; forcing the Sicilians to withdraw themſelues into the faſt and mountainous parts of the Iland, making their Royall reſidence in Trinacia.

After ſuch time as the Dores of Peloponneſus had driuen out the Sicilians, this goodly Citie, for a long time became the ſeat of Tyrants The firſt wherof was Gelo: The ſecond, Hiero, the elder: The third, Thraſybulus: The fourth, and fift, Dionyſius, the elder, and yonger: The ſixt, Dion: The ſeuenth Agathocles: The eight, Pyrrhus: The ninth, Hiero the yonger: The tenth and laſt, Hieronymus: who being ſlaine at Leontium, at length the Romans conquered it vnder the conduct of Marcellus.

Some ſeuen yeares after the arriuall of Archias; the Chalcidians, encouraged by the ſucceſſe of the Corinthians, did aſſaile, and obtaine the Citie of Leontium, built and poſſeſt by the Siculi. In briefe, the Greekes winne from the Siculi, and their Aſſociates, the Cities of Catana, and Hybla, which, in honour of the Megarians that forc't it, they called Megara.

About fiue and fortie yeares after Archias had taken Syracuſe; Antiphemus and Entimus, the one from Rhodes, the other from Crete, brought an Armie into Sicil, and built Gela; whoſe Citizens, one hundred and eight yeares after, did erect that magnificent and renowned Citie of Agrigentum, gouerned according to the Lawes of the Dorians.

The Syracuſians alſo, in the ſeuentieth yeare after their plantation, did ſet vp the Citie of Acra, in the Mountaines; and in the ninetieth yeare Caſmena, in the Playnes adjoyning; and againe, in the hundred and thirtieth yeare of their dwelling in Syracuſe, they built Camerina; and ſoone after that, Enna, in the very Center of the Iland. So did the Cumani, about the ſame time, recouer from the Siculi the Citie of Zancle, which they had founded in the ſtreight betweene Sicil and Italie. They of Zancle had beene founders of Himera.

Not long after this Dorieus the Lacedæmonian built Heraclia; which the Phœnicians, and Carthaginians, fearing the Neighbourhood of the Spartans, ſoone after inuaded and ruined, though the ſame were againe ere long re-edified.

Selinus alſo was built by a Colonie of Megara: and Zancle was taken by the Meſſenians; who hauing loſt their owne Countrie, gaue the name thereof vnto this their new purchaſe. Such were the beginnings of the greateſt Cities in this Iland.

†. II.

Of the gouernement and affaires of Sicil, before DIONYSIVS his Tyrannie.

THe moſt part of the Cities in Sicil, were gouerned by the rule of the people, till ſuch time as Phalaris began to vſurpe the ſtate of Agrigentum, and to exerciſe all manner of tyrannie therein.

This was that Phalaris, to whom Perillus, the cunning Artificer of a deteſtable Engine, gaue an hollow Bull of braſſe, wherein to encloſe men, and ſcorch them to death: prayſing the deuice with this commendation; That the noiſe of one tormented therein, ſhould bee like vnto the bellowing of a Bull. The Tyrant gaue a due reward to the Inuentour; by cauſing the firſt triall to be made vpon himſelfe. Hee raigned one and thirtie yeares, ſaith Euſebius; others giue him but ſixteene: Howſoeuer it were, one Telemachus, in the end, fell vpon him with the whole multitude of Agrigentum, and ſtoned him to death; being thereto animated by Zeno, euen whileſt the Tyrant was tormenting the ſame Zeno, to make him confeſſe ſome matter of conſpiracie.

After the death of Phalaris, the Citizens recouered their libertie, and enjoyed it long, till Thero vſurped the gouernement of the Common-weale: at which time alſo Panetius made himſelfe Lord of Leontium; and Cleander, of Gela: but Cleander, hauing ruled ſeuen yeares, was ſlaine by one of the Citizens. Cleander being dead, his brother Hippocrates ſucceeded in his roome, and greatly afflicted the people of Naxos, of Zancle or Meſſena, and of Leontium; whom with diuers other of the ancient inhabitants, he forced to acknowledge him their Lord. Hee alſo made warre with the Syracuſians, and, in the end, got from them, by compoſition, the Citie of Camerina. But when he had raigned ſeuen yeares, he was ſlaine in a battell againſt the Siculi, before Hybla.

At this time did the Syracuſians change their forme of Gouernement, from Popular to Ariſtocraticall; a preparation towards a Principalitie, whereinto it was ſoone after changed. After the death of Hippocrates, Gelon (deſcended from the Rhodians, which together with the Cretans had long before, among other of the Greeks, ſeated themſelues in Sicil) that had commanded the forces of Hippocrates, in the former warre, with notable ſucceſſe, became Lord of Gela. Hee, after his Maſters death, breaking the truſt committed vnto him by Hippocrates ouer his children, and being in poſſeſſion of Gela, took the occaſion and aduantage of a contention in Syracuſe, betweene the Magiſtrates and the People. For comming with a ſtrong Armie to the ſuccour of the Gouernours, driuen out by the multitude, they elected him their Prince, being the firſt, and (indeede) the moſt famous, that euer gouerned the Syracuſians. This change hapned in the ſecond yeare of the threeſcore and twelfth Olympiad; wherein the better to eſtabliſh himſelfe, he tooke to wife the Daughter of Thero, who had alſo vſurped the ſtate of Agrigentum.

Pauſan 4.6.

Now this Gelon, the ſonne of Dinomenes, had three brethren; Hiero, Polyzelus, and Thraſibulus: to the firſt of which hee gaue vp the Citie of Gela, when hee had obtayned the Principalitie of Syracuſe. For, after that time, all his thoughts trauelled in the ſtrengthning, beautifying, and amplifying of Syracuſe. He defaced Camerina, that a little before was fallen from the obedience of the Syracuſians who built it, and brought the Citizens to Syracuſe. The Megarians that had moued a warre againſt him, he ouer-came; the richer ſort he brought to Syracuſe; and the people he ſold for ſlaues. In like manner dealt he with other places vpon like occaſion. Not long after this, Thero, a Prince of the Agrigentines, hauing diſpoſſeſt Terillus, of his Citie Himera; the Carthaginians were drawne into the quarrell by Anaxilus, Lord of Meſſena, Father-in-law to Terillus: and Gelon was alſo ſollicited by his Father-in-law, Thero. Gelon was content, and in fine, after diuers conflicts, the Carthaginians, and other Africans, led by Amilcar, were ouerthrowne by Gelon: and an hundred and fiftie thouſand of them left their bodies in Sicil.

Herod. & Diod.

This Gelon it was, to whom the Athenians and Lacedæmonians ſent for ſuccour, when Xerxes with his huge Armie paſt the Helleſpont. Hee, for their reliefe hauing armed thirtie thouſand Souldiers, and two hundred ſhips, refuſed neuertheleſſe to ſend them into Greece, becauſe they refuſed him the commandement of one of their Armies, either by Sea, or by Land. So he vſed to their Embaſſadors onely this ſaying, That their Spring was withered; accompting the Armie, by him prepared, to be the flower of the Greeke Nations.

The Carthaginians, after this great loſſe receiued, fearing the inuaſion of their owne Countrie, ſent to Gelon by their Embaſſadors, to deſire peace; who grants it them on theſe conditions; That from thenceforth they ſhould not ſacrifice their children to Saturne; That they ſhould pay him two thouſand talents of ſiluer; and preſent him with two armed ſhips, in ſigne of amitie. Theſe conditions the Carthaginians, not only willingly accepted, but with the two thouſands talents, and the ſhips for warre, they ſent vnto Demarata; Gelon's wife, a crowne, valued at an hundred hundred talents of gold, with other preſents. Whereby we ſee, that ſome Nations, and ſome Natures, are much the better for being well beaten. The warres ended; and Sicil in peace; Gelon beautified the Temples of the gods, and erected others in honour of them. So being exceedingly beloued and honoured of his Subiects, he left the World, and left for his Succeſſour his brother Hiero. Philiſtus and Plinie report, That, when his body was burnt, according to the cuſtome of that Age, a Dogge of his, which alwaies waited on him, ranne into the fire, and ſuffered himſelfe to be burnt with him.

To Gelon, Hiero his brother ſucceeded, a man rude, cruell, couetous, and ſo ſuſpicious of his brethren Polyzelus, and Thraſybulus, as hee ſought by all meanes to deſtroy them. Notwithſtanding all this; by the conuerſation which hee had with Simonides, he became of better condition, and greatly delighted with the ſtudie of good Arts. Diuers quarrells he had, as well with Theron of Agrigentum, as with other Cities: all which he ſhortly after compounded, and gaue a notable ouerthrow to the Carthaginians, whom Xerxes had incited to inuade Sicil, fearing the ſuccours which Gelon had prepared, to aide the Græcians, againſt him. Hee alſo ouerthrew in battaile Thraſydæus, the ſonne of Theron, and thereby reſtored the Agrigentines, to their former libertie. But in the end, hee loſt the loue of the Syracuſians; and after he had raigned eleuen yeares, he left the Kingdome to his brother Thraſybulus, who became a moſt vniuſt and bloudie Tyrant. Thraſybulus enioyed his Principalitie no longer then ten moneths. For, notwithſtanding the force of mercinarie Souldiers, which he entertained for his guards, he was beaten out of Syracuſe by the Citizens; to whom, being beſieged in Acradina, hee reſtored the gouernement, and was baniſhed the Iland. From whence he ſailed into Greece, where he died a priuate man, among the Locrians.

And now had the Syracuſians recouered againe their former libertie, as all the reſt of the Cities did, after which they had neuer ſought, had the Succeſſours of Gelon inherited his vertue, as they did the Principalitie of Syracuſe. For in all changes of Eſtates, the preſeruation ought to anſwere the acquiſition. Where a liberall, valiant, and aduiſed Prince, hath obtained any new Signiorie, and added it to that of his owne, or exalted himſelfe from being a priuate man, to the dignitie of a Prince; it behoueth the Succeſſour to maintaine it by the ſame way and arte, by which it was gotten.

To conclude, Syracuſe (though not without blowes, ere ſhee could cleanſe her ſelfe of the creatures and louers of Gelon) was now againe become Miſtreſſe of her ſelfe, and held her ſelfe free, well-neare threeſcore yeares, to the time of Dionyſius; though ſhe were in the meane while greatly endangered by a Citizen of her owne, called Tindario.

Now, to preuent the greatneſſe of any one among them, for the future, they deuiſed a kind of baniſhment of ſuch among them, as were ſuſpected; taking patterne from the Athenian Oſtraciſme. They called this their new deuiſed judgement of exile, Petaliſmus, wherein euery one wrote vpon an Oliue leafe (as at Athens they wrote vpon ſhells) the name of him, whom hee would haue expelled the Citie. Hee that had moſt ſuffrages againſt him, was baniſhed for fiue yeares. Hereby, in a ſhort time, it came to paſſe, that thoſe of judgement, and beſt able to gouerne the Common-weale, were by the worſt able, either ſuppreſt, or thruſt out of the Citie. Yea, ſuch as feared this Law, though they had not yet felt it, withdrew themſelues as ſecretly as they could; ſeeking ſome place of more ſecuritie, wherein to maintaine themſelues. And good reaſon they had ſo to doe; ſeeing there is nothing ſo terrible in any State, as a powerfull and authorized ignorance. But this Law laſted not long. For their neceſſitie taught them to aboliſh it, and reſtore againe the wiſer ſort to the Gouernment; from which, the Nobilitie hauing practiſed to baniſh one another, the State became altogether Popular. But after a while, being inuaded by Ducetius, King of the Sicilians, that inhabited the inner part of the Iland (who had alreadie taken Enna, and some other of the Grecian Cities, and ouerthrowne the Armie of the Agregentines) the Syracusians sent forces against him, commanded by an vnworthy Citizen of theirs called Bolcon. This their Captaine made nothing so much haste to finde Ducetius, against whom he was imployed, as he did to flee from the Armie he led, as soone as Ducetius presented him battaile. So for want of conduct, the greatest number of the Syracusians perished.

But making better choice among those, whom they had banished, they leuie other troups: by whom, in concluſion, Ducetius being beaten, submitteth himselfe, and is constrained to leaue the Iland for a time. Yet it was not long, ere hee returned againe, and built the Citie Collatina on the Sea-side.

Ducetius being dead; all the Greeke Cities did in a sort acknowledge Syracuse: Trinacia excepted; which also by force of armes, in the foureſcore and fift Olympiad, they brought to reason.

But they doe not long enioy this their Superintendencie. For the Citizens of Leontium, being oppreſt by them, seeke aide from the Athenians, about the sixt yeare of the Peloponnesian Warre. In this suite they preuailed by the eloquence of Gorgias their Orator; and got an hundred Athenian Gallies to succour them, vnder the leading of Laches, and Charœades. To this fleet, the Leontines, and their Partners, added one hundred more; with which forces, and with some supplies brought by Sophocles, Pythodorus, Eurymedon, and other Athenian Captaines, they inuaded the Territories of the Syracusians, and their Partisans; wanne and loſt diuers places; tooke Messana; and, in the seuenth yeare of the Peloponnesian Warre, loſt it againe. They also at the same time, attempted Himera, but in vaine. The fire of this quarrell tooke hold vpon many Cities, which inuaded each others Territorie with great violence. But when they had wearied themselues on all hands, and yet could see none issue of the warre; the Leontines, without the aduice of the Athenians, came to an accord with the Syracusians, and were admitted into their societie, with equall freedome. So the Athenians, who hoped to haue greatned themselues in Sicil, by the diuision and ciuill warre, were disappointed of their expectation, by the good agreement of the Sicilians, and faine to bee gone with the broken remainder of their fleet. This they knew not how to amend; but (according to the custome of popular Estates) by taking reuenge vpon their owne Commanders. So they banished Pythodorus, and Sophocles, and layd an heauy fine vpon Eurymedon. Shortly after this, followed the most memorable Warre, that euer was made by the Greekes in Sicil: which was that of the Athenians, against the Selinuntines, and Syracusians, in fauour of the Cities of Egesta, Leontium, and Catana. They of Selinus had oppreſt the Egestans; and they of Syracuse, the Leontines, and the Catanians: which was the ground of the warre. For, the Athenians vndertooke the protection of their old friends: And, in hatred of the Athenians, aide from Lacedæmon was sent to the Syracusians. The Lacedæmonians dealt plainely, hauing none other end, than that which they pretended, namely, to helpe a people of their owne Tribe, that craued their succour, being in distresse. The Athenians scarce knew what to pretend: for their preparations were so great, as discouered their intent to be none other, then the conqueſt of the whole Iland. Yet they which had called them in, were so blinded with their owne passions, that they would not beleeue their owne eies; which presented vnto them a Fleet, and Armie, farre greater, than the terrible report of fame had made it.

In this expedition, the Citie of Athens had engaged all her power; as regarding, not only the greatnesse of the enterprise, but the necessitie of finishing it in a short space of time. For the Lacedæmonians (as hath alreadie beene shewed in due place) stood at that time in such broken termes of peace with Athens, as differed not much from open warre. Wherefore it was thought necessarie, either to spare coſt in this great expeditiõ, or altogether to forbear it: which was likely to be hindred by wars at home, if their proceedings were slacke abroad. And surely, had not the desire of the Athenians beene ouer-passionate, the arguments of Nicias had caused them to abstaine from so chargeable a businesse, and to reserue their forces for a more needfull vse. But yong counsailes preuailed against the authoritie of ancient men, that were more regardfull of safetie than of honour.

Of this businesse, mention hath beene alreadie made, in that which wee haue written of the Peloponnesian warre. But what was there deliuered in general termes, as not concerning the affaires of Greece, otherwise than by consequẽce; doth in this place require a more perfect relation, as a matter, wherein the whole State of Sicil was like to haue felt a great conuersion.

Though Alcibiades had preuailed against Nicias, in exhorting the people to this great voiage; yet Nicias, together with Alcibiades, and Lamachus, was appointed to be one of the chiefe Commanders therein.

These had commission and direction, as well to succour the Segestans, and to reestablish the Leontines, cast out of their places by the Syracusians, as also, by force of armes, to subject the Syracusians, and all their adherents, in Sicil, and compell them by tribute, to acknowledge the Athenians for their supreme Lords. To effect which, the fore-named Captaines were sent off, with an hundred and thirtie Gallies, and fiue thousand one hundred Souldiers, besides the thirtie ships of burden, which transported their victualls, engines, and other munitions for the warre: and these were Athenians, Mantineans, Rhodians, and Candians: there were, besides these, sixe thousand Megarians light armed, with thirtie horse-men. Thucid. l. 6. c. 9.

With these troups and fleets they arriue at Rhegium, where the Rhegians refuse to giue them entrie; but sell them victualls for their monie. From thence they sent to the Egestans, to know what treasure they would contribute towards the warre, seeing for their sakes, they had entred thereinto. But they found by their answeres, that these Egestans were poore, and that they had abused the Athenian Embassadors with false shewes of gold, hauing in all but thirtie talents. The Athenians further were discouraged, when they found that the Rhegians, their ancient friends, and allied vnto the Leontines, refused to trust them within their walls. Hereupon Nicias aduiseth to depart towards the Selinuntines, and to force them, or perswade them, to an agreement with the Egestans; as likewise to see what disbursements the Egestans could make; and so to returne againe into Greece, and not to waste Athens in a needlesse warre. Alcibiades, on the other side, would sollicite the Cities of Sicil to confederacie against the Syracusians and Selinuntines, whereby to force them vnto restitution of all that they had taken from the Leontines. Lamachus, hee perswades them to assaile Syracuse it selfe, before it were prepared against them. But in the end (being excluded out of diuers Cities) they surprize Catana: & there they take new counsaile, how to proceede. Thence they imploied Nicias to those of Egista, who receiued from them thirtie talents towards his charges; and one hundred & twentie talents more there were of the spoiles they had gotten in the Iland. Thus, the Summer being spent in idle consultations, & vaine attempts, the Athenians prepare to assaile Syracuse. But Alcibiades hauing beene accused at home, in his absence, was sent for backe by the Athenians, to make his answere: and the Armie was left to the conduct of Nicias and Lamachus. These Commanders obtaine a landing place very neare vnto Syracuse, by this deuice.

They imploy to Syracuse an inhabitant of Catana, whom they trust; and instruct him, to promise vnto the Syracusians, that he would deliuer into their hands all the Athenians, within Catana. Hereupon the Syracusians draw thitherward with their best forces. But in the meane while, the Athenians, setting saile from Catana, arriue at Syracuse, where they land at faire ease, and fortifie themselues against the Town. Shortly after this, they fight, and the Syracusians had the losse: but the Athenians, wanting horse, could not pursue their victorie to any great effect. They then retire themselues, with a resolutiõ to refresh their Armie at Catana, for the winter-season.

From thence they made an attempt vpon Messana, hoping to haue taken it by an intelligence, but in vaine. For Alcibiades had discouered such as were Traitors within the Citie to the Messenians. This he now did, in despight of his owne Citizens, the Athenians; because they had recalled him from his command, with a purpose either to haue put him to death, or to haue banished him: whereof being assured by his friends, he tooke his way towards the Lacedæmonians, and to them hee gaue mischieuous counsaile against his countrey. While this winter yet lasted, the Syracusians send Embassadours to Lacedæmon, and Corinth, for aide: as likewise the Athenian Captaines in Sycil, send to Athens, for supplies. Which both the one and the other obtained.

In the Spring following (which was the beginning of the eighteenth yeare of the Peloponnesian warre) the Athenians in Sicil, saile from the Port of Catana, to Megara, forsaken of the Inhabitants; from whence forraging the Countrie, they obtaine some small victories ouer the straggling Syracusians: and at their returne to Catana, they receiue a supply of two hundred men at armes, but without horse, which they hoped to furnish in the Iland, from the Segestians, and other their adherents: they were also strengthened with a companie of Archers and with three hundred talents in monie.

Hereupon they take courage, and incampe neere Syracuse, vpon the banks of the great Port, repelling the Syracusians, that sallied to impeach their intrenchments. They also receiued from their Confederates foure hundred horse-men, with two hūdred other horse, to mount their men at armes. Syracuse was now in effect blockt vp, so as hardly any succours could enter, but such as were able to force their passage: yet the Athenians receiue diuers losses; among which it was not the least, that Lamachus, one of their best Commanders, was slaine.

In the meane while, Gylyppus, and Python, with the Lacedæmonian, and Corinthian forces arriue, and take land at Hymera. The Citizens of Hymera, and of Gela, together with the Selinuntines, joyne with them; so that with these and his own troups, Gylippus aduentured to march ouer-land towards Syracuse. The Syracusians send a part of their forces to meet him, and conduct him. The Athenians prepare to encounter them, expecting his arriual neere vnto the Citie, vpon a place of aduantage. At the first encounter, they had the better of their enemies, by reason that the Syracusian horse-men could not come to fight in those streights: but soone after, Gylippus charging them againe, brake them, and constrained Nicias to fortifie himselfe within his Campe. Whereupon Nicias made the state of his affaires knowne, by his letters, to the Athenians; shewing, that, without great supplies by Sea and Land, the enterprise would be lost, together with the small Armie remaining. These letters receiued, the Athenians appoint two other Generalls, Eurymedon, and Demosthenes, to joyne with Nicias: the one they dispatch presently with some supply; the other they send after him in the Spring following.

In the meane while, Gylyppus at Syracuse, fights with the Athenians, both by Sea and Land, somtimes with ill, and at other times with good successe: but in conclusion, he tooke from them their Fort, neere vnto Syracuse, at the Promontorie, called Plymmyrium; wherein the Athenians lost their treasure, and a great part of all their prouisions. Notwithstanding which losse, and that the Athenians themselues, in Greece, were (in effect) besieged within Athens, by the Lacedæmonians; yet were they most obstinate in prosecuting the Warre in Sicil, and dispatched away Demosthenes with new succours. Demosthenes, in his way towards Sicil, encountred with Polyanthes the Corinthian, with his fleete: both the Captaines being bound for Sicil; the one to succour Nicias; the other, Gylippus. The losse betweene them was in effect equall; and neither so broken, but that each of them prosecuted the enterprise they had in hand. But before the succours arriued to either, Gylippus and Ariston had assailed the Athenians in the great Port of Syracuse, and in a Sea-fight put them to the worst, to the great discouragement of the Athenians. On the neck of this, Demosthenes nes arriued with three-ſcore and thirteene Gallies, charged with foot-men; and (blaming the ſlouth of Nicias) he inuaded the Syracuſians, the ſame day that he arriued. But he made more haſte, than he had good ſpeede, being ſhamefully beaten, and repulſed with great loſſe. Hereupon Demoſthenes and Eurymedon, determine to riſe vp from before Syracuſe, and returne to the ſuccour of Athens: but Nicias diſputed to the contrarie, pretending that hee had good intelligence within Syracuſe, whereby he learned, that the Towne could not long hold out.

Whatſoeuer Nicias his intelligence was; vpon the arriuall of a new ſupply into the Towne, the Athenians had all conſented to depart, and to lodge at Catana: had not an Eclipſe of the Moone, boding (as was thought) ill ſucceſſe, cauſed them to deferre their departure. But this ſuperſtition coſt them deare. For the Syracuſians, Lacedæmonians, and Corinthians, with three-ſcore and ſeuenteene ſaile of Gallies, entred the great Port of Syracuſe, wherein the Athenians kept their fleet, and whereon they had fortified themſelues. The Athenians, in the ſame Port encountred them with foure-ſcore and ſixe Gallies, commanded by Eurymedon; in which the Athenian fleet was beaten, by the leſſer number, and Eurymedon ſlaine. Now, though it were ſo, that the Syracuſians receiued the more loſſe by Land (for the fight was generall) yet when the Athenians were beaten by Sea, in which kinde they thought themſelues inuincible, they were wonderfully caſt downe. For it was well ſaid of Gylippus, to the Syracuſians; When any people doe finde themſelues vanquiſhed in that manner of fight, and with thoſe weapons, in which they perſwade themſelues that they exceede all others, they not only looſe their reputation, but their courage. The Athenians, beſides the Gallies ſunck and wrackt, had ſeuenteene taken, and poſſeſt by the enemie: and with great labour and loſſe they defended the reſt from being fired, hauing drawne them within a Paliſado, in one corner of the Port, vnaduiſedly: for it is as contrarie to a Sea-warre, to thruſt ſhips into a ſtreight roome and corner, as it is to ſcatter foot in a plaine field againſt horſe; the one ſubſiſting, by being at large; the other, by cloſe imbattailing.

The Syracuſians, hauing now weakned the Athenian fleet, reſolue to impriſon them within the Port. And to that purpoſe they range all their Gallies in the mouth of the Hauen, being about a mile ouer, and there they came to Anchor; filling the Out-let with all manner of Veſſels, which they man moſt ſtrongly, becauſe the Athenians, being now made deſperate, ſhould not with double ranks of Gallies breake through the Syracuſian fleet; which lay but ſingle, becauſe they were forſt to range themſelues ouer all the Out-let of the Port. They therefore, not onely mored themſelues ſtrongly by their Anchors, but chained the ſides of their Gallies together, and layd behinde them againe certaine ſhips, which ſerued in the former warre for victuallers: to the end, that if any of their Gallies were ſunke; or the chaine, which joined them to their fellowes, broken; the Athenians might yet finde themſelues, a ſecond time, intangled and arreſted. To diſorder alſo thoſe Athenian Gallies, which came on in forme of a wedge, to breake through, and force a paſſage, the Syracuſians had left within theſe Gallies and Ships, inchained together, a certaine number of looſe ones, to ſtop their courſe and furie. For where the way of any veſſell, vſing oare or ſailes, is broken, and their ſpeede fore-ſlowed, they cannot force with any weight and violence, the reſiſtance oppoſing.

On the other ſide, the Athenians knew that they were vtterly loſt, except with an inuincible reſolution, they could make their way, and breake downe this great bridge of boats; or (at leaſt) force a paſſage through them in ſome part or other: which they reſolue to hazard, with all their ſhipping (to the number of one hundred and ten, of all ſorts) and with all the ſtrength of their Land-armie, in them imbarqued. But the Gallies, which were within the bridge of boats, did ſo diſorder the Athenian fleet, ere they came to force the bridge, as, albeit ſome few of them had broken through the chaines, yet being ſtopt by the ſhips without, and aſſailed by other looſe Gallies of the Syracuſians, which were purpoſely left at large in the Sea,

they were either taken or ſunke. Three great diſaduantages the Athenians had: the firſt, that fighting within a Hauen, and (as it were) in a ſtreight, they had no roome to turne themſelues, nor to free themſelues one from another, being intangled; the ſecond, that hauing ouer-peſtered their Gallies with Souldiers, who vſed offenſiue armes of darts and ſlings, they had not place vpon the decks to ſtretch their armes: the third was, the diſcomfortable end for which they fought, namely, to force a paſſage, by which they might ſaue themſelues by running away. To be ſhort, the fight was no leſſe terrible than the confuſion; the ſlaughter great on all ſides; and the noiſe, and the cries, ſo lowd and lamentable, as that no direction could be heard. But in the end, the Athenians, as many as ſuruiued, were beaten back to the Land, with loſſe of threeſcore of their Gallies, broken, ſunke, or abandoned. The Syracuſians did alſo looſe twentie of theirs, with Python, Commander of the Corinthians. The reſt of the Athenian Gallies, running themſelues into the bottome of the Port, ſaued themſelues by the helpe and countenance of the Land-armie, there fortified. In this deſperate eſtate, the Athenian Commanders goe to counſell. Demoſthenes perſwades them, to furniſh with freſh Souldiers thoſe few Gallies which remained; and while the Syracuſians were triumphing, and made ſecure by their preſent victorie, to ſet vpon them, and forcing their way out of the Port, to returne to Athens. This was no ill counſaile. For, as we haue heard of many great Captaines (yea, the greateſt number of all that haue beene victorious) that haue neglected the ſpeedie proſecution of a beaten enemie; ſo might we produce many examples of thoſe, who, hauing ſlept ſecurely in the boſome of good ſucceſſe, haue beene ſuddenly awaked, by the re-allied Companies of a broken Armie, and haue therby loſt againe all the honour, and aduantage, formerly gotten. But Nicias oppoſeth the aduice of Demoſthenes: Others ſay, that the Sea-men were againſt it. Whereupon abandoning their Gallies, they all reſolue to march ouer land to the Cities of their Confederates, till ſome more fauourable fortune ſhould call them thence. On the other ſide, Gylippus, and other the Lacedæmonian and Corinthian Captaines, with Hermocrates, exhort the Syracuſians to put themſelues preſently into the field, and to ſtop all the paſſages, leading to thoſe Cities of their enemies, to which the Athenians might make retrait. But many were weary, and many were wounded, and many of them thought that they had done enough for the preſent. Which humour in ſome of our Commanders at Cadez, loſt vs both the Indian fleet, and the ſpoiles of many other Neighbour-places. Hermocrates, the Syracuſian, finding it a loſt labour, to perſwade his Countrimen to any haſtie proſecution, deuiſed this good ſtratagem, thereby to gaine time; not doubting, but that after a day or two, hee ſhould draw them willingly out. He ſent two or three horſe-men out of Syracuſe by night, willing them to finde Nicias, and (after they had aſſured him, that they were of the Athenians faction) to giue him aduice not to march away ouer-haſtily from the place, wherein he was fortified; alleaging that the Syracuſians had lodged their Armie, which could not long ſtay there, vpon the paſſages & places of aduantage, leading towards the Cities of their Allies. Theſe tidings Nicias eaſily beleeued, and put off his iournie to the third day. For men newly beaten, are (for the moſt part) more fearefull than wiſe; and to them, euery thiſtle in the field, appeares, by night, a man at armes.

The third day (leauing all their Gallies, and all their baggage) they remoue; being pierced and purſued with the lamentable out-cries of thoſe that were ſick and hurt: whom they abandon to the cure of their enemies ſwords. The reſt march away, to the number of fortie thouſand; and make their firſt paſſage by force, ouer the Riuer of Anapus, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of their enemies. But being euery day charged in their marches, & by the Syracuſian horſe-men, beaten in from forraging, and prouiſion of foode, they grow weake and heartleſſe. The Syracuſians alſo poſſeſſe the Mountaine Lepas, by which they were to paſſe towards Camerina, and thereby force them to fall back againe towards the Sea coaſt, and to take what what way they could: being vnable to proceede in their journey intended. Many hard ſhifts they made, in difficult paſſages, and blinde marches by night; which they were faine to endure, as hauing none other meanes to eſcape from the enemie that purſued them, and held them waking with continuall skirmiſhing. To keepe all in order, Nicias vnder-tooke the leading of the Vantgard; and Demoſthenes conducted the Reare. At the Riuer Erineus, Nicias takes the ſtart of a whole nights march, leauing Demoſthenes to make the retrait: who being incompaſſed, and ouerpreſt with numbers, in the end renders himſelfe. The conditions he obtained, were farre better than he could haue hoped for; and the faith of his enemies farre worſe than he ſuſpected. For he was afterward, with Nicias, murdered in priſon. The Armie of Demoſthenes being diſſolued, they purſue Nicias with the greater courage: who being vtterly broken, vpon the paſſage of the Riuer Aſſinarus, rendred himſelfe to Gylippus, vpon honeſt conditions. Gylippus ſought to preſerue him, and to haue had the honour, to haue brought theſe two to Sparta; Nicias, as a noble enemie to the Lacedæmonians, and who, at the ouerthrow, which they receiued at Pylus by the Athenians, had ſaued the liues of the vanquiſhed; Demoſthenes, as one that had done to Lacedæmon the greateſt hurt. Hermocrates alſo, the Commander of the Syracuſian Armie, diſſwaded the reſt, by all the arte he had, from vſing any barbarous violence, after ſo noble a victorie. But the cruell, and the cowardly ſort, (cowardiſe and crueltie, being inſeparable paſſions) preuailed, and cauſed theſe braue Captaines to be miſerably murdered; one part of their Souldiers to bee ſtarued in lothſome priſons; and the reſt, ſold for ſlaues. This was the ſucceſſe of the Sicilian warre: which tooke end at the riuer Aſſinarus, the foure and twentieth day of May, in the foureſcore and eleuenth Olympiad.

The Athenians being beaten out of Sicil; the Egeſtans (for whoſe defence, againſt the Selinuntines, this late warre had beene taken in hand) fearing the victorious Syracuſians, ſought helpe from the Carthaginians; to whom they offered themſelues, and their Citie, as their Vaſſals. The Carthaginians, though ambitious enough of enlarging their Dominion in Sicil, yet conſidering the proſperitie of the Syracuſians, and their late victories ouer the Athenians, they ſtaied a while to diſpute of the matter, whether they ſhould refuſe, or accept, the offer made vnto them: for the Selinuntines were ſtreightly allied to the Syracuſians, as may appeare by what is paſt. In the end, the Senators of Carthage reſolue vpon the enterpriſe; and (by a trick of their Punick wit) to ſeparate the Syracuſians from the Selinuntines, they ſend Embaſſadours to Syracuſe: praying that Citie, as in the behalfe of the Egeſtans, to compell the Selinuntines to take reaſon, and to reſt content with ſo much of the lands in queſtion, as they of Syracuſe ſhould thinke meet to allow them. The Syracuſians approued the motion; for it tended to their owne honour. But the Selinuntines would make no ſuch appointment: rather they tooke it ill, that the Syracuſians, with whom they had run one courſe of fortune, in the Athenian war, ſhould offer to trouble them, by interpoſing as Arbitrators, in a buſines, that themſelues could end by force. This was right as the Carthaginians would haue it. For now could they of Selinus with an ill grace craue aide of Syracuſe; and the Syracuſians as ill grant it vnto thoſe, that had refuſed to ſtand to the Arbitrement, which the Carthaginians would haue put into their hands. Hereupon, an Armie of three hundred thouſand men is ſet out from Carthage, vnder the conduct of Hannibal, Nephew to that Amilcar, who (as you haue heard before) was ouerthrowne with the great Carthaginian Armie at Himera by Gelon. Hannibal was exceeding greedy of this imploiment, that he might take reuenge, as well of his Vncles, as of his Fathers death; the one of them hauing beene ſlaine by the Himerans; the other by thoſe of Selinus. Both theſe Cities, Hannibal, in this warre, wonne by force of armes, ſackt them, and burnt them; and hauing taken three thouſand of the Himerans priſoners, he cauſed them to be led vnto the place, where Amilcar was ſlaine, and buried them there.

After this followed ſome trouble at Syracuſe, occaſioned by the baniſhment of Hermocrates, Hermocrates, who had lately beene Generall of the Syracusian forces, against the Athenians. The malice of his enemies had so farre preuailed with the ingratefull multitude, that he was condemned to exile for his meere vertue, at such time, as he was aiding the Lacedæmonians, in their warre against Athens; wherein hee did great seruice. All the honester sort within Syracuse were sorie for the injurie done vnto him, and sought to haue him repealed. Hermocrates himselfe, returning into Sicil, gathered an Armie of sixe thousand; with which he beganne to repaire Selinus; and by many noble actions laboured to winne the loue of his Citizens. But the faction that opposed him was the stronger. Wherefore, he was aduised to seize vpon a Gate of Syracuse, with some strength of men; wherby his friends, within the Towne, might haue the better meanes to rise against the aduerse partie. This he did: but presently the multitude fell to armes, and set vpon him; in which conflict hee was slaine. But his sonne-in-law, Dionysius, shall make them wish Hermocrates aliue againe.

Of DIONYSIVS the Tyrant: and others, following him, in Syracuse.

THe Syracusians had enjoyed their libertie about threescore yeares, from the death of Thrasybulus, to the death of Hermocrates: at which time Dionysius was raised vp by God, to take reuenge, as well of their crueltie towards strangers, as of their ingratitude towards their owne best Citizens. For before the time of Dionysius, they had made it their pastime, to reward the vertue of their worthiest Commanders with death, or disgrace: which custome they must now bee taught to amend.

Dionysius obtained the Principalitie of Syracuse, by the same degrees, that many others, before him, had made themselues Masters of other Cities, and of Syracuse it selfe. For, being made Prætor, and commanding their Armies against the Carthaginians, and other their enemies, he behaued himselfe so well, that he got a generall loue among the people, and men of warr. Then beganne he to follow the example of Pisistratus, that made himselfe Lord of Athens; obtaining a band of sixe hundred men, to defend his person: vnder pretence, that his priuate enemies, being traiterously affected to the State of Syracuse, had laied plots how to murder him, because of his good seruices. He doubled the pay of the Souldiers; alledging, that it would encourage them to fight manfully: but intending thereby to assure them to himselfe. He perswaded the Citizens, to call home, out of exile, those that had beene banished, which were the best men of Syracuse; and these were afterwards at his deuotion, as obliged vnto him by so great a benefit. His first fauour, among the Syracusians, grew from his accusation of the principall men. It is the delight of base people to raigne ouer their betters: wherefore, gladly did hee helpe them to breake downe, as fetters imprisoning their libertie, the barres that held it vnder safe custodie. Long it was not, ere the chiefe Citizens had found whereat hee aimed. But what they saw, the people would not see: and some that were needie, and knew not how to get Offices without his helpe, were willing to helpe him, though they knew his purposes to be such, as would make all the Citie to smart. He began early to hunt after the tyrannie; being but fiue and twentie yeares of age when he obtained it: belike, it was his desire to raigne long. His first worke, of making himselfe absolute Lord in Syracuse, was, the possession of the Citadell; wherein was much good prouision, and vnder it the Gallies were mored. This hee obtained by allowance of the people; and hauing obtained this, he cared for no more, but declared himselfe without all shame or feare: The Armie, the chiefe Citizens, restored by him from banishment; all the needie sort within Syracuse, that could not thriue thriue by honeſt courſes; and ſome neighbour-townes, bound vnto him, either for his helpe in warre, or for his eſtabliſhing the faction, raigning at that preſent, were wholly affected to his aſſiſtance. Hauing therefore gotten the Citadell into his hands, he needed no more, ſaue to aſſure what hee had alreadie. Hee ſtrengthned himſelfe by diuers marriages; taking firſt to wife the daughter of Hermocrates; and after her, two at once; the one a Locrian, Doris, by whom he had Dionyſius, his Succeſſor; the other, Ariſtomache, the daughter of Hipparinus, and ſiſter to Dion, honourable men in Syracuſe, which bare vnto him many children, that ſerued to fortifie him with new alliances.

Yet it was not long, ere ſome of the Syracuſians (enuying his proſperitie) incited the multitude, and tooke armes againſt him, euen in the noueltie of his Rule. But their enterpriſe was more paſſionately, than wiſely gouerned. He had ſhamefully been beaten by the Carthaginians at Gela: which, as it vexed the Sicilian men at armes, making them ſuſpect that it was his purpoſe to let the Carthaginians waſte all, that hee might afterwards take poſſeſſion of the deſolate places; ſo it inflamed them with a deſire to free themſelues from his tyrannie. They departed therefore from him, and marched haſtily to Syracuſe, where they found friends to helpe them: there they forced his Palace, ranſaked his treaſures, and ſo ſhamefully abuſed his wife, that for the griefe thereof ſhee poiſoned her ſelfe. But hee followed their heeles apace; and firing a Gate of the Citie by night, entred ſoone enough to take reuenge, by making a ſpeedie riddance of them. For he ſpared none of his knowne, no, not of his ſuſpected enemies. After that, he grew ſo doubtfull of his life, as he neuer durſt truſt Barber to trim him, nor any perſon, no, not ſo much as his brother, to enter into his chamber, vnſtript and ſearched. He was the greateſt Robber of the people, that euer raigned in any State; and withall the moſt vnreſpectiuely cruell.

After this, he ſeparated with fortification that part of the Citie, called the Iland, from the reſt; like as the Spaniard did the Citadell of Antwerpe: therein he lodged his treaſures, and his Guards.

He then beganne to make warre vpon the free Cities of Sicil: but while hee lay before Herbeſſe, an in-land Towne, the Syracuſians rebelled againſt him; ſo, as with great difficultie hee recouered his Citadell: from whence, hauing allured the old Souldiers of the Campanians, who forced their paſſage through the Citie, with one thouſand and two hundred horſe, hee againe recouered the maſterie ouer the Syracuſians. And when a multitude of them were buſied in gathering in their Harueſt, he diſarmed all the Townes-men remayning: and new ſtrengthned the Fort of the Iland, with a double wall. He incloſed that part alſo, called Epipoles; which, with threeſcore thouſand labourers, hee finiſhed in three weekes; being two leagues in compaſſe. He then built two hundred new Gallies, and repaired one hundred and ten of the old; forged one hundred and fortie thouſand Targets, with as many ſwords, and head-peeces, with fourteene thouſand corſlets, and all other ſutable armes. Which done, he ſent word to the Carthaginians, (greatly enfeebled by the plague) That except they would abandon the Greeke Townes, which they held in Sicil, he would make warre vpon them: and, not ſtaying for anſwere, he tooke the ſpoile of all the Phœnician ſhips, and merchandize, within his Ports; as King Philip the ſecond did of our Engliſh, before the warre in our late Queenes time. He then goes to the field with foureſcore thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe, and ſends his brother Leptines to ſea, with two hundred Gallies, and fiue hundred ſhips of burden. Moſt of the Townes which held for Carthage yeelded vnto him; ſauing Panormus, Segeſta or Egeſta, Ancyra, Motya, and Entella. Of theſe, he firſt wonne Motya by aſſault, and put all therein to the ſword; but before Egeſta hee loſt a great part of his Armie, by a ſallie of the Citizens. In the meane while Himilco arriues; but, ere he tooke land, he loſt in a fight at Sea, with Leptines, fiftie ſhips of warre, and fiue thouſand Souldiers, beſides many ſhips of burden. This notwithſtanding, hee recouered againe Motya vpon his firſt deſcent. From thence marching towards Meſſena, sena, he tooke Lypara, and (soone after) Messena, and rased it to the ground. Now beganne Dionysius greatly to doubt his estate. Hee therefore fortified all the places hee could, in the Territorie of the Leontines, by which hee supposed that Himilco would passe toward Syracuse; and he himselfe tooke the field againe, with foure and thirtie thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Now, hearing that Himilco had diuided his Armie into two parts, marching with the one halfe ouer land, and sending Mago with the other by Sea: he sent Leptines, his brother, to encounter Mago. But Leptines was vtterly beaten by the Carthaginians; twentie thousand of his men were slaine, and an hundred of his Gallies lost. It is very strange, and hardly credible, which yet good Authours tell vs; That one Citie should be able to furnish fiue hundred saile of ships, and two hundred Gallies: (for, so many did Syracuse arme in this warre) and more strange it is, that in a battaile at Sea, without any great Artillerie, or Musket-shot, twentie thousand should be slaine in one fight. In all our fights against the Turkes, of which that at Lepanto was the most notable, we heare of no such number lost; nor in any other fight by Sea, that euer hapned in our age, nor before vs. When Charles the fift went to besiege Algier, hee had in all his fleet, transporters and others, but two hundred and fiftie saile of ships, and threescore and fiue Gallies: for the furnishing of which fleet, he sought helpe from all the Cities and Ports of Spaine, Naples, and the rest of Italie. But in old times it was the manner to carrie into the field, vpon extremitie, as many as were needfull, of all that could beare armes, giuing them little wages, or other allowance: in our daies it is not so; neither indeede, is it often requisite. Vpon this ouerthrow, Dionysius postes away to Syracuse, to strengthen it: Himilco followes him, and besiegeth the Towne by Land and Sea. But the Tyrant, hauing receiued aide from the Lacedæmonians, vnder the conduct of Pharacidas, puts himselfe to Sea, to make prouision for his Citizens: who, in his absence, take twenty of the Carthaginian Gallies, and sinke foure. Hereupon, finding their owne successe prosperous, and that of the Tyrant exceeding ill; hauing also at the present weapons in their hands; they consult how to recouer their libertie. And this they had done, had not Pharacidas the Lacedæmonian resisted them. It also fell out, to his exceeding aduantage, that the plague was so increased, and so violent, among the Carthaginians; as it is said, that aboue an hundred thousand of them died thereof. Hee therefore, with the power that he could gather together, sets vpon them both by Sea and Land; and hauing slaine great numbers of them, forceth Himilco to desire peace. This peace Dionysius sold him for a great summe of monie; on condition that he should steale away with his Carthaginians only: which he basely accepted, betraying the rest of the Africans and Spaniards. Yet no faith was kept with him: for he was pursued, and left many of his Carthaginians behinde him. The rest of the Africans fell vnder the swords of their enemies; only the Spaniards, after they had a while brauely defended themselues, were (after their submission) entertained, and serued the Conquerour.

Many such examples of perfidious dealing haue I noted in other places, and can hardly forbeare to deliuer vnto memorie the like practises, when they meete with their matches: That which hapned vnto Monsieur de Piles, was very sutable to this treacherie, wherewith Dionysius pursued Himilco. I was present, when De Piles related the injurie done vnto him. He had rendered St. Iohn d' Angelie, to the French King Charles the ninth, who besieged him therein. Hee rendred it, vpon promise made by the faith of a King, that he should be suffered to depart in safetie, with all his followers. Yet in presence of the King himselfe, of the Duke of Anion his brother, Generall of his Armie, of the Queene Mother, and of diuers Dukes and Marshalls of France, he was set vpon, and broken in his march; spoiled of all that he had; and forced to saue his life by flight, leauing the most of his Souldiers dead vpon the place: the Kings hand and faith, warranting him to march away with ensignes displaid, and with all his goods and prouisions, no whit auailing him. It needes not therefore seeme strange, that an Heathen Tyrant should thus break his faith, since

Kings,

Kings, profeſſing Chriſtianitie, are bold to doe the like, or command their Captaines to doe it for them.

Dionyſius, after this great victorie, tooke care to re-edifie Meſſena. Mago, who ſtaied in Sicil, to hold vp the Carthaginians therein, is againe beaten by Dionyſius; who is alſo beaten by the Tauromenians. A new ſupply of foureſcore thouſand Souldiers is ſent from Carthage to Mago; but they take egges for their monie, and make peace with Dionyſius, leauing the Sicilians in Tauromenium, to ſhift for themſelues: whom Dionyſius, after a long ſiege, ouer-came, and gaue their Citie to his mercinarie Souldiers.

He then paſt into Italie, obtained diuers victories there, brought the Rhegians on their knees, forced them to pay him one hundred & foureſcore thouſand crownes, to furniſh him with threeſcore Gallies, and to put in an hundred pledges, for aſſurance of their future obſeruance of couenants. This he did, not with any purpoſe to performe vnto them the peace that they had ſo dearely bought; but that hauing taken from them their Gallies, he might beſiege them, and ruine them vtterly, with the more eaſe. Now to the ende hee might not, without ſome colour, falſifie the faith that hee had giuen to them; he pretended to want victual for his Armie, at ſuch time as hee ſeemed ready to depart out of Italie, and ſent to them to furniſh him therewith; promiſing to returne them the like quantitie, at his comming home to Syracuſe.

His reſolution was, that if they refuſed to furniſh him, hee would then make their refuſall the cauſe of his quarrell: if they yeelded to aide him with the proportion which he deſired, that then they ſhould not be able, for want of food, to endure a ſiege any long time againſt him. For to ruine them hee had fully determined, at what price ſoeuer. And great reaſon he had to take reuenge of them, if he had done it fairely, and without breach of faith. For when in the beginning of his raigne, he deſired them to beſtow a daughter of ſome of their Nobilitie vpon him, for a wife: they anſwered, That they had not any one fit for him, ſaue the Hang-mans daughter. Princes doe rather pardon ill deedes, than villanous words. Alexander the Great forgaue many ſharpe ſwords, but neuer any ſharpe tongues; no, though they told him but truely of his errours. And certainely, it belongs to thoſe that haue warrant from God, to reprehend Princes: and to none elſe, eſpecially in publique.

It is ſaid, that Henrie the fourth of France, had his heart more inflamed againſt the Duke of Biron, for his ouer-bold and biting taunts, that hee vſed againſt him before Amiens, than for his conſpiracie with the Spaniard, or Sauoyan: for he had pardoned tenne thouſand of ſuch as had gone farther, and drawne their ſwords againſt him. The contemptuous words that Sir Iohn Parret vſed of our late Queene Elizabeth, were his ruine; and not the counterfait letter of the Romiſh Prieſt, produced againſt him. So fared it with ſome other, greater than hee, that thereby ranne the ſame, and a worſe fortune, ſoone after.

To bee ſhort, hee made them know new bread from old. Hee aſſaulted their Towne on al ſides, which he continued to doe eleuen moneths, till he wonne it by force. He vſed his victorie without mercie; ſpecially againſt Phyton, who had commanded within it.

Some other warres hee made with the Carthaginians, after the taking and raſing of this Citie; and thoſe with variable ſucceſſe. For as in one encounter hee ſlue Mago, with ten thouſand Africans: ſo the ſonne of Mago beat him, and ſlue his brother Leptines, with foureteene thouſand of his Souldiers. After which hee bought his peace of the Carthaginians, as they had formerly done of him; following therein the aduice of Proſperitie and Aduerſitie, as all Kings and States doe.

When he had raigned eight and thirtie yeeres, he died: some say, in his bedde, peaceably; which is the most likely, though others report it otherwise. A cruell man he was, and a faithlesse; a great Poet, but a fooliſh one. He entertained Plato a while, but afterward, for speaking against his tyrannie, hee gaue order to haue him slaine, or sold for a slaue. For he could endure no man, that flattered him not beyond measure. His Parasites therefore stiled his crueltie, The hate of euill men; and his lawlesse slaughters, The ornaments and effects of his iustice. True it is, that flatterers are a kinde of vermine, which poison all the Princes of the World; and yet they prosper better than the worthiest and valiantest men doe: and I wonder not at it; for it is a world: and as our Sauiour Christ hath told vs, The World will loue her owne.

To this Dionysius, his sonne of the same name succeeded; and inherited both his Kingdome, and his Vices. To winne the loue of the People, he pardoned, and released out of prison, a great number of persons, by his Father lockt vp, and condemned. Withall, hee remitted vnto his Citizens diuers payments, by his Father imposed vpon them. Which done, and thereby hoping, that hee had fastned vnto himselfe the peoples affections; he cast off the Sheepes skinne, and put on that of the Woolfe. For being jealous of his owne Brethren, as men of more vertue than himselfe, he caused them all to bee slaine; and all the Kindred that they had by their Mothers side. For Dionysius his Father (as hath beene said) had two Wiues; Doris of Locris; and Aristomache a Syracusian, the sister of Dion, which Brother-in-law of his he greatly enriched.

By Doris hee had this Dionysius, who succeeded vnto him: and by Aristomache he had two Sonnes and two Daughters; of which the elder, called Sophrosyne, he gaue in marriage to his eldest Sonne, and her halfe-brother, Dionysius; the yonger, called Areta, he bestowed on his Brother Theorides: after whose death, Dion tooke her to Wife, being his Neece.

This Dion, a just, and valiant man, finding that Dionysius had abandoned all exercise of vertue, and that hee was wholly giuen ouer to sensualitie, preuailed so much with Plato, whose Disciple he had beene, as he drew him into Sicil, to instruct the youg King. And hauing perswaded the King to entertaine him, hee wrought so well with him, as Dionysius beganne to change condition; to change Tyrannie, into Monarchie; and to hold the Principalitie, that he had, rather by the loue of his People, and his Nationall Lawes, than by the violence of his Guards and Garrisons. But this goodnesse of his lasted not long. For Philistus the Historian, and other his Parasites, that hated Dions seueritie, wrought him out of the Tyrants fauour; and caused him soone after to be banished out of Sicil, to the great griefe of the whole Nation. For whereas Dion had made offer to the King, either to compound the quarrels betweene him and the Carthaginians, of whom Dionysius stood in great feare, or (at least) if they refused it, to furnish him with fiftie Gallies at his owne charge, during the warre against them: his enemies found meanes, by sinister interpretation, to conuert his good will into matter of treason. They told Dionysius, that al the great commendations, giuen of Plato, had tended to none other end, then to soften his minde, and to make him neglect his owne affaires, by the studie of Philosophie; whilest Dion, in the meane time hauing furnished fiftie Gallies, vnder colour of the Kings seruice, had it in his owne power, either to deliuer to the Syracusians their former liberty, or to make himself Lord and Soueraigne of their State.

It is likely, that the honest and liberall offer which hee made, to serue the King with so great a preparation, at his owne charge, begot him many enemies. For they that had serued the King for none other ende, than to raise and enrich themselues, and had already beene raised and enriched, thought themselues bound to make the same offer, that Dion had made, if the King had had the grace to conceiue ceiue it aright. But theſe couetous and ignorant cowards, that had neither the knowledge, nor the daring, that Dion had, were bold to ſtile his Loue and Liberalitie, Pride and Preſumption; and heartned the yong King, in his oppreſſing, and eating vp his owne people, of whoſe ſpoiles they themſelues ſhared no ſmall portion. I haue heard it, That when Charles the fift had the repulſe at Algier in Africa, Ferdinando Corteſe, one of the braueſt men that euer Spaine brought forth, offered vnto the Emperour, to continue the ſiege at his owne charge. But he had neuer good day after it. For they that enuied his victories, and his conqueſt of Mexico in the weſt Indies, perſwaded the Emperour, that Corteſe ſought to value himſelfe aboue him; and to haue it ſaid, That what the Emperour could not, Corteſe had effected, and was therefore more worthy of the Empire, than he that had it.

When Dion was newly baniſhed, the Tyrant was contented, at firſt, to ſend him the reuenewes of his Lands, and permit him to diſpoſe of his moueables, at his own pleaſure: not without giuing hope, to recall him in ſhort time. Had he continued in this good moode, like enough it is, that Dion would haue beene well pleaſed to liue well, as he did, at Athens. But after ſome time, Dionyſius made Port-ſale of this Noble-mans goods; and thereby vrged him to take another courſe; euen to ſeeke the reſtitution of his Countrie to libertie. The vertues of Dion, eſpecially his great liberalitie, had purchaſed much loue in Greece. This loue made him ſuſpected and hated of the Tyrant: but it ſtood him in good ſtead, when he ſought to raiſe men, with whoſe helpe he might returne into Sicil. Yet he got not aboue eight hundred (for hee caried the matter cloſely) to follow him in this aduenture. But many of them were men of quality, and fit to be Leaders. Neither did he doubt of finding in Syracuſe, as many as ſhould be needfull, that would readily aſſiſt him. Therefore he landed boldly in Sicil; marched to Syracuſe; entred the Citie without reſiſtance; armed the multitude; and wonne all, ſaue the Citadell.

Dionyſius was then abſent in Italie; but hee quickely had aduertiſement of this dangerous accident. Wherefore hee returned haſtily to Syracuſe: whence, after many vaine treaties of peace, and ſome forceable attempts to recouer the Towne, he was faine to depart; leauing yet the Caſtle to the cuſtodie of Apollocrates, his eldeſt ſonne. Yet ere he went, his Minion Philiſtus, comming with a ſtrength of men to aſſiſt him, was beaten, taken, and put to death by torment. But Dion, for the recouerie of his Countries libertie, had the ſame reward, that all worthy men haue had from popular Eſtates. He was diſgraced, aſſaulted, and forced to abandon the Citie. Hee retired himſelfe to the Leontines, who receiue him with great ioy. Soone after his departure from Syracuſe, new troups enter the Caſtle: they ſallie out, aſſaile, ſpoile, and burne a great part of the Citie. Dion is ſent for, with humble requeſt: yet, ere hee could arriue, Dionyſius his Souldiers were retired; and the Townesmen, thinking themſelues ſecure, ſhut the gates againſt Dion. But the next night they of the Caſtle ſallie againe, with greater furie then euer; they kill Man, Woman, and Child, and ſet fire in all parts of the Towne. In this their extremitie Dion comes the ſecond time to their ſuccour; the loue of his Countrie ſurmounting all the injuries that he had receiued. Hee ſets vpon the Garriſon of the Caſtle, with the one part of his Armie; and quencheth the fire, euery-where kindled, with the other part. In concluſion, after he had conquered both the fire and the ſword, that had well-neere burnt to aſhes, and depopulated Syracuſe, he recouered the Caſtle, with the munition and furniture thereof, and ſent Apollocrates, after Dionyſius his Father, into Italie. But their malice, of whom he had beſt deſerued, and whom he had loued moſt, gaue an vntimely ende to his dayes. For he was ſoone after this his victorie, murdered by Calyppus; who, after he had, with ill ſucceſſe, a while gouerned Syracuſe, was ſlaine with the ſame Dagger, with which hee had murdered Dion.

Ten yeeres after the death of Dion, Dionyſius, with the aſſiſtance of his friends in Italie, recouers his eſtate, and returnes to Syracuſe, driuing Nyſæus thence, whom he found Gouernour therein. The better sort of the Citizens, fearing, more then euer, his crueltie, flee to Icetes, a Syracusian borne, and then ruling the Leontines. Icetes enters into confederacie with the Carthaginians, hoping by their assistance, not onely to preuaile against Dionysius; but by the hatred of the Syracusians towards Dionysius, to make him also Lord of their Citie. The Syracusians, being deseruingly afflicted on all sides, send to the Corinthians for succour. Icetes also sends thither, and disswades the Corinthians, as well as he can, from intermeddling in the businesse. He tells them, by his messengers, That he had entred into league with the Carthaginians, who were so strong by Sea, that it was not in the power of Corinth, to land any Armie in Sicil. But the Corinthians, being by this treason of Icetes, more inraged then disswaded, sent Timoleon with nintreene Gallies, to deliuer Syracuse from tyrannie. In the meane while, Icetes had entred Syracuse, and with the helpe of the Carthaginians, driuen Dionysius into the Castle, where hee besieged him.

Icetes, being himselfe a Tyrant in Leontium, rather sought how to enlarge his power, than, how to deliuer his Countrie. Therefore, hearing that Timoleon was arriued at Rhegium, he sent to perswade him, to returne his fleet; for that all things were (in effect) established in Sicil. The Carthaginian Gallies were also in the same Port of Rhegium; whose Captaines aduised Timoleon, to get him gone in peace. They had farre more Gallies there, then he had, and were like to compell him, if he would not be perswaded. Timoleon, finding himselfe ouer-mastered, makes request to the Carthaginian Captaines, that they would be pleased to enter into Rhegium, and there, in an open assembly of the people, to deliuer vnto him those arguments, for his returne, which they had vsed to him in priuate; that he might, by publique testimonie, discharge himselfe to the Senate of Corinth.

The Carthaginians, perswading themselues, that a victorie, obtayned by a few faire words, was without losse, and farre more easie, than that of many blowes and wounds, yeelded to Timoleons desire. But while the Orations were deliuering, Timoleon, fauoured by the Rhegians, stole out of the presse; and hauing set saile, before the Gates were opened to the Carthaginians, he recouered the Port of Tauromenium, where he was joyfully receiued by Andromachus the Gouernour. From thence he marched toward Adranum, were surpising Icetes his Armie, hee slue a part thereof, and put the rest to runne. It is the nature of victorie to beget friends. The Adranitans ioyned with him; and so did Mamercus, the Tyrant of Catana. Dionysius also sent to Timoleon, offering to surrender the Castle of Syracuse into his hands, as thinking it better to yeeld vp himself, and the places which he could not defend, vnto the Corinthians, than either to Icetes, whom he disdained, or to the Carthaginians, whom he hated. Now Timoleon, who within fiftie daies, after his arriuall, had recouered the Castle of Syracuse, and sent Dionysius to Corinth, to liue there a priuate man, was still inuaded by the Armies, and molested by the practices of Icetes. For he besieged the Corinthians within the Castle of Syracuse, and attempted (but in vaine) the murder of Timoleon.

The Corinthians send vnto Timoleon a supply of two thousand foot, and two hundred horse, which are staid in Italie by foule weather. Icetes is strengthned with threescore thousand Africans, brought vnto him by Mago (all which he lodgeth within Syracuse) and with an hundred and fiftie Gallies, to keepe the Port. This was the first time, that euer the Carthaginians had dominion within the walls of that Citie. With this great Armie, Icetes assaulteth the Castle. Timoleon sends them victualls, and succour, in small boats, by night, from Catana. Mago and Icetes doe therefore resolue to besiege Catana; but they were no sooner on their way towards it, with part of their forces, than Leon, Captaine of the Corinthians, sallied out of the Castle, and tooke that part of Syracuse, called Acradina, which he fortified.

In the meane while, the two thousand Corinthians arriue: with whom, and two thousand other Souldiers, Timoleon marcheth towards Syracuse. Mago abandoneth

Icetes,

Icetes, being frighted out of Sicil (which he might easily haue conquered) with an idle rumour of treason. This made him returne to Carthage; where the generall exclamation against his cowardize, did so much affright him, that for feare of farther punishment, he hanged himselfe. Timoleon enters the Citie, and beats downe the Castle (which he called the nest of Tyrants) to the ground. But he found the Citie when the strangers were fled, in effect desolate; so as their horses did feede on the grasse, growing in the market-place. Therefore, he writes to Corinth, for people to re-inhabite it. Ten thousand are sent out of Greece; many come from Italie; others, from other parts of the Iland.

But a new storme ariseth. Asdrubal and Amilcar, Carthaginians, arriue about Lilybæum, with threescore and ten thousand Souldiers, transported (with all their prouisions) in a thousand ships of burden, and two hundred Gallies. Timoleon marcheth thither, and chargeth this great Armie vpon the passage of a Riuer.

A tempest of raine, haile, and lightning, with boysterous windes, beating vpon the faces of the Carthaginians, they are vtterly broken: ten thousand slain; fiue thousand taken; with all their carriages and prouisions: among which there were found a thousand corslets, gilt, and grauen. After this Timoleon, gaue an ouerthrowe to Icetes, and following his victorie, tooke him, with his sonne Eupolemus, and the Generall of his horse, prisoners; whom he caused all to be slaine: and afterwards (which was imputed to him for great crueltie) he suffered Icetes his wiues and daughters to be put to death. But this was the reuenge of God vpon Icetes, who (after the murder of Dion) had caused Arete, Dions wife and a yong child of his, with Aristomache his sister, to to be cast into the Sea. Plut. in vit. Tim.

He againe preuailed against Mamercus, Tyrant of Catana, and wonne Catana it selfe. Mamercus fled to Hippon Tyrant of Messena: but Timoleon, pursuing him, wonne the towne; deliuering Hippon, to his Citizens, who tormented him to death. The same end had Mamercus, and all other, the Tyrants in Sicil.

Finally, he made peace with the Carthaginians; on condition, That they should nor passe the Riuer of Lycus. After this, he liued in great honour among the Syracusians, till his death; and was solemnely buried by them in the market-place of their Citie: the day of his Funeralls, being for euer ordained to bee kept holy among them.

After such time, as Timoleon had deliuered Syracuse, from the tyrannie of Dionysius, and brought peace to the whole Iland; the inhabitants enioyed their libertie in peace, about twentie yeeres. The Cities and Temples were repaired; the Trade renewed; the Merchant sailed in safetie; and the Labouring man enioyed the fruits of the earth in quiet. But it was impossible that a Nation which neither knew how to gouerne, nor how to obey; which could neither endure Kings, nor men worthie to be Kings, to gouerne them; should any long time subsist.

Twentie yeares after the death of Timoleon, there started vp an Agathocles among them, a man of base birth, and of baser condition; who from a Begger, to a common Souldier; from a Souldier to a Captaine; and so from degree to degree, rising to bee a Prætor; finally became Lord and Soueraigne of the Syracusians. Many fortunes he ranne, and vnder-went as many dangers, ere hee obtained the Principalitie. For he had more than once attempted it, and was therein both beaten and banisht. A passing valiant man he was, and did notable seruice, as well for those by whom he was imployed, as also for the Syracusians, and against them. For in their warres against those of Enna, and the Campanes, he did them memorable seruice: and on the contrarie, as memorable seruice for the Murgantines, against the Syracusians. For being entertained by the people of Murgantia, and made Generall of their forces, he sackt Leontium; and besieged Syracuse so streightly, that the Citizens were driuen to craue aide, euen from their ancient and naturall enemies, the Carthaginians. Amilcar was sent by the Carthaginians, to relieue Syracuse. With him Agathocles wrought so well, that he got him to make peace betweene himselfe and the Syracusians; binding himselfe by promise and oath, to remaine a friend and seruant to the state of Carthage, for euer after. Amilcar entertained the businesse, and compounded the quarrels betweene Agathocles, and the Syracusians. Agathocles is chosen Prætor; he entertaines fiue thousand Africans, and diuers old Souldiers of the Murgantines, vnder colour of a purpose to besiege Herbita. With these, and with the assistance of the poore and discontented Syracusians (the Citie being also diuided into many factions) he assailes the Senators, kills all his enemies and opposites; diuides the spoile of the rich, among the poore; and giues libertie to his Souldiers, to robbe, to rauish, and to murder, for two whole dayes and nights, without controlment: the third day, when they had blunted their barbarous appetites, and strewed the streets with ten thousand dead carkasses, besides those that had broken their necks ouer the walls; their furie had no further subject to worke on.

Agathocles, in an assembly of the people (being an eloquent knaue) perswaded them, that, for the violent sickenesse, by which the common-wealth was vtterly consumed, he found no better, than the violēt remedies, which he had administred; & that he affected no other thing, than the reducing of the state from an Oligarchie, or the rule of a few tyrannous Magistrates, to the ancient & indifferent Democratie, by which it had beene gouerned, from the first institution, with so great glorie and prosperitie. This he did, to haue the crowne clapt on his head (as it were) perforce. For as hee knew, that hee had left none liuing, within the Citie, fit, nor able, to exercise the office of a Magistrate: so knew he right well, that all they which had assisted, in the murder and spoile of their fellow-Citizens, had no other hope of defence, then the support of a lawlesse Lord, who had beene partaker with them, in their villanies and cruelties committed. So as this Rabble, his Oration ended, proclaimed him King: againe and againe, saluting, and adoring him, by that name, as if it had beene giuen to him by some lawfull election. Hence had our King Richard the third a peece of his patterne; but the one was of base; the other, of Kingly parents; the one tooke libertie from a Common-weale; the other sought only to succeede in a Monarchie; the one continued his cruelty to the end; the other, after he had obtayned the Crowne, sought, by making of good lawes, to recouer the loue of his people.

The life of this Tyrant, is briefly written by Iustine; more largely and particularly by Diodorus Siculus: the summe whereof is this. The same Amilcar that had brought him into Syracuse, and that had lent him fiue thousand men to helpe in the massacre of the Citizens, was also content to winke at many wrongs, that hee did vnto the Confederates of the Carthaginians. It was the purpose of Amilcar, to settle Agathocles in his tyrannie, and to let him vexe and waste the whole Iland; because it was thereby like to come to passe, that he should reduce all Sicil into such termes, as would make it become an easie prey to Carthage. But when the Cities, confederate with the Carthaginians, sent their Embassadors, with complaint of this ill dealing, to Carthage; the Punick faith (so much taunted by the Romans, as no better than meere falsehood) shewed it selfe very honourable, in taking order for the redresse. Embassadours were sent to comfort the Sicilians, and to put Agathocles in minde of his couenants; Amilcar was recalled home into Africke, and a new Captaine appointed to succeede in his charge, with such forces, as might compell Agathocles to reason, if otherwise he would not harken to it. All this tended, to saue their Confederates from suffering such iniuries in the future. For that which was past (since it could not be recalled) they tooke order to haue it seuerely punished. Amilcar was accused secretly, and by way of scrutinie: the suffrages being giuen, but not calculated; and so reserued, vntill he should returne. This was not so closely handled, but that Amilcar had some notice of it. In managing his businesse with Agathocles, it is likely that he had an eye to his owne profit, as well as to the publike benefit of his Countrie. For he had made such a composition with the Syracusian, as gaue him not onely meanes to weaken others, but to ſtrengthen himſelfe, both in power and authoritie, euen againſt the Carthaginians. Such is commonly the cuſtome of thoſe, that hope to worke their owne ends by cunning practices: thinking to deale ſubtilly, and finely, they ſpinne their threads ſo ſmall, that they are broken with the very winde. Amilcar ſaw, that his Carthaginians had a purpoſe to deale ſubſtantially; and that therefore it would bee hard for him, to make them follow his crooked deuices: which if he could not doe, it was to be expected, that their anger would breake out into ſo much the greater extremitie, by how much the more they had concealed it. Therefore he followed the example, which ſome of his forego-10 ers had taught him; and, for feare of ſuch a death, as the Iudges might award him, he ended his owne life in what ſort he thought beſt. This deſperation of Amilcar ſerued to informe Agathocles of the Carthaginians intent. He ſaw they would not be deluded with words, and therefore reſolued to get the ſtart of them in action. He diſſembled no longer; but, inſtead of ſpoile and robberie, made open warre vpon all their Adherents. He had made the better part of Sicil his owne, ere the Carthaginian forces arriued: which thinking to haue encountred an ill-eſtabliſhed Tyrant, found him readie, as a King, to defend his owne, and giue them ſharpe entertainement. They were beaten by him; and their Nauie was ſo Tempeſt-beaten, that they could neither doe good by Land, nor Sea, but were glad to leaue their 20 buſineſſe vndone, and returne into Africk.

The Carthaginians prepare a new fleet: which being very gallantly manned and furniſhed, was broken by foule weather, and the beſt part of it caſt away, euen whileſt it was yet within kenning of their Citie. But Amilcar, the ſonne of Giſco, gathering together the remainders of this ſhip-wrack, was bold to paſſe ouer into Sicil, and landed not farre from Gela; where Agathocles was ſoone readie to examine the cauſe of their comming. Many skirmiſhes paſſed betweene them, in which (commonly) the Syracuſian had the better. But his good ſucceſſe begat preſumption; whereby he loſt a battaile, more important than all the other fights. One aduerſe chance is enough to ouerthrow the ſtate of a Tyrant, if it be not vp-held by great 30 circumſpection. The warre was ſoone transferred to the walls of Syracuſe; within which Agathocles was cloſed vp, and driuen to make his laſt defence by their helpe, who may be judged to haue loued him not very greatly. But the Inhabitants of Syracuſe, after that great maſſacre of the principall men, made in the beginning of this new tyrannie, were (for the moſt part) ſuch, as had beene either mercinarie Souldiers, infranchiſed ſlaues, or baſe and needie people; helpers in eſtabliſhing the preſent Gouernement, and Executioners of the murders, and ſpoile, committed in that change. If there were any other (as ſome there were) they were ſo well obſerued, and (withall) ſo fearfull, that they durſt not ſtirre. But it was not enough, that they all agreed in the common defence of themſelues and their Citie; Famine
40 was likely to grow vpon them, and enforce them to change their reſolution. In this neceſſitie, Agathocles aduentured vpon a ſtrange courſe, which the euent commended, as wiſe. He imbarqued as many as he thought meet, in thoſe veſſells that rode in the Hauen; and committing the gouernment of the Citie to his brother Antander, willed the people to be of good courage, for that (as he told them) hee had bethought himſelfe of a meane, both to raiſe the ſiege, and to repaire all other loſſes. A Carthaginian fleet lay in the mouth of the Hauen, both to hinder the entrance of victuallers, and to keepe the beſieged from iſſuing forth.

Now, at ſuch time as Agathocles was readie to depart, aduertiſement came, that many ſhips of burden, laden with corne, and other prouiſions, were drawing neere
50 vnto Syracuſe. To intercept theſe, the Carthaginians hoiſe ſaile, and lanch forth into the deepe. They were not farre gone, when they might behold Agathocles, iſſuing forth of the Port, with purpoſe (as they thought) to giue conuoy vnto his victuallers. Hereupon they wheele about, and make amaine towards him, as thinking him the better bootie. He neither abode their comming, nor fled back into the Citie, Citie, but made all speede towards Africk; and was pursued by the Carthaginians, as long as day would giue them light. In the meane season, the victuallers were gotten into Syracuse; which was the more plentifully relieued by their comming, for that Agathocles had vnburdened the place of no small number. When the Carthaginian Admirall perceiued; first, that by pursuing two fleets at once, he had missed of them both; and secondly, that Agathocles returned not againe, but was gone to seeke his fortune elsewhere; he thought it good to pursue those that were fled, and to attend so well vpon them, that they should not haue leisure to doe mischiefe in some other part.

The Carthaginian Nauie followed Agathocles (whether by chance, or by relation of such as had met with him at Sea) directly towards Africk, and ouer-tooke him after sixe dayes. He had (at the first) a great start of them; so that (belike) they rowed hard, and wearied themselues, in seeking their owne misfortune. For he fought with them, and beat them; and, hauing sunke, or taken many, draue the rest to flie which way they could, laden with strange tidings of his voiage.

When Agathocles had landed his men in Africk, then did he discouer vnto them his project; letting them vnderstand, That there was no better way to diuert the Carthaginians, not only from Syracuse, but from all the Ile of Sicil, than by bringing the warre to their owne dores. For here (said hee) they haue many that hate them, and that will readily take armes against them, as soone as they perceiue that there is an Armie on foot, which dares to looke vpon their walls. Their Townes are ill fortified; their people vntrained, and vnexperienced in dangers; the mercinarie forces, that they leuie in these parts, will rather follow vs than them, if wee offer greater wages than they can giue: which wee may better promise and make good, by letting them haue some share with vs in all the wealth of the Carthaginians, than our enemies can doe, by making some addition to their stipends. Thus hee talked, as one already Master of all the riches in Africk; and with many braue wordes encouraged his men so well, that they were contented to set fire on all their ships (reseruing one or two, to vse as Messengers) to the end that no hope should remaine, saue only in victorie. In this heat of resolution, they winne by force two Cities; which after they had throughly sacked, they burnt to the ground; as a marke of terrour to all that should make resistance. The Carthaginians, hearing this, are amazed; thinking that Amilcar is broken, and his whole Armie destroied in Sicil. This impression so dismaies them, that when they know the truth of all, by such as had scaped in the late Sea-fight, yet still they feare, and know not what. They suspect Amilcars faith, who had suffered Agathocles to land in Africk: they suspect their principall Citizens at home, of a meaning to betray Carthage, vnto the enemie; they raise a great Armie, and know not vnto whose charge they may safely commit it.

There were at that time two famous Captaines in the Citie, Hanno, and Bomilcar; great enemies, and therefore the more vnlikely to conspire against the Common-wealth. These are made Generalls of the Armie leuied, which farre exceeded the forces of Agathocles. But it seldome happens, that dissension betweene Commanders produceth any fortunate euent. Necessitie draue Agathocles to fight: and the courage of his men, resolued to deale with the whole multitude of the Carthaginians, made easie the victorie against the one halfe of them. For Bomilcar would not stirre: but suffered Hanno to be cut in peeces.

The reputation of this victorie, brought ouer a King of the Africans, from the Carthaginian societie, to take part with Agathocles: who pursuing his victorie, wins many Townes, and sends word to Syracuse of his good successe. The Carthaginians also send into Sicil, willing Amilcar, their Generall, to succour the state of Africk, which was in danger to be lost, whilest hee was trauailing in the conquest of Sicil. Amilcar sends them fiue thousand men: all his forces he thought it not needfull to transport; as hoping rather to draw Agathocles back into Sicil, than to bee drawne home home by one, that could ſcarce retaine his owne Kingdome. But theſe good hopes had a bad iſſue. He ſpent ſome time in winning a few Townes, that adhered vnto the Syracuſians: and hauing brought his matters to ſome good order, he conceiued a ſudden hope of taking Syracuſe by ſurpriſe. It was a prettie (though tragicall) accident, if it were true, as Tullie relates it. Amilcar had a dreame, which told him that he ſhould ſuppe the next day within Syracuſe. His fancie begot this dreame, and he belieued it. He made more haſte, than good ſpeede, toward the Citie: and comming vpon it on the ſudden, had good hope to carrie it. But his enemies were prepared for him, and had laied an ambuſh to intrap him, whereinto he fell. So he was carried priſoner into the Citie; in which it was likely, that he had no great cheare to his ſupper: for they ſtruck off his head, and ſent it into Africk (a welcome preſent) to Agathocles.

This good ſucceſſe of things at home, did put ſuch courage into the Sicilian Armie, that Agathocles was bold to weare a Crowne, and ſtile himſelfe King of Africk. He had allured Ophellas, King of the Cyrenians, to take his part, by promiſes to deliuer the Countrie into his hands: for that (as he ſaid) it was ſufficient vnto himſelfe to haue diuerted the Carthaginians from Sicil, wherein (after this warre ended) he might raigne quietly. Ophellas came with a great Armie, and was friendly entertained. But the traiterous Sicilian, taking an aduantage, did murder this his aſſiſtant; and afterwards, by good words, and great promiſes, drew all the Cyrenian Armie to follow him in his warres. Thus his villanie found good ſucceſſe; and he ſo preuailed in Africk, that he got leiſure to make a ſtep into Sicil. Many Townes in Sicil had imbraced a deſire of recouering their libertie; thinking it high time to fight at length for their owne freedome, after that they had ſo long beene expoſed, (as a reward of victorie) either vnto Aliens, or to Tyrants, of their owne Countrie. Theſe had preuailed farre, and gotten many to take their parts, as in a common cauſe: when the comming of Agathocles abated their high ſpirits, and his good ſucceſſe in many fights, compelled them to obedience. Out of Sicil he returned into Africk, where his affaires ſtood in very bad termes. Archagathus, his ſonne, had loſt a battaile; and (which was worſe) had ill meanes to help himſelfe: his Armie being in mutinie for lack of pay. But Agathocles pacified the tumult, by the accuſtomed promiſes of great bootie and ſpoile. It had now beene time for him, to offer peace to the Carthaginians which to obtaine, they would (queſtionleſſe) haue giuen to him, both monie enough to pay his Armie, and all that they then held in Sicil. For their Citie had beene diſtreſſed, not only by this his warre, but by the treaſon of Bomilcar, who failed not much of making himſelfe Tyrant ouer them. But ambition is blinde. Agathocles had all his thoughts fixed vpon the conqueſt of Carthage it ſelfe: out of which dreame he was awaked, by the loſſe of a battaile, not ſo memorable in regard of any accident therein, as of the ſtrange euents following it. The Carthaginians, after their great misfortunes in this warre, had renewed their old ſacrifices of children to Saturne: from which they had abſtained, euer ſince they made peace with Gelon. And now they made choice of ſome, the goodlieſt of their priſoners, taken in the battaile, to offer vnto the ſaid Idoll, in way of thankefulneſſe for their victorie. The fire, with which theſe vnhappie men were conſumed, caught hold vpon the lodgings neereſt vnto the Altar; and ſpreading it ſelfe farther through the Campe, with the deſtruction of many men, cauſed ſuch a tumult, as is vſuall in the like caſes. At the ſame time, the like accident of fire burnt vp the Pauilion of Agathocles. Hereupon both the Armies fled away; each of them beleeuing, that the noiſe in the aduerſe Campe, was a ſigne of the enemies comming to inuade it. But the Carthaginians had a ſafe retrait: Agathocles, by a ſecond errour, fell into a new calamitie. In the beginning of this his flight in the darke, hee met with his owne African Souldiers; and thinking them to bee enemies, (as indeede the one halfe of them had reuolted from him, to the Carthaginians, in the laſt battaile) hee beganne to aſſaile them, and was ſo ſtoutly reſiſted, that he loſt, in this blinde fight, aboue foure thousand of his men. This did so discourage his proud heart; that being fallen from the neere hope of taking the Citie of Carthage, vnto some distrust of his owne safetie, hee knew no more how to moderate his present weake feares, than lately he had knowne how to gouerne his ambition. Therefore he tooke the way that came next into his head; which was, to steale closely aboord his ships, with his yonger sonne (the elder he suspected of Incest, and of Ambition) and so to flie into Sicil; thinking it the best course, to shift for himselfe, as wanting vessells wherein to transport his Armie. His elder sonne, Archagathus, perceiued his drift, arrested him, and put him vnder custodie: but by meanes of a sudden tumult, hee was let loose, escaped, and fled alone, leauing both his sonnes behinde him. His flight being noised through the Armie, all was in vprore; and extremitie of rage caused not only the common Souldier, but euen such as had beene friends to the Tyrant, to lay hold vpon his two sonnes, and kill them. That this flight of Agathocles was extremely base; I neede not vse wordes to proue: That his feare was truly, as all feare is said to be, a passion, depriuing him of the succours which reason offered, the sequele doth manifest. His forsaken Souldiers, being now a headlesse company, and no longer an Armie to be feared, obtained neuertheless a reasonable composition from the Carthaginians: to whom they sold those places, whereof they had possession, for nineteene talents. Likewise, Agathocles himselfe, hauing lost his Armie, did neuertheless, by the reputation of this late warre, make peace with Carthage vpon equall termes.

After this, the Tyrant, being deliuered from forraine enemies, discouered his bloudie nature, in most abominable cruelties, among the Sicilians. His wants, and his feares, vrged him so violently, that he was not satisfied with the spoiles of the rich, or the death of those whom he held suspected: but in a beastly rage depopulated whole Cities. Hee deuised new engines of torment; wherein striuing to exceede the Bull of Phalaris, he made a frame of brasse, that should serue to scortch mens bodies, and withall giue him leaue to behold them in their miserie. So deuillish is the nature of man, when reason, that should be his guide, is become a slaue to his brutish affections. In these mischiefes he was so outragious, that he neither spared Sexe, nor Age; especially, when he was informed of the slaughter of his children in Africk. But this was not the way to preserue his estate: it threw him into new dangers. They whom hee had chased out of their Countrie, tooke armes against him, and draue him into such feare, that hee was faine to seeke the loue at Carthage, which, by ruling well, he might haue had in Sicil. He freely deliuered into the Carthaginians hands, all those Townes of the Phœnicians in Sicil, belonging vnto them, which were in his possession. They requited him honourably, with great store of corne, and with foure hundred talents of gold and siluer. So (though not without much trouble and hazard) he preuailed against the Rebells, and setled his estate. Hauing no further businesse left in Sicil, hee made a voiage into Italie. There hee subdued the Brutians, rather by terrour of his name, than by any force, for they yeelded at his first comming. This done, he went to the Isle of Lipara, and made the Inhabitants buy peace with one hundred talents of gold. But when he had gotten this great summe, he would needs exact a greater; and finding plainly that they had no more left, he was bold to spoile the Temples of their gods. Herein (me thinks) he did well enough. For how could he beleiue those to be gods, that had continually giuen deafe eares to his horrible periuries? Then hee returned richly home, with eleuen ships loaden with gold: all which, and all the rest of his fleet, were cast away by foule weather at Sea; one Gallie excepted, in which he himselfe escaped, to suffer a more miserable end. A grieuous sickneſſe fell vpon him, that rotted his whole bodie, spreading it selfe through all his veines and sinewes. Whilest he lay in this case, all desiring his end, saue only Theogenia (a wife that hee had taken out of Ægypt) and her small children: his Nephew, the sonne of Archagathus, before mentioned, and a yonger sonne of his owne, beganne to contend about the Kingdome.

Kingdome. Neither did they seeke to end the controuersie by the old Tyrants decision; they regarded him not so much. But each of them laied wait for the others life: wherein the Nephew sped so well, that he slue his Vncle, and got his Grandfathers Kingdome without asking any leaue. These tidings wounded the heart of Agathocles with feare and sorrow. He saw himselfe without helpe, like to become a prey to his vngracious Nephew, from whom hee knew that no fauour was to be expected, either by himselfe, or by those, whom only hee now held deare, which were, Theogenia, and her children. Therefore hee aduised her and them to flie before they were surprised: for that otherwise they could by no meanes auoid, either death, or somewhat that would be worse. Hee gaue them all his treasures and goods, wherewith he euen compelled them (weeping to leaue him desolate in so wretched a case) to imbarke themselues hastily, and make speede into Ægypt. After their departure, whether he threw himselfe into the fire, or whether his disease consumed him, there was none left that cared to attend him; but he ended his life as basely, as obscurely, and in as much want, as he first beganne it.

After the death of Agathocles it was, that the Mamertines his Souldiers traiterously occupied Messana, and infested a great part of the Iland. Then also did the Carthaginians beginne to renew their attempts of conquering all Sicil. What the Nephew of Agathocles did, I cannot finde. Likely it is that hee quickly perished. For the Sicilians were driuen to send for Pyrrhus to helpe them, who had married with a daughter of Agathocles. But Pyrrhus was soone wearie of the Countrie (as hath beene shewed before) and therefore left it; prophecying that it would become a goodly champaine field, wherein Rome and Carthage should fight for superioritie. In which businesse, how these two great Cities did speede, the order of our Storie will declare.

§. V.

A recontinuation of the Roman warre in Sicil. How HIERON, King of Syracuse, forsooke the Carthaginians; and made his peace with Rome.

WHen Appius Claudius, following the aduantage of his victorie gotten at Messana, brought the warre vnto the Gates of Syracuse, and besieged that great Citie; Hieron found it high time for him to seeke peace: knowing that the Carthaginians had neither any reason to be offended with him, for helping himselfe by what meanes he could, when they were not in case to giue him assistance; and foreseeing withall, that when once hee had purchased his quiet from the Romans, it would be free for him to sit still, without feare of molestation, whilest Rome and Carthage were fighting for the masterie. In this good moode, the new Roman Consulls, M. Valerius, and C. Octacilius, found him, and readily embraced the offer of his friendship. Yet they made vse of their present aduantage, and sold him peace for an hundred (some say two hundred) Talents.

These Consulls had brought a great Armie into Sicil; yet did they nothing else in effect, than bring ouer Hiero to their side. If the Syracusian held them busied (which I finde not, otherwise than by circumstances, as, by the summe of monie imposed vpon him, and by their performing none other peece of seruice) all the whole time of their abode in the Iland; then was his departure from the friendship of Carthage, no lesse to his honour, than it was to his commoditie. For by no reason could they require, that he should suffer his owne Kingdome to runne into manifest perill of subuersion, for their sakes, that should haue receiued all the profit of the victorie: seeing they did expose him to the whole danger, without strayning themthemselues to giue him reliefe. But the Carthaginians had lately made good proofe of the strength of Syracuse, in the daies of Agathocles: and therefore knew, that it was able to beare out a very strong siege. And hereupon it is like that they were the more slack, in sending helpe: if (perhaps) it were not some part of their desire, that both Rome and Syracuse should weaken one the other, whereby their owne worke might be the easier against them both. Yet indeede, the case of the besieged Citie was not the same, when the Romans lay before it, as it had beene, when the Carthaginians attempted it. For there was great reason, to trie the vttermost hazard of warre against the Carthaginians, who sought no other thing than to bring it into slaverie: not so against the Romans, who thought it sufficient, if they could with- 10 draw it from the partie of their enemies. Besides, it was not all one to be gouerned by Agathocles, or by Hiero. The former of these cared not what the citizens endured, so long as he might preserue his owne tyranie: the later, as a just and good Prince, had no greater desire than to winne the loue of his people, by seeking their commoditie; but including his owne felicitie within the publique, laboured to vphold both, by honest and faithfull dealing. Hereby it came to passe, that hee enjoyed a long and happie raigne, liuing deare to his owne Subjects, beloued of the Romans, and not greatly molested by the Carthaginians; whom, either the consideration, That they had left him to himselfe, ere he left their societie, made vnwilling to seeke his ruine; or their more earnest businesse with the Romans, made vnable to compasse it. 20

§. VI.

How the Romans besiege and winne Agrigentum. Their beginning to maintaine a fleet. Their first losse, and first victorie by Sea. Of Sea-fight in generall.

HIERON, having sided himselfe with the Romans, aided them with victuals, and other necessaries: so that they, presuming vpon his 30 assistance, recall some part of their forces. The Carthaginians finde it high time to bestirre them; they send to the Ligurians, and to the troups they had in Spaine, to come to their aide; who being arriued, they made the Citie of Agrigentum, the seat of the warre, against the Romans, filling it with all manner of munition.

* Agrigentum was a goodly Citie, built by the Geloi, vnder conduct of Arision and Pystilus. The compasse was ten miles about the walls; and it had sometimes in it eight hundred thousand Inhabitants. This Citie, by reason of the fertilitie of the soile, and the neighbourhood of Carthage, grew in a short space from small beginnings, to great glorie and riches. The plentie and luxurie thereof was so great, as it caused Empedocles to say, That the Agrigentines built Palaces of such sumptuositie, as if they meant to liue for euer; and made such feasts, as if they meant to die the next day. But their greatest pompe and magnificence, was in their goodly Temples, and Theaters, Water-conduits, and Fish-ponds: the ruines whereof at this day are sufficient argument, that Rome it selfe could neuer boast of the like. In the Porch of the Temple of Iupiter Olympius, (by which we may iudge of the Temple it selfe) there was set out on one side the full proportion of the Giants, fighting with the gods, all cut out in polished marble of diuers colours; a worke the most magnificent and rare, that euer hath beene seene: on the other side, the warre of Troy, and the encounters which hapned at that siege; with the personages of the Heroes that were doers in that warre; all of the like beautifull stone, and of equall stature to the bodies of men in those ancient times: In comparison of which, the latter workes of that kinde, are but pettie things, and meere trifles. It would require a volume, to expresse the magnificence of the Temples of Hercules, Æsculapius, Concord, Iuno Lacinia, Chastitie, Proserpina, Castor and Pollux, wherein the Master-peeces of those exquisite Painters, and Caruers, Phidias, Zeuxis, Myron, and Polycletus, were to be seene. But in processe of time it ranne the same fortune that all other great Cities haue done, and was ruined by diuers calamities of warre: whereof this warre present brought vnto it not the least.

The Roman Consulls, hauing made peace with Hieron, returne into Italie; and, in their places, Lucius Posthumius, and Quintus Mamilius, arriue. They goe on towards * Agrigentum: and finding 40 no enemie in the field, they besiege it, though it were stuffed with fiftie thousand Souldiers. After a while, the time of harueft being come, a part of the Roman armie range the Country to gather corne, and those at the siege grow negligent; the Carthaginians sallie furiously, and indanger the Roman Armie, but are in the end repelled into the towne with great losse: but by the smart felt on both 50 sides, the Assailants redoubled their guards, & the besieged kept within their couert. Yet the Romans, the better to assure themselues, cut a deepe trench, betweene

tweene the walls of the Citie and their Campe: and another on the out ſide thereof; that neither the Carthaginians might force any quarter ſuddenly, by a ſallie, nor thoſe of the Countrie without, breake vpon them vnawares: which double defence kept the beſieged alſo from the receiuing any reliefe of victuals, and munitions, whileſt the Siracuſian ſupplies the aſſailants with what they went. The beſieged ſend for ſuccour to Carthage: after they had beene in this ſort pent vp fiue moneths. The Carthaginians imbarke an Armie, with certaine Elephants, vnder the command of Hanno; who arriues with it at Heraclea, to the Weſt of Agrigentum. Hanno puts himſelfe into the field, and ſurpriſeth Erbeſus, a Citie wherein the Romans had beſtowed all their prouiſion. By meanes hereof, the famine without grew to be as great, as it was within Agrigentum; and the Roman campe no leſſe ſtreightly aſſieged by Hanno, than the Citie was by the Romans: inſomuch, as if Hieron had not ſupplied them, they had beene forced to abandon the ſiege. But ſeeing that this diſtreſſe was not enough to make them riſe; Hanno determined to giue them battaile. To which end departing from Heraclia, hee makes approch vnto the Roman campe. The Romans reſolue to ſuſtaine him, and put themſelues in order. Hanno directs the Numidian horſe-men to charge their Vantguard, to the ende to draw them further on; which done, he commands them to returne as broken, till they came to the body of the Army, that lay ſhadowed behind ſome riſing ground. The Numidians performe it accordingly; and while the Romans purſued the Numidians, Hanno giues vpon them, and hauing ſlaughtered many, beats the reſt into their Trenches.

After this encounter, the Carthaginians made no other attempt for two moneths, but lay ſtrongly incamped, waiting vntill ſome oportunitie ſhould inuite them. But Annibal, that was beſieged in Agrigentum, as well by ſignes as meſſengers, made Hanno know, how ill the extremitie which he endured, was able to brooke ſuch dilatorie courſes. Hanno thereupon, a ſecond time, prouoked the Conſulls to fight. But his Elephants being diſordered by his owne Vantguard, which was broken by the Romans, he loſt the day: and with ſuch as eſcaped, he recouered Heraclea. Annibal perceiuing this, and remayning hopeleſſe of ſuccour, reſolued to make his owne way. Finding therefore that the Romans, after this daies victorie, wearied with labour, and ſecured by their good fortune, kept negligent watch in the night; hee ruſht out of the Towne, with all the remainder of his armie, and paſt by the Roman campe without reſiſtance. The Conſulls purſue him in the morning, but in vaine: ſure they were, that he could not carrie the Citie with him, which with little a-doe the Romans entred, and pittifully ſpoiled. The Romans, proud of this victorie, purpoſe henceforth rather to follow the direction of their preſent good fortunes, than their firſt determinations. They had reſolued in the beginning of this Warre, only to ſuccour the Mamertines, and to keepe the Carthaginians from their owne coaſts: but now they determine, to make themſelues Lords of all Sicil; and from thence, being fauoured with the winde of good ſucceſſe, to ſaile ouer into Africke. It is the diſeaſe of Kings, of States, and of priuate men, to couet the greateſt things, but not to enioy the leaſt; the deſire of that which wee neither haue nor neede, taking from vs the true vſe and fruition of what wee haue alreadie. This curſe vpon mortall men, was neuer taken from them ſince the beginning of the World to this day.

To proſecute this Warre, Lucius Valerius and Titus Octacilius, two new Conſuls, are ſent into Sicil. Whereupon, the Romans being Maſters of the field, many inland Townes gaue themſelues vnto them. On the contrarie, the Carthaginians keeping ſtill the Lordſhip of the Sea, many maritimate places became theirs. The Romans therefore, as well to ſecure their owne coaſts, often inuaded by the African fleets, as alſo to equall themſelues in euery kinde of warfare with their enemies, determine to make a fleet. And herein fortune fauoured them with this accident, that being altogether ignorant in ſhipwrights-craft, a ſtorme of winde thruſt one of the Carthaginian Gallies, of fiue bankes, to the shore.

Now had the Romans a patterne, and by it they beganne to set vp an hundred Quinqueremes, which were Gallies, rowed by fiue on euery banke, and twentie, of three on a banke: and while these were in preparing, they exercised their men in the feat of rowing. This they did after a strange fashion. They placed vpon the Sea-sands many seates, in order of the bankes in Gallies, whereon they placed their water-men, and taught them to beat the sand with long poles, orderly, and as they were directed by the Master, that so they might learne the stroke of the Gallie, and how to mount and draw their Oares.

When their fleet was finished, some rigging and other implements excepted, C. Cornelius, one of the new Consuls (for they changed euery yere) was made Admirall: who being more in loue with this new kind of warfare, then well aduised, past ouer to Messena with seuenteene Gallies, leauing the rest to follow him. There hee staid not, but would needs row alongst the cost to Lipara, hoping to doe some piece of seruice. Hannibal, a Carthaginian, was at the same time Gouernour in Panormus; who being aduertised of this new Sea-mans arriuall, sent foorth one Boodes, a Senatour of Carthage, with twentie Gallies to entertaine him. Boodes, falling vpon the Consull vnawares, tooke both him and the fleet he commanded. When Hannibal receiued this good newes, together with the Roman Gallies, and their Consull; he grew no lesse foolish hardie than Cornelius had beene. For hee, fancying to himselfe to surprise the rest of the Roman fleet, on their owne coast, ere they were yet in all points prouided; sought them out with a fleet of fiftie saile: wherewith falling among them, hee was well beaten, and leauing the greater number of his own behind him, made an hard escape with the rest: for of one hundred and twentie Gallies, the Romans vnder Cornelius had lost but seuenteene, so as one hundred and three remained, which were not easily beaten by fiftie.

The Romans, being aduertised of Cornelius his ouerthrow, make haste to redeeme him, but giue the charge of their fleet to his Colleague, Duilius. Duilius, considering that the Roman vessels were heauie and slow, the African Gallies hauing the speede of them, deuised a certaine engine in the prow of his Gallies, whereby they might fasten or grapple themselues with their enemies, when they were (as we call it) boord and boord, that is, when they brought the Gallies sides together. This done, the waightier ships had gotten the aduantage, and the Africans lost it. For neither did their swiftnesse serue them, nor their Mariners craft; the Vessells, wherin both Nations fought, being open: so that al was to be carried by the aduantage of weapon, and valour of the men. Besides this, as the heauier Gallies were likely to crush and crack the sides of the lighter and weaker, so were they by reason of their breadth, more steadie; and those that best kept their feet, could also best vse their hands. The example may bee giuen betweene one of the long boates of his Maiesties great ships, and a London barge.

Certainly, hee that will happily performe a fight at Sea, must bee skilfull in making choice of Vessels to fight in: hee must beleeue, that there is more belonging to a good man of warre, vpon the waters, than great during; and must know, that there is a great deale of difference, betweene fighting loose or at large, and grapling. The Gunnes of a slow ship pierce as well, and make as great holes, as those in a swift. To clap ships together, without consideration, belongs rather to a mad man, than to a man of warre: for by such an ignorant brauerie was Peter Strosse, lost at the Azores, when hee fought against the Marquesse of Santa Cruz. In like sort had the Lord Charles Howard, Admirall of England, been lost in the yeare 1588. if he had not beene better aduised, than a great many malignant fooles were, that found fault with his demeanour. The Spaniards had an Armie aboord them; and he had none: they had more ships than he had, and of higher building and charging; so that, had he intangled himselfe with those great and powerfull Vessells, he had greatly endangered this Kingdome of England. For twentie men vpon the defences, fences, are equall to an hundred that boord and enter; whereas then, contrariwise, the Spaniards had an hundred, for twentie of ours, to defend themselues withall. But our Admirall knew his aduantage, and held it: which had he not done, hee had not beene worthie to haue held his head. Heere to speake in generall of Sea-fight (for particulars are fitter for priuate hands, then for the Presse) I say, That a fleet of twenty ships, all good sailers, and good ships, haue the aduantage, on the open Sea, of an hundred as good ships, and of slower sayling. For if the fleet of an hundred saile keepe themselues neere together, in a grosse squadron; the twentie ships, charging them vpon any angle, shall force them to giue ground, and to fall back vpon their next fellowes: of which so many as intangle, are made vnseruiceable, or lost. Force them they may easily, because the twentie ships, which giue themselues scope, after they haue giuen one broad side of Artillerie, by clapping into the winde, and staying, they may giue them the other: and so the twentie ships batter them in pieces with a perpetuall vollie; whereas those, that fight in a troupe, haue no roome to turne, and can alwaies vse but one and the same beaten side. If the fleet of an hundred saile giue themselues any distance, then shall the lesser fleet preuaile, either against those that are a-reare and hindmost, or against those, that by aduantage of ouer-sailing their fellowes keepe the winde: and if vpon a Lee-shore, the ships next the winde be constrained to fall back into their own squadron, then it is all to nothing, that the whole fleet must suffer shipwrack, or render it selfe. That such aduantage may be taken vpon a fleet of vnequall speed, it hath been wel enough conceiued in old time; as by that Oration of Hermocrates, in Thucydides, which he made to the Syracusians, when the Athenians inuaded them, it may easily be obserued. Thucid. l. 6.

Of the Art of Warre by Sea, I had written a Treatise, for the Lord HENRIE, Prince of Wales; a subiect, to my knowledge, neuer handled by any man, ancient or moderne: but God hath spared me the labour of finishing it, by his losse; by the losse of that braue Prince; of which, like an Eclypse of the Sunne, wee shall finde the effects hereafter. Impossible it is to equall words and sorrowes; I will therefore leaue him in the hands of God that hath him. Curæ leues loquuntur, ingentes stupent.

But it is now time to returne to the beaten Carthaginians; who by loosing their aduantage of swift boats, and boording the Romans, haue lost fiftie saile of their Gallies: as on the other side, their enemies by commanding the Seas, haue gotten libertie to saile about the West part of Sicil; where they raised the siege layed vnto Segesta, by the Carthaginians, and wonne the Towne of Macella, with some other places.

§. VII.

Diuers enterfeats of warre, betweene the Romans and Carthaginians, with variable successe. The Romans prepare to inuade Africk: and obtaine a great victorie at Sea.

THE victorie of Duilius, as it was honoured at Rome, with the first Naual triumph, that was euer seene in that Citie; so gaue it vnto the Romans a great incouragement, to proceede in their warres by Sea; whereby they hoped, not onely to get Sicil, but all the other Iles betweene Italie and Africk, beginning with Sardinia, whither soone after they sent a fleet for that purpose. On the contrary side, Amilcar the Carthaginian, lying in Panormus, carefully waited for all occasions, that might helpe to recompence the late misfortune: and being aduertised, that some quarrell was growne betweene the Roman Souldiers, and their Auxiliaries, being such as caused them to incampe a-part, he sent forth Hanno to set vpon them; who taking them vnawares, buried foure thousand of them in the place. Now during the continuance of the Land-warre in Sicil, Hannibal, who had lately beene beaten by Sea, but escaped vnto Carthage, meaning to make amends for his former errour, obtayned the trust of a new fleet, wherewith hee arriued at Sardinia: the conquest of which Iland, the Romans had entertayned for their next enterprise. Now it so fell out, that the Romans, crossing the Seas from Sicil, arriued in the Port where Hannibal with his new fleet anchored. They set vpon him vnawares, and tooke the better part of the fleet which he conducted; himselfe hardly escaping their danger. But it little auailed him to haue escaped from the Romans. His good friends the Carthaginians, were so ill pleased with this his second vnfortunate voiage, that they hanged him vp for his diligence: for (as it hath beene said of old) Non est bis in bello peccare; In warre it is too much to offend twice.

After this, it was long ere any thing of importance was done by the Consuls, till Panormus* was besieged: where, when the Romans had sought in vaine to draw the Carthaginians into the field; being vnable to force that great Citie, because of the strong Garrison therein bestowed: they departed thence, and tooke certaine inland Townes, as Mytistratum, Enna, Camerina, Hippana, and others, betweene Panormus and Messana. The yeare following, C. Atilius the Consul, who commanded the Roman fleet, discouered a Company of the Carthaginian Gallies, ranging the coast: and, not staying for his whole number, pursued them with ten of his. But he was well beaten for the haste hee made, and lost all, saue the Gallie which transported him: wherein himselfe escaped with great labour. But ere all was done, the rest of Atilius his fleet was gotten vp: who renewing the fight, recouered from the Carthaginians a double number of theirs; by which the victory remaining doubtful, both challenge it. Now to try at once, which of these two Nations should command the Seas, they both prepare all they can. The Romans make a fleet of three hundred and thirty Gallies; the Carthaginians, of three hundred and fiftie,  Triremes, Quadriremes, and Quinqueremes.

The Romans resolue to transport the warre into Africk; the Carthaginians, to arrest them on the coast of Sicil. The numbers, with which each of them filled their fleet, was (perhaps) the greatest that euer fought on the waters. By Polybius his estimation, there were in the Romane Gallies an hundred and forty thousand men; and in those of Carthage, an hundred and fifty thousand: reckoning one hundred and twenty Souldiers, and three hundred Rowers, to euery Gallie, one with the other. The Roman fleet was diuided into foure parts, of which the three first made the forme of a Wedge or Triangle; the two first squadrons making the Flancks,

* If wee may giue credit to Antiquities, which Fazellus, a diligent writer, hath left vs in his Historie of Sicil; Panormus, now called Palermo, is one of the first Cities that hath beene built in all Europe. For whereas Thucydides seemes to make it a Colonie of the Phœnicians; Ranzanus, in libello de Panormo, lib. 6. affirmes that it was first, and long before the time which Thucydides sets downe, founded by the Chaldæans, and Damascenes. To proue which, he tells vs of two inscriptions vpon marble in the Hebrew Character, found at Panormus in the time of William the second, King of Sicil, that were then beheld of all the Citizens, and other strangers; which, being translated into Latine, say as followeth: Viuente Isaac filio Abrahæ, & regnante in Idumæa, atq; in Valle Damascena, Esau filio Isaac; ingens Hebræorum manus, quibus adiuncti sunt multi Damasceni, atq; Phœnices, profecti in hanc triangularem Insulam, sedes perpetuas locauerunt in hoc amœnissimo loco, quem Panormum nominauerunt. In the other marble table are found these words: Non est alius Deus præter vnum Deum; non est alius Potens, præter eundem Deum, &c. Huius Turris Præfectus est Saphu, filius Eliphar filij Esau, fratris Iacob filij Isaac, filij Abrahami: & Turri quidem ipsi nomen est Baych; sed Turri huic proximæ nomen est Pharah. And this inscription (saith Fazellus) was found intire in the Castle Baych, in the yeere one thousand fiue hundred, thirtie and foure. Now whether these inscriptions were truely as ancient, as these men beleeue they were, I leaue euery man to his owne faith. But that the Citie was of aged times, it appeares by Thucydides, who affirmeth; when the Greekes past first into Sicil, that then the Phœnicians inhabited Panormus: which certaine it is that they did in the first Punik warre; to wit, the Carthaginians, who were Phœnicians, from whom the Romans (A. Aquilius, and C. Corneliu-, commanding this Armie) tooke it. And when Marcellus besieged Syracuse, it sent him in ayde three thousand Souldiers. But it was rather confederate, than subiect to the Romans. For Cicero against Verres, names it among the free Cities of Sicil. After Siracuse destroied, it became the first Citie and Regall seat, as well of the Goths and Saracens in that Iland, as of the Emperours of Constantinople; of the Normans, French, and Arragonians: which honour it holds to this day, and is much frequented, for the excellent wine which growes about it.

 The Quinqueremes are Gallies, wherin euerie Oare hath fiue men to draw it: the Quadriremes had foure to an Oare: and the Triremes, three. Some haue thought, that the Quinqueremes had fiue ranks of Oares, one ouer another; and the other Gallies (rateably) fewer. But had this been so, they must then haue had fiue decks each ouer other: which hath seldome been seen in ships of a thousand Tonnes, neither could the third, fourth, and fift rankes, haue reached vnto the water with the Oares.

and the third ſquadron, the Baſe: the point thereof (wherein were the two Conſulls as Admirals) looking toward the enemie; and the middle ſpace lying emptie. Their Veſſels of carriage were towed by the third ſquadron. After all came vp the fourth, in forme of a Creſcent; very well manned, but exceeding thinne: ſo that the hornes of it incloſed all the third ſquadron, together with the corners of the firſt and ſecond. The order of the Carthaginian fleet I cannot conceiue by the relation; but, by the manner of the fight afterwards, I coniecture, that the front of their fleet was thinne, and ſtretched in a great length, much like to that which the French call Combat en haij; a long front of horſe, and thinne: which forme, ſince the Piſtoll preuailed ouer the Lance, they haue changed. Behind this firſt out-ſtretched front, their Battalions were more ſolide: for Amilcar, Admirall of the Cathaginians, had thus ordered them, of purpoſe, (his Gallies hauing the ſpeed of the Romans) that, when the firſt fleet of the Romans haſted to breake through the firſt Gallies, they ſhould all turne taile, and the Romans purſuing them (as after a victorie) diſorder themſelues, and, for eagerneſſe of taking the Runn-awaies, leaue their other three ſquadrons farre behinde them. For ſo it muſt needes fall out; ſeeing that the third ſquadron towed their horſe-boats, and victuallers; and the fourth had the Reareward of all. According to Amilcars direction it ſucceeded. For when the Romans had charged, and broken, the thinne front of the Carthaginian firſt fleet, which ran away, they forthwith gaue after them with all ſpeede poſſible, not ſo much as looking behinde them for the ſecond ſquadron. Hereby the Romans were drawne neare vnto the bodie of the Carthaginian fleet, led by Amilcar, and by him (at the firſt) receiued great loſſe, till their ſecond ſquadron came vp, which forced Amilcar to betake him to his Oares. Hanno alſo, who commanded the right wing of the Carthaginian fleet, inuaded the Roman Reareward, and preuailed againſt them. But Amilcar being beaten off, Marcus Atilius fell backe to their ſuccour, and put the Carthaginians to their heeles; as not able to ſuſtaine both ſquadrons. The Reare being relieued, the Conſulls came to the aide of their third Battalion, which towed their victuailers, which was alſo in great danger of being beaten by the Africans: but the Conſulls, joyning their ſquadrons to it, but the Carthaginians on that part alſo to running. This victorie fell to the Romans, partly by the hardineſſe of their Souldiers; but principally, for that Amilcar, being firſt beaten, could neuer after joyne himſelfe to any of his other ſquadrons, that remained as yet in faire likelihood of preuailing, ſo long as they fought vpon euen termes, and but ſquadron to ſquadron. But Amilcar, forſaking the fight, thereby left a full fourth part of the Roman fleet vningaged, and readie to giue ſuccour to any of the other parts that were oppreſt. So as in concluſion, the Romans got the honour of the day: for they loſt but foure and twentie of theirs; whereas the Africans loſt thirtie that were ſunk, and threeſcore and three that were taken.

Now, if Amilcar, who had more Gallies than the Romans, had alſo diuided his fleet into foure ſquadrons, (beſides thoſe that he ranged in the front to draw on the enemies, and to ingage them) and that, while hee himſelfe fought with one ſquadron that charged him, all the reſt of the enemies fleet had beene at the ſame time entertained, he had preuailed: But the ſecond ſquadron, being free, came to the reſcue of the firſt, by which Amilcar was oppreſt: and Amilcar, being oppreſt and ſcattered, the Conſuls had good leiſure to relieue both their third and fourth ſquadron, and got the victorie.

Charles the fift, among other his Precepts to Philip the ſecond his ſonne, where he aduiſeth him concerning Warre againſt the Turkes, tells him, that in all battailes betweene them and the Chriſtians, he ſhould neuer faile to charge the Ianiſars in the beginning of the fight, and to ingage them at once with the reſt. For (ſaith he) the Ianiſars, who are alwaies reſerued intire in the Reare of the battaile, and in whom the Turke repoſeth his greateſt confidence; come vp in a groſſe body, when all the troups, on both ſides are disbanded and in confuſion; whereby they carie the victorie before them without resistance. By the same order of fight, and reseruation, did the Romans also preuaile against other Nations. For they kept their Triarij in store (who were the choice of their Armie) for the vp-shot and last blow. A great and a victorious aduantage it hath euer beene found, to keepe some one or two good troupes to looke on, when all else are disbanded and ingaged.

§. VIII.

The Romans preuaile in Africk. ATILIVS the Consull propoundeth intolerable conditions of peace to the Carthaginians. He is vtterly beaten, and made prisoner.

NOw the Romans, according to their former resolution, after they had repaired and re-victualled their fleet, set saile for Africa, and arriued at the Promontorie of Hercules, a great Head-land, somewhat to the East of the Port of Carthage, and some fortie leagues from Heraclea in Sicil, where Amilcar himselfe as yet staid. From this Head-land (leauing the entrance into Carthage) they coasted the East-side of the Promontorie, till they came to Clypea, a Towne, about fiftie English mile from it. There they disimbarked, and prepared to besiege Clypea; which, to ease them of labour, was yeelded vnto them. Now had they a Port of their owne on Africa side; without which all inuasions are fooliſh. By this time were the Africans also arriued at their owne Carthage; fearing that the Roman fleet and armie had directed themselues thither: but being aduertised, that they had taken Clypea, they made prouisions of all sorts: both by Sea and Land, for their defence. The Romans send to Rome for directions, and in the meane while waste all round about them. The order giuen from the Senate, was, that one of the Consulls should remaine with the Armie, and that the other should returne, with the fleet into Italie. According to this direction, Manlius the Consul is sent home to Rome; whither he carried with him twentie thousand African captaines, with all the Roman fleet and armie; except fortie ships, fifteene thousand foot, and fiue hundred horse, that were left with Atilius.

With these forces, Regulus easily wanne some Townes and Places, that were vnwalled, and laid siege to others. But he performed no great matter, before he came vnto Adis. Yet I hold it worthy of relation, that neere vnto the Riuer of Bagrada, he encountred with a Serpent of one hundred and twentie foot long, which he slue, not without losse of many Souldiers, being driuen to vse against it such engines of warre, as serued properly for the assaulting of Townes. At Adis he met with the Carthaginian Armie, whereof the Captaines were Hanno and Bostar, together with Amilcar, who had brought ouer out of Sicil fiue thousand foot, and fiue hundred horse to succour his Countrie. These (belike) had an intent, rather to wearie him out of Africa, by warie protraction of time, than to vndergoe the hazard of a maine fight. They were carefull to hold themselues free, from necessitie of comming to blowes: yet had they a great desire, to saue the Towne of Adis out of his hands. Intending therefore to follow their generall purpose, and yet to disturbe him in the siege of Adis, they incampe neere vnto him, and strongly (as they thinke) on the top of an hill: but thereby they loose the seruices, both of their Elephants, and of their horse-men. This disaduantage of theirs Regulus discouers, and makes vse of it. He assailes them in their strength, which they defend a-while; but in fine the Romans preuaile, and force them from the place, taking the spoile of their campe. Following this their good fortune at the heeles, they proceede to Tunis* a Citie within sixteene miles of Carthage, which they assault and take.

* This Citie was taken from the Turkes by Charles the fift, in the yeere 1536. and was one of the three Keyes, which he gaue in charge to Philip the second his sonne to keepe safe; to wit, this Tunis, the Key of Africa: Flushing, the Key of the Netherlands: and Cadiz, the Key of Spaine. But two of these Philip so lost, that hee neuer found them againe; where we staid not to pick any locke, but brake open the dores, and hauing rifled all, threw it into the fire.

the third, our English were bold, in the time of the renowned Queene Elizabeth, to wring out of his hands:

By

By the loſſe of this battaile at Adis, and more eſpecially by the loſſe of Tunis, the Carthaginians were greatly diſmaied. The Numidians, their next Neighbours towards the Weſt, inſult vpon their misfortunes; inuade, and ſpoile their Territory, and force thoſe that inhabite abroad, to forſake their villages and fields, and to hide themſelues within the walls of Carthage. By reaſon hereof, a great famine at hand threatens the Citizens. Atilius findes his owne aduantage, and aſſures himſelfe that the Citie could not long hold out: yet he feared leſt it might defend it ſelfe, vntill his time of Office, that was neere expired, ſhould be quite runne out, whereby the new Conſulls were like to reape the honor of obtaining it. Ambition therefore, that hath no reſpect but to it ſelfe, perſwades him to treat of peace with the Carthaginians. But he propounded vnto them ſo vnworthy and baſe conditions, as thereby their hearts, formerly poſſeſſed with feare, beeame now ſo couragious and diſdainefull, that they reſolued, either to defend their libertie, or to die to the laſt man. To ſtrengthen this their reſolution, there arriued at the ſame time a great troupe of Greekes, whom they had formerly ſent to entertaine. Among theſe was a very expert Souldier, named Xantippus, a Spartan: who being informed of what had paſſed, and of the ouerthrow which the Carthaginians receiued neere vnto Adis, gaue it out publiquely, that the ſame was occaſioned by default of the Commanders, and not of the Nation. This bruit ranne, till it came to the Senate; Xantippus is ſent for; giues the reaſon of his opinion; and in concluſion, being made Generall of the African forces, he puts himſelfe into the field. The Armie which he led, conſiſted of no more than twelue thouſand foot, and foure thouſand horſe, with an hundred Elephants. No greater were the forces, wherwith the Carthaginians ſought for all that they had, Libertie, Liues, Goods, Wiues, and Children: which might well make it ſuſpected, that the Armies by Sea, before ſpoken of, were miſſe-numbred; the one conſiſting of an hundred and fortie thouſand, and the other of an hundred and fiftie thouſand: were it not commonly found, that they which vſe the ſeruice of mercinarie Souldiers, are ſtronger abroad, than at their owne dores.

Xantippus, taking the field with this Armie, marched directly towards the Romans; and ranging his troups vpon faire and leuell ground, fitteſt both for his Elephants and Horſe, preſented them battaile. The Romans wondred, whence this new courage of their enemies might grow: but confident they were that it ſhould be ſoone abated. Their chiefe care was, how to reſiſt the violence of the Elephants. Againſt them they placed the Velites, or light-armed Souldiers, as a forlorne hope; that theſe might, either with darts and other caſting weapons, driue back the beaſts vpon the enemies, or at leaſt breake their violence, and hinder them from ruſhing freely vpon the Legions. To the ſame end, they made their battailes deeper in file, than they had beene accuſtomed to doe. By which meanes, as they were the leſſe ſubject vnto the impreſſion of the Elephants; ſo were they the more expoſed vnto the violence of horſe, wherein the enemie did farre exceede them. The Elephants were placed by Xantippus, all in one ranke, before his Armie; which followed them at a reaſonable diſtance: his horſe-men, and ſome light-armed foot, of the Carthaginians Auxiliaries, were in the wings. The firſt onſet was giuen by the Elephants, againſt which the Velites were ſo vnable to make reſiſtance, that they brake into the battalions following, and put them into ſome diſorder. In this caſe, the depth of the Roman battaile was helpfull. For when the beaſts had ſpent their force, in piercing through a few of the firſt ranks; the ſquadrons neuertheleſſe perſiſted in their order, without opening. But the Carthaginian horſe, hauing at the firſt encounter, by reaſon of their aduantage in number, driuen thoſe of Atilius out of the field, beganne to charge the Roman battalions in flanke, and put them in great diſtreſſe; who being forced to turne face euery way, could neither paſſe forward, nor yet retire; but had much adoe to make good the ground whereon they ſtood. In the meane while, ſuch of the Romans, as had eſcaped the furie of the Elephants, and left them at their backes, fell vpon the Carthaginian Armie, that met them in very good good array. It was no euen match. The one were a disordred Companie, wearied with labour, and hurt; the other, fresh, and well prepared, to haue dealt with the enemie vpon equall termes. Here was therefore a greater slaughter with little fight, the Romans haltily recoiling to the bodie of their Armie, which being surrounded with the enemie, and spent with trauaile, fell all to rout, vpon the defeat of these troups, that open the way to a generall ouerthrow. So the Carthaginians obtayned a full victorie; destroying the whole Roman Armie, saue two thousand, and taking fiue hundred prisoners, together with Atilius the Consull. Of their owne they lost no more than eight hundred mercinaries, which were slaine, when the fight began, by two thousand of the Romans: that wheeling about, to auoide the Elephants, bare downe all before them, and made way euen to the Carthaginian trenches. These were the two thousand that escaped, when the whole Armie behinde them was routed. All the rest were either taken or slaine. Hereby fortune made the Romans know, that they were no lesse her vassalls, than were the Carthaginians: how insolent soeuer they had beene in their proposition of peace, as if they had purchased from her the inheritance of their prosperitie, which she neuer gaue nor sold to any mortall man. With what ioy these newes were welcommed, when they came to Carthage, wee may easily coniecture; and what great things the vertue of one man hath often brought to passe in the World, there are many examples to proue, no lesse then this of Xantippus: all of them confirming that sentence of EVRIPIDES, Mens vna sapiens, plurium vincit manus; Many mens hands equall not one wise minde.

After this great seruice done to the Carthaginians, Xantippus returned into Greece; whether for that he was more enuied then honoured, or for what other cause it is vnknowne.

The death of Atilius Regulus the Consull, was very memorable. Hee was sent from Carthage to Rome, about the exchange and ransome of prisoners on both sides: giuing his faith to returne if the businesse were not effected. When he came to Rome, and plainely saw that his Countrie should loose by the bargaine: so far was he from vrging the Senate vnto compassion of his owne miserie, that he earnestly perswaded to haue the prisoners in Africk left to their ill destinies. This done, hee returned to Carthage: where for his paines taken, he was rewarded with an horrible death. For this his constancie and faith, all Writers highly extoll him. But the Carthaginians seeme to haue iudged him an obstinate and malicious enemie; that neither in his prosperitie would harken to reason, nor yet in his calamitie would haue the naturall care, to perseuc himselfe and others, by yeelding to such an office of humanitie, as is common in all warres (not grounded vpon deadly hatred) only in regard of some small aduantage. Whatsoeuer the Carthaginians thought of him; sure it is, that his faithfull obseruance of his word giuen, cannot be too much commended. But that graue speech, which he made in the Senate, against the exchange of prisoners, appeares, in all reason, to haue proceeded from a vaine-glorious frowardnesse, rather than from any necessitie of state. For the exchange was made soone after his death; wherein the Romans had the worse bargaine, by so much as Regulus himselfe was worth. As for the authoritie of all Historians, that magnifie him in this point; we are to consider that they liued vnder the Roman Empire: Philinus, the Carthaginian, perhaps did censure it otherwise. Yet the death which he suffered with extreme torments, could not be more greeuous to him than it was dishonourable to Carthage. Neither doe I think that the Carthaginians could excuse themselues herein; otherwise than by recrimination: saying, That the Romans deserued to be no better intreated for as much as it was their ordinary practice to vse others in the like sort. Crueltie doth not become more warrantable, but rather more odious, by being customarie. It was the Roman fashon, to whip almost to death, and then to behead, the Captaines of their enemies whom they tooke, yea although they were such, as had alwaies made faire warres with them. Wherefore it ſeemes not meet, in reaſon, that they ſhould crie out againſt the like tyrannicall inſolence in others, as if it were lawfull only in themſelues.

The conſideration both of this misfortune, that rewarded the pride of Atilius his intolerable demands; and of the ſudden valour, whereinto the Carthaginians feare was changed by meere deſperation; calls to remembrance the like inſolencie of others in proſperitie, that hath bred the like reſolution in thoſe, to whom all reaſonable grace hath beene denied. In ſuch caſes I neuer hold it impertinent, to adde vnto one, more teſtimonies; approuing the true rules, from which our paſſions carrie vs away.

In the yeere 1378. the Genowaies wonne ſo faſt vpon the Venetians, as they not only draue their Gallies out of the Sea, but they brought their owne fleet within two miles of Venice it ſelfe. This bred ſuch an amazement in the Citizens of Venice, that they offered vnto the Genowaies (their ſtate reſerued) whatſoeuer they would demand. But Peter Doria, blowne vp with many former victories, would harken to no compoſition; ſaue the yeelding of their Citie and State to his diſcretion. Hereupon, the Venetians, being filled with diſdaine, thruſt out to Sea with all their remaining power, and aſſaile Doria with ſuch deſperate furie, that they breake his fleet; kill Doria himſelfe; take nineteene of his Gallies, foureſcore boats of Padoa, and foure thouſand priſoners; recouer Chiozza, and all the places taken from them; and following their victorie, enter the Port of Genoa, enforcing the Genowaies, baſely to begge peace, to their extreme diſhonour and diſaduantage, being beaten; which, being victorious, they might haue commanded, to their greateſt honour and aduantage. The like hapned to the Earle of Flanders, in the yeere 1380. when hauing taken a notable, and withall an ouer-cruell reuenge vpon the Gantois, he refuſed mercy to the reſt, who in all humilitie, ſubmitting themſelues to his obedience, offered their Citie, goods, and eſtates, to be diſpoſed at his pleaſure. This when he had vnaduiſedly refuſed, and was reſolued to extinguiſh them vtterly; they iſſue out of their Citie with fiue thouſand choſen men, and armed with a deſperate reſolution, they charge the Earle, breake his Armie, enter Bruges (pell-mell) with his vanquiſhed followers; and enforce him to hide himſelfe vnder an heape of ſtraw, in a poore cottage; out of which with great difficultie he eſcaped, and ſaued himſelfe. Such are the fruits of inſolencie.

How the affaires of Carthage proſpered after the victorie againſt ATILIVS: How the Romans hauing loſt their fleet by tempeſt, reſolue to forſake the Seas: The great aduantages of a good fleet in warre, betweene Nations diuided by the Sea.

BY the reputation of this late victory, all places that had beene loſt in Africk, returne to the obedience of Carthage. Onely Clypea ſtands out; before which the Carthaginians ſit downe, and aſſaile it, but in vaine: For the Romans, hearing of the loſſe of Atilius with their forces in Africk, and withall, that Clypea was beſieged, make ready a groſſe Armie, and tranſport it in a fleet of three hundred and fiftie Gallies, commanded by M. Æmilius, and Ser. Fuluius, their Conſulls. At the Promontory of Mercurie, two hundred Carthaginian Gallies, ſet out of purpoſe, vpon the bruit of their comming, encounter them: but greatly to their coſt. For the Romans tooke by force an hundred and fourteene of their fleet, and drew them after them to Clypea; where they ſtaid no longer, than to take in their owne men that had beene beſieged: and this done, they made amaine toward Sicil, in hope to recouer all that the Carthaginians held therein. In this haſty voyage they deſpiſe the aduice of the Pilots, Pilots, who pray them to finde harbour in time, for that the season threatned some violent stormes; which euer hapned betweene the rising of Orion, and of the * Dog-starre. Now although the Pilots of the Roman Fleete had thus fore-warned them of the weather at hand, and certified them withall, that the South coast of Sicil had no good Ports, wherein to saue themselues vpon such an accident: yet this victorious Nation was perswaded, that the winde and seas feared them no lesse, than did the Africans; and that they were able to conquer the Elements themselues. So refusing to stay within some Port, as they were aduised, they would needes put out to Sea; thinking it a matter much helping their reputation, after this victorie against the Carthaginian fleet; to take a few worthlesse Townes vpon the coast. The mercilesse windes in the meane while ouertake them, and neere vnto Camerina, ouerturne and thrust headlong on the rocks, all but foure score of three hundred and fortie ships: so as their former great victorie was deuoured by the Seas, before the fame thereof recouered Rome.

* There is no Part of the World, which hath not some certaine times of outragious weather besides their accidentall stormes. We haue vpon our coast a Michaelmas flaw, that seldome or neuer failes: In the west Indies, in the moneths of August and September, those most forcible winds, which the Spaniards call the Nortes, or Northwinds, are very fearefull: and therefore they that Nauigate in those parts, take harbor till those months take end. Charles the fift being as ill aduised, in passing the Seas towards Algire, in the Winter quarter, contrary to the counsaile of A. Doria, as he was in like vnseasonable times to continue his siege before Metz in Loraine, lost an hundred and fortie ships by tempest, and fifteene Gallies, with all in effect in them of men, victuailes, horses, and munition: a losse no lesse great, than his retrait, both from before the one and the other, was extreme dishonourable.

The Carthaginians, hearing what had hapned, repaire all their warlike Vessells, hoping once againe to command the Seas: they are also as confident of their land-forces since the ouerthrow of Atilius. They send Asdrubal into Sicil with all their old Souldiers, and an hundred and fortie Elephants, imbarqued in two hundred Gallies. With this Armie and fleet he arriues at Lilybæum; where hee beginnes to vexe the Partisans of Rome. But aduersitie doth not discourage the Romanes: They build in three moneths (a matter of great note) one hundred and twentie ships; with which, and the remainder of their late shipwracke, they row to Panormus, or Palerma, the chiefe Citie of the Africans in Sicil, and surround it by Land and Water: after a while they take it, and leauing a Garrison therein, returne to Rome.

Very desirous the Romans were to bee doing in Africk: to which purpose they imploied C. Seruilius, and C. Sempronius, their Consulls. But these wrought no wonders. Some spoile they made vpon the coasts of Africa: but Fortune robbed them of all their gettings. For in their returne, they were first set vpon the sands, and like to haue perished, neere vnto the lesser Syrtes, where they were faine to heaue all ouer-boord, that so they might get off: then, hauing with much a-doe doubled the Cape of Lilybæum, in their passage from Panormus towards Italie, they lost an hundred and fiftie of their ships by foule weather. A greater discouragement neuer Nation had; the God of the warres fauoured them no more, than the God of the waters afflicted them. Of all that Mars enricht them with vpon the Land, Neptune robbed them vpon the Seas. For they had now lost, besides what they lost in fight, foure hundred & sixe ships and Gallies, with all the munition and Souldiers transported in them.

The exceeding damage hereby receiued, perswaded them to giue ouer their Nauigation, and their fight by Sea, and to send only a Land-armie into Sicil, vnder L. Cæcilius, and F. Furius, their Consulls. These they transported in some three-score ordinarie passage-boats, by the straights of Messana, that are not aboue a mile and an halfe broad from land to land. In like sort, the ouerthrow which Atilius receiued in Africa, occasioned chiefly by the Elephants, made them lesse cholericke against the Carthaginians, than before: so that for two yeeres after, they kept the high and woodie grounds, not daring to fight in the faire and champian Countries. But this late resolution of forsaking the Seas lasted not long. For it was impossible for them to succour those places which they held in Sicil, without a Nauie, much lesse to maintaine the warre in Africa. For whereas the Romans were to send forces from Messana to Egesta, to Lilybæum, and to other places in the extreme West parts of Sicil, making sometimes a march of aboue an hundred and forty English mile by land, which could not be performed with an Armie, and the prouisions that follow it, in lesse than fourteene daies; the Carthaginians would passe it with their Gallies, in eight and fortie houres.

An old example we haue, of that great aduantage of transporting Armies by water, betweene Canutus, and Edmond Ironside. For Canutus, when he had entred the Thames with his Nauie and Armie, and could not preuaile against London, suddenly imbarqued; and sailing to the West, landed in Dorset-shire, so drawing Edmond and his Armie thither. There finding ill entertainement, he againe shipt his men, and entred the Seuerne, making Edmond to march after him, to the succour of Worcester-shire, by him greatly spoiled. But when he had Edmond there, he sailed back againe to London: by meanes whereof, he both wearied the King, and spoiled where hee pleased, ere succour could arriue. And this was not the least helpe, which the Netherlands haue had against the Spaniards, in the defence of their libertie, that being Masters of the Sea, they could passe their Armie from place to place, vnwearied, and entire, with all the Munition and Artilerie belonging vnto it, in the tenth part of the time, wherein their enemies haue beene able to doe it. Of this, an instance or two. The Count Maurice of Nassau, now liuing, one of the greatest Captaines, and of the worthiest Princes, that either the present or preceding Ages haue brought forth, in the yeare 1590. carried his Armie by Sea, with fortie Canons, to Breda: making countenance either to besiege Boisleduc, or Gertreuiden Berg; which the enemie (in preuention) filled with Souldiers, and victualls. But as soone as the winde serued, he suddenly set saile; and arriuing in the mouth of the Meuze, turned vp the Rhine, and thence to Yssel, and sate downe before Zutphen. So before the Spaniards could march ouer land round about Holland, aboue fourescore mile, and ouer many great Riuers, with their Cannon and carriage, Zutphen was taken. Againe, when the Spanish Armie had ouercome this wearisome march, and were now farre from home, the Prince Maurice, making countenance to saile vp the Rhine, changed his course in the night; and sailing downe the streame, he was set downe before Hulst in Brabant, ere the Spaniards had knowledge what was become of him. So this Towne he also tooke, before the Spanish armie could returne. Lastly, the Spanish armie was no sooner arriued in Brabant, than the Prince Maurice, well attended by his good fleet, hauing fortified Hulst, set saile againe, and presented himselfe before Nymegen in Gelders, a Citie of notable importance, and mastred it.

And to say the truth; it is impossible for any maritime Countrie, not hauing the coasts admirably fortified, to defend it selfe against a powerfull enemie, that is master of the Sea. Hereof I had rather, that Spaine than England should bee an example. Let it therefore be supposed, that King Philip the second had fully resolued to hinder Sir John Norris in the yeare 1589. from presenting Don Antonio, King of Portugall, before the gates of Lysborne; and that he would haue kept off the English, by power of his land-forces; as being too weake at Sea, through the great ouerthrow of his mighty Armada, by the fleet of Queene Elizabeth, in the yeere foregoing. Surely, it had not beene hard for him, to prepare an Armie, that should be able to resist our eleuen thousand. But where should this his Armie haue beene bestowed? If about Lysborne; then would it haue beene easie vnto the English, to take, ransack, and burne the Towne of Groine, and to waste the Countrie round about it. For the great and threatning preparations, of the Earle of Altemira, the Marquesse of Seralba, and others, did not hinder them from performing all this. Neither did the hastie leauie of eight thousand, vnder the Earle of Andrada, serue to more effect, than the increase of honour to S^r John Norris, and his Associates: considering, that the English charged these, at Puente de Burgos, and passing the great Bridge, behinde which they lay, that was flanked with shot, and barricadoed at the further end, routed them; tooke their campe; tooke their Generalls standard with the Kings Armes, and pursued them ouer all the Countrie, which they fired. If a roiall Armie, and not (as this was) a Companie of priuate aduenturers, had thus begunne begunne the warre in Galicia; I thinke it would haue made the Spaniards to quit the guard of Portugale, and make haste to the defence of their S^t. Iago, whose Temple was not farre from the danger. But, had they held their first resolution; as knowing, that Sir Iohn Norris his maine intent was, to bring Don Antonio, with an Armie, into his Kingdome, whither comming strong, he expected to bee readily and joyfully welcomed: could they haue hindred his landing in Portugale? Did not he land at Penicha, and march ouer the Countrie to Lysborne, sixe daies iournie? Did not hee (when all Don Antonio his promises failed) passe along by the Riuer of Lysborne to Cascaliz, and there, hauing wonne the Fort, quietly imbarque his men, and depart? But these, though no more than an handfull, yet were they Englishmen. Let vs consider of the matter it selfe; what an other Nation might doe, euen against England, in landing an Armie, by aduantage of a fleet, if wee had none. This question, Whether an inuading Armie may be resisted at their landing vpon the coast of England, were there no fleete of ours at the Sea to impeach it; is alreadie handled by a learned Gentleman of our Nation, in his obseruations vpon Cæsars Commentaries, that maintaines the affirmatiue. This he holds only vpon supposition; in absence of our shipping: and comparatiuely; as, that it is a more safe and easie course, to defend all the coast of England, than to suffer an enemie to land, and afterwards to fight with him. Surely I hold with him, that it is the best way, to keepe our enemie from treading vpon our ground: wherein, if wee faile, then must wee seeke to make him wish, that he had staied at his owne home. In such a case, if it should happen, our iudgements are to weigh many particular circumstances, that belong not vnto this discourse. But making the question generall, and positiue, Whether England, without helpe of her fleet, be able to debarre an enemie from landing; I hold that it is vnable so to doe: and therefore I thinke it most dangerous to make the aduenture. For the incouragement of a first victorie to an enemie, and the discouragement of being beaten to the inuaded, may draw after it a most perilous consequence.

It is true, that the Marshall Monluc, in his Commentaries, doth greatly complaine, that by his wanting forces, wherewith to haue kept the frontier of Guienne, they of the Protestant religion, after the battaile of Moncounter, entred that Countrie, and gathered great strength and reliefe thence; for if the King (saith he) would haue giuen me but reasonable meanes, ieuse bien garde a Monsieur l' Admiral, de faire boire ses Cheuaux en la Garonne; I would haue kept the Admiral from watering his horses in the Riuer of Garonne. Monsieur de Langey, on the contrarie side, preferres the not fighting vpon a frontier with an inuading enemie, and commends the delay; which course the Constable of France held, against the Emperour Charles, when hee inuaded Prouence. Great difference I know there is, and a diuerse consideration to be had, betweene such a Countrie as France is, strengthned with many fortified places; and this of ours, where our Rampars are but of the bodies of men. And it was of inuasions vpon firme land, that these great Captaines spake: whose entrances cannot be vncertaine. But our question is, of an Armie to be transported ouer Sea, and to be landed againe in an enemies Country, and the place left to the choice of the Inuader. Hereunto I say, That such an Armie cannot bee resisted on the coast of England, without a fleet to impeach it; no, nor on the coast of France, or any other Countrie: except euery Creeke, Port, or sandie Bay, had a powerfull Armie, in each of them, to make opposition. For let his whole supposition be granted; That Kent is able to furnish twelue thousand foot; and that those twelue thousand be laied in the three best landing places within that Countie, to wit, three thousand at Margat, three thousand at the Nesse, and sixe thousand at Foulkston, that is somewhat equally distant from them both; as also that two of these troups (vnlesse some other order be thought more fit) bee directed to strengthen the third, when they shall see the enemies fleet to bend towards it: I say, that notwithstanding this prouision, if the enemie, setting saile from the Isle of Wight, in the first firſt watch of the night, and towing their long boates at their ſternes, ſhall arriue by dawne of day at the Neſſe, and thruſt their Armie on ſhore there; it will be hard for thoſe three thouſand that are at Margat, (twentie and foure long miles from thence) to come time enough to re-enforce their fellowes at the Neſſe. Nay, how ſhall they at Foulkſton bee able to doe it, who are neerer by more than halfe the way? ſeeing that the enemie, at his firſt arriuall, will eyther make his entrance by force, with three or foure hundred ſhot of great Artillery, and quickly put the firſt three thouſand, that were intrenched at the Neſſe, to runne; or elſe giue them ſo much to doe, that they ſhall be glad to ſend for helpe to Foulkſton; and perhaps to Margat: where-10 by thoſe places will bee left bare. Now let vs ſuppoſe, that all the twelue thouſand Kentiſh Souldiers arriue at the Neſſe, ere the enemie can be ready to diſimbarque his Armie, ſo that hee ſhall finde it vnſafe, to land in the face of ſo many, prepared to withſtand him; yet muſt we beleeue, that he will play the beſt of his owne game; and (hauing liberty to goe which way he liſt) vnder couert of the night, ſet ſayle towards the Eaſt, where what ſhall hinder him to take ground, eyther at Margat, the Downes, or elſewhere, before they at the Neſſe can be well aware of his departure? Certainly, there is nothing more eaſie than to doe it. Yea the like may bee ſayd of Waymouth, Purbeck, Poole, and of all landing places on the South Coaſt. For there is no man ignorant, that Ships, without putting themſelues out of breath, will eaſily

20 out-runne the Souldiers that coaſt them. Les Armees ne volent point en poſte; Armies neyther flye, nor runne poſt, ſayth a Marſhall of France. And I know it to be true, that a fleet of Ships may be ſeene at Sunne-ſet, and after it, at the Liſard; yet by the next morning they may recouer Portland, whereas an Armie of foot ſhall not bee able to march it in ſixe dayes. Againe, when thoſe troupes, lodged on the Sea-ſhores, ſhall be forced to runne from place to place in vaine, after a fleet of Ships; they will at length ſit downe in the mid-way, and leaue all at aduenture. But ſay it were otherwiſe; That the inuading enemie will offer to land in ſome ſuch place, where there ſhall be an Armie of ours readie to receiue him; yet it cannot be doubted, but that when the choice of all our trained bands, and the choice of our Commanders
30 and Captaines, ſhal be drawn together (as they were at Tilburie in the yeare 1588.) to attend the perſon of the Prince, and for the defence of the Citie of London: they that remaine to guard the coaſt, can be of no ſuch force, as to encounter an Armie like vnto that, wherewith it was intended that the Prince of Parma ſhould haue landed in England.

The Ile of Tercera hath taught vs by experience, what to thinke in ſuch a caſe. There are not many Ilands in the world, better fenced by nature, and ſtrengthned by art: it being euery where hard of acceſſe; hauing no good harbour wherein to ſhelter a Nauie of friends; and vpon euery coue or watering place a Fort erected, to forbid the approch of an enemies boat. Yet when Emanuel de Sylua, and Monſieur 1582.
40 de Chattes, that held it to the vſe of Don Antonio, with fiue or ſixe thouſand men, thought to haue kept the Marqueſſe of Santa Cruz, from ſetting foot on ground therin; the Marqueſſe hauing ſhewed himſelfe in the Roade of Angra, did ſet ſaile, ere any was aware of it, and arriued at the Port des Moles; farre diſtant from thence, where hee wanne a Fort, and landed, ere Monſieur de Chattes, running thither in vaine, could come to hinder him. The example of Philip Stroſſie, ſlaine the yeere before, without all regard of his worth, and of three hundred French priſoners murdered in cold blood, had inſtructed de Chattes and his followers, what they might expect at that Marqueſſe his hands: Therefore it is not like, that they were ſlow in carrying reliefe to Port des Moles. Whether our Engliſh would bee perſwaded to 50 make ſuch diligent haſte, from Margat to the Neſſe, and backe againe, it may bee doubted. Sure I am, that it were a greater march than all the length of Tercera; whereof the French-men had not meaſured the one halfe when they found themſelues preuented by the more nimble ſhips of Spaine.

This may ſuffice to proue, that a ſtrong Armie, in a good fleet, which neither foot, nor horſe, is able to follow, cannot be denied to land where it liſt, in England, France, or elsewhere, vnlesse it be hindred, encountred, and shuffled together, by a fleet of equall, or answerable strength.

The difficult landing of our English, at Fayal, in the yeere 1597. is alleaged against this: which example moues me no way to thinke, that a large coast may be defended against a strong fleet. I landed those English in Fayal, my selfe, and therefore ought to take notice of this instance. For whereas I finde an action of mine cited, with omission of my name; I may by a ciuill interpretation, thinke, that there was no purpose to defraud me of any honour; but rather an opinion, that the enterprise was such, or so ill managed, as that no honour could be due vnto it. There were indeed some which were in that voiage, who aduised me not to vndertake it: and I harkened vnto them, somewhat longer than was requisite, especially, whilest they desired mee, to reserue the title of such an exploit (though it were not great) for a greater person. But when they began to tell me of difficultie: I gaue them to vnderstand, the same which I now maintaine, that it was more difficult to defend a coast, then to inuade it. The truth is, that I could haue landed my men with more ease then I did; yea without finding any resistance, if I would haue rowed to another place, yea euen there where I landed, if I would haue taken more companie to helpe me. But, without fearing any imputation of rashnesse, I may say, that I had more regard of reputation, in that businesse, than of safetie. For I thought it to belong vnto the honour of our Prince & Nation, that a few Ilanders should not think any aduantage great enough, against a fleet set forth by Q. Elizabeth: and further, I was vnwilling, that some Low-Countrie Captaines, and others, not of mine owne squadron, whose assistance I had refused, should please themselues with a sweet conceipt (though it would haue bin short, when I had landed in some other place) That for want of their helpe I was driuen to turne taile. Therfore I tooke with me none, but men assured, Cõmanders of mine own squadron, with some of their followers, and a few other Gentlemen, voluntaries, whom I could not refuse; as, Sir William Brooke, Sir William Haruey, Sir Arthur Gorges, Sir Iohn Skot, Sir Thomas Ridgeway, Sir Henrie Thinne, Sir Charles Morgan, Sir Walter Chute, Marcellus Throckmorton, Captaine Laurence Kemis, Captaine William Morgan, and others, such as well vnderstood themselues and the enemie: by whose helpe, with Gods fauour, I made good the enterprise I vndertooke. As for the working of the Sea, the steepenesse of the Cliffes, and other troubles, that were not new to vs, we ouercame them well enough. And these (notwithstanding) made fiue or sixe Companies of the enemies, that sought to impeach our landing, abandon the wal, whereon their Musketiers lay on the rest for vs, and wonne the place of them without any great losse. This I could haue done with lesse danger, so that it should not haue serued for example of a rule, that failed euen in this example: but the reasons before alleaged, (together with other reasons well knowne to some of the Gentlemen aboue named, though more priuate, then to be here laid downe) made me rather follow the way of brauerie, and take the shorter course; hauing it still in mine owne power to fall off when I should thinke it meet. It is easily said, that the Enemie was more then a Coward; (which yet was more then we knew) neither will I magnifie such a small peece of seruice, by seeking to proue him better: whom had I thought equall to mine owne followers, I would otherwise haue dealt with. But for so much as concernes the Proposition in hand; he that beheld this, may well remember that the same enemie troubled vs more in our march towards Fayal, than in our taking the shore; that he sought how to stop vs in place of his aduantage; that many of our men were slayne or hurt by him, among whom Sir Arthur Gorges was shot in that march; and that such, as (thinking all danger to bee past, when we had wonne good footing) would needes follow vs to the Town were driuen by him, to forsake the pace of a man of warre, and betake themselues to an hastie trot.

For end of this digression, I hope that this question shall neuer come to triall; his Majesties many moueable Forts will forbid the experience. And although the English will no lesse disdaine, than any Nation vnder heauen can doe, to be beaten

vpon their owne ground, or elſewhere by a forraigne enemie; yet to entertaine thoſe that ſhall aſſaile vs, with their owne beefe in their bellies, and before they eate of our Kentiſh Capons, I take it to be the wiſeſt way. To doe which, his Maieſtie, after God, will imploy his good ſhips on the Sea, and not truſt to any intrenchment vpon the ſhore.

§. X.

How the Romans attempt againe to get the maſtrie of the Seas. The victorie of CEACILIVS the Roman Conſull at Panormus: The ſiege of Lilybæum. How a Rhodian Gallie entred Lilybæum at pleaſure, in deſpight of the Roman fleet. That it is a matter of great difficultie to ſtop the paſſage of good ſhips. The Romans, by reaſon of grieuous loſſes receiued, vnder CLAVDIVS and IVNIVS their Conſulls, abandon the Seas againe.

WHen, without a ſtrong Nauie, the Romans found it altogether impoſſible, either to keepe what they had alreadie gotten in Sicil, or to enlarge their Dominions in Africa or elſewhere, they reſolued once againe, notwithſtanding their late miſaduentures, to ſtrengthen their fleet and ſhips of warre. So cauſing fiftie new Gallies to be built, and the old to be repaired, they gaue them in charge (together with certaine Legions of Souldiers) to the new Conſulls, C. Atilius, and L. Manlius. On the other ſide, Aſdrubal perceiuing that the Romans, partly by reaſon of the ſhipwarke which they had lately ſuffered, partly by reaſon of the ouerthrow which they receiued by Xantippus in Africa, were leſſe daring than they had beene in the beginning of the warre; and withall, that one of the Conſulls was returned into Italie, with the one halfe of the Armie; and that Cæcilius, with onely the other halfe, remained at Panormus: he remoued with the Carthaginian forces from Lilybæum towards it, hoping to prouoke Cæcilius to fight. But the Conſull was better aduiſed. For when Aſdrubal had made his approches ſomewhat neere the Towne, Cæcilius cauſed a deepe trench to be cut, a good diſtance without the ditch of the Citie: betweene which and his trench he left ground ſufficient, to embattaile a Legion of his Souldiers. To theſe he gaue order that they ſhould aduance themſelues, and paſſe ouer the new trench, till ſuch time as the African Elephants were thruſt vpon them. From thoſe beaſts he commanded them to retire, by ſlow degrees, till they had drawne on the Elephants to the brinke of the new trench, which they could by no meanes paſſe. This they performed accordingly. For when the Elephants were at a ſtand, they were ſo gawled and beaten, both by thoſe Souldiers that were on the inſide of the trench, and by thoſe that lay in the trench it ſelfe, that being inraged by their many wounds, they brake back furiouſly vpon their owne foot men, and vtterly diſordered them. Cæcilius, eſpying this aduantage, ſallied with all the force hee had; and charging the other troups, that ſtood embattailed, he vtterly brake them, and put them to their heels; making a great ſlaughter of them, and taking al their Elephants.

The report of this victorie being brought to Rome, the whole ſtate, filled with courage, prepared a new fleet of two hundred ſaile, which they ſent into Sicil, to giue end to that warre, that had now laſted foureteene yeeres. With this fleet and armie the Romans reſolue to attempt Lilybæum, the only place of importance which the Carthaginians held in Sicil; and all (indeed) ſaue Drepanum, that was neere adjoyning. They ſet downe before it, and poſſeſſe themſelues of all the places of aduantage neere vnto it, eſpecially of ſuch as cõmand the hauen, which had a very difficult entrance. They alſo beat to the ground ſixe towres of defence; & by forcible engines weaken ſo many other parts of the city, as the defendants begin to deſpaire.

Yet Himilco, Commander of the Place, faileth not in all that belongs to a man of Warre. All that is broken, he repaireth with admirable diligence; he maketh many furious sallies, and giueth to the Romans all the affronts that possibly could bee made. He hath in Garrison (besides the Citizens) ten thousand Souldiers; among which there are certaine Lieutenants, and other pettie Officers, that conspire to render and betray the Towne. But the matter is reuealed by an Achæan, called Alexon, who had formerly, in danger of the like treason, saued Agrigentum. Himilco vseth the helpe of Alexon, to assure the hired Souldiers; and imployeth Hannibal to appeaze the troups of the Gaules, which did wauer, and had sent their agents to the enemie. All promise constancie and truth; so that the Traitors, being vnable to performe what they had vndertaken, are faine to liue in the Roman campe as fugitiues, that had wrought no good whereby to deserue their bread. In the meane while, a supply of ten thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to their reliefe, hauing Hannibal the sonne of Amilcar, for their Conductor: who, in despight of all resistance, entred the Port and Citie, to the incredible ioy of the besieged. The old Souldiers, together with the new Companies, (thereto perswaded by Himilco with hope of great reward) resolue to set vpon the Romans in their Trenches, and either force them to abandon the siege, or (at least) to take from them, or set on fire, their engines of batterie. The attempt is presently made, and pursued to the vttermost, with great slaughter on both sides. But the Romans being more in number, and hauing the aduantage of the ground, hold still their places, and with extreme difficultie defend their engines.

They of Carthage desire greatly to vnderstand the state of things at Lilybæum; but know not how to send into the Towne. A certaine Rhodian vndertakes the seruice; and hauing receiued his dispatch, sailes with one Gallie to Ægusa, a little Iland neere Lilybæum. Thence, taking his time, he steered directly with the Port; and hauing a passing swift Gallie, he past through the best of the Channel, and recouered the water-gate, ere any of those, which the Romans had to guard the Port, could thrust from the shores on either side.

The next day, neither attending the couert of the darke night, nor dreading to be boorded by the Roman Gallies, who waited his returne, he set saile, and shipping his Oares (his Gallie being exceeding quick of steerage, and himselfe expert in all parts of the channell) recouered the Hauens mouth, and the Sea, in despight of all the pursuit made after him. Then, finding himselfe out of danger of being incompassed by many, he turned againe towards the mouth of the Hauen, challenging any one, if any one durst come forth, to vndertake him. This enterprise, and the wel performing of it, was very remarkeable, and much wondred at in those dayes: and yet, where there was no great Artillerie, nor any other weapons of fire, to kill a-farre-off, the aduenture which this Rhodian made, was not greatly hazardous. For in this Age, a valiant and iudicious man of warre will not feare to passe by the best appointed Fort of Europe, with the helpe of a good Tide, and a leading gale of wind: no, though fortie peeces of great Artillerie open their mouthes against him, and threaten to teare him in pieces.

In the beginning of our late Queenes time, when Denmarke and Sweden were at Warre; our East-land fleet, bound for Leif-land, was forbidden by the King of Denmarke to trade with the subiects of his enemies, and he threatned to sinke their ships if they came through the streights of Elsenour. Notwithstanding this, our Merchants (hauing a ship of her Maiesties, called the Minion, to defend them) made the aduenture; and sustaining some Vollies of shot, kept on their course. The King made all the prouision he could, to stop them, or sinke them, at their returne. But the Minion, commanded (as I take it) by William Burrough, leading the way, did not only passe out with little losse, but did beat downe, with artillerie, a great part of the Fort of Elsenour; which at that time was not so well rampard, as now perhaps it is: and the fleet of Merchants that followed him, went through without any wound receiued. Neither was it long ſince, that the Duke of Parma beſieging Antwerp, and finding no poſſibilitie to maſter it, otherwiſe then by famine, laid his Cannon on the bancke of the Riuer, ſo well to purpoſe, and ſo euen with the face of the water, that he thought it impoſſible for the leaſt boat to paſſe by. Yet the Hollanders and Zelanders, not blowne vp by any winde of glorie, but comming to finde a good market for their Butter and Cheeſe, euen the poore men, attending their profit when all things were extreme deare in Antwerp, paſſed in boats of ten or twelue Tonne, by the mouth of the Dukes Cannon, in deſpight of it, when a ſtrong Weſterly winde, and a Tide of floud fauoured them; as alſo with a contrarie winde, and an ebbing water, they turned backe againe: ſo as he was forced, in the ende, to build his Stockado ouerthwart the Riuer, to his maruailous trouble and charge.

The Fort St. Philip terrified not vs in the yeere 1596. when we ented the Port of Caliz; neither did the Fort at Puntal, when we were entred, beat vs from our anchoring by it; though it plaied vpon vs with foure Demi-cannons within point blanque, from ſixe in the morning till twelue at noone. The ſiege of Oſtend, and of many other places, may be giuen for proofe, how hard a matter it is to ſtop the paſſage of a good ſhip, without another as good to encounter it. Yet this is true, that where a Fort is ſo ſet, as that of Angra in Tercera, that there is no paſſage along beſide it, or that the ſhips are driuen to turne vpon a bow line towards it, wanting all helpe of winde and tide; there, and in ſuch places, is it of great vſe, and fearefull: otherwiſe not.

But to returne to our aduenturous Rhodian: Hee arriues in ſafetie at Carthage, and makes them know the eſtate of Lilybæum. Others alſo, after this take vpon them to doe the like, and performe it with the ſame ſucceſſe. The Romans therfore labour to choke the channell; and, for that purpoſe, fill many Merchants ſhips with great ſtones, and ſinke them therein. The force of the Tides cleares it againe in part: but they grounded ſo many of thoſe great-bellied boats in the beſt of the entrance, as at laſt it made a manifeſt riſing and heape, like a ragged Iland, in the paſſage. Hereby it came to paſſe, that a Carthaginian Gallie, taking her courſe by night, and not ſuſpecting any ſuch impediment, ranne her ſelfe a-ground thereon, and was taken. Now comes the braue Rhodian, thinking to enter, as hee had done before: but this Carthaginian Gallie, a little before taken, gaue him chace, and gathered vpon him; he findes what ſhee is, both by her forme and by her ſwiftneſſe: and being not able to runne from her, reſolued to fight with her. But ſhe is too well manned for him, ſo that he is beaten and taken.

Lilybæum, after this, is greatly diſtreſſed; the Souldiers being worne with labour and watching. But in this deſpaire there roſe ſo violent a tempeſt, as ſome of the Romans woodden Towers, by which they ouer-topt the walls of Lilybæum, were ouer-turned. A Greeke Souldier vndertakes to fire thoſe that were fallen, and performes it: for the fire was no ſooner kindled, but being blowne vnto by the bellowes of a tempeſt, it increaſed ſo faſt, as it became reſiſtleſſe, and in the end burned all to aſhes, and melted the braſen heads of the battering Rammes. Hereupon deſpaire and wearineſſe hinder the Romans from repairing their Engines: ſo that they reſolue, by a long ſiege, to ſtarue the defendants.

Vpon relation of what had paſt, a ſupply of ten thouſand Souldiers is ſent from Rome, vnder M. Claudius, the Conſull. He arriues at Meſſana, and marcheth ouer land to Lilybæum: where hauing re-inforced the Armie, and ſupplied the Gallies with new Rowers, he propounds the ſurpriſe of Drepanum, a Citie on the other ſide of the Bay of Lilybæum. This ſeruice the Captaines and Souldiers willingly embrace. So the Conſull embarques his troups, and arriues on the ſudden in the mouth of the Port. Adherbal is Gouernour of the Towne, a valiant and prudent man of warre, who being ignorant of the new ſupply arriued at Lilybæum, was at firſt amazed at their ſudden approch; but hauing recouered his ſpirits, hee perſwades swades the Souldiers, rather to fight abroad, than to be incloſed. Herewithall hee promiſeth great rewards to ſuch, as by their valour ſhall deſerue them; offering to leade them himſelfe, and to fight in the head of his fleete. Hauing ſufficiently encouraged his men, he thruſts into the Sea towards the Romans. The Conſull, deceiued of his expectation, calls back the foremoſt Gallies, that he might now marſhall them for defence. Hereupon ſome row backward, ſome forward, in great confuſion. Adherbal findes and followes his aduantage, and forceth the Conſull into a Bay at hand, wherein he rangeth himſelfe, hauing the land on his back: hoping thereby to keepe himſelfe from being incompaſſed. But he was thereby, and for want of Sea-roome, ſo ſtreightned, as hee could not turne himſelfe any way from his enemies, nor range himſelfe in any order. Therefore when hee found no hope of reſiſtance, keeping the ſhore on his left hand, he thruſt out of the Bay with thirtie Gallies, beſides his owne, and ſo fled away: all the reſt of his fleete, to the number of ninetie and foure ſhips, were taken or ſunke by the Carthaginians. Adherbal for this ſeruice is greatly honoured at Carthage; and Claudius, for his indiſcretion and flight, as much diſgraced at Rome.

The Romans, notwithſtanding this great loſſe, arme threeſcore Gallies, with which they ſend away L. Iunius, their Conſull, to take charge of their buſineſſe in Sicil. Iunius arriues at Meſſana, where he meets with the whole remainder of the Roman fleet, thoſe excepted which rode in the Port of Lilybæum. One hundred and twentie Gallies he had; and beſides theſe, hee had gotten together almoſt eight hundred ſhips of burthen, which were laden with all neceſſarie prouiſions for the Armie. With this great fleet he arriues at Syracuſe, where he ſtaies a while; partly to take in corne; partly, to wait for ſome, that were too ſlow of ſaile, to keepe companie with him along from Meſſana. In the meane time, hee diſpatcheth away towards Lilybæum, his Quæſtors or Treaſurers; to whom he commits the one halfe of his victuallers, with ſome Gallies for their conuoy.

Adherbal was not careleſſe, after his late victorie: but ſtudied how to vſe it to the beſt aduantage. The ſhips and priſoners that he had taken, he ſent to Carthage. Of his owne Gallies hee deliuered thirtie to Carthalo, who had threeſcore and ten more vnder his owne charge; and ſent him to trie, what good might be done againſt the Roman fleet, in the Hauen of Lilybæum. According to this direction, Carthalo ſuddenly enters the mouth of that Hauen, where he findes the Romans, more attentiue to the keeping in of the beſieged Carthaginians, than to the defence of their owne againſt another fleet. So hee chargeth them, boords and takes ſome, and fires the reſt. The Roman Campe takes alarme, and haſtens to the reſcue. But Himilco, Gouernour of the Towne, is not behinde hand; who ſallies out at the ſame time, and putting the Romans in great diſtreſſe, giues Carthalo good leiſure to go through with his enterpriſe.

After this exploit, Carthalo ranne all along the South coaſt of Sicil, deuiſing how to worke miſchiefe to the enemie: wherein Fortune preſented him with a faire occaſion, which he wiſely managed. He was aduertiſed by his Scouts, that they had deſcried, neere at hand, a great fleet, conſiſting of all manner of Veſſells. Theſe were the victuallers, which the Conſull Iunius, more haſtily than prouidently, had ſent before him towards Lilybæum, Carthalo was glad to heare of their comming: for hee and his men were full of courage, by reaſon of their late victories. Accompting therefore the great multitude of Roman Hulks approching, to be rather a prey, than a fleet, likely to make ſtrong oppoſition, he haſtens to encounter them. It fell out according to his expectation. The Romans had no minde to fight: but were glad to ſeeke ſhelter in an open Road, full of rocks, vnder couert of a poore Towne, belonging to their partie; that could helpe to ſaue them only from the preſent danger, by lending them engines and other aide, wherewith to beat off the Carthaginians that aſſailed them. Carthalo therefore, hauing taken a few of them, lay waiting for the reſt, that could not long ride vnder thoſe rocks, but vvould be forced, by any great change of winde, either to put out into the deepe, or to saue their men, how they could, by taking land, with the losse of all their shipping. Whilest he was busied in this care; the Consull Iunius drew neere, and was discouered. Against him Carthalo makes out, and findes him altogether vnprepared to fight, as being wholly ignorant of that which had hapned. The Consull had neither meanes to flie, nor abilitie to fight. Therefore he likewise ran into a very dangerous Creeke; thinking no danger so great, as that of the enemie. The Carthaginian, seeing this, betakes him selfe to a Station betweene the two Roman fleets; where hee watcheth, to see which of them would first stirre, with a resolution to assault that, which should first dare to put it selfe into the Sea. So as now all the three fleets were on the South coast of Sicil, betweene the Promontorie of Pachinus and Lilybæum; a Tract exceeding dangerous, when the winde stormed at South. The Carthaginians, who knew the times of tempest, and their signes, finding (belike) some swelling billow (for so we doe in the West of England, before a Southerly storme) hasted to double the Cape of Pachinus, thereby to couer themselues from the rage at hand. But the Romans, who knew better how to fight, than how to Nauigate, and neuer found any foule weather in the entrailes of their beasts, their Soothsayers being all land-prophets, were suddenly ouer-taken with a boisterous South winde, and all their Gallies forced against the rocks, and vtterly wrackt.

This calamitie so discouraged the Romans, that they resolued againe to forsake the Seas, and trust onely to the seruice of their Legions vpon firme ground. But such a resolution cannot long hold. Either they must be strong at Sea, or else they must not make warre in an Iland, against those that haue a mightier fleet. Yet are they to be excused, in regard of the many great calamities which they had suffered, through their want of skill. Here I cannot forbeare to commend the patient vertue of the Spaniards. We seldome or neuer finde, that any Nation hath endured so many misaduentures and miseries, as the Spaniards haue done, in their Indian Discoueries. Yet persisting in their enterprises, with an inuincible constancie, they haue annexed to their Kingdome so many goodly Prouinces, as burie the remembrance of all dangers past. Tempests and shipwracks, famine, ouerthrowes, mutinies, heat and cold, pestilence, and all manner of diseases, both old and new, together with extreme pouertie, and want of all things needfull, haue beene the enemies, wherewith euery one of their most noble Discouerers, at one time or other, hath encountred. Many yeeres haue passed ouer some of their heads, in the search of not so many leagues: yea more then one or two, haue spent their labour, their wealth, and their liues, in search of a golden Kingdome, without getting further notice of it, than what they had at their first setting forth. All which notwithstanding, the third, fourth, and fift vndertakers, haue not beene disheartned. Surely, they are worthily rewarded with those Treasuries, and Paradises, which they enjoy; and well they deserue to hold them quietly, if they hinder not the like vertue in others, which (perhaps) will not be found.

§. XI.

§. XI.

The Citie of Eryx is surprized by the Romans, and recouered by AMILCAR; who stoutly holds warre with them fiue yeeres. The Romans hauing emptied their common treasurie, build a new fleet, at the charges of priuate men. The great victorie at Sea of LVCTATIVS the Consull; whereby the Carthaginians are forced to craue peace. The conditions of the peace betweene Rome and Carthage.

THE Romans were carefull, to supply with all industrie, by land, the want of strength at Sea. Therefore they continue the siege of Lilybæum, and seeke to make sure to themselues all places, whither the enemies ships could not bring relieſe. The Consull Iunius, to cure the wound of dishonour, which hee had receiued, bethought him what enterprise to vndertake. In the end hee resolued to attempt the Mountaine and Citie of Eryx, with the Temple of Venus Erycina: which was the faireſt and richeſt of all the Iland; and of theſe, by cunning or treason, hee got possession. Eryx was commodiously seated betweene Drepanum and Panormus; so that it seemed a fit place for a Garrison, that should restraine the Carthaginians from making roads into the Countrie. Wherefore Iunius fortified both the top of the Mountaine, and the first entrance of the passage from the bottome, (both which places were verie defencible) with a good strength of men. But shortly after, in the eighteenth yeere of this warre, the Carthaginians sent forth Amilcar, surnamed Barcas, Father of the great Hannibal, with a fleet and armie, who sailing to the coasts of Italie, did throughly repay the spoiles which the Romans made in Africa. For hee first of all wasted and destroied the Territories of the Locrines, and of the Brutians, that were dependants of Rome. Then entred hee into Sicil; and finding there no walled Citie in the Carthaginians power, that serued fitly to infeſt the Romans, hee occupied a peece of ground of great aduantage, and lodged his Armie thereon; to confront as well the Romans, that were in Panormus, as those that kept about Eryx, putting himselfe betweene both Armies with admirable resolution.

The place that Amilcar had seized vpon, was not only very strong by situation, but had the command of a Port: whereby it gaue him oportunitie, to scoure all the coast of Italie with his fleet, wasting all along as farre as to Cuma. In the Isle of Sicil hee held the Romans to hard worke: lying neere vnto Panormus, where in three yeeres abode hee did many notable acts, though not of much consequence, for that the enemie could neuer bee drawne to hazard the maine chance. Hauing wearied himselfe and the Romans long enough about Panormus, hee vndertooke a strange peece of worke at Eryx. The Roman Garrisons, placed there by Iunius, on the top, and at the bottome of the Mountaine, were very strongly lodged. Neuertheleſſe Amilcar found a way, lying towards the Sea-side, by which hee conueighed his men into the Citie of Eryx, that was about the middest of the ascent, ere the enemie knew of it. By this it came to passe, that the Romans which kept the top of the Mountaine, were streightly held (as it were) besieged. And no leſſe was Amilcar himselfe restrained, by both of theſe Garrisons, and such as came to relieue them. There he found them pastime about two yeeres more; hoping still to wearie out those that lay ouer his head, as they on the contrarie did their best, to thrust him out of those quarters.

At this time, all the care, both of the Romans and of the Carthaginians, was bent vnto the prosequuting of this businesse at Eryx. Wherein it seemes true (as Hannibal, in Liuie, spake vnto Scipio) that the affaires of Carthage neuer stood in better termes, since the beginning of the warre, than now they did. For whereas the Ro- mans had vtterly forſaken the Seas, partly by reaſon of their great loſſes; partly vpon confidence of their land-forces, which they held reſiſtleſſe; Amilcar, with a ſmall Armie, had ſo well acquited himſelfe, to the honour of his Countrie, that by the triall of fiue yeares warre, the Carthaginian Souldier was judged equall, if not ſuperiour to the Roman. Finally, when all, that might be, had beene deuiſed and gone, for the diſlodging of this obſtinate Warriour: no way ſeemed better to the Senate of Rome, than once againe to build a fleet; whereby, if the maſtrie of the Sea could once be gotten, it was likely that Amilcar, for lack of ſupply, ſhould not long be able to hold out. But in performing this, extreme difficultie was found. The common treaſurie was exhauſted: and the coſt was not little, that was requiſite vnto ſuch an enterpriſe. Wherefore there was none other way left, than to lay the burden vpon priuate purſes. Diuers of the principall Citizens vndertooke to build (each at his owne charges) one Quinquereme; which example wrought ſo well, that they, whoſe abilitie would not ſerue to doe the like, joyned with ſome others, and laying their monie together, cōcurred two or three of them, in building of another; with condition to be repaid, when the warre was finiſhed. By this voluntarie contribution, they made and furniſhed two hundred new Quinqueremes: taking for their patterne, that excellent ſwift-rowing Gallie which they had gotten from the Rhodian, in the Port of Lilybæum, as was ſhewed before. The charge of this fleet was committed to C. Luctatius Catulus; who paſt with the ſame into Sicil, the Spring following, and entred the Port of Drepanum, indeuouring by all meanes to haue forced the Citie. But being aduertiſed that the Carthaginian fleet was at hand, and being mindfull of the late loſſes which his Predeceſſours had receiued; he was carefull to put himſelfe in order, againſt their arriuall.

Hanno was Admirall of the Carthaginian fleet; a man (as his actions declare him) wiſe in picture, exceedingly formall, and skilfull in the arte of ſeeming reuerend. How his reputation was firſt bred, I doe not finde; but it was vp-held by a factious contradiction, of things vndertaken by men more worthie than himſelfe. This qualitie procured vnto him (as it hath done to many others) both good liking among the ancient ſort, whoſe cold temper is auerſe from new enterpriſes, and therewithall an opinion of great fore-ſight, confirmed by euery loſſe receiued. More particularly, hee was gracious among the people, for that hee was one of the moſt grieuous oppreſſours of their ſubject Prouinces; whereby he procured vnto the Carthaginians much wealth, but therewithall ſuch hatred, as turned it al to their great loſſe. Hee had ere this beene imployed againſt the Numidians, and wilde Africans, that were more like to Rouers, than to Souldiers, in making Warre. Of thoſe fugitiue Nations, hee learned to neglect more manly enemies, to his owne great diſhonour, and to the great hurt of Carthage; which loſt not more by his bad conduct, than by his malicious counſaile, when, hauing ſhewed himſelfe an vnworthie Captaine, he betooke himſelfe to the long Robe. Yet is hee much commended in Roman Hiſtories, as a temperate man, and one that ſtudied how to preſerue the League betweene Carthage and Rome. In which regard, how well hee deſerued of his owne Countrie, it will appeare hereafter: how beneficiall hee was to the Romans, it will appeare, both hereafter, and in his preſent voyage; wherein he reduced the Carthaginians to a miſerable neceſſitie of accepting, vpon hard conditions, that peace which he thence-forth commended.

Hanno had very well furniſhed his Nauie, with all needfull prouiſions for the Souldiers at Eryx: (for dexteritie in making preparation was the beſt of his qualities) but hee had neither beene carefull in trayning his Mariners, to the practice of Sea-fight, nor in manning his Gallies with ſtout fellowes. Hee thought, that the fame of a Carthaginian fleet was enough, to make the vnexpert Romans giue way: forgetting, that rather the reſiſtleſſe force of tempeſts, than any other ſtrength of oppoſition, had made them to forſake the Seas. Yet in one thing hee had either conceiued a-right, or elſe was ſent forth well inſtructed. It was his purpoſe, firſt of all to ſaile to Eryx, and there to diſcharge his ſhips of their lading: and hauing thus lightned himſelfe, he meant to take aboord ſome part of the Land-armie, together with Amilcar himſelfe, by whoſe helpe he doubted not, but that he ſhould be able to make the enemie repent of his new aduenture to Sea. This was a good courſe, if it could haue beene performed. But Catulus vſed all poſſible diligence, to preuent the execution of this deſigne: not becauſe hee was informed of the enemies purpoſe, but for that he knew it to be the beſt for them, and for that feared no danger ſo greatly, as to encounter with Amilcar. Wherefore although the weather was very rough, and the Seas went high, when the Carthaginian fleet was deſcried; yet he rather choſe to fight with the enemie, that had the winde of him, than to ſuffer this conuoy to paſſe along to Eryx, vpon vnlikely hope of better oportunitie in the future. All that Hanno ſhould haue done, Catulus had performed. Hee had carefully exerciſed his men in Rowing; hee had lightned his Gallies of all vnneceſſarie burthen; and hee had taken aboord the choice men of the Roman Land-ſouldiers. The Carthaginians therefore, at the firſt encounter, were vtterly broken and defeated; hauing fiftie of their Gallies ſtemmed and ſunke, and ſeuentie taken, wherein were few leſſe than ten thouſand men, that were all made priſoners: the reſt, by a ſudden change of winde, eſcaping to the Ile of Hieroneſus.

The ſtate of Carthage, vtterly diſcouraged by this change of fortune, knew not whereon to reſolue. Meanes to repaire their fleete in any time there were none left; their beſt men of warre by Sea were conſumed; and Amilcar, vpon whoſe valour and judgement the honour and ſafetie of the Common-weale reſted, was now ſurrounded by his enemies in Sicil, where hee could not bee relieued. In this extremitie, they make diſpatch vnto Amilcar himſelfe, and authorize him to take what courſe ſhould ſeeme beſt vnto his excellent wiſedome; leauing all concluſions to his election and ſole counſaile.

Amilcar, whom no aduerſitie, accompanied with the leaſt hope or poſſibilitie of recouerie, had euer vanquiſhed, looking ouer euery promiſe, true or falſe, that the preſent time could make him, (for to attend any thing from the future hee was not able) reſolued to make triall, whether his neceſſitie might bee compounded vpon any reaſonable termes. He therefore ſent to Lutatius the Conſull an Ouerture of peace: who conſidering it well, gathered ſo many arguments from the preſent pouertie of the Roman State, waſted beyond expectation in the former warre, that he willingly harkened vnto it. So, in concluſion, an accord was made, but with prouiſion, That it ſhould hold none otherwiſe, than if the Senate and People of Rome would ratifie it with their allowance.

The conditions were: Firſt, that the Carthaginians ſhould clearely abandon the Iſle of Sicil. Secondly, that they ſhould neuer vnder-take vpon Hieron King of Syracuſe, nor inuade any part of his Territories, nor the Territories of any of his Friends and Allies. Thirdly, that they ſhould ſet at libertie, and ſend back into Italie, all the Romans, whom they hold priſoners, without ranſome. Laſtly, that they ſhould pay vnto the Romans two thouſand and two hundred talents; which make, as the French reckon the talent, thirteene hundred and twentie thouſand crownes: the ſame to be deliuered within twentie yeeres next following.

Theſe Articles were ſent to Rome, where they were not throughly approued: but ten Commiſſioners were ſent into Sicil, to make perfect the agreement. Theſe Commiſſioners added a thouſand talents to the former ſumme; and required a ſhorter time of payment. Further alſo, they tooke order, that the Carthaginians ſhould not onely depart out of Sicil it ſelfe, but ſhould alſo with-draw their Companies out of all the other Ilands betweene it and Italie, renouncing their whole intereſt therein.

Such

Such was the end of the firſt Punick Warre; that had laſted about twentie foure yeares without intermiſſion; in which time the Romans had loſt, by fight or ſhipwrack, about ſeuen hundred Quinqueremes; and the Carthaginians, about fiue hundred: the greatneſſe of which loſſes, doth ſerue to proue the greatneſſe both of theſe two Cities, and of the Warre it ſelfe; wherein I hold good the judgement of Polybius, That the Romans, in generall, did ſhew themſelues the brauer Nation; and Amilcar, the moſt worthie Captaine.

CHAP. II.

Of diuers actions paſſing betweene the firſt and ſecond Punick Warres.

§. I.

Of the cruell warre begunne betweene the Carthaginians and their owne Mercinaries.

THE Romans, hauing partly by force, and partly by compoſition, thruſt the Carthaginians out of Sicil, and all the little Ilands thereunto adjacent, gaue them rather meanes and leiſure to helpe themſelues in a following warre, than cauſe to hold themſelues contented with the preſent peace. It is a true rule, Quòd leges à victoribus dicuntur, accipiuntur à victis; That lawes are giuen by the Conquerors, and receiued of the conquered. Q. curt. l. 4. But the Romans had either forgotten the anſwer that was made vnto them, by one of the Priuernates; or elſe had forgotten to follow it, in this waightie buſineſſe. For when one of Priuernum, after a rebellion, defending in the Senate the cauſe of his Citie, was demanded by a Senator, What peace the Romans might hope for, or aſſure themſelues of, if they quitted their preſent aduantage ouer them; he anſwered in theſe words, Si bonam dederitis, & fidam & perpetuam; ſi malam, haud diuturnam; If the peace be good and faithfull that you giue vs, it will be perpetuall; if it be ill, then of little continuance. To this anſwere, the Senate, at that time, gaue ſuch approbation, that it was ſaid, Viri & liberi vocem auditam; an credi poſſe, vllum populum, aut hominem dentq; in ea conditione, cuius eum pœniteat, diutius quàm neceſſe ſit manſurum? That it was the ſpeech of a manly, and a free man; for who could beleeue, that any people, or indeede any one man, would continue longer in an ouer-burdened eſtate, than meere neceſſitie did enforce? Now if the Romans themſelues could make this judgement, of thoſe Nations, who had little elſe, beſides their manly reſolution, to defend their libertie; ſurely, they groſly flattered themſelues, in preſuming, that the Carthaginians, who neither in power nor in pride, were any way inferiour vnto themſelues, would ſit downe any longer by the loſſe and diſhonour receiued, than vntill they could recouer their legs, and the ſtrength, which had a while failed them, to take reuenge. But Occaſion, by whom (while well entertained) not only priuate men, but Kings and publique States, haue more preuailed, than by any proper proweſſe or vertue; with-with-held the tempeſt from the Romans for a time, and turned it moſt fearefully vpon Africa, and the Carthaginians themſelues.

For after that the firſt Punick Warre was ended; Amilcar, leauing Eryx, went to Lilybæum, from whence moſt conueniently the Armie might be tranſported into Africk: the care of which buſineſſe he committed vnto Geſco, to whom, as to a man of approued ſufficiencie, he deliuered ouer his charge. Geſco had an eſpeciall conſideration of the great ſummes, wherein Carthage was indebted vnto theſe Mercinaries; and, withall, of the great diſabilitie to make paiment. Therefore he thought it the wiſeſt way, to ſend them ouer (as it were) by handfulls, a few at a time; that ſo the firſt might haue their diſpatch, and be gone, ere the ſecond or third Companies arriued. Herein hee dealt prouidently. For it had not beene hard to perſwade any ſmall number, lodged within ſo great a Citie as Carthage, vnto ſome ſuch reaſonable compoſition, as the preſent emptineſſe of the common Treaſurie did require: ſo that the firſt might haue beene friendly diſcharged, and a good preſident left vnto the ſecond and third, whileſt their deſiunction had made them vnable to recouer their whole due by force. But the Carthaginians were of a contrarie opinion. They thought to finde, in the whole Armie, ſome that would be contented to gratifie the Publique ſtate, by remitting a great part of their owne due: and hoped by ſuch an example, to draw all the multitude to the like agreement and capitulation. So they detayned the firſt and ſecond commers; telling them, that they would make an euen reckoning with all together. Thus euery day the number increaſed, and many diſorders (a thing incident among Souldiers) were committed; which much diſquieted the Citie, not accuſtomed vnto the like. In this regard it was thought fit, to remoue them all to ſome other place where they might be leſſe troubleſome. This muſt be done by ſome colourable words of perſwaſion: for their number was alreadie ſo great, that it was not ſafe to offend them too farre. Wherefore it is deuiſed, that they ſhould all attend the comming of their fellowes, at Sicca: receiuing euery one a peece of gold, to beare his charges in the meane while. This motion is accepted, and the Souldiers beginne to diſlodge; leauing behinde them their wiues, their children, and all their baggage, as meaning ſhortly to fetch away all, when they came back for their pay. But the Carthaginians haue no fancie to their returning into the Towne; and therefore compell them to truſſe vp their fardells, that they might haue none occaſion left, to make any errands thither. So to Sicca they remoued, with all their goods; and there lay waiting for newes of their fellowes arriuall, and their owne pay. Buſineſſe they had none to doe, and therfore might eaſily be drawne to mutinie: the whole argument of their diſcourſe inclining them to nothing elſe. Their daily talke was, how rich they ſhould be, when all their mony came in; how much would fall to euery ſingle ſhare; and for how long time the Citie was behinde hand with them in reckoning. They were all growne Arithmeticians; and hee was thought a man of worth, that could finde moſt reaſon to increaſe their demands, to the very higheſt, euen beyond their due. No part of their long ſeruice was forgotten; but the comfortable words and promiſes of their Captaines, leading them forth to any dangerous fight, were called to minde, as ſo many obligations, not to be cancelled, without ſatisfying their expectation by ſome vnordinarie largeſſe.

Thus the time paſſeth away; vntill the whole Armie being arriued, and lodged in Sicca, Hanno comes thither to cleare the accompt. Now is the day come, wherein they ſhall all be made rich; eſpecially if they can hold together, in maintaining ſtoutly the common cauſe. So thinke they all; and aſſemble themſelues to heare what good newes this meſſenger had brought: with a a full reſolution to helpe his memorie, in caſe he ſhould happen to forget any part of the many promiſes made vnto them; all which were to be conſidered in their Donatiue. Hanno begins a verie formall Oration; wherein he bewailes the pouertie of Carthage; tells them, how great a ſumme of mony is to be paid vnto the Romans, reckons vp the exceſſiue charges, charges, whereat the common-wealth had beene in the late warre; and finally deſires them to hold themſelues contented with part of their pay, and out of the loue which they bare vnto the Citie, to remit the reſt. Few of them vnderſtood his diſcourſe: for the Carthaginian Armie was compoſed of ſundry Nations, as Greekes, Africans, Gaules, Ligurians, Spaniards, and others, all of different languages. Yet they ſtared vpon him, and were (as I thinke) little pleaſed with his very geſture. But when ſuch, as conceiued the whole tenour of his ſpeech, had informed the reſt what cold comfort he brought; they were all enraged, and fared like mad men, ſo that nothing would ſerue to appeaſe them. Hanno would faine haue aſſwaged their furie, but he knew not how: for hee leſſe vnderſtood their diſſonant lowde noiſes, than they did his Oration. An Armie collected out of many countries, that haue no one language common to all, or to the greater part of them, is neither eaſily ſtirred vp to mutinie, nor eaſily pacified, when once it is broken into outrage. The beſt that Hanno can doe, is to vſe the helpe of Interpreters, and meſſengers. But theſe Interpreters miſtake his meaning; ſome, for want of skill; others, of ſet purpoſe; and ſuch as deliuer his errandes in the worſt ſenſe, are beſt beleeued. Finally, they thinke themſelues much abuſed by the Carthaginians, and reſolue to demand their owne in peremptorie termes, at a neerer diſtance. In this moode they leaue Sicca, and march as farre as Tunis, that is within a little of Carthage, and there they incampe.

Now begin the Carthaginians to find their one errour. It is a good rule,

Curandum inprimis, ne magna iniuria fiat
Fortibus & miſeris.

Haue ſpeciall care, that valiant pouertie
Be not oppreſt with too great iniurie.

But this proud citie, hauing neglected the rule, hath alſo beene careleſſe in prouiding to ſecure her ſelfe againſt the inconuenience that might followe. She had ſuffered the whole multitude, whereunto ſhee was like to giue cauſe of diſcontent, to ioyne it ſelfe into one bodie, when the ſeuerall troupes might eaſily haue beene diſperſed: ſhee hath turned out of her gates the wiues, children, and goods of theſe poore men, which had ſhee retained in ſhew of kindneſſe, ſhee might haue vſed them as Hoſtages, for her owne ſafetie; and by imploying a miſerable pennie-father, in her negotiation with men of warre, ſhee hath weakened the reputation of her braueſt Captaines, that might beſt haue ſerued to free her from the threatning danger. Yet likely enough it is, that Amilcar had no deſire to be vſed as an inſtrumẽt in defrauding his owne ſouldiours of their wages: epecially conſidering, that as he beſt could beare witneſſe of their merits, ſo was hee not ignorant, that meanes to content them were not wanting, if the Citizens had beene willing thereunto. Hereto may be added a probable coniecture, that Hanno, with his complices, who at this very time was a bitter enemie to Amilcar, had the boldneſſe to impoſe the blame of his owne wretched counſaile, vpon the liberall promiſes made by the Captaines. Amilcar therefore did wiſely, in ſuffering thoſe that maligned him, to haue the managing of their own plot, and to deale the cards which themſelues had ſhuffled. This they continue to doe as fooliſhly, as they had at firſt begun. They furniſh a market at Tunis, for the ſouldiours; whom they ſuffer to buy what they liſt, and at what price they liſt. They ſend euer and anon ſome of their Senatours into the Campe; who promiſe to ſatisfie all demands, as farre forth as it ſhould be poſſible. And thus by ſhifting from one extreme to another, they make the ſouldiours vnderſtand, into what feare the City was driuen; which cannot but adde much inſolency to the paſſions alreadie ſtirred vp.

Armie, which thereupon growes wise, and finding the season fit, labours to make a great harueſt. Monie must be had, and without any abatement. This is granted. Many haue loſt their horſes, in publique ſeruice of the ſtate. The ſtate ſhall pay for them. They had liued ſome yeares, by making hard ſhift, without receiuing their allowance of victualls from Carthage. If they had liued, they wanted not meat; therefore what was this to the Carthaginians? Was it not all one, whether the ſhips did bring in prouiſion; or their Captaine direct them where to fetch it? But this would not ſerue. They ſaid that they had beene ſometimes driuen to buy; and that (ſince they could not remember, how much, or at what rate they bought) they would be paid for their prouiſion, during the whole time, and according to the deareſt price that wheat had borne, whileſt the warre laſted. Such are now the demands of theſe Mutiners; who might eaſily haue beene ſatiſfied with farre leſſe charges, and farre more honour, by receiuing their due at the firſt. But now they make none end of craving. For whileſt the Carthaginians are perplexed, about this corne-monie; the Souldiers haue deuiſed many more tricks, whereby to extort a greater ſumme of monie, without all regard of ſhame. Since therefore no good end could bee found of theſe controuerſies which daily did multiply, it was thought conuenient, that one of the Carthaginians, which had commanded in Sicil, ſhould be choſen by the Souldiers, to reconcile all differences. Hereunto the Armie condeſcended, and made choiſe of Geſco: partly out of good liking to him, who had ſhewed himſelfe at all times a friendly man to them, and careful of their good, eſpecially when they were to be tranſported into Africk: partly out of a diſlike which they had conceiued of Amilcar; for that he had not viſited them in all this buſie time. So Geſco comes among them; and, to pleaſe them the better, comes not without monie: which might giue better countenance to his proceedings, than barren eloquence had done to the negotiation of Hanno. Hee calles vnto him firſt of all, the Captaines, and then, the ſeuerall Nations apart; rebuking them gently for that which had paſſed; aduiſing them temperatly concerning the preſent; and exhorting them to continue their loue vnto the State, which had long entertained them, and would alwaies be mindfull of their good ſeruices. After this he beganne to put hand to his purſe: offering to giue them their whole paie in hand; and then after to conſider of other recknonings, at a more conuenient time. This had beene well accepted, and might haue ſerued to bring all to a quiet paſſe; if two ſeditious ringleaders of the multitude had not ſtood againſt it.

There was in the Campe one Spendius, a ſturdie fellowe, and audacious, but a ſlaue; that in the late warre had fled from a Roman whom hee ſerued, and therefore ſtood in feare, leſt he ſhould be deliuered backe to his Maſter; at whoſe hands he could expect no leſſe, than to be whipt and crucified. This wretch could finde no better way to prolong his owne life, than by raiſing ſuch troubles as might ſerue to withdraw men from care of priuate matters, and make his owne reſtitution impoſſible, were his Maſter neuer ſo importunate. With Spendius there aſſociated himſelfe one Matho; an hote-headed man, that had beene ſo forward in ſtirring vp the tumult, as hee could not chooſe but feare, leſt his owne death ſhould bee made an example, to deterre others from the like ſeditious behauiour. This Matho deales with his Countrimen, the Africans; telling them, that they were in farre worſe condition, than either the Gaules, the Greekes, the Spaniards, or any forreyne mercinaries. For (ſaith he) theſe our companions haue no more to doe, than to receiue their wages, and ſo get them gone: but wee, that are to ſtay behinde in Africa, ſhall be called to another manner of accompt, when wee are left alone; ſo that we ſhall haue cauſe to wiſh, that wee had returned home beggers, rather than loaden with the monie, which (little though it be) ſhall breake our backes. Yee are not ignorant, how tyrannically theſe our haughtie Maſters of CARTHAGE doe reigne ouer vs. They thinke it reaſonable, that our liues and goods ſhould be at their diſpoſition; which they haue at other times beene accuſtomed to take away from vs, euen without apparent cauſe, as it were to declare declare their Souereigntie: what will they now doe, seeing that we haue demeaned our selues as free men, and beene bold to set a good face on the matter, demanding our owne, as others haue done? Ye all doe know, that it were a very shame for vs, if hauing beene as forward in euerie danger of warre, as any other men, we should now stand quaking like slaues, and not dare to open our mouthes, when others take libertie to require their due. This notwithstanding yee may assure your selues, that we are like to be taught better manners, as soone as our fellowes are gone: in regard of whom they are contented to shadow their indignation with a good, but a forced countenance. Let vs therefore be wise; and consider, that they hate and feare vs. Their hatred will shew it selfe, when their feare is once past: vnlesse wee now take our time, and, whilest we are the stronger, enfeeble them so greatlie, that their hatred shal not be able to doe vs wrong. All their strength consisteth in monie, wherewithall they haue hired others against vs, and vs against others. At the present they haue neither monie nor friends. The best Armie that euer serued them, whereof wee are no small part, lies at their gates, readie to helpe vs if we be men. A better opportunitie cannot be expected: for were our swords once drawne, all AFRICK would rise on our side. As for the CARTHAGINIANS, whither can they send for helpe? The case it selfe is plaine: but we must quickely resolue. Either we must preuent the diligence of GESCO, by incensing these GAVLES and SPANIARDES, and procuring them to drawe bloud, or else it behoueth vs to please our good masters, by ioyning with them against our fellowes, yea by offering to forgiue vnto them all our wages, if so (peraduenture) they may be wonne to forgiue vs, or not ouercruelly to punish our faults already committed. Hee is worthily a wretched slaue, that neither hath care to winne his Masters loue, nor courage to attempt his owne libertie.

By such perswasions Matho winnes the African souldiers to his owne purpose. They are not now so greedie of monie, as of qurraell; which hee that seekes, will not misse to finde. When Gesco therefore offered to pay them their whole stipend presently, but referred their other demandes, for horses and victuailes to some other more conuenient time; they breake into great outrage, and say that they will haue all, euen all at once, and that out of hand. In this tumult, the whole Armie flocke together about Matho and Spendius; whose diligence is not wanting, to adde more fuell to the fire alreadie blazing. Matho and Spendius are the onely men to whom the souldiours will hearken: if any other stand vp to make a speech, a showre of stones, flying about his eares, puts him to silence, that hee shall neuer afterwards speake word more. Neither stay they to consider what it is that any man would say: enough hath beene said alreadie by these good spokesmen; so that no other word (though perhaps to the same purpose) can bee heard, saue onely throwe, throwe.

Now the Rebellion beginnes to take forme. Matho and Spendius are chosen Captaines; who, followed by a desperate crue of Ruffians, will suffer no man to make his owne peace, but pursue their owne ends, vnder faire pretence of the common cause. All which notwithstanding, Gesco is not wanting to the good of his countrie, but aduentures himselfe vpon their furie. One while hee deales with the Captaines, and other principall men; taking them by the hand, and giuing gentle words: another while hee workes with the seuerall Nations; putting them all in hope of their owne hearts desire, if any reason would content them. None of them are so sullen as the Africans: indeed none of them had so good cause. They require him peremptorilie, to giue them their owne, and not to feed them with wordes. The truth is, that they are not so couetous as they seeme: but will be more glad of an ill answere, then of a good payment. This is more then Gesco knowes: he sees not that Matho hath, any more then bare words, to bestow vpon them. Wherefore, as rebuking their inconsiderate heat, he telles them, That they may doe well, if they stand in want of monie, to seeke it of their Captaine, Matho. This is enough. Shall he both defraud them & deride them? They stay no longer, but lay violent hands vpon the treasure that he had brought; yea vpon him also, and al that are with him:

as intending to take this in part of paiment, and, for the reſt, to take another courſe. Matho and Spendius are glad of this. It had little pleaſed them to ſee their fellowes beginne to grow calme, by his faire language: wherefore they caſt into bonds both him, and all the Carthaginians that they can finde; that ſo the Armie may be freed from danger of good admonition, which they call Treaſon. After this followes open warre. Matho ſollicites all Africk; and his Embaſſadours are euerie where well entertained. Neither is it needefull to vſe perſwaſion: the very fame of this rebellion ſufficeth to drawe the whole countrie into it. Now muſt the Carthaginians bee plagued for thoſe oppreſſions, with which they haue plagued others. It is true that aduerſitie hath neuer beene vntold of her errours: and as ſhe is euer aſſured to heare her owne, ſo commonly with her owne ſhee vndergoes thoſe of other men. The Africans, finding the Carthaginians hang vnder the wheele, tell them boldly, that their Impoſitions were mercileſſe; that they tooke from them the one halfe of their corne; that they doubled their tributes in al things elſe; and that they inflicted vpon their vaſſals the greateſt puniſhments for the leaſt offences. Theſe cruelties the Carthaginians themſelues haue forgotten: but the people, that haue ſuffered ſo much, retaine all in perfect memorie. Wherefore not onely ſuch as can beare armes, are ready to doe ſeruice in this great Commotion; but the very women bring forth their iewels, and other ornaments, offering all to ſale for maintenance of ſo iuſt a quarrell. By this great forwardneſſe, and liberall contribution, Matho and Spendius are ſupplied with a ſtrong aide of threeſcore and tenne thouſand Africans: and are moreouer furniſhed with monie, not onely to ſatisfie the preſent appetite of their men, but ſufficient to continue the warre begun, though it ſhould be of long endurance.

§. II.

Diuers obſeruations vpon this warre with the mercinaries.

†. I.

Of Tyrannie, and how tyrants are driuen to vſe helpe of mercinaries.

HEre let vs reſt awhile, as in a conuenient breathing place: whence wee may take proſpect of the ſubiect, ouer which we trauaile. Behold a tyrannicall Citie, perſecuted by her owne mercinaries with a deadly warre. It is a common thing, as being almoſt neceſſarie, that a tyrannie ſhould bee vpheld by mercinarie forces: it is common that mercinaries ſhould be falſe: and it is common, that all warre made againſt Tyrants, ſhould be exceeding full of hate and crueltie. Yet wee ſeldome heare, that the ruine of a Tyrannie is procured or ſought, by thoſe that were hired to maintaine the power of it: and ſeldome or neuer doe we reade of any warre, that hath beene proſecuted with ſuch inexpiable hatred, as this that is now in hand.

That which we properly call Tyrannie, is A violent forme of gouernment, not reſpecting the good of the ſubiect, but onely the pleaſure of the Commander. I purpoſely forbeare to ſay, that it is the vniuſt rule of one ouer many: for verie truely doth Cleon in Thucydides tell the Athenians, that their dominion ouer their ſubiects, was none other than a meere tyranny; though it were ſo, that they themſelues were

were a great Citie, and a popular eſtate. Neither is it peraduenture greatly needefull, that I ſhould call this forme of commanding, violent: ſince it may well and eaſily bee conceiued, that no man willingly performes obedience, to one regardleſſe of his life and welfare; vnleſſe himſelfe bee either a mad man, or (which is little better) wholly poſſeſſed with ſome extreme paſſion of loue. The practice of tyrannie, is not alwaies of a like extremitie: for ſome Lords are more gentle, than others, to their very ſlaues; and he that is moſt cruell to ſome, is milde enough towards others, though it be but for his owne aduantage. Neuertheleſſe, in large Dominions, wherein the Rulers diſcretion cannot extend it ſelfe, vnto notice of the difference which might bee found betweene the worth of ſeuerall men; it is commonly ſeene, that the taſte of ſweetneſſe, drawne out of oppreſſion, hath ſo good a reliſh, as continually inflames the Tyrants appetite, and will not ſuffer it to bee reſtrained with any limits of reſpect. Why ſhould he ſeeke out bounds, to preſcribe vnto his deſires, who cannot endure the face of one ſo honeſt, as may put him in remembrance of any moderation? It is much that hee hath gotten, by extorting from ſome few: by ſparing none, hee ſhould haue riches in goodly aboundance. He hath taken a great deale from euery one: but euery one could haue ſpared more. He hath wrung all their purſes, and now he hath enough: but (as Couetouſneſſe is neuer ſatisfied) he thinkes that all this is too little for a ſtock, though it were indeede a good yearely Income. Therefore he deuiſeth new tricks of robberie, and is not better pleaſed with the gaines, then with the Art of getting. He is hated for this; and he knowes it well: but hee thinkes by crueltie to change hatred into feare. So he makes it his exerciſe, to torment and murder all, whom he ſuſpecteth: in which courſe, if he ſuſpect none vnjuſtly, he may be ſaid to deale craftily; but if Innocency be not ſafe, how can all this make any Conſpiratour to ſtand in feare, ſince the Traitor is no worſe rewarded, than the quiet man? Whereforehee can thinke vpon none other ſecuritie, than to diſarme all his Subiects; to fortifie himſelfe within ſome ſtrong place; and for defence of his Perſon and ſtate, to hire as many luſtie Souldiers as ſhall be thought ſufficient. Theſe muſt not bee of his owne Countrie: for if not euery one, yet ſome one or other might chance to haue a feeling of the publique miſerie. This conſidered, he allures vnto him a deſperate rabble of ſtrangers, the moſt vnhoneſt that can bee found; ſuch as haue neither wealth nor credit at home, and will therefore be careful to ſupport him, by whoſe onely fauour they are maintained. Now leſt any of theſe, either by deteſtation of his wickedneſſe, or (which in wicked men is moſt likely) by promiſe of greater reward, than he doth giue, ſhould be drawne to turne his ſword againſt the Tyrant himſelfe: they ſhall all be permitted to doe as he doth; to robbe, to rauiſh, to murder, and to ſatisfie their owne appetites, in moſt outragious manner; being thought ſo much the more aſſured to their Maſter, by how much the more he ſees them grow hatefull to all men elſe. Conſidering in what Age, and in what Language I write; I muſt be faine to ſay, that theſe are not dreames: though ſome Engliſh-man perhaps that were vnacquainted with Hiſtorie, lighting vpon this leafe, might ſuppoſe this diſcourſe to be little better. This is to ſhew, both how tyrannie growes to ſtand in need of mercinarie Souldiers, and how thoſe Mercinaries are, by mutuall obligation, firmely aſſured vnto the Tyrant.

†. II.

That the tyrannie of a Citie ouer her Subiects is worse, than the tyrannie of one man: and that a tyrannicall Citie must likewise vse mercinary Souldiers.

NOw concerning the tyrannie, wherewith a Citie or State oppresseth her Subjects; it may appeare some waies to be more moderate, then that of one man: but in many things it is more intolerable. A Citie is jelous of her Dominion; but not (as is one man) fearefull of her life: the lesse neede hath shee therefore, to secure her selfe by crueltie. A Citie is not luxurious in consuming her treasures; and therefore needes the lesse, to pluck from her Subiects. If warre, or any other great occasion, driue her to necessitie, of taking from her Subiects more than ordinarie summes of monie: the same necessitie makes either the contribution easie, or the taking excusable. Indeede, no wrongs are so grieuous and hatefull, as those that are insolent. Remember (saith Caligula the Emperor, to his Grand-mother Antonia) that I may doe what I list, and to whom I list: these wordes were accounted horrible, though he did her no harme. And Iuuenal reckons it, as the complement of all torments, inflicted by a cruell Roman Dame vpon her slaues; that whilest shee was whipping them, she painted her face, talked with her Gossips, and vsed all signes of neglecting what those wretches felt. Now seeing that the greatest grieuances wherwith a domineering State offendeth her Subiects, are free from all sence of indignitie: likely it is, that they will not extremely hate her, although desire of libertie make them wearie of her Empire. In these respects it is not needefull, that shee should keepe a Guard of licentious cut-throtes, and maintaine them in all villanie, as a Dionysius or Agathocles must doe: her owne Citizens are able to terrifie, and to hold perforce in obedience, all male-contents. These things, considered alone by themselues, may serue to proue, That a Citie is scarce able to deserue the name of a Tyranne, in the proper signification.

All this notwithstanding, it shall appeare, That the miseries, wherewith a Tyrant lodeth his people, are not so heauie, as the burdens imposed by a cruel Citie. Not without some apparance of truth, it may be said, that Lust, and many other priuate passions, are no way incident to a Citie or Corporation. But to make this good, wee shall haue neede to vse the helpe of such distinctions, as the Argument in hand doth not require. Was not Rome lasciuious, when Cato was faine to rise and leaue the Theater, to the end, that the reuerend regard of his grauitie, might not hinder the people, from calling for a shew of naked Courtisans, that were to be brought vpon the open stage? By common practice, & generall approued custome, we are to censure the quality of a whole State; not by the priuate vertue or vice of any one man; nor by metaphysicall abstraction of the vniuersall from the singular; or of the Corporation, from those of whom it is compounded. I say therefore (as I haue said elsewhere) That it were better to liue vnder one pernicious Tyrant, then vnder many thousands. The reasons, prouing this, are too many to set downe: but few may suffice. The desires of one man, how inordinate soeuer, if they cannot be satisfied, yet they may be wearied; he is not able to search all corners; his humour may be found, and soothed; age or good aduice, yea, or some vnexpected accident, may reforme him: all which failing, yet is there hope, that his successour may proue better. Many Tyrants haue beene changed into worthie Kings: and many haue ill vsed their ill-gotten Dominion, which becomming hereditarie to their posteritie, hath growne into the most excellent forme of Gouernment, euen a lawfull Monarchie. But they that liue vnder a tyrannicall Citie, haue no such hope: their Mistresse is immortall, and will not slacken the reines, vntill they bee pulled out of her hands; and her owne mouth receiue the bridle of a more mightie Chariotier. This is wofull: yet their present sufferings make them lesse mindefull of the future. New flies, and hungrie ones, fall vpon the ſame ſore, out of which, others had alreadie ſucked their fill. A new Gouernour comes yearly among them, attended by all his poore kindred and friends, who meane not to returne home emptie to their hiues, without a good lading of waxe and honie. Theſe flie into all quarters, and are quickly acquainted with euery mans wealth, or whatſoeuer elſe, in all the Prouince, is worthie to be deſired. They know all a mans enemies, and all his feares: becomming themſelues, within a little ſpace, the enemies that he feareth moſt. To grow into acquaintance with theſe maſterfull gueſts, in hope to win their friendſhip, were an endleſſe labour (yet it muſt be vnder-gone) and ſuch as euery one hath not meanes to goe about: but were this effected, what auaileth it? The loue of one Gouernour is purchaſed with gifts: the Succeſſour of this man, he is more louing than could be wiſhed, in reſpect of a faire Wife or Daughter: then comes the third, perhaps of the contrarie faction at home, a bitter enemie to both his fore-goers, who ſeekes the ruine of all that haue beene inward with them. So the miſeries of this tyrannie are not ſimple; but interlaced (as it were) with the calamities of ciuill warre. The Romans had a Law De Repetundis, or Of Recouerie, againſt extorting Magiſtrates: yet wee finde, that it ſerued not wholly to reſtraine their Prouinciall Gouernours; who preſuming on the fauour of their owne Citizens, and of their kindred and friends at home, were bold in their Prouinces, to worke all theſe enormities rehearſed; though ſomewhat the more ſparingly, for feare of judgement. If the ſubjects of Rome groned vnder ſuch oppreſſions; what muſt we thinke of thoſe, that were vaſſalls vnto Carthage? The Romans impoſed no burthenſome tributes; they loued not to heare, that their Empire was grieuous; they condemned many noble Citizens, for hauing beene ill Gouernours. At Carthage all went quite contrarie: the rapines newly deuiſed by one Magiſtrate, ſerued as preſidents to inſtruct another; euery man reſolued to doe the like, when it ſhould fall to his turne; and he was held a notable Stateſman, whoſe robberies had beene ſuch, as might affoord a good ſhare to the common treaſure. Particular examples of this Carthaginian practice, are not extant: the gouernement of Verres the Roman, in Sicil, that is liuely ſet out by Tullie, may ſerue to informe vs, what was the demeanour of theſe Punick Rulers, who ſtood in feare of no ſuch condemnation, as Verres vnder-went. By proſequuting this diſcourſe, I might inferre a more generall Propoſition; That a Citie cannot gouerne her ſubject Prouinces ſo mildly, as a King: but it is enough to haue ſhewed, That the tyrannie of a Citie is farre more intolerable, than that of any one moſt wicked man.

Suteable to the crueltie of ſuch Lords, is the hatred of their ſubjects: and againe, ſuteable to the hatred of the ſubjects, is the jealouſie of their Lords. Hence it followed, that, in warres abroad, the Carthaginians durſt vſe the ſeruice of African ſouldiers; in Africk it ſelfe, they had rather bee beholding to others, that were farther fetcht. For the ſame purpoſe did Hannibal, in the ſecond Punick Warre, ſhift his mercinaries out of their owne Countries; Vt Afri in Hiſpaniâ, Hiſpani in Africâ, melior procul ab domo futurus vterq; miles, velut mutuis pignoribus obligati ſtipendia facerent; That the Africans might ſerue in Spaine, the Spaniards in Africk, being each of them like to proue the better Souldiers, the farther they were from home, as if they were obliged by mutuall pledges. Liu. Dec. 3. l. 1. It is diſputable, I confeſſe, whether theſe African, and Spaniſh hirelings, could properly be termed Mercinaries: for they were ſubiect vnto Carthage, and carried into the field, not only by reward, but by dutie. Yet ſeeing their dutie was no better than enforced, and that it was not any loue to the State, but meere deſire of gaine, that made them fight; I will not nicely ſtand vpon proprietie of a word, but hold them, as Polybius alſo doth, no better than Mercinaries.

†. III.

The dangers growing from the vse of mercinarie Souldiers, and forraigne Auxiliaries.

THe extreme danger, growing from the imploiment of such Souldiers, is well obserued by Machiauel: who sheweth, that they are more terrible to those whom they serue, than to those against whom they serue. They are seditious, vnfaithfull, disobedient, deuourers, and destroiers of all places and countries, whereinto they are drawne; as being held by no other bond, than their owne commoditie. Yea, that which is most fearefull among such hirelings, is, that they haue often, and in time of greatest extremitie, not only refused to fight, in their defence, who haue entertained them, but reuolted vnto the contrarie part; to the vtter ruine of those Princes and States, that haue trusted them. These Mercinaries (saith Machiauel) which filled all Italie, when Charles the eighth of France did passe the Alpes, were the cause that the said French King wonne the Realme of Naples, with his Buckler without a sword. Notable was the example of Sforza, the Father of Francis Sforza, Duke of Millan; who being entertained by Queene Ioane of Naples, abandoned her seruice on the sudden; and forced her to put her selfe into the hands of the King of Arragon. Like vnto his father was Francis Sforza, the first of that race Duke of Millan: who, being entertained by the Millanois, forced them to become his slaues; euen with the same Armie which themselues had leuied for their owne defence. But Lodouick Sforza, the sonne of this Francis, by the just judgement of God, was made a memorable example vnto posteritie, in loosing his whole estate by the trecherie of such faithlesse Mercinaries, as his owne father had beene. For, hauing waged an Armie of Switzers, and committed his Duchie, together with his person, into their hands; he was by them deliuered vp vnto his enemie the French King, by whom he was inclosed in the Castle of Loches to his dying day.

The like inconuenience is found, in vsing the helpe of forraigne Auxiliaries. We see, that when the Emperor of Constantinople had hired ten thousand Turkes, against his neighbour Princes; he could neuer, either by perswasion or force, set them againe ouer Sea vpon Asia side: which gaue beginning to the Christian seruitude, that soone after followed. Alexander, the sonne of Cassander, sought aide of the great Demetrius: but Demetrius, being entred into his Kingdome, slue the same Alexander, who had inuited him, and made himselfe King of Macedon. Syracon the Turke was called into Ægypt by Sanar the Soldan, against his Opposite: but this Turke did settle himselfe so surely in Ægypt, that Saladine his Successour became Lord thereof; and of all the holy Land, soone after. What neede we looke about for examples of this kinde? Euery Kingdome, in effect, can furnish vs. The Britaines drew the Saxons into this our Countrie; and Mac Murrough drew the English into Ireland: but the one and the other soone became Lords of those two Kingdomes.

Against all this may be alleadged, the good successe of the vnited Prouinces of the Netherlands, vsing none other than such kinde of Souldiers, in their late warre. Indeede these Low Countries haue many goodly and strong Cities, filled with Inhabitants that are wealthie, industrious, and valiant in their kinde. They are stout Seamen, and therein is their excellencie; neither are they bad, at the defence of a place well fortified: but in open field they haue seldome beene able to stand against the Spaniard. Necessitie therefore compelled them to seeke helpe abroad: and the like necessitie made them forbeare to arme any great numbers of their owne. For, with monie raised by their Trade, they maintained the warre: and therefore could ill spare, vnto the Pike and Musket, those hands, that were of more vse in helping to fill the common purse. Yet what of this? they sped well. Surely they sped as ill as might might be, whileſt they had none other than mercinarie Souldiers. Many fruitleſſe attemps, made by the Prince of Orange, can witneſſe it: and that braue Commander, Count Lodowick of Naſſau, felt it to his griefe, in his retrait from Groeninghen; when in the very inſtant, that required their ſeruice in fight, his mercinaries cried out aloud for monie, and ſo ranne away. This was not the only time, when the hired ſouldiers of the States, haue either ſought to hide their cowardize vnder a ſhew of greedineſſe; or at leaſt, by meere couetouſneſſe, haue ruined in one houre the labour of many moneths. I will not ſtand to proue this by many examples: for they themſelues will not deny it. Neither would I touch the honour of Monſieur the Duke of Anion, brother to the French King; ſaue that it is follie to conceale what all the world knowes. He that would lay open the danger of forraine Auxiliaries, needeth no better patterne. It is commonly found, that ſuch Aiders make themſelues Lords ouer thoſe, to whom they lend their ſuccour: but where ſhall we meet with ſuch another as this Monſieur, who, for his protection promiſed, being rewarded with the Lordſhip of the Countrie, made it his firſt worke, to thruſt by violence a galling yoke vpon the peoples neck? Well, hee liued to repent it, with griefe enough. Euen whileſt he was counterfeiting vnto thoſe about him, that were ignorant of his plot, an imaginarie ſorrow for the poore Burghers of Antwerpe, as verily beleeuing the Towne to bee ſurpriſed and wonne; the death of the Count S^r. Aignan, who fell ouer the wall, and the Cannon of the Citie, diſcharged againſt his owne troupes, informed him better what had hapned; ſhewing that they were his owne French, who ſtood in neede of pittie. Then was his fained paſſion changed, into a very bitter anguiſh of minde; wherein, ſmiting his breſt, and wringing his hands, he exclaimed, Helas, mon Dieu, que veulx tu faire de moy; Alas, my God, what wilt thou doe with me? So the affaires of the Netherlands will not ſerue to proue, that there is litle danger in vſing mercinarie ſouldiers, or the help of forraine Auxiliaries. This notwithſtanding they were obedient vnto neceſſitie, and ſought helpe of the Engliſh, Scots, and French: wherein they did wiſely, and proſpered. For when there was in France a King, partaker with them in the ſame danger; when the Queen of England refuſed to accept the Soueraigntie of their Countrie, which they offered, yet being prouoked by the Spaniard their enemie, purſued him with continuall warre; when the heire of England raigned in Scotland, a King too juſt and wiſe (though not ingaged in any quarrell) either to make profit of his Neighbours miſeries, or to helpe thoſe that had attempted the conqueſt of his owne inheritance: then might the Netherlanders very ſafely repoſe confidence, in the forces of theſe their Neighbour-Countries. The ſouldiers that came vnto them from hence, were (to omit many other commendations) not onely regardfull of the pay that they ſhould receiue; but well affected vnto the cauſe that they tooke in hand: or if any were cold in his deuotion, to the ſide whereon he fought; yet was he kept in order, by remembrance of his owne home, where the Engliſh would haue rewarded him with death, if his faith had beene corrupted by the Spaniard. They were therefore truſted with the cuſtodie of Cities; they were held as friends, and patrons; the neceſſitie of the poorer ſort was relieued, before the pay-day came, with lendings, and other helps, as well as the abilitie of the States could permit. When three ſuch Princes, raigning at one time, ſhall agree ſo well, to maintaine againſt the power of a fourth, injurious (or at leaſt ſo ſeeming) to them all, a Neighbour-Countrie, of the ſame Religion, and to which they all are louingly affected: then may ſuch a Countrie be ſecure of her Auxiliaries, and quietly intend her Trade, or other buſineſſe, in hope of like ſucceſſe. But theſe circumſtances meet ſo ſeldome, as it may well hold true in generall: That mercinarie, and forraigne auxiliarie forces, are no leſſe dangerous, than the enemie, againſt whom they are entertained.

That the moderate gouernment of the Romans gaue them assurance to vse the seruice of their owne subiects in their warres. That in mans nature there is an affection breeding tyrannie, which hindreth the vse and benefit of the like moderation.

HEre may it be demanded, whether also the Romans were not compelled to vse seruice of other souldiours in their many great warres, but performed all by their owne citizens? for if it were their manner to arme their owne subiects; how happened it, that they feared no rebellion? if strangers; how then could they auoide the inconueniences aboue rehearsed? The answere is; That their Armies were compounded vsually of their owne citizens, and of the Latines, in equall number: to which they added, as occasion required, some companies of the Campanes, Hetrurians, Samnites, or other of their subiects, as were either interessed in the quarrell, or might best be trusted. They had, about these times, (though seldome they did imploy so many,) ten Roman Legions; a good strength, if all other helpe had beene wanting: which serued to keepe in good order their subiects, that were alwaies fewer in the Army than themselues. As for the Latines, if consanguinitie were not a sufficient obligation; yet many priuiledges and immunities, which they enioyed, made them assured vnto the State of Rome: vnder which they liued almost at libertie, as being bound to little else, than to serue it in warre. It is true, that a yoke, how easie soeuer, seemes troublesome to the necke that hath been accustomed to freedome. Therefore many people of Italie haue taken occasion of seuerall aduantages, to deliuer themselues from the Roman subjection. But still they haue beene reclaimed by warre; the Authors of rebellion haue sharpely punished; and the people, by degrees, haue obtained such libertie, as made them esteeme none otherwise of Rome, than as the common citie of all Italie. Yea, in processe of time it was granted vnto many cities, and those farre off remoued, euen to Tarsus in Cilicia, where Saint Paul was borne, That all the Burgesses should be free of Rome it selfe. This fauour was conferred absolutely vpon some; vpon some, with restraint of giuing voice in election of Magistrates, or with other such limitation, as was thought fit. Hereunto may be added, that it was their manner, after a great conquest, to release vnto their new subiects halfe of their tribute which they had beene wont to pay vnto their former Lords, which was a readie way, to bring the multitude into good liking of their present condition; when the reuiew of harder times past, should rather teach them to feare a relapse, than to hope for better in the future, by seeking innouation. Neither would it be forgotten, as a speciall note of the Romans good gouernment, That when some, for their well-deseruing, haue had the offer to be made citizens of Rome; they haue refused it, and held themselues better contented with their owne present estate. Wherefore it is no maruaile, that Petellia, a citie of the Brutians in Italie, chose rather to endure all extremitie of warre, than, vpon any condition, to forsake the Romans; euen when the Romans themselues had confessed, that they were vnable to helpe these their subiects, and therefore willed them to looke to their owne good, as hauing beene faithfull to the vtmost. Such loue purchased these milde Gouernours, without impairing their Maiestie thereby. The summe of all is: They had, of their owne, a strong Armie; they doubled it, by adioyning thereunto the Latines; and they further increased it, as neede required, with other helpe of their owne subiects: all, or the most of their followers, accounting the prosperitie of Rome to be the common good.

Liu. Dec. 3. l. 3.

Liu. ibid.

The moderate vse of soueraigne power being so effectuall, in assuring the people vnto their Lords, and consequentlie, in the establishment or enlargement of Dominion: it may seeme strange, that the practice of tyrannie, whose effects are contrarie, hath beene so common in all ages. The like, I know, may bee said, of all Vice, and and Irregularitie whatſoeuer. For it is leſſe difficult (whoſoeuer thinke otherwiſe) and more ſafe, to keepe the way of Iuſtice and Honeſtie, than to turne aſide from it; yet commonly our paſſions lead vs into by-pathes. But where Luſt, Anger, Feare, or any the like Affection, ſeduceth our reaſon, the ſame vnrulie appetite either bringeth with it an excuſe, or at leaſt-wiſe taketh away all cauſe of wonder. In tyrannie it is not ſo: for as much as we can hardly deſcrie the paſſion, that is of force to inſinuate it ſelfe into the whole tenour of a Gouernment. It muſt be confeſſed, that lawleſſe deſires haue bred many Tyrants: yet ſo, that theſe deſires haue ſeldome beene hereditarie, or long-laſting; but haue ended commonly with the Tyrants life, ſometimes before his death; by which meanes the Gouernment hath beene reduced to a better forme. In ſuch caſes, the ſaying of Ariſtotle holds, That Tyrannies are of ſhort continuance. But this doth not ſatisfie the queſtion in hand. Why did the Carthaginians exerciſe Tyrannie? why did the Athenians? why haue many other Cities done the like? If in reſpect of their generall good; how could they be ignorant, that this was an ill courſe for the ſafetie of the Weale publique? If they were led hereunto by any affection; what was that affection, wherein ſo many thouſand citizens, diuided and ſubdiuided within themſelues by factions, did all concurre, notwithſtanding the much diuerſitie of temper, and the vehemencie of priuate hatred among them? Doubtles, we muſt be faine to ſay, That Tyrannie is, by it ſelfe, a Vice diſtinct from others. A Man, we know, is Animal politicum, apt, euen by Nature, to command, or to obey; euery one in his proper degree. Other deſires of Mankinde, are common likewiſe vnto bruit beaſtes; and ſome of them, to bodies wanting ſenſe: but the deſire of rule belongeth vnto the nobler part of reaſon; whereunto is alſo anſwerable an aptneſſe to yeeld obedience. Now as hunger and thirſt are giuen by nature, not onely to Man and Beaſt, but vnto all ſorts of Vegetables, for the ſuſtentation of their life: as Feare, Anger, Luſt, and other Affections are likewiſe naturall, in conuenient meaſure, both vnto Mankinde, and to all creatures that haue ſenſe, for the ſhunning or repelling of harme, and ſeeking after that which is requiſite: euen ſo is this deſire of ruling or obaying, engrafted by Nature in the race of Man, and in Man onely as a reaſonable creature, for the ordering of his life, in a ciuile forme of iuſtice. All theſe in bred qualities are good and vſefull. Neuertheleſſe, Hunger and Thirſt are the Parents of Gluttonie and Drunkenneſſe, which, in reproach, are called beaſtlie, by an vnproper terme: ſince they grow from appetites, found in leſſe worthie creatures than beaſtes, and are yet not ſo common in beaſtes, as in men. The effects of Anger, and of ſuch other Paſſions as deſcend no lower than vnto bruit beaſtes, are held leſſe vile; and perhaps not without good reaſon: yet are they more horrible, and puniſhed more grieuouſly, by ſharper Lawes, as being in generall more pernicious. But as no corruption is worſe, than of that which is beſt; there is not any Paſſion, that nouriſheth a vice more hurtfull vnto Mankinde, than that which iſſueth from the moſt noble roote, euen the depraued Affection of ruling. Hence ariſe thoſe two great miſchiefes, of which hath beene an old queſtion in diſpute, whether bee the worſe; That all things, or That nothing, ſhould be lawfull. Of theſe, a dull ſpirit, and ouer-loaden by fortune, with power, whereof it is not capable, occaſioneth the one; the other proceedeth from a contrarie diſtemper, whoſe vehemencie the bounds of Reaſon cannot limit. Vnder the extremitie of either, no countrie is able to ſubſiſt: yet the defectiue dulneſſe, that permitteth any thing, wil alſo permit the execution of Law, to which, meere neceſſitie doth enforce the ordinarie Magiſtrate; whereas Tyrannie is more actiue, and pleaſeth it ſelfe in the exceſſe, with a falſe colour of iuſtice. Examples of ſtupiditie, and vnaptnes to rule, are not very frequent, though ſuch natures are euery where found: for this qualitie troubles not it ſelfe in ſeeking Empire; or if by ſome errour of fortune, it encounter therewithall, (as when Claudius, hiding himſelfe in a corner, found the Empire of Rome) ſome friend or elſe a wife, is not wanting to ſupply the defect, which alſo crueltie doth helpe

to shadow. Therefore this Vice, as a thing vnknowne, is without a name. Tyrannie is more bold, and feareth not to be knowne, but would be reputed honourable: for it is prosperum & fœlix scelus, a fortunate mischiefe, as long as it can subsist. There is no reward or honour ( saith PETER CHARRON*) assigned to those, that know how to increase, or to preserue humane nature: all honours, greatnesse, riches, dignities, empires, triumphs, trophees, are appointed for those, that know how to afflict, trouble, or destroy it.* CAESAR, and ALEXANDER, haue vn-made and slaine, each of them, more than a million of men: but they made none, nor left none behinde them. Such is the errour of Mans iudgement, in valuing things according to common opinion. But the true name of Tyrannie, when it growes to ripenesse, is none other, than Feritie: the same that Aristotle saith to be worse than any vice. It exceedeth indeed all other vices, issuing from the Passions incident both to Man, and Beast; no lesse than Periurie, Murder, Treason, and the like horrible crimes, exceede in villanie, the faults of Gluttonie and drunkennesse, that grow from more ignoble appetites. Hereof Sciron, Procrustes, and Pityocamptes, that vsed their bodily force to the destruction of Mankinde, are not better examples, than Phalaris, Dionysius and Agathocles, whose mischieuous heads were assisted by the hands of detestable Ruffians. The same barbarous desire of Lordship, transported those old examples of Feritie, and these latter Tyrants, beyond the bounds of reason: neither of them knew the vse of Rule, nor the difference betweene Freemen, and slaues.

The rule of the husband ouer the wife, and of parents ouer their children, is naturall, and appointed by God himselfe; so that it is alwaies, and simplie, allowable and good. The former of these, is, as the dominion of Reason ouer Appetite; the latter is the whole authoritie, which one free man can haue ouer another. The rule of a King is no more, nor none other, than of a common Father ouer his whole countrie: which hee that knowes what the power of a Father is, or ought to bee, knowes to be enough. But there is a greater, and more Masterlie rule, which God

Gen.c.1.v.28. gaue vnto Adam, when he said; Haue dominion ouer the fish of the Sea, and ouer the fowle of the aire, and ouer euery liuing thing that moueth vpon the earth: which also hee

Gen.9.2. confirmed vnto Noah, and his children, saying, The feare of you, and the dread of you, shall be vpon euery beast of the earth, and vpon euery fowle of the aire, vpon all that moueth vpon the earth, and vpon all the fishes of the Sea; into your hands are they deliuered. Hee who gaue this dominion to Man, gaue also an aptitude to vse it. The execution of this power hath since extended it selfe, ouer a great part of Mankinde. There are indeed no small numbers of men, whose disabilitie to gouerne themselues, proues them, according vnto Aristotles doctrine, to be naturallie slaues.

Arist.Pol.l.1.c.3 Yet finde I not in Scripture any warrant, to oppresse men with bondage: vnlesse the lawfulnesse thereof be sufficiently intimated, where it is said, That a man shal not be punished for the death of a seruant, whom he hath slaine by correction,

Num.c.30.v.40 Midianitish girles, which were made bond-slaues, and the Sanctuarie had a part of them for the Lords tribute. Doubtlesse the custome hath beene very ancient: for Noah laid this curse vpon Canaan, that hee should be a seruant of seruants; and Abraham

Gen.12.v.16. had of Pharaoh, among other gifts, men-seruants, and maide-seruants, which were none other than slaues. Christian Religion is said to haue abrogated this olde kinde of seruilitie: but surely, they are deceiued, that thinke so. Saint Paul desired the li-

Epist. to Philem. vers.14. bertie of Onesimus, whome he had wonne vnto Christ: yet wrote hee for this vnto Philemon, by way of request, crauing it as a benefite, not vrging it as a dutie. Agree-

1.Cor.c.7.v.20. & 21. able hereto is the direction, which the same Saint Paul giueth vnto seruants: Let euery man abide in the same calling wherein hee was called: art thou called, being a seruant? care not for it, but if thou maist be made free, vse it rather. It is true, that Christian Religion hath procured libertie vnto many; not onely in regard of pietie, but for that the Christian Masters stood in feare, of being discouered by their slaues, vnto the persecuters of religion. Mahomet likewise by giuing libertie to his followers, drewe many many vnto his impietie: but whether he forbade it, as vnlawfull, vnto his ſectators, to hold one another of them in bondage, I cannot tell; ſaue that by the practice of the Turks and Moores, it ſeemes he did not. In England we had many bond-ſeruants, vntill the times of our laſt ciuile warres: and I thinke that the Lawes concerning Villenage are ſtill in force, of which the lateſt are the ſharpeſt. And now, ſince ſlaues were made free, which were of great vſe and ſeruice, there are growne vp a rabble of Rogues, Cutpurſes and other the like Trades; ſlaues in Nature, though not in Lawe.

But whether this kind of dominion be lawfull, or not; Ariſtotle hath well proued, that it is naturall. And certainly wee finde not ſuch a latitude of difference in any creature, as in the nature of man: wherein (to omit the infinite diſtance in eſtate of the elect & reprobate) the wiſeſt excell the moſt fooliſh, by far greater degree, than the moſt fooliſh of men doth ſurpaſſe the wiſeſt of beaſts. Therfore when Commiſeration hath giuen way to Reaſon: we ſhall find that Nature is the ground euen of Maſterly power, & of ſeruile obedience, which is therto correſpondent. But it may be truly ſaid, that ſome countries haue ſubſiſted long, without the vſe of any ſeruilitie: as alſo it is true, that ſome countries haue not the vſe of any tame cattell. Indeede the affections which vphold ciuill rule, are (though more noble) not ſo ſimplie needfull, vnto the ſuſtentation either of our kind, as are Luſt, and the like; or of euerie one, as are hunger and thirſt; which notwithſtanding are the loweſt in degree. But where moſt vile, and ſeruile diſpoſitions, haue libertie to ſhew themſelues begging in the ſtreets; there may wee more iuſtly wonder, how the dangerous toile of ſea-faring men can finde enough to vndertake them, than how the ſwarme of idle vagabonds ſhould increaſe, by acceſſe of thoſe, that are wearie of their owne more painefull condition. This may ſuffice to proue, that in Mankind there is found, ingraſted euen by Nature, a deſire of abſolute dominion: whereunto the generall cuſtome of Nations doth ſubſcribe; together with the pleaſure which moſt men take in flatterers, that are the baſeſt of ſlaues.

This being ſo, we finde no cauſe to maruaile, how Tyranny hath beene ſo rife in all ages, and practiſed, not onely in the ſingle rule of ſome vicious Prince, but euer by conſent of whole Cities and Eſtates: ſince, other vices haue likewiſe gotten head, and borne a generall ſway; notwithſtanding that the way of vertue be more honourable, and commodious. Few there are that haue vſed well the inferiour Paſſions: how then can we expect, that the moſt noble affections ſhould not bee diſordered? In the gouernment of wife and children, ſome are vtterly careleſſe, and corrupt all by their dull conniuencie: others, by maſterly rigour, hold their owne blood vnder condition of ſlauerie. To be a good Gouernour is a rare commendation; and to preferre the Weale publike aboue all reſpects whatſoeuer, is the Vertue iuſtly termed Heroicall. Of this Vertue, many ages affoord not many examples. Hector is named by Ariſtotle, as one of them; and deſeruedly, if this praiſe be due to extraordinarie height of fortitude, vſed in defence of a mans owne countrie. But if we conſider, that a loue of the generall good cannot be perfect, without reference vnto the fountaine of all goodneſſe: wee ſhall finde, that no Morall vertue, how great ſoeuer, can, by it ſelfe, deſerue the commendation of more than Vertue, as the Heroicall doth. Wherefore we muſt ſearch the Scriptures, for patterns hereof; ſuch as Dauid, Ioſaphat, and Ioſias were. Of Chriſtian Kings if there were many ſuch, the world would ſoone be happie. It is not my purpoſe to wrong the worth of any, by denying the praiſe where it is due; or by preferring a leſſe excellent. But he that can finde a King, religious, and zealous in Gods cauſe, without enforcement either of aduerſitie, or of ſome regard of ſtate; a procurer of the general peace and quiet; who not onely vſeth his authoritie, but addes the trauell of his eloquence, in admoniſhing his Iudges to doe iuſtice; by the vigorous influence of whoſe Gouernment, ciuilitie is infuſed, euen into thoſe places, that haue beene the dennes of ſauage Robbers and Cutthrotes; one that hath quite aboliſhed a ſlauiſh Brehon

Law, by which an whole Nation of his ſubiects were held in bondage; and one, whoſe higher vertue and wiſdome doth make the praiſe not onlie of Nobilitie and other ornaments, but of abſtinence from the bloud, the wiues, and the goods, of thoſe that are vnder his power, together with a world of chiefe commendations belonging vnto ſome good Princes, to appeare leſſe regardable: he, I ſay, that can finde ſuch a King, findeth an example, worthie to adde vnto vertue an honourable title, if it were formerly wanting. Vnder ſuch a King, it is likelie by Gods bleſſing, that a Land ſhall flouriſh, with increaſe of Trade, in countries before vnknowne; that Ciuilitie and Religion ſhall be propagated, into barbarous and heathen cõuntries; and that the happineſſe of his ſubiects, ſhall cauſe the Nations farre off remoued, to wiſh him their Souereigne. I neede not adde hereunto, that all the actions of ſuch a King, euen his bodilie exerciſes, doe partake of vertue; ſince all things tending to the preſeruation of his life and health, or to the mollifying of his cares, (who, fixing his contemplation vpon God, ſeeketh how to imitate the vnſpeakeable goodneſſe, rather than the inacceſſible maieſtie, with both of which himſelfe is indued, as farre as humane nature is capable) doe alſo belong to the furtherance of that common good, which hee procureth. Leſt any man ſhould thinke me tranſported with admiration, or other affection, beyond the bonds of reaſon; I adde hereunto, that ſuch a King is neuertherleſſe a man muſt die, and may erre: yet wiſdome and fame ſhall ſet him free, from errour, and from death, both with and without the helpe of time. One thing I may not omit, as a ſingular benefite (though there be many other beſides) redounding vnto this King, as the fruit of his goodneſſe. The people that liue vnder a pleaſant yoke, are not onely louing to their Souereigne Lord, but free of courage, and no greater in muſter of men, then of ſtout fighters, if neede require: whereas on the contrarie, he that ruleth as ouer ſlaues, ſhall bee attended in time of neceſſitie, by ſlauiſh mindes, neither louing his perſon, nor regarding his or their owne honour. Cowards may bee furious, and ſlaues outragious, for a time: but among ſpirits that haue once yeelded vnto ſlauerie, vniuerſally it is found true, that Homer ſaith, God bereaueth a man of halfe his vertue, that day when he caſteth him into bondage.

Hom. Odyſſ. l. 17.

Of theſe things, I might perhaps more ſeaſonably haue ſpoken, in the generall diſcourſe of Gouernement: but where ſo liuely an example, of the calamitie following a tyrannicall rule, and the vſe of Mercinaries, thereupon depending, did offer it ſelfe, as is this preſent buſineſſe of the Carthaginians; I thought that the note would be more effectuall, than being barely deliuered, as out of a common place.

§. III.

How the warre againſt the Mercinarie was diuerſlie mannaged by HANNO and AMILCAR, with variable ſucceſſe. The bloudy counſailes of the Mercinaries; and their finall deſtruction.

BEeing now to returne vnto thoſe Mercinaries, from whome I haue thus farre digreſſed, I cannot readily finde, by what name henceforth I ſhould call them. They are no longer in pay with the Carthaginians; neither care they to pretend, that they ſeeke their wages already due; ſo that they are neither Mercinaries, nor Mutiners. Had they all beene ſubiects vnto Carthage, then might they iuſtly haue beene termed Rebels: but Spendius, and others, that were the principall part of them, ought none allegeance to that State, which they endeuoured to ſubuert. Wherefore I will borrow the name of their late occupation, and ſtill call them Mercinaries, as Polybius alſo doth.

Theſe

Theſe vſing the aduantage of their preſent ſtrength, beſieged * Vtica, and Hippagreta, Cities of great importance, as being ſeated vpon the weſterne Hauen of Carthage, where it is diuided by a necke of land; Hippagreta ſtanding inwards vpon the great Lake; Vtica further out vpon the Sea. Neither was the Campe at Tunes abandoned, which lay filthie to hinder the Carthaginians, from paſſing vp into the countrie: for Matho and Spendius wanted not men, to followe the warre in all parts at once.

How the Carthaginians were amazed with this vnexpected perill, any man may conceiue. But the buſineſſe it ſelfe awakes them haſtilie. They are hardly preſt on all ſides; and therefore trauailed their braines to the vttermoſt, how to ſhake off theſe furious dogges from their ſhoulders, who ſometimes by night, ſometimes by day, came vnto the very walles of their Citie. In this exigent Hanno was made their Generall: who failed not in his accuſtomed diligence of making all good preparation: but had gotten together whatſoeuer was needfull, as well to relieue a Towne beſieged, as to batter and aſſaile any place defended againſt him. With theſe prouiſions, and with an hundred Elephants, hee came to Vtica; ſo ſuddenly, that the enemies as men ſurpriſed, forſooke their Trenches, and retired themſelues vnto a riſing peece of woody ground, where they might be ſafe againſt the violence of his beaſts. Hanno, thinking that he had to doe with Numidians, whoſe cuſtome was, after any loſſe, to flie two or three whole daies iournie off; preſently entred the Towne; to ſhew himſelfe, after this his victory. But theſe good fellowes, againſt whom he was to warre, had learned of Amilcar, to retire and to fight againe, many times in one day, as need required. Therefore as ſoone as they perceiued, that hee knew not how to vſe a victorie; they aſſailed their owne Campe, and with great ſlaughter, draue the Carthaginians out of it, forcing them to hide themſelues within Vtica; and got poſſeſſion of all the ſtore, that Hanno had brought for the reliefe of the Towne. This bad beginning Hanno followed with ſutable indiſcretion: looſing the benefit of many faire opportunites, and ſuffering the enemies to take poſſeſſion of all the entrance from Carthage to the firme land.

The Carthaginians, perceiuing this, were exceedingly troubled, and did therefore let fall their ſhete-anchor; ſending to the field their great Captaine, Amilcar, whom they furniſhed with ten thouſand foote of ſupply, and ſeuentie Elephants. Amilcar had worke enough to doe, before he ſhould be able to meet with the enemie vpon equall ground. For beſides other places of aduantage that the Mercenaries had occupied, Hanno had ſuffered them to winne the only Bridge, by which the Riuer Macra, or Bagradas, was paſſable vnto theſe, that were to trauaile into the Continent. This Riuer had not many foords, nor thoſe eaſie for a ſingle man to get ouer: but vpon them all was kept ſuch guard, as gaue to Amilcar little hope of preuailing in ſeeking way by force. As for the Bridge it ſelfe, Matho and his followers were there lodged: and had there built a Towne, wherein to lie commodiouſly, intentiue onely to the cuſtodie thereof. But Amilcar had obſerued, that the very mouth of Bagradas vſed to be ſometimes cloyed with ſand and grauell, that was driuen in by certaine cuſtomarie windes, & could not be driuen out againe, by force of that ſlow Riuer, till the winde falling, or changing, ſuffered the weight of the waters, to diſburden their channel. Hereof he made vſe; and taking his opportunity, paſſed the Riuer; contrarie to all expectation, either of the enemie, or of his owne Citizens.

There was no neede to bid Spendius looke about him, when once it was heard, that Amilcar was come ouer Bagradas: all the Mercenaries were troubled with the newes; knowing that they were no longer to deale with the improuident grauitie of Hanno, but with an able ſpirit, euen with their own Maſter in the Art of Warre, whom they admired, though they hated him. But this feare was ſoone changed into preſumption; when more than fifteene thouſand of their owne ſocietie, were come from Vtica; and other tenne thouſand from the gard of the Bridge. Their

* Vtica is ſeated in the great Bay, that enters towards Carthage, not far within the Promontorie of Apollo. At this time it is called Porto Farina, or Biſerta; and by the Africans themſelues, Garel Melba. Niger ſaith, that the Towne it ſelfe is ruined, and the place, whereon it ſtood, now called Mazachares. It was verie ancient, and built before Carthage, ſaith Silius. As it flouriſhed before Carthage was ſet vp; ſo did it after Carthage was throwne down by the Romans, in the third Punick Warre. Famous it was by the death of Cato the younger, who held it againſt Ceſar. Victor, that worthy Diuine, was Biſhop thereof in the time of Genſeric the Arrian, who lined all the time of that Tyrant, and hath written the ſtorie of his cruelties.

Armie was farre greater, than that of Amilcar; and they were, in their owne iudgement, the better men, vpon which confidence, they resolued to charge him on all sides, and beate him downe, in despight of his worth and reputation. With this resolution they attended vpon him; watching for some aduantage; and still exhorting one another to play the men, and giue the onset. Especially they that followed him in the Rere, had a great minde to begin the fight; whereunto their promptnesse was such, as tooke from them their former circumspection. Amilcar held his way towards the Bridge, keeping himselfe on plaine grounds, that were fittest for the seruice of his Elephants, which hee placed in front of his Armie. Neither made hee shewe of any desire to fight, but suffered the rashnes of his enemies to increase, till it should breake into some disorder. At length perceiuing, that with more boldnesse than good heed, they followed him so neere, as would bee little for their good, if hee should turne vpon them, he hastened his march, euen to such a pace, as made a shewe little differing from plaine flight. The Mercinaries presently fell vpon his skirts; beleeuing, that for feare of them he was ready to runne away. But whilest they confusedly, as in sudden opinion of victorie, were driuing at the heeles of those that had the Reare; Amilcar wheeled about, and met them in the face, charging them hotely, but in very good order, so that amazed with the apprehension of inexpected danger, they fled without making any resistance. In this ouerthrowe, there were sixe thousand of the Mercinaries slaine, and about two thousand taken; the rest fled; some to the Campe at Vtica; others to the Towne at the Bridge; whither Amilcar followed them so fast, that he wanne the place easily: the enemies being thence also fled vnto Tunes, as not hauing recollected their spirits to make it good.

The fame of this victorie, together with the diligence of Amilcar in pursuing it, caused many Townes reuolted, partly by feare, partly by force, to returne to their former obedience. Yet was not Matho wanting to himselfe, in this dangerous time. He sent about Numidia and Africke, for new supplies; admonishing the people, now or neuer to doe their best, for the recouerie of their freedome; hee perswaded Spendius, and Autaritus that was Captaine of the Gaules, to wait vpon Amilcar, and alwaies to keepe the higher grounds, or at least the foot of some hill, where they might be safe from the Elephants; and hee himselfe continued to presse the Towne of Hippagreta with an hard siege. It was necessarie for Amilcar, in passing from place to place, as his businesse required, to take such waies as there were: for all the countrie lay not leuell. Therefore Spendius, who still coasted him, had once gotten a notable aduantage of ground: the Carthaginians lying in a Plaine, surrounded with hilles, that were occupied by the Mercinaries, with their Numidian and African succours. In this difficultie; the fame of Amilcar his personall worth did greatly benefit his countrie. For Naraua∫us, a yong gentleman commanding ouer the Numidians, was glad of this occasion seruing to get the acquaintance and loue of so braue a man, which he much desired: and therefore came vnto Amilcar, signifying his good affection to him, with offer to doe him all seruice. Amilcar ioyfully entertained this friend; promised vnto him his owne daughter in marriage; and so wanne from the enemies two thousand horse, that following Naraua∫us turned vnto the Carthaginians side. With this helpe he gaue battaile vnto Spendius: wherein the Numidian laboured to approue his owne valour, to his new friend. So the victorie was great: for there were slaine ten thousand of Spendius his fellowes, and foure thousand taken prisoners, but Spendius himselfe, with Autaritus the Gaule, escaped to doe more mischiefe. Amilcar dealt very gently with his prisoners: pardoning all offences past, and dismissing as many, as were vnwilling to become his followers; yet with condition, that they should neuer more beare armes against the Carthaginians; threatning to take sharpe reuenge vpon all, that should breake this Couenant.

This humanitie was vehemently suspected by Matho, Spendius, and Autaritus, as tending tending to winne from them, the hearts of their ſouldiers. Wherefore they reſolued to take ſuch order, that not a man among them ſhould dare, to truſt in the good nature of Amilcar, nor to hope for any ſafetie, whileſt Carthage was able to doe him hurt. They counterfeited letters of aduertiſement, wherein was contained, that ſome of their company reſpectiue onely of their priuate benefit, and careleſſe of the generall good, had a purpoſe to betraie them all vnto the Carthaginians, with whom they held intelligence; and that it was needfull, to looke well vnto Geſco, and his companions, whom theſe traitours had a purpoſe to enlarge. Vpon this Theme Spendius makes an Oration to the ſouldiours, exhorting them to fidelitie; and ſhewing with many words, that the ſeeming humanitie of Amilcar, toward ſome, was none other than a baite, wherewith to entrap them all at once together; as alſo telling them, what a dangerous enemie Geſco would prooue, if hee might eſcape their hands. While hee is yet in the midſt of his tale; were letters come, to the ſame purpoſe. Then ſteps forth Autaritus and ſpeakes his minde plainely: ſaying, that it were the beſt, yea the onely way, for the common ſafetie, to cut off all hope of reconciliation with Carthage; that if ſome were deuiſing to make their owne peace, it would goe hard with thoſe that had a care of the warre; that it were better to make an end of Geſco his life, than to trouble themſelues with looking to his cuſtodie; that by ſuch a courſe euery one ſhould be ingaged in the preſent Action, as hauing none other hope left, than in victorie alone; finally, that ſuch as would ſpeake here-againſt, were worthy to bee reputed Traitours. This Autaritus was in great credit with the ſouldiours, and could ſpeake ſundrie languages, in ſuch ſort, that hee was vnderſtood by all. According to his motion therefore it was agreed, that Geſco, and all the other priſoners, ſhould forthwith be put to horrible death, by torments. Neuertheleſſe there were ſome, that for loue of Geſco, ſought to alter his intended crueltie; but they were forthwith ſtoned to death, as a Document vnto others; and ſo the Decree was put in execution. Neither were they therewithall contented; but further ordained, that all Carthaginian priſoners which they tooke, ſhould be ſerued in like ſort: and that the ſubiects or friends of Carthage, ſhould loſe their hands, and ſo be ſent home: which rule they obſerued euer afterwards.

Of this crueltie I need ſay no more, then that it was moſt execrable feritie. As for the counſaile of vſing it, it was like vnto the counſaile of ACHITOPHEL; All Iſrael ſhall heare, that thou art abhorred of thy father; then ſhall the hands of all that are with thee, be ſtrong. Such are the fruits of deſperation. He that is paſt all hope of pardon, is afraid of his owne fellowes, if they be more innocent; and to auoide the puniſhment of leſſe offences, committeth greater. The cowardize of offenders, and the reuengefull ſpirits of thoſe that haue beene wronged, are breeders of this deſparation: to which may be added, ſome deficiencie of Lawes, in diſtinguiſhing the puniſhments of malefactors, according to the decree of their ſeuerall crimes. A coward thinkes all prouiſion too little, for his owne ſecuritie. If PHOCAS be a coward (ſaid the Emperour MAVRITIVS) then is he murderous. To be ſtedfaſt and ſure, in taking reuenge; is thought a point of honour, and a defenſatiue againſt new iniuries. But wrongfully: for it is oppoſite to the rule of Chriſtianitie; and ſuch a qualitie diſcouered, makes them deadly enemies, who otherwiſe would haue repented, and ſought to make amends, for the wrong done in paſſion. This was it, which wrought ſo much woe to the Carthaginians; teaching Matho, and his Africans, to ſuſpect euen their gentleneſſe, as the introduction to extreme rigour. Like vnto the errours of Princes and Gouernours, are the errours of Lawes. Where one and the ſame puniſhment, is awarded vnto the leſſe offence, and vnto the greater, he that hath aduentured to robbe a man, is eaſily tempted to kill him, for his owne ſecuritie.

Againſt theſe inconueniences Mercie and Seueritie, vſed with due reſpect, are the beſt remedies. In neither of which Amilcar failed. For as long as theſe his owne ſouldiours were any way likely to be reclaimed, by gentle courſes; his humanitie was readie to inuite them. But when they were transported with beastly outrage, beyond all regard of honestie and shame, he rewarded their villanie with answerable vengeance; casting them vnto wilde beasts, to be deuoured.

Vntill this time Hanno, with the Armie vnder his command, had kept himselfe apart from Amilcar, and done little, as may seeme, for that nothing is remembred of him, since his late losses. Neither was Amilcar sorrie to want his helpe; as being able to doe better without him. But when the warre grew to such extremitie, as threatned vtter ruine to the one or the other side: then was Hanno sent for, & came to Amilcar, with whom hee ioyned his forces. By this accesse of strength Amilcar was not enabled, to doe more then in former times: rather he could now performe nothing; such was the hatred betweene him and his vnworthy Colleague. The Townes of Vtica and Hippagreta, that had stood alwaies firme on the Carthaginian partie, did now reuolt vnto the enemie, murdering all the souldiours that they had in Garrison, and casting their bodies forth, without suffering them to be buried. The prouisions brought by sea, for maintenance of the Armie, were lost in foule weather: and Carthage it selfe stood in danger of being besieged, about which Matho and Spendius consulted, whilest one of the Carthaginian Generals did (as it were) binde the others hands.

It hath in all Ages beene vsed, as the safest course, to send foorth in great Expeditions, two Generals of one Armie. This was the common practice of those two mighty Cities, Athens and Rome; which other States and Princes haue often imitated; perswading themselues, that great Armies are not so well conducted by one, as by two: who out of emulation to excel each other, will vse the greater diligence. They haue also ioyned two chiefe Commanders in equall commission, vpon this further consideration; the better to restraine the ambition of any one, that should be trusted with so great a strength. For hereof all Common-weales haue beene iealous, hauing beene taught by their examples that haue made themselues Tyrants ouer those Cities and States that haue imployed them. In this point, the Venetians haue bin so circumspect, as they haue for the most part, trusted strangers, and not their owne, in all the warres which they haue made. It is true, that the equall authoritie of two commanding in chiefe, serueth well to bridle the ambition of one or both, from turning vpon the Prince or State that hath giuen them trust: but in mannaging the warre it selfe, it is commonly the cause of ill successe. In warres made neere vnto Rome it selfe, when two good friends were Consuls, or such two at least, as concurred in one desire of Triumph; which honor (the greatest of any that Rome could giue) was to be obtained by that one yeeres seruice; it is no maruaile, though each of the Consuls did his best, and referred all his thoughts vnto none other end then victorie. Yet in all dangerous cases, when the Consuls proceeded otherwise then was desired, one Dictator was appointed, whose power was neither hindered by any partner, nor by any great limitation. Neither was it indeede the manner, to send foorth both the Consuls to one warre; but each went, whither his lot called him, to his owne Prouince; vnlesse one businesse seemed to require them both, and they also seemed fit to be ioined in the administration. Now although it was so, that the Romans did many times prenaile with their ioynt Generals: yet was this neuer or seldome, without as much concord, as any other vertue of the Commanders. For their modestie hath often beene such, that the lesse able Captaine, though of equall authoritie, hath willingly submitted himselfe to the other, and obeyed his directions. This notwithstanding, they haue many times, by ordaining two Commanders of one Armie, receiued great and most dangerous ouerthrowes; whereof in the second Punick warre we shall finde examples. On the contrarie side, in their warres most remote, that were alwayes mannaged by one, they seldome failed to winne exceeding honour, as hereafter shall appeare. Now of those tenne Generals, which serued the Athenians at the Battaile of Marathon, it may truly be said, that had not their temper been better, than the iudgement

of the people that ſent them forth, and had not they ſubmitted themſelues to the conduction of Miltiades; their affaires had found the ſame ſucceſſe which they found at other times, when they coupled Nicias and Alcibiades together in Sicil: the one being ſo ouer-warie, and the other ſo haſtie, as all came to nought that they vndertooke; whereas Cimon alone, as alſo Ariſtides, and others, hauing ſole charge of all, did their Countrie and Common-weale moſt remarkeable ſeruice. For it is hard to finde two great Captaines, of equall diſcretion and valour; but that the one hath more of furie than of iudgement, and ſo the contrarie, by which the beſt occaſions are as often ouerſlipt, as at other times many actions are vnſeaſonably vndertaken. I remember it well, that when the Prince of Condy was ſlaine after the Battaile of Iarnac, (which Prince, together with the Admirall Chaſtillon, had the conduct of the Proteſtant Armie) the Proteſtants did greatly bewaile the loſſe of the ſaid Prince, in reſpect of his Religion, perſon, and birth; yet comforting themſelues, they thought it rather an aduancement, than an hinderance to their affaires. For ſo much did the valour of the one, out-reach the aduiſedneſſe of the other, as whatſoeuer the Admirall intended to winne by attending the aduantage, the Prince aduentured to loſe, by being ouer-confident in his owne courage.

But we need no better example, than of the Carthaginians in this preſent buſines: who, though they were ſtill ſicke of their ill-grounded loue to Hanno, and were vnwilling to diſgrace him; yet ſeeing that all ranne towards ruine, through the diſcord of the Generals, committed the deciſion of their controuerſies, vnto the Armie that ſerued vnder them. The iudgement of the Armie was, that Hanno ſhould depart the Campe: which he did; and Hannibal was ſent in his ſtead, one that would be directed by Amilcar; and that was enough.

After this, the affaires of Carthage began to proſper ſomewhat better. Matho and Spendius had brought their Armie neere vnto the Citie; and lay before it, as in a ſiege. They might well be bold, to hope and aduenture much; hauing in their Campe aboue fiftie thouſand, beſides thoſe that lay abroad in Garriſons. Neuertheleſſe, the Citie was too ſtrong for them to winne by aſſault: and the entrance of victuailes they could not hinder, if any ſhould bee ſent in by friends from abroad.

Hieron, King of Syracuſe, though during the warres in Sicil he aſſiſted the Romans, and ſtill continued in their Alliance, yet now ſent ſuccours to the Carthaginians: fearing their fall, and conſequently his owne; becauſe if no other State gaue the Romans ſomwhat to trouble their diſgeſtion, the Principalitie of Syracuſe would ſoone be deuoured by them. The Romans alſo gaue them ſome ſlender aſſiſtance, and for the preſent refuſed good offers made vnto them by the Mercinaries. This they did, to ſhew a kind of noble diſpoſition; which was indeed but counterfeit, as the ſequele manifeſtly proued.

Whileſt Matho and his followers were buſily preſſing the Citie, Amilcar was as diligent, in waiting at their backes, and cutting off all that came to their ſupply: ſo that finding themſelues more ſtraightly beſieged by him, than Carthage was by them, they purpoſed to deſiſt from their vaine attempt, and try ſome other courſe. Hereupon they iſſue into the field: where Spendius, and one Zarcas an African Captaine aſſiſting the rebellion, take vpon them to finde Amilcar worke; leauing Matho in Tunis, to negotiate with their friends, and take a generall care of the buſineſſe. The Elephants of Carthage, and horſe of Narauiſus, made Spendius feareſull to deſcend into the Plaines. Wherefore hee betooke himſelfe to his former method of warre; keeping the mountaines, and rough grounds, or occupying the ſtraighteſt paſſages, wherein the deſperate courage of his men might ſhew it ſelfe, with little diſaduantage. But Amilcar had more skill in this Art, than could bee matched by the labour of Spendius. Hee drew the enemie to many skirmiſhes; in all which the ſucceſſe was ſuch, as added courage to his owne men, and abated the ſtrength and ſpirit of the Rebels. Thus he continued, prouoking them night and day:

day: ſtill intrapping ſome of them, and ſometimes giuing them the ouerthrow in plaine battaile: vntill at length he got them into a ſtraight, whence ere they ſhould get out, he meant to take of them a good account. Their iudgement was enough, to perceiue their owne diſaduantage: and therefore they had the leſſe ſtomake to fight; but awaited for helpe from Tunis. Amilcar prudently foreſeeing, that neceſſitie might teach them, to dare impoſſibilities, vſed the benefit of their preſent feare, and ſhut them cloſe vp with Trench and Rampart. There they waited miſerably for ſuccour, that came not: and hauing ſpent all their victuailes, were ſo pinched with hunger, that they fed vpon the bodies of their priſoners. This they ſuffred patiently, as knowing that they had not deſerued any fauour from Carthage; and hoping, that their friends at Tunis would not bee vnmindfull of them. But when they were driuen to ſuch extremitie, that they were faine to deuoure their owne companions, and yet ſaw none appearance or likelihood of reliefe: their obſtinacie was broken; and they threatned their Captaines with what they had deſerued, vnleſſe they would goe foorth to Amilcar, and ſeeke ſuch peace as might be gotten. So Spendius, Zarxas, and Autaritus, fell to conſultation, wherein it was reſolued, to obey the multitude, and yeeld themſelues, if it were ſo required, vnto the death, rather than to periſh by the hands of their owne companions. Hereupon they ſend to craue parle, which is granted; and theſe three come forth to talke with Amilcar in perſon. What they could ſay vnto him, it is hard to coniecture: yet by the conditions which Amilcar granted, it ſeemes that they tooke the blame vpon themſelues, and craued pardon for the multitude. The conditions were, that the Carthaginians ſhould chooſe, out of the whole number of theſe enemies, any ten whom they pleaſed, to remaine at their diſcretion; and that the reſt ſhould all be diſmiſſed, each in his ſhirt, or in one ſingle coate. When the peace was thus concluded; Amilcar told theſe Ringleaders, that he choſe them preſently, as part of the ten, and ſo commanded to lay hands on them: the reſt he foorthwith went to fetch, with his whole Armie in order. The Rebels, who knew not that peace was concluded vpon ſo gentle articles, thought themſelues betraied: and therefore amazedly ranne to armes. But they wanted Captaines to order them; and the ſame aſtoniſhment, that made them breake the Couenants of peace, whereof they were ignorant, gaue vnto Amilcar both colour of iuſtice, in accompliſhing reuenge, and eaſe in doing the execution. They were all ſlaine: being fortie thouſand, or more, in number.

This was a famous exploit: and the newes thereof, exceeding welcome to Carthage; and terrible to the reuolted Cities of Africk. Henceforward Amilcar, with his Naraueſus and Hannibal, carried the warre from Towne to Towne, and found all places readie to yeelde: Vtica, and Hippagreta, onely ſtanding out, vpon feare of deſerued vengeance; and Tunes, being held by Matho, with the remainder of his Armie. It was thought fit to begin with Tunis, wherein lay the chiefe ſtrength of the enemie. Comming before this Towne, they brought forth Spendius, with his fellowes, in view of the defendants, and crucified them vnder the walles; to terrifie thoſe of his olde companions, that were ſtill in armes. With this rigour the ſiege began; as if ſpeedie victorie had beene aſſured. Hannibal quartered on that part of Tunis, which lay towards Carthage; Amilcar on the oppoſite ſide: too farre aſunder to helpe one another in ſudden accidents; and therefore it behoued each, to be the more circumſpect.

Matho from the walles beheld his owne deſtinie, in the miſerie of his companion, and knew not how to auoide it otherwiſe, than by a caſt at dice with fortune. So he brake out vpon that part of the Carthaginian Armie, that lay ſecure, as if all danger were paſt, vnder the command of Hannibal: and with ſo great and vnexpected furie he ſallied, that after an exceeding ſlaughter, he tooke Hannibal priſoner; on whom, and thirtie the moſt noble of the Carthaginian priſoners, he preſently reuenged the death of Spendius by the ſame torture. Of this Amilcar knew nothing till it was too late; neither had he ſtrength enough remaining, after this great loſſe, to continue the ſiege; but was faine to breake it vp, and remoue vnto the mouth of the Riuer Bagradas, where he incamped.

The terrour was no leſſe within Carthage, vpon the fame of this loſſe; than had beene the ioy of the late great victorie. All that could beare armes, were ſent into the field, vnder Hanno; whom, it ſeemes, they thought the moſt able of their Captaines ſuruiuing the late accidents of Warre. If there were any Law among them, forbidding the imployment of one ſole Generall, neere vnto their Citie (for they are knowne to haue truſted one man abroad) the time did not permit, in this haſtie exigent, to deuiſe about repealing it. But thirtie principall men are choſen by the Senate, to bring Hanno to Amilcars campe, and by all good perſwaſions to reconcile them. This could not be effected in one day. It neerely touched Amilcar in his honour, that the careleſneſſe of Hannibal ſeemed to be imputed vnto him, by ſending his enemie to moderate his proceedings. Neuertheleſſe after many conferences, the authoritie of the Senatours preuailed; Amilcar and Hanno were made friends; and thenceforth, whileſt this warre laſted, Hanno tooke warning by Hannibals calamities, to followe good directions, though afterwards hee returned to his old and deadly hatred. Liu. Dec. 3. l. 1.

In the meane ſeaſon Matho was come abroad; as meaning to vſe the reputation of his late ſucceſſe, whileſt it gaue ſome life vnto his buſineſſe. He had reaſon to doe as he did: but he wanted skill to deale with Amilcar. The skirmiſhes, and light exerciſes of warre, wherein Amilcar trained his Carthaginians, did ſo farre abate the ſtrength, and withall diminiſh the credit of Matho, that he reſolued to trie the fortune of one battaile: wherein either his deſires ſhould be accompliſhed, or his cares ended. To this concluſion the Carthaginians were no leſſe prone, than Matho: as being wearie of theſe long troubles, and inſupportable expences; confident in the valour of their owne men, which had approued it ſelfe in many trials; and well aſſured of Amilcar his great worth, whereunto the enemie had not what to oppoſe. According to this determination, each part was diligent in making prouiſion: inuiting their friends to helpe; and drawing foorth into the fielde, all that lay in Garriſon.

The iſſue of this Battaile might haue beene foretold, without helpe of witchcraft. Matho, and his followers, had nothing whereon to preſume, ſaue their daring ſpirits, which had beene well cooled by the many late skirmiſhes, wherein they had learned how to runne away. The Carthaginians had reaſon to dare, as hauing often beene victorious: and in all points elſe they had the better of their enemies; eſpecially (which is worth all the reſt) they had ſuch a Commander, as was not eaſily to be matched in that Age. Neither was it likely, that the deſire of libertie ſhould worke ſo much, in men accuſtomed to ſeruitude; as the honour of their State would, in Citizens, whoſe future and preſent good lay all at once ingaged in that aduenture. So the Carthaginians wanne a great victorie, wherein moſt of the Africans their enemies were ſlaine; the reſt fled into a Towne, which was not to be defended, and therefore they all yeelded; and Matho himſelfe was taken aliue. Immediatly vpon this victorie, all the Africans that had rebelled, made ſubmiſſion to their old maſters: Vtica onely, and Hippagreta ſtood out, as knowing how little they deſerued of fauour. But they were ſoone forced, to take what conditions beſt pleaſed the victours. Matho and his fellowes were led to Carthage in triumph; where they ſuffered all torments that could be deuiſed, in recompence of the miſchiefes which they had wrought in this warre. The warre had laſted three yeeres, and about foure moneths, when it came to this good end: which the Carthaginians, whoſe ſubiects did not loue them, ſhould with leſſe expence, by contenting their Mercinaries, haue preuented in the beginning.

§. IIII.

How the Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, that were in Sardinia, rebelled: and were afterwards driuen out by the Ilanders. The faithlesse dealing of the Romans with the Carthaginians, in taking from them Sardinia, contrarie to the peace.

WHilest Matho and Spendius were making this terrible combustion in Africke; other Mercenaries of the Carthaginians had kindled the like fire in Sardinia: where murdering Bostar the Gouernour, and other Carthaginians, they were in hope to get, and hold that Iland to their own vse. Against these one Hanno was sent with a small Armie (such as could be spared in that busie time) consisting likewise of Mercenaries, leuied on the sudden. But these companions that followed Hanno, finding it more for their safety, and present profit, to ioyne themselues with those that were already reuolted, than to indanger themselues by battaile, for the good of that commonweale, of which they had no care; began to enter into practice with the Sardinian Rebels; offering to runne one course of fortune with them in their enterprise. This their offer was kindly taken; but their faith was suspected. Wherefore, to take away all iealousie and distrust, they resolued to hang vp their Commander Hanno, and performed it. A common practice it hath beene in all Ages, with those that haue vndertaken the quarrell of an vniust warre, to enioyne the performance of some notorious and villainous act, to those that come into them as seconds, with offer to partake, and to assist the impious purposes which they haue in hand. It is indeed the best pawne, that desperate men can deliuer to each other, to performe some such Actions, as are equally vnpardonable to all.

By such a kind of crueltie did the vngratefull Mantinæans murder a Garrison of Achaians, sent vnto them for their defence against the Lacedæmonians, by Aratus; who, when hee had formerly possest himselfe of their Citie, by right of warre, did not onely spare the sacke and spoile thereof, but gaue them equall freedome with the rest of the Cities vnited. These Reuolts are also common in our Court-warres; where, in the conquests of newe fortunes, and making of newe parties, and factions, without the depression or destruction of olde friends, we cannot be receiued and trusted by old enemies. Ce sont les coups de vieille escrime. These, (say the French) be the blowes of the old art of fencing.

These Mercinaries in Sardinia were no whit lesse violent in their purpose, than were Spendius, and his associates: onely they wanted a Matho among them, to negotiate with the inhabitants of the Prouince. The Ilanders were no lesse glad, than the souldiours, that the Carthaginians were expelled the Countrie: but they could not agree about the profit of the victorie. The Sardinians thought that it was enough, if they rewarded the souldiours for their paines taken. Contrariwise, the souldiours were of opinion, that the title of the Carthaginians to that Ile, was deuolued vnto themselues, by right of conquest. The same quarrell would (in likelihood) haue risen, betweene Spendius with his Mercenaries, and their African friends; if the common desire of both had once taken effect: vnlesse the riches of Carthage had serued to content them all. But in Sardinia, where there was none other valuable reward, than possession and rule of the Countrie; the matter was not easily taken vp. So they fell to blowes; which how they were dealt, I know not; but finally, the Mercenaries were driuen out, and compelled to saue themselues in Italie. Before their departure out of Sardinia, they had inuited the Romans into it; with as good right, as the Mamertines had called them into Sicil. Yet this offer was refused, vpon reasons that follow.

Some Italian Merchants had relieued Matho and Spendius with corne; of whom the

the Carthaginians tooke almoſt fiue hundred, and held them in priſon. Hereof was made a great complaint: ſo that the Romans ſent Embaſſadours to Carthage, requiring ſatisfaction. It was no time for the Carthaginians to diſpute: they quietly yeelded to releaſe them all. This was ſo kindly taken, that they forbade all their Merchants, to trade thenceforth with the Rebels; admoniſhing them to carry all prouiſions to Carthage. And vpon the ſame reaſon, did they forbeare to meddle with Sardinia, or to accept the Citie of Vtica, offering it ſelfe vnto their ſubiection. This might haue ſerued, as a notable example of the Roman faith, to all poſteritie: had not the iſſue proued, that it was meere regard of greater profit, which kept them ſo temperate, no longer than the hope laſted of thriuing better thereby, than they ſhould haue done by open breach of faith. The whole eſtate of Carthage depended, at that time, vpon the vertue of Amilcar: who had he beene ouerthrown by Spendius or Matho, in one maine battaile, that mightie Citie muſt either haue fallen into the barbarous hands of merciles villaines, or haue humbled herſelfe vnder protection of the Romans, with whom ſhee had lately ſtriuen for ſuperioritie. That extreme neceſſitie, whereinto Matho reduced the Citie, by the fortune of one ſallie made out of Tunis, is enough to proue, that Carthage was not farre from ſuch a miſerable choice. Wherfore it was not vnwiſely done of the Romans, to make ſuch demonſtration of kindneſſe, and honourable dealing, as might inuite a rich, but ſinking ſhippe, to runne her ſelfe aground vpon their ſhore. But when all was well ended in Africke, and the Carthaginians began to prepare for the recouerie of Sardinia: then did Ambition put off her goodly vizour. The Romans perceiuing that Carthage, beyond their hope, had recouered her feete againe; began to ſtrike at her head. They entertained the proffer of thoſe Mercinaries, that were fled out of Sardinia; and they denounced warre againſt this enfeebled and impoueriſhed Citie, vnder a ſhameleſſe pretence, that the preparations made for SARDINIA, were made indeed againſt Rome it ſelfe. The Carthaginians knew themſelues vnable to reſiſt; and therefore yeelded to the Romans demand; renouncing vnto them all their right in Sardinia. But this was not enough. They would haue twelue hundred talents, in recompence belike (for I ſee not what reaſon they could alleage) of the great feare which they had endured, of an inuaſion from Carthage. It is indeed plaine, that they impudently ſought occaſion of warre. But neceſſitie taught the Carthaginians patience; and the monie was paied, how hardly ſoeuer it was raiſed. From this time forward, let not Rome complaine of the Punick faith, in breach of Couenants: ſhe her ſelfe hath broken the peace alreadie, which Amilcar purpoſeth to make her dearely repent; but what Amilcar liues not to performe, ſhall be accompliſhed by Hannibal his renoumed ſonne.

How the affaires of Carthage went betweene the African Rebellion, and the ſecond Punicke Warre.

THe iniurious dealing of the Romans, expreſſing their deſire to picke a quarrell; ſerued to inſtruct the Carthaginians in a neceſſarie leſſon. That either they muſt make themſelues the ſtronger, or elſe reſolue to be obedient vnto thoſe that were more mighty. In a Citie long accuſtomed to rule, the brauer determination eaſilie tooke place: and the beſt meanes were thought vpon, for the increaſe of puiſſance and Empire. The ſtrength, and the iealouſie of the Romans, forbade all attempts vpon the Mediterran ſeas; but the riches of Spaine, that lay vpon the Ocean, were vnknowne to Rome: wherefore that Prouince might ſerue, both to exerciſe the Carthaginians in warre, and to repaire their decaied forces, with all needfull ſupplies. Of this Spaniſh Expedition, the charge and ſoueraigne truſt was committed vnto Amilcar: vpon whom whom his Countrie did wholly repose it selfe; in hope to recouer strength by his meanes, that had saued it from ruine.

Hanno, with some other enuious men, that were of his faction, took little pleasure in the generall loue and honour, which daily increased towards Amilcar and his friends. Yet could they not denie him to bee the most worthy of command in all the Citie: onely they commended peace and quietnesse; aduising men to beware of prouoking the Romans, in whose amitie they said, that the felicitie of Carthage did consist. By such discourses, harsh to the eares of good Citizens, who had feeling of the wrong done to their Common weale; they got none other reputation, than of singularitie: which the ignorant sort suspected to be wisedome.

But the glory of Amilcar was continually vpheld and enlarged, by many notable seruices that he did, to the singular benefit of his Countrie. He passed the Streights of Hercules, (now called the Streights of Gibraltar) and landed on the westerne coast of Spaine; in which Countrie, during nine yeeres that he liued there, hee subiected vnto the State of Carthage the better part of all those Prouinces. But finally, in a battaile that he fought with a Nation in Portugale, called the Vettones, (defending himselfe a long time with an admirable resolution) hee was inuironed and slaine: carrying with him to the graue the same great honour and fame, by which in many signall victories, he had acquired the name of a second Mars.

After the death of Amilcar; Asdrubal his sonne in law was made Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spaine. This was a good man of warre; but farre better in practice and cunning, than in deedes of armes. By his notable dexteritie in matter of negotiation, he greatly enlarged the Dominion of Carthage: adding so many subiects and confederates thereunto, that the Romans began to grow iealous againe of this hastie increase. He built a goodly Citie, vpon a commodious Hauen, in the Kingdome of Granado, opposite to that of Oran in Africa, and gaue it the name of New Carthage, which to this day it neerely retaineth, being called now * Carthagena. With this successe of the Carthaginians in Spaine, the Romans were not a little troubled; but begin to cause their owne negligence. For whereas they had formerly taken so much paines to beate them out of the Ile of Sicil, as suspecting their neighbourhood there; they had now, by cumbring themselues in a warre of farre lesse importance, (whereof I shall speake anon) giuen them leysure, without interruption, to recouer vpon their owne Continent, a Dominion by farre exceeding, both in the bodies of men and in reuenue, that which the Romans had taken from them. But how to helpe this, at the present they knew not; for they daily expected to be inuaded by the Gaules, their ancient enemies, and neerest neighbours to the West. But hee needeth little helpe of force, that knoweth himselfe to be feared: it is enough if hee request; since his request shall haue the vertue of a command.

* The Spaniards haue since built a Citie of the same name in the West Indies: which being peopled by them in the yeere 1532. was sackt by the English in the yeere 1585

Yet were the Romans vtterly destitute of all good colour; that might helpe them to intermeddle in Spaine. The Spaniards were then vnacquainted with Rome, whereof (in probabilitie) they scarce had heard the name: so that there were no Mamertines, nor other such Rebels, to call in Roman succours. But in the enterprise of Sardinia, the Romans had learned an impudent pretence, that might also serue their turne in Spaine. For though it were apparent, that the Spanish affaires had no relation to the peace between these two Cities; and though it were nothing likely, that Asdrubal had any purpose, to extend his victories vnto the gates of Rome, or to any of the Roman frontiers: yet (as if some such matter had beene suspected) they sent vnto him, requiring that hee should forbeare to proceed any further, than to the Riuer of Iberus. In addressing their messengers, rather to Asdrubal, than to the Citie of Carthage; they seeme to haue hoped, that howsoeuer the generalitie of the Carthaginians had sweetly swallowed many bitter pilles, to auoide all occasion of warre with Rome: yet the brauerie of one man might proue more fastidious, and, resenting the iniurie, returne such answere, as would intangle his whole Countrie in the quarrell, quarrell, that they so much desired; and might embrace at leisure, when once they had found apparent cause. But Asdruball finely deluded their expectation. He pretended no manner of dislike at all: and whereas they would haue this insolent couenant inserted into the articles of peace; he tooke vpon him to doe it, of his owne power, with such appearance of conformitie to their will, that they went their wayes contented, and sought no further.

If it had beene so, that the State of Carthage, thereunto pressed by the Romans, for feare of present warre, had ratified this new composition made by Asdrubal, yet should it not haue stood bound in honour, to obserue the same carefully, vnlesse an oath had also beene extorted, to make all sure. But since all passed quietly, vnder the bare authoritie of Asdrubal; this Capitulation was none other in effect, than a second breach of peace; whereof the Romans might be accused more iustly, than they could accuse the Carthaginians of periurie, (as they after did) for refusing to stand to it.

By this Treatie with Asdrubal, the Romans wanne some reputation in Spaine. For when it was once conceiued by the Spaniards, that the Citie which would needes be mistresse ouer them, stood in feare her selfe, of receiuing blowes from a stouter Dame; there were soone found some, that by offering themselues to the protection of Rome, became (as they thought) fellow-seruants with Carthage. But the Carthaginians will shortly teach them another lesson. The Saguntines, a people on the South side of Iberus, entred into confederacie with the Romans, and were gladly accepted. Surely it was lawfull vnto the Romans, to admit the Saguntines, or any other people (neither subiect, nor open enemie in warre to the Carthaginians) into their societie: and vnlawfull it was vnto the Carthaginians, to vse violence towards any that should thus once become confederate with Rome. Neuertheless, if we consider the late agreement made with Asdrubal; we shall finde that the Romans could haue none other honest colour of requiring it, than an implicit couenant of making the Riuer Iberus a bound, ouer which they themselues would not passe, in any Discouerie or Conquest by them intended to be made vpon Spaine: in which regard, they might haue some honest pretence to require the like of the Carthaginians; though Rome as yet had no foote, on the one side of Iberus, whereas Carthage, on the other side of that Riuer, held almost all the Countrie. Howsoeuer it were; this indignitie was not so easily digested, as former iniuries had beene. For it was a matter of ill consequence, that the Nations which had heard of no greater power than the Carthaginian, should behold Saguntum resting securely among them, vpon confidence of helpe from a more mightie Citie. Wherefore either in this respect; or for that the sense is most feeling of the latest iniuries; or rather for that now the Carthaginians were of power to do themselues right: warre against Saguntum was generally thought vpon, let the Romans take it how they list. In such termes were the Carthaginians, when Asdrubal died, after he had commanded in Spaine eight yeeres: (being slaine by a slaue, whose master he had put to death) and the Great Hannibal, sonne of the Great Amilcar, was chosen Generall in his stead.

§. VI.

The estate of Greece from the death of PYRRHVS, to the raigne of PHILIP the sonne of DEMETRIVS in Macedon.

IN the long terme of the first Punick warre, and the vacation following, betweene it and the second; the estate of Greece, after the death of Pyrrhus, was growne somewhat like vnto that, wherein Philip of Macedon had found it; though farre weaker, as in an after-spring. The whole countrie had recouered by degrees, a forme of libertie: the pettie tyrannies (bred of those inferiour Captaines, which in the times of generall combustion, had seised each vpon such Townes as he could get) were, by force or accident, extirpated, and reformed; and some States were risen to such greatnesse, as not onely serued to defend themselues, but to giue protection to others. This conuersion to the better, proceeded from the like dissensions and tumults in Macedon, as had beene in Greece, when Philip first began to encroch vpon it. For after many quarrels and great warres, about the Kingdome of Macedon, betweene Antigonus the elder, Cassander, Demetrius, Lysimachus, Selencus, Pyrrhus, and the Gaules: Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, finally got and held it, reigning sixe and thirtie yeeres; yet so, that he was diuers times thence expelled, not onely by the Gaules, and by Pyrrhus, as hath beene alreadie shewed, but by Alexander the sonne of Pyrrhus the Epirot, from whose father he had hardly wonne it. This happened vnto him, by the reuolt of his souldiours, euen at such time, as hauing ouerthrowne with great slaughter an Amie of the Gaules, he was conuerting his forces against the Athenians, whom he compelled to receiue his Garrisons. But his yong sonne Demetrius raised an Armie; wherewith he chased Alexander, not onely out of Macedon, but out of his owne Epirus, and restored his father to the Kingdome.

By the helpe of this yong Prince Demetrius (though in another kind) Antigonus got into his possession the Citadell of Corinth; which was iustly termed the fetter of Greece. The Citadel called Acrocorinthus, stood vpon a steep rockie hill on the North side of the towne; and was by nature and art so strong, that it seemed impregnable. It commanded the towne; which was of much importance, as occupying the whole breadth of the Isthmus, that running betweene the Ægean and Ionique Seas, ioyneth Peloponnesus to the Maine of Greece. Wherefore he that held possession of this Castle, was able to cut off all passage by land, from one halfe of Greece vnto the other; besides the commoditie of the two Seas, vpon both of which, this rich and goodly Citie had commodious hauens. Alexander, the sonne of Polysperchon; and after his death, Cratesipolis his wife, had gotten Corinth in the great shuffling of Prouinces and Townes, that was made between Alexanders Princes. Afterwards it passed from hand to hand, vntill it came, I know not how, to one Alexander; of whom I finde nothing else, than that he was thought to bee poisoned by this Antigonus, who deceiued his wife Nicæa thereof, and got it from her by a tricke. The deuice was this. Antigonus sent his yong Demetrius to Corinth, willing him to court Nicæa, and seeke her marriage. The foolish old widdow perceiued not how vnfit a match she was for the yong Prince, but entertained the fancie of marriage; whereto the old King was euen as readie, to consent, as was his sonne to desire it, and came thither in person to solemnize it. Hereupon all Corinth was filled with sacrifices, feasts, plaies, and all sorts of games: in the middest of which, Antigonus watched his time, and got into the Castle, beguiling the poore Ladie, whose iealousie had beene exceeding diligent in keeping it. Of this purchase hee was so glad, that he could not containe himselfe within the grauitie beseeming his old age. But as hee had stollen it; so was it againe stollen from him: neither liued he to reuenge the losse of it, being alreadie spent with age.

Demetrius,

Demetrius, the ſonne of this Antigonus, ſucceeding vnto his father, reigned ten yeeres. He made greater proofe of his vertue before he was King than after. The Dardanians, Ætolians, and Achæans, held him continually buſied in warre; wherin his fortune was variable, and for the more part ill. About theſe times the power of the Macedonians began to decay: and the Græcians to caſt off their yoke.

Philip, the onely ſonne of Demetrius, was a yong child when his father died; and therefore Antigonus, his vncle, had the charge of the Kingdome, during the minoritie of the Prince; but he aſſumed the name and power of a King, though hee reſpected Philip as his owne ſonne, to whom he left the Crowne at his death; This Antigonus was called the Tutor, in regard of his Protectorſhip; and was alſo called Doſon, that is as much as, Will-giue, becauſe he was ſlow in his liberalitie. He repreſſed the Dardanians and Theſſalians, which moleſted his Kingdome, in the beginning of his raigne. Vpon confidence of this good ſeruice, hee tooke ſtate vpon him, as one that rather were King in his owne right, then onely a Protector. Hereupon the people fell to mutinie; but were ſoone appeaſed by faire words, and a ſeeming vnwillingneſſe of his to meddle any more with the Gouernment. The Achaians tooke from him the Citie of Athens, ſoone after Demetrius his death; and likely they were to haue wrought him out of all or moſt that hee held in Greece, if their owne eſtate had not beene endangered by a neerer enemy. But ciuile diſſention, which had ouerthrowne the power of Greece, when it flouriſhed moſt; ouerthrew it eaſily now againe, when it had ſcarcely recouered ſtrength after a long ſickneſſe; and gaue to this Antigonus no leſſe authoritie therein, than Philip the father of Alexander, got by the like aduantage.

Theſe Achaians, from ſmall beginnings, had increaſed in ſhort time to great ſtrength and fame: ſo that they grew the moſt redoubted Nation of all the Greeks. By the equalitie of their Lawes, and by their clemencie (notwithſtanding that they were a long time held vnder by the Macedonians and Spartans) they did not onely draw all others by their loue and alliance, but induced, through their example, the reſt of the Cities of Peloponneſus, to bee gouerned by one Lawe, and to vſe one and the ſame ſort of waights, meaſure, and monie.

Aratus, the Sicyonian, was the firſt that vnited them againe; and gaue them courage, after that they had beene by the Macedonian Captaines diuided into many Principalities. In elder times they were gouerned by Kings, as moſt of the great Cities of Greece were; to which kinde of rule they firſt ſubiected themſelues, after the deſcent of the Heraclidæ, when Tiſamenus the ſonne of Oreſtes poſſeſt the Territorie of Achaia. In this eſtate they continued to the time of Gyges; after whome, when his ſonnes ſought to change the Legall gouernment of their Predeceſſors into Tyrannie, they expelled them, and made their State popular; as ſeeming moſt equall. This forme of Common-weale had continuance, with ſome ſmall changes according to the diuerſitie of times, till the reigne of Philip and Alexander Kings of Macedon: who tempeſt-like ouerturned all things in that part of the world. For thoſe twelue Cities, called the Cities of alliance, whereof Helice, and Bura or Olenus, the Sea had eaten vp a little before the Battaile of Leuctres; were, by diſturbance of the Macedonians, diuided from each other, and trained into a warre, no leſſe fooliſh than cruell, among themſelues. But in the one hundred and foure and twentieth Olympiad, in which, or neere it, Ptolomie the ſonne of Lagus, Lyſimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolomie Ceraunus, left the world; two of the ten remaining Cities and people, namely, the Patrenſes and the Dimæi, vnited themſelues, and laid the foundation of that generall accord, and re-vnion, which after followed. For hauing beene, ſome of them Partiſans with ſundrie Macedonian Captaines, and others hauing beene gouerned by pettie Kings; they began to faſten themſelues in a ſtrong league of amitie, partly, in the Olympiad before ſpoken of, and partly, at ſuch time as Pyrrhus made his firſt voiage into Italie. Now after the vniting of the Patrenſes and Dimæi, to whom alſo the Cites of Tritæa, and Phara, ioyned themſelues;

Ægira chaſed out her Garriſons: and the Burians, killing their Kings, entred with the Ceraunians into the ſame Confederacie. Theſe Cities, for twentie & fiue yeeres, vſed the ſame forme of Gouernement with the Achaians; who by a Senatorie and two Prætors, ordered all things in their Commonweale; and ſoone after, by one Prætor, or Commander: of which, Marcus Carynenſis was the firſt, and Aratus the ſecond.

This Aratus was a noble yong Gentleman of Sicyon, who liuing at Argos in exile, whileſt his Countrie was oppreſſed by Tyrants, found meanes, through the helpe of other baniſhed men, to enter their owne Citie by night, with ladders; whence they chaced the Tyrant, and reſtored the people to libertie. This was in the time of Antigonus Gonatas King of Macedon, a Prince more buſie in watching what to get among the Greekes, than wiſe in looking to his owne. For feare of Antigonus, the Sicyonians entred into the Achaian league: which though at that time it receiued more increaſe, by their acceſſion, than it added ſtrength to them; yet the benefit of this coniunction ſerued well enough againſt Antigonus, whoſe ſubtilty was ſomewhat greater than his valour. As the induſtrie and counſaile of Aratus deliuered his Countrie from bondage, and fortified it by the Achaian league: ſo further, by his great liberalitie, with the exceeding great coſt of one hundred and fiftie talents, he pacified the inexplicable controuerſies, betweene the baniſhed Sicyonians, which returned with him, and the other Citizens that had poſſeſſion of theſe mens Lands; as alſo with the ſame mony he drew many others to aſſiſt him in thoſe enterpriſes following, that redounded to the ſingular good of all Achaia. The mony he obtained of Ptolemie Euergetes King of Ægypt; who partly had a deſire to hold ſome ſtrong and ſure friendſhip in Greece, partly was delighted with the conuerſation of Aratus himſelfe, that made a dangerous voiage to him into Ægypt, and fed his pleaſure in goodly pictures, with the gift of many curious peeces, wherein the workemen of Sicyon excelled.

The firſt of Aratus his great attempts, was the ſurprize of the Acrocorinthus or Citadell of Corinth; which he wanne by night, being thereinto guided by ſome theeues that he had hired for the purpoſe, who liuing in the place, had practiſed to rob Antigonus his treaſurie, paſſing in and out by a ſecret path among the rockes. Yet was he faine to fight for it, ere he could get it: though indeede Antigonus his Souldiers were rather ouer-come by their owne feare, than by any force of the aſſailants; as miſtruſting leſt the Achaians were more in number, than in truth they were, and hauing loſt the aduantages of the place already, vpon which they had preſumed, before they were aware of any enemie.

In theſe kinde of night-ſeruices, ambuſhments, ſurpriſes, and practices, Aratus was very cunning, aduenturous, and valiant: in open field, and plaine battaile, hee was as timorous. By this ſtrange mixture of cowardize and courage, he miniſtred argument of diſputation, to Philoſophers and others; Whether a valiant man (as he was eſteemed, and in ſome caſes approued) might looke pale and tremble, when he beganne battaile; and whether the vertue of Fortitude were diuerſified, by the ſundry natures of men, and in a manner confined, vnto ſeuerall ſorts of action. In reſoluing which doubts it may be ſaid; that all vertue is perfected in men by exerciſe, wherein they are trained by occaſion: though a naturall inclination ſtandeth in neede of little practice; whereas the defect hereof muſt be ſupplied with much inſtruction, vſe, good ſucceſſe, and other helpe, yet hardly ſhall grow abſolute in generall. Such was Aratus in matter of Warre. In ſincere affection to his Countrie he was vnreproueable, and ſo acknowledged: as his following actions will teſtifie.

When Acrocorinthus was taken, and ioyned vnto the Common-wealth of Achaia, the Megarians reuolted ſoon after from Antigonus, and entred into the ſame Corporation. So did the Trœzenians, and the Epidaurians: whereby this new erected State grew ſo powerfull, that it aduentured to take Athens, from the Macedonians; and Argos and Megalopolis, from Tyrants that held them. The enterpriſe vpon Athens was of none effect. For though Aratus waſted the Ile of Salamis, to ſhew his ſtrength, and ſent home the Athenian priſoners, without ranſome, to allure the Citie by ſhew of loue; yet the Athenians ſtirred neither againſt him, nor for him, as being now growne honeſt ſlaues to the Macedonians. Vpon Argos the aduenture was carried more ſtrongly. The Achaians came ſometimes to the gates of the Citie, but the people ſtirred not: once they entred it, and might haue wonne it, if the Citizens would haue lent any helpe to the recouerie of their owne freedome; ſundrie times, and with diuers euent, they fought with the Tyrants, (who roſe vp one after another in Argos) in open field, and ſlue one of them in battaile; but all ſufficed not: vntil at length Ariſtomachus the Tyrant was ſo terrified, perſwaded, and hired, by Aratus, that he conſented to reſigne his eſtate. The like did Xenon the Tyrant of Hermione, and Cleonymus that had oppreſſed the Phliaſians. Whileſt this buſineſſe with the Argiues was on foot, Lyſiadas the Tyrant of Megalopolis was ſo well handled by Aratus, that, without compulſion, he gaue libertie to his Citie, and annexed it to the Councell of Achaia: whereby he got ſuch credit, that he was choſen Generall of their forces (which was a yeerly Office, and might not be held two yeeres together by one man) euerie ſecond yeere, for a certaine while, he and Aratus ſucceeding one another by turnes. But thoſe late Tyrants, and new Citizens, Lyſiadas and Ariſtomachus, were carried with priuate paſſion from care of the generall good; in which courſes they oppoſed Aratus, to the great hurt of Achaia, as ſhall appeare in due time.

The Achæans hauing obtayned ſo much puiſſance and reputation, that Ptolomie King of Ægypt was become Patron of their Alliance, and (in title of honour) Generall of their forces by Sea and Land; made open Warre vpon Demetrius the Sonne of Antigonus Gonatas, for the libertie of Athens. It is ſtrange and worthy of noting, That when Aratus in this quarrell had loſt a battaile, the Athenians wore Garlands, in ſigne of ioy, to flatter their good Lords the Macedonians, that had wonne the victorie. Such were now the Athenians become; in whom the rule was verified, that holds true in generall of the multitude, Aut humiliter ſeruit, aut ſuperbè dominatur; It is either baſe in ſeruice, or inſolent in command. Neuertheleſſe when Demetrius was dead, Aratus performed that by monie, which he could not by force; and corrupting the Captaine of the Macedonian Garriſon, purchaſed libertie to the Athenians, who thencefoorth held good correſpondence with the Achæans, louing them, and ſpeaking well of them, which was all that they could doe: but into their Corporation they entred not, ſcorning it belike, in regard of their owne out-worne glorie.

Now as the Common-wealth of Achaia daily increaſed within Peloponneſus, by iuſtice and honeſtie; ſo did the Ætolians, in the vtter part of Greece, yea and within Peloponneſus it ſelfe, waxe very powerfull, by ſturdineſſe of bodie, and rude courage in fight, without helpe of any other vertue. They had ſtoutly defended themſelues againſt Antipater and Craterus; partly by daring to doe and ſuffer much; partly by the natural ſtrength and faſtneſſe of their Countrie; but eſpecially by the benefit of the time, which called away theſe famous Captaines to other buſineſſe, as hath beene related. They had moleſted Caſſander, in fauour of Antigonus; and were themſelues as much plagued by him, & by the Acarnanians, a little, but a ſtout Nation, that tooke his part. Afterwards they had to doe with Demetrius, the ſonne of the firſt Antigonus, and more or leſſe, with al the Kings of Macedon ſucceeding him. They likewiſe held often Warre with the Acarnanians, Athamanians, Epirots, and many Cities in Peloponneſus: ſo that they were hardened with perpetuall trauaile; ſeldome putting off their Armour. But their hardineſſe ill deſerued the name of valour, ſeeing they had no regard of honeſtie or friendſhip; meaſuring all things by their owne inſolent wil, and thinking al people baſe-minded, that were not as fierce and outragious as themſelues.

Theſe Ætolians had lately made great ſpoiles in Peloponneſus, and occupied a good part of the countrie. They had inuaded the friends of the Achæans; taken and ſacked

Pallene; where although they were soundly beaten by Aratus, yet their desire of gaine made them greedie of a new voiage thither, as to a Countrie wherein somewhat was to be gotten. But they were forced to looke another way, by Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus Gonatas: who pressed them so hardly, that they were driuen to seeke helpe of the Achæans; which they obtained. The warre which the Achæans made vpon Demetrius, without Peloponnesus, in Attica, though it tended to expelling the Macedons out of Greece, yet the benefit thereof redounded chiefly vnto the Ætolians, at whose instance it was set on foot: for thereby were the Macedonian forces diuerted from them. Neither was this good turne vnacknowledged; though very basely the Ætolians, giuing thanks in words, deuised how to requite the benefit with some great mischiefe. They saw that the Achæans were desirous, to bring all Peloponnesus into their Alliance and Corporation: of which intent, the Lacedæmonians were very iealous. Wherefore these Ætolians laboured earnestly, to set the Lacedæmonians and Achæans together by the eares: hoping that if this might come to passe, they themselues should be called into helpe (it skilled not on what side) and so get no small share, both in booties and Territorie. Neither did they forbeare to communicate this their deuice vnto Antigonus; offering to make him partaker of their gaine, whom they knew to be offended with the many losses, that his Kingdome had sustained by the Achæans. Of this plot Aratus was aware: who therefore determined to suffer many indignities, rather than to giue the Lacedæmonians cause to take armes. But this resolution was taken somewhat too late: and not altogether in his own power to hold. He had been medling with the Archadians, that were dependants of Lacedæmon: and thereby had prouoked the Lacedæmonians to looke about them; seeing that all Peloponnesus, excepting themselues, the Eleans, and a few Arcadians their friends (who also were attempted) was alreadie become Achæan.

The Citie of Sparta was in ill case about these times; and subiect to the iniuries of any stronger Neighbour. Pyrrhus had greatly weakned it; The Ætolians entring Laconia with an Armie, had carried away fiftie thousand slaues; and, which was worse, their discipline was corrupted, Auarice and Luxurie raigned among them, the poore was oppressed by the rich, & the generositie of spirit, that had sometime beene their generall vertue, was hardly now to be found among the best of them. There were left in Sparta no more than seuen hundred naturall Citizens; of whom not aboue one hundred had lands: all the rest were needie people and desirous of innouation. Hereupon followed inteſtine sedition; which endangered the Citie most of all. Agis a good King, who sought to reforme the disorders of the State, exhorted the people to a strict obseruation of Lycurgus his laws. To which purpose he caused them to passe an Act, for the abolishing of all debts, and equal diuision of lands. All the yonger, and the poorer sort were glad of this: but the rich men opposed it. These had recourse vnto Leonidas the other King, (for in Sparta were two Kings) who tooke their part: being himselfe a dissolute man, as one trained vp in the Court of Syria, whence also he had his wife. In this contention Leonidas was expelled the Citie, and a new King chosen in his stead. But Agis his friends and Counsailors in this enterprise, abused his good meaning to their owne priuate commoditie. They were hastie to take away all debts, and cancell bonds, for they themselues were deeply indebted: but the diuision of lands they afterwards hindred, because their owne possessions were great. Hence arose a tumult in Sparta, which these men increased by their foule oppression of the poorer Citizens. So that in fine, Leonidas was brought home, and restored to his Kingdome, and the two aduerse Kings driuen to take Sanctuarie; out of which, Cleombrotus, the late-made King, was dismissed into exile: but Agis was trained forth, drawne into prison, and there by his enemies condemned and strangled, together with his Mother, and his old Grandmother. The like to this was neuer knowne in Sparta: and (which is the more odious) this cruelties proceeded from the Ephori, Magistrates that should haue giuen Patronage to the lawes, vsing their power, and more power than to them belonged,

againſt a King, that had proceeded orderly in reforming the Citie, as the lawes required.

The death of Agis was much lamented by all good Citizens; and ſerued to eſtabliſh the impotent rule of a few tyrannicall oppreſſors. In which caſe Aratus might well hope, to adioyne Lacedæmon to the Achæan Common-wealth: though it were great iniuſtice to take ſuch aduantages, & attempt by force, that which would haue redounded to the generall good of Peloponneſus, and to the beneſit of Sparta it ſelfe, if it could haue beene wrought by perſwaſion.

But the ſame man who redreſſed the diſorders of Sparta, and reuenged the death of Agis, did alſo requite the iniuſt attempts of the Achæans, euen in their owne kind: obtruding vpon them by force, an vnion of all Peloponneſus; though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedæmonians and their King, ſhould haue beene the principall; not they and their Prætor. Leonidas hauing thus cauſed Agis to be ſlaine, tooke his wife that was very rich and beautifull, and gaue her in mariage (perforce) to his owne ſonne Cleomenes. This yong Prince fell greatly enamoured on his wife, and ſought to winne her affection, as well as he had her perſon. He diſcourſed much with her about the purpoſe of her former husband Agis, and by pittying his misfortune, began to entertaine a deſire of accompliſhing that, wherein Agis had failed. So comming himſelfe to be King, whilſt he was very yong, hee gladly embraced all occaſions of warre: for that he hoped by ſtrong hand to effect that, which Agis, by proceeding formally, in ſo corrupt an eſtate of the Citie, had attempted to his owne ruine. Therfore when the Ephori gaue him in charge, to take and fortifie Athenæum, a Temple on the marches of Laconia, to which both they and the Megalopolitans pretended title; he readily performed it. Hereof Aratus made no complaint, but ſought to take by ſurpriſe Tegea and Orchomenus, Cities then confederate with the Lacedæmonians: wherein, his intelligence failing, he loſt the labour of a painefull nights trauaile, and diſcouered his enmitie to Sparta; of which Cleomenes was nothing ſorrie. By theſe degrees the warre began. In the entrance whereto Aratus had diſcouered the Ætolian practice, and therfore would haue ſtaied the quarrell from proceeding too farre. But Lyſiadas and Ariſtomachus would needes fight, and he could doe none other than be ruled by them; eſpecially ſeeing Cleomenes was ſo vrgent. Ariſtomachus was at that time General of the Achæans, (He & Lyſiadas being of great account, ſince they had abandoned their tyrannie) who ſent vnto Aratus, lying then in Athens, and required his aſſiſtance in a journie to be made into Laconia. No diſſwaſions of Aratus would ſerue: therefore he came in perſon, and tooke part of a buſineſſe, little pleaſing him in the preſent, and leſſe in the future. When he met with Cleomenes, he durſt not fight; but oppoſed himſelfe againſt Ariſtomachus, who deſired to giue battaile. Yet had the Achæans twentie thouſand foot, & one thouſand horſe, in their Armie: whereas Cleomenes had no more than fiue thouſand in all. This gaue reputation to the Lacedæmonian, and raiſed an ill report vpon Aratus; which Lyſiadas helped to make worſe, by accuſing his cowardize. Neuertheleſſe the Achæans would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but choſe him their General the yere, following, againſt Lyſiadas his accuſer that ſued for the place. Being Generall himſelfe, it behoued him to confute, with deedes, the ſlanderous wordes of Lyſiadas. Therefore he purpoſed to ſet vpon the Eleans: but was met withall on the way, neere vnto the Mount Lycæus, by Cleomenes; who vanquiſhed him in a great battaile, and draue him to hide himſelfe all night for feare, ſo that he was thought to haue beene ſlaine. This miſaduenture Aratus recompenced by a trick of his owne more naturall occupation: performing with his broken Armie, that which could hardly haue been expected, had he bin victorious. For whilſt there was no ſuſpition of any great matter that he could vndertake; he ſecretly wrought with ſome of the Mantineans, who did let him into their Citie. The Mantineans had once before ioyned themſelues with the Achæans; but ſhortly vpon feare, or ſome other paſſion, they gaue themſelues

to the Ætolians; and from the Ætolians, presently after this victorie, to Cleomenes, from whom immediately they were thus won. For this their leuitie they were not punished, but freely admitted now againe into the Achæan societie. As this good successe repaired the credit of Aratus; so another battaile almost ruined it. Cleomenes and he encountred neere vnto Megalopolis; where the Achæans had somewhat the better at the first, but their Generall durst not follow his aduantage. Therupon Lysiadas, of whom we spake before, grew somewhat impatient with anger; and taking with him all the horse, brake vpon the Lacedæmonians, whom hee routed at the beginning, but pursuing them too farre into places of hard passage, he was slaine by them, and his followers driuen backe vpon their owne Companions; in such sort, that finally all the Armie was disordered, and put to flight. This was a great losse, and incensed the Achæans against Aratus: yet their indignation proceeded no further, than that they refused to make any longer contribution, towards the pay of those Mercinaries which he had waged. This Aratus tooke patiently, and followed the warre neuertheless; wherein though Cleomenes wanne some Townes, and Aratus got the better in one small fight, yet little of importance was done; the Achæans being wearie, and the Spartan King intentiue to another businesse.

Cleomenes hauing led into the field all that were like to hinder his purpose, and tired them with painefull journies, forsooke the Achæan warre on a sudden, and came vnexpected home to Sparta, where hee slue the Ephori, and restored by force the ancient discipline of Lycurgus. Then gaue hee an accompt of his doings: and shewing by what degrees the Ephori had incroched vpon the power of Kings, and many disorders had growne in the Citie; he justified his proceedings, and forthwith began to make equall diuision of the Lands, reducing all to the first institution. Hee also supplied the defect of Citizens, by choosing new, out of such as were friends to the State, and valiant men: so that henceforth his Countrie might not altogether stand in neede of mercinarie helpe, as it lately had done, to saue it selfe from the Ætolians, Illyrians, and other enemies. All this was dispatched in great haste; the Spartans well satisfied; and Cleomenes himselfe ready in the field, ere his enemies could take aduantage of these his domesticall troubles.

The Achæans hearing of this great alteration in Sparta, thought that it would be long, ere Cleomenes durst issue forth of the Citie, for feare of some rebellion. But it was not long ere they heard, that he had wasted all the Countrie of Megalopolis; had ranged ouer all Arcadia at his pleasure; and was admitted into Mantinæa; and readie to take other places, euen of Achaia. These newes displeased them not a little: but they must patiently endure to heare worse. For when Cleomenes had shaken off the power of the Ephori, that curbed his authoritie, hee proceeded more roundly in his worke; being better obeyed, and by better men. His Lacedæmonians resumed their ancient courage; and he himselfe had the heart to demand the Principalitie of Greece. He did not therefore henceforth contend, about the possession of a few Townes: but aduentured to winne or lose all. The Ætolians, in fauour of his attempt, declared themselues on his side: and whereas he had gotten Mantinæa, Tegea, and other places, to which they had some title, they willingly renounced all their interest vnto him.

Aratus did apprehend the danger of his Countrie, and saw that Antigonus with the Ætolians, or perhaps without them, would shortly make an end of that, which Cleomenes had thus begunne. Therefore hee deuised how to prouide against the worst, and either to repaire all, or (if it could not bee) to saue all from vtter ruine. The office of Generall when it was next put vpon him, hee refused; fearing to bee so farre prest, as to hazzard in one battaile all the force of his Countrie, to which as hee had neuer any affection, nor perchance courage, so was his manner of warfare otherwise. For he commonly attempted by surprise, and defended vpon the aduantage of place, after the manner of the Iriſh, and of all other Nations, ouer-charged with numbers of men. Yet did he not forſake the care of the weale publike, though in aiming at the generall good, it ſeemes that priuate paſſion drew him into an ill courſe. He ſaw, that Megalopolis could not be defended without making a dangerous hazzard of battaile; that Mantinæa had not only opened her gates vnto Cleomenes, but ſlaine the Achæan Garriſon that lay therein; that other Townes had yeelded vnto him, without compulſion; and that Ariſtomachus, once Tyrant of Argos, and ſince Generall of the Achæans, was now reuolted vnto the enemie, following the fortune of Cleomenes. Ptolemie was too farre off to helpe; and the neereneſſe of Antigonus was very dangerous; yet might be vſefull, if this King would (as Polybius ſaith) like others, be friend or enemie, as ſhould beſt agree with his owne profit. To make triall hereof, Aratus practiſed with ſome of Megalopolis, whom he found apt vnto his purpoſe; and inſtructed them how to deale both with Antigonus, and the Achæans.

The Citie of Megalopolis had beene well affected to the Macedonians, euer ſince the time of Philip the Father of Alexander, who had obliged it vnto him by ſome eſpeciall benefits. At this time it lay neereſt vnto the danger; was very faithfull, and therefore deſerued ſuccour; yet could not well bee relieued by the Achæans, with their owne proper ſtrength. Wherefore it was thought meet, that Embaſſadours ſhould bee ſent vnto the generall Councell of Achaia, requeſting leaue and good allowance, to trie the fauour of Antigonus in their neceſſitie. This was granted, for lack of what elſe to anſwere: and the ſame Embaſſadours diſpatched away to Antigonus. They did their owne errand briefly; telling him of the good will and reſpect which their Citie had of long time borne vnto him and his Predeceſſours; of their preſent neede; and how it would agree with his honour to giue them aide. But when they deliuered the more generall matter, wherein Aratus had giuen them inſtruction; ſhewing how the ambition of Cleomenes, and violence of the Ætolians, might redound to his owne great loſſe or danger, if the one and the other were not in time preuented; how Aratus himſelfe did ſtand affected; and what good likelihood there was of reducing the Achæans vnder the Patronage of Macedon: then beganne Antigonus to lend a more attentiue eare to their diſcourſe. He embraced the motion: and to giue it the more life, he wrote vnto the Megalopolitans, that his helpe ſhould not be wanting, ſo farre forth, as it might ſtand with the Achæans good liking. Particularly he commended himſelfe, by theſe Meſſengers, to Aratus; aſſuring them, that he thought himſelfe highly bound to this honourable man, whoſe former actions he now perceiued, not to haue beene grounded vpon any hatred to the Macedonians, but only vpon a iuſt and worthy loue to his owne Nation. With this anſwere they returne to Megalopolis: and are preſently ſent away to the Councell of Achaia; there to make ſome ſpeedy concluſion, as the neceſſitie of the time required.

The Achæans were glad to heare, that Antigonus was ſo inclinable to their deſire; and therefore were ready to entertaine his fauour, with all good correſpondence. Hereunto Aratus gaue his conſent; and praiſed the wiſedome of his Countrimen, that ſo well diſcerned the beſt and likelieſt meanes of their common ſafetie: adding neuertheleſſe, that it were not amiſſe, firſt of all to trie their owne abilitie; which if it failed, then ſhould they doe well to call in this gracious Prince, and make him their Patron and Protector. Thus hee ſhewed himſelfe moderate, in that which himſelfe of all others did moſt wiſh: to the end, that hee might not afterward ſuſtaine the common reprehenſion, if any thing fell out amiſſe; ſince it might appeare, that he had not beene Author of this Decree, but only followed, and that leiſurably, the generall conſent.

Neuertheleſſe in true eſtimation, this fineneſſe of Aratus might haue beene vſed, with his greater commendation, in a contrarie courſe. For it had beene more honourable, to make an end of the Warre, by yeelding vnto Cleomenes that power which they gaue vnto Antigonus: ſince therby he ſhould both haue freed his

Countrie from all further trouble; and withall ſhould haue reſtored vnto the vniuerſall ſtate of Greece, that honorable condition, whereof the Macedonians had bereſt it. But it is commonly found (which is great pittie) that Vertue hauing riſen to honour by degrees, and confirmed it ſelfe, (as it were) in the ſeat of Principalitie, by length of time, and ſucceſſe of many actions; can ill endure the haſtie growth of any others reputation, wherewith it ſees it ſelfe likely to bee ouer-topped. Other cauſe to deſpiſe the Lacedæmonians there was none; than that they lately had bin in dangerous caſe: neither could any reaſon be found, why Aratus ſhould prefer Antigonus before Cleomenes, than that he had ſtood in doubt of the one, when he thought himſelfe more mighty than the other. Wherefore he was iuſtly plagued, when he ſaw his owne honors reuerſed by the inſolent Macedonians; and in ſtead of liuing as a companion with Cleomenes, that was deſcended of a long race of Kings, the poſteritie of Hercules was faine to doe ſacrifice vnto Antigonus, as vnto a God, and was finally poiſoned by Philip, whoſe Nobilitie was but of fiue deſcents, and whom perhaps he might haue ſeene his fellowes, if he had not made them his Lords. By this inclination to the Macedonians, the loue of Ptolomie was loſt: who forthwith tooke part with Cleomenes, though he did not ſupply him with ſuch liberalitie, as hee had vſed to the Achæans; being warned, as may ſeeme, by their example, to be more warie both in truſting & diſburſing. Cleomenes himſelfe, whileſt this buſineſſe with Antigonus was a-foot, paſſed through Arcadia with an Armie, & laboured by all meanes to draw the Achæans to battaile. At the Citie of Dymes in Achaia were aſſembled all the remaining forces of the Nation; with which it was concluded, to make triall, whether perhaps they might amend their eſtate, without ſeeking helpe of the Macedonian. Thither went Cleomenes, and there fought with them; where hee had ſo great a victorie, that the enemie was no longer able to keepe the open field. The calamitie was ſuch, that Aratus himſelfe durſt not take vpon him to be their Generall, when his turne came in the next election. Wherefore the Achæans were compelled to ſue for peace; which was granted vpon this eaſie condition: That they ſhould not arrogate vnto themſelues the command of Peloponneſus, but ſuffer the Lacedæmonians (as in former ages) to be their Leaders in Warre. Hereunto if they would condeſcend, he promiſed vnto them, that he would preſently reſtore al places taken from them, and al his priſoners ranſom-free: alſo that they ſhould enioy their owne Lawes and Liberties without moleſtation. This gentle offer of Cleomenes was very pleaſing to the Achæans: who deſired him to come vnto the Citie of Lerna, where a Parliament ſhould be held, for the concluſion of the Warre.

Now ſeemed the affaires of Greece likely to be ſettled in better order, than they had euer beene ſince the beginning of the Peloponneſian Warres, yea or ſince the Perſian Inuaſion: when God, who had otherwiſe diſpoſed of theſe matters, hindred all, with a draught of cold water, which Cleomenes dranke in a great heat, and thereupon fell extreme ſick, and ſo could not be preſent at Lerna, but cauſed the Parliament to be deferred to another time. Neuertheleſſe he ſent home the chiefe of his priſoners, to ſhew that he meant none other than good faith. By this faire dealing he confirmed the Achæans in their deſire of his friendſhip: who aſſembled againe at Argos, there to eſtabliſh the League. But Aratus was violently bent againſt it; and ſought by great words, and terrible threats, to make his Countrimen afraid of reſoluing. When all would not ſerue turne, he betooke himſelfe to his cunning; and ſent word to Cleomenes, that hee ſhould doe well to leaue his Armie behinde him, and come alone into Argos, receiuing Hoſtages for ſafetie of his perſon. Cleomenes was already farre on his way, when he met with this aduertiſement: and tooke it in ill part, that he ſhould be thus deluded. For it had beene an eaſie matter, to haue told him ſo much at the firſt, and not haue made him come ſo farre with an Armie, which afterwards he muſt diſmiſſe. Yet that which chiefly ſeemes to haue troubled him, was the drift of his oppugners; who ſought thereby, either to make him wait without the gates, and deale only with themſelues and their Meſſengers; or if he would aduenture uenture himselfe into the Citie, then to depriue him of all Royall shew, that might breede respect of him in the Multitude. This was that indeede which Aratus feared, and for which he sought to hinder his comming thither in person: lest the people, hearing the promises of Cleomenes ratified by his owne mouth, should presently be wonne with his gentle words, & finish the bargaine without more adoe. Therefore Cleomenes wrote vnto the whole Councell, bitterly complaining against these iuggling tricks: and Aratus was not farre behinde with him, in as bitter an Oration. So betweene feare of the one, and reuerence of the other, the Assembly knew not how to proceede, but abruptly brake vp, leauing all as it were to fortune. Cleomenes tooke his aduantage of their present weakenesse, and renewed the Warre. Many Cities yeelded vnto him willingly; many hee forced; and partly by force, partly by terrour, he wanne Argos, which neuer King of Sparta before him could doe. In this case Aratus sent his owne sonne to Antigonus, entreating him to deferre no time, but come presently to relieue the distressed Achæans. Antigonus gaue as good words as could be wished: saying that he vtterly refused to doe any thing, vnlesse he might first haue Acrocorinthus put into his hand. This demand was somewhat like vnto that of the Hunter, who promised to helpe the Horse against his enemie the Stag: but with condition, that the Horse should suffer himselfe to be saddled & bridled. Aratus was herewithall contented, but wanted all honest colour to doe it: seeing the Corinthians had no way deserued, to be thus giuen away to the Macedonians. Yet at length an occasion was found; for that the Corinthians, perceiuing what he intended, were minded to arrest him. So hee withdrew himselfe out of their Citie, and sent word to Antigonus, that the Castle should bee ready to let him in. The Corinthians on the other side ranne to Cleomenes; who lost no time, but made haste with them to Corinth, where he sought how to get possession of their Castle, or at least to saue it from Antigonus, by surrounding it with Trenches, that none might issue nor enter without his leaue. Whilest this was in doing, he tooke speciall order, that Aratus his house and goods, within the Towne, should be safely kept for the Owner; to whom he sent Messenger after Messenger, desiring him to come to agreement, and not to bring in the barbarous Macedonians, and Illyrians, to Peloponnesus: promising that if he would harken to these perswasions, then would he giue him double the same pension, which hee had beene wont to receiue of King Ptolemie. As for the Castle of Corinth, which was the gate of Peleponnesus, and without which none could hold assured soueraigntie of the Countrie; he desired that it might not be committed vnto his owne disposition, but be iointly kept by the Lacedæmonians and Achæans. All this entreatie serued to no purpose. For Aratus, reiecting vtterly the motion, sent his owne sonne as an Hostage to Antigonus; and laboured with the Achæans, to put Acrocorinthus into his hands. Which when Cleomenes vnderstood, he seised vpon the goods of Aratus in Corinth, and wasted all the Countrie of Sicyon, whereof this his Aduersarie was natiue.

Antigonus in the meane time drew neere to the Isthmus; hauing passed with his Armie through Eubœa, because the Ætolians held the streights of Thermopylæ against him. This they did, either in fauour of Cleomenes, which they pretended; or in doubt of the greatnesse, whereunto the Macedonians might attaine by the good successe of this iournie. At his comming thither he found the Lacedæmonians ready to forbid his entrance: and that with sufficient strength; yet with no purpose to hazzard battaile, but rather to wearie him thence with hunger, against which hee came not well prouided. Antigonus therefore laboured hard to make his way by force; but he was not able so to doe: hee secretly got into the Corinthian Hauen; but was violently driuen out againe, with great losse of men; finally he resolued to turne aside, and seeke a passage ouer the gulfe of Corinth, to Sicyon, or some other part of Achaia; but this required much time, and great preparation, which was not easily made.

In this perplexitie newes from Argos came by Sea, that greatly comforted Antigonus, gonus, and no leſſe troubled his enemies; The Achæans were gotten into that Citie, and the Garriſon which Cleomenes had left therein, thoughit was not driuen out of the Citadell, yet was hardly diſtreſſed, and ſtood in neede of preſent helpe. Argos had alwaies bin enemie to Sparta, and well affected to the Kings of Macedon. When Cleomenes tooke it, he forbare to chaſe out thoſe whom he moſt ſuſpected, partly, at the entreatie of friends; and partly, for that they all made ſhew to be glad of his proſperitie. They were glad indeede of Cleomenes his victories, both in Argos and elſewhere, as many as hoped that he would cauſe all debtors to be diſcharged from their creditours, as he had lately done in Sparta. But that which Cleomenes had done in Sparta, was agreeable to the Spartan inſtitution: in other places, where it would haue beene tyrannicall, he did it not. Thereupon, ſuch as were diſappointed of their vniuſt hopes, beganne to turne good Common-wealths-men; and called him Tyrant for his doings at home, becauſe hee would not doe the like abroad. So they tooke their time; inuited the Achæans; aſſailed his Garriſon; cut in peeces the Reſcue that he ſent; and compelled him at length, to forſake the defence of Corinth, and looke vnto the enemies that were behind his backe. For when he vnderſtood, by continuall meſſages, that his men which held the Citadell at Argos, were almoſt loſt: hee beganne to feare, leſt his labour in guarding the entry ſhould grow friuolous; the Achæans in the meane while ſpoiling all that lay within. Therefore hee forſooke his cuſtodie of the Iſthmus, and made all haſte towards Argos: which if he could ſaue, he meant to truſt fortune with the reſt. And ſo farre he preuailed at his comming to Argos; that both Argiues and Achæans were glad to houſe themſelues, leauing him Maſter of the ſtreets: when the horſe-men of Antigonus were diſcouered a-farre off, haſting to relieue the Citizens; and Antigonus himſelfe (to whom Corinth was yeelded, as ſoone as the Spartan had turned his backe) following apace with the bodie of his Armie. Cleomenes therefore had no more to doe, than to make a ſafe retrait. This he did; and got him home into Laconia: looſing in ſhort ſpace all, or moſt, of that which he had beene long in getting.

Antigonus hauing ſhewed himſelfe at Argos, and commended the Citizens, went into Arcadia; where he wanne ſuch Caſtles as were held for Cleomenes, and reſtored them to the old Poſſeſſors. This done, he tooke his way to Ægium, where was held a Parliament by the Achæans: to whom he declared the cauſe of his comming, and ſpake braue wordes, that filled them with hope. The Achæans were not behinde with him; but made him Captaine Generall ouer them and their Confederates; and further entred into couenant with him, That they ſhould not deale with any Prince or State, either by writing or Embaſſadour, without his conſent. All this while, & ſomwhat longer, Aratus was the only man, that ſeemed to rule the Kings heart: carrying him to Sicyon, his owne Towne (for Winter was come on) where he not only feaſted him as a great Prince, but ſuffered more than humane honours, as ſacrifices and the like, to be done vnto him. This example of Aratus and his Sicyonians, was followed by the reſt of Achaia: which had made (forſooth) a very wiſe bargaine, if in ſtead of Cleomenes that would haue beene a King, it had obtained the protection of a God. But this God was poore; and wanting wherewith to pay his Macedonians, impoſed the burthen vpon the Achæans. This was hardly taken: yet worſe muſt be endured in hope of better. Neither was Aratus himſelfe ouer-carefully reſpected; when the ſtatues of thoſe Tyrants, which he had throwne downe in Argos, were againe erected by Antigonus; or when the ſtatues, which he had erected, of thoſe that had taken Acrocorinthus with him, were all throwne downe by the ſame King, and one only left vnto himſelfe at his earneſt entreatie. It might therefore appeare, that this God was alſo ſpightfull. Neuertheleſſe in taking reuenge vpon thoſe that offended him, Aratus did ſatisfie his owne paſſion by the aide of theſe Macedonians. For with extreme torments he did put Ariſtomachus to death, who had beene once Tyrant of Argos; afterwards Generall of the Achæans; and from them reuolting vnto Cleomenes, did fall at length into their hands. In like ſort handled hee (though not as yet) the Mantineans for their ingratitude and crueltie ſhewed to the Achæans. For he ſlue all the principall Citizens, and ſold the reſt, men, women, and children, all for bond-ſlaues: diuiding the ſpoile; two parts to the Macedonians, and the third to the Achæans. The Towne it ſelfe was giuen by Antigonus to the Argiues: who peopled it with a Colonie of their owne; and Aratus hauing charge of this buſineſſe, cauſed it to be new-named Antigonia. Surely of this crueltie there can be no better excuſe; than euen the flatterie, which Aratus was driuen to vſe to Antigonus: foraſmuch as it was a token of ſeruilitie, whereinto they had vrged and brought him; whom he, as in reuenge thereof, did thus requite. But leauing to ſpeake of this change, which the comming in of the Macedonian wrought, in the Ciuill ſtate of the Achæans; Let vs returne into his warre againſt the Lacedæmonian.

The next Summer Antigonus wanne Tegea, Mantinæa, Orchomenus, Heræa, and Telphuſſa: Mantinæa he diſpeopled, as was ſaid before; in Orchomenus he placed a Garriſon of his Macedonians; the reſt he reſtored to the Achæans: with whom he wintred at Ægium, where they held a Parliament. Once only Cleomenes had met him this yeare; and that was on the borders of Laconia, where he lay ready to defend his owne Territorie. The reaſon why he ſtirred no further, nor followed Antigonus to Mantinæa, and to thoſe other Townes that hee wanne, was this: He had few Souldiers, and not monie enough to wage more. Ptolemy the Ægyptian promiſed much, but would performe nothing, vnleſſe he might haue Cleomenes his own Mother, and his children in pledge. Theſe were ſent into Ægypt; yet the aide came not. For Ptolemie was ſlow; as dealing in the buſineſſe of Greece, rather for his mindes ſake, than vpon any apprehenſion of neceſſitie. Cleomenes therefore prouided for himſelfe, as well as his owne abilitie would ſerue. He manumiſed all the Heilotes, which were the Lacedæmonian ſlaues: taking monie for their libertie, and arming two thouſand of them, after the Macedonian faſhion. Hauing thus increaſed his forces, hee came on the ſudden to Megalopolis; that lay ſecure, as hauing defended it ſelfe in more dangerous times, and hauing now Antigonus neere at hand in Ægium. The Towne he wanne: but after he was entred, all that were fit to beare armes, roſe haſtily againſt him; & though they could not driue him out, yet ſaued the multitude, to whom they gaue a Port free for their eſcape. He ſent after the Citizens, offering their Towne and goods to them againe, if they would bee of his partie. But they brauely refuſed his offer: wherefore he ſacked and ruined it, carrying with him to Sparta a great bootie that he found therein. Theſe newes aſtoniſhed the Achæans at Ægium: who thereupon brake vp their Parliament. Antigonus ſent haſtily for his Macedonians, out of their wintering places: but they were ſo long in comming, that Cleomenes was ſafely gone home. Therfore he returned them back to their lodgings, and went himſelfe to Argos, there to paſſe the reſt of this vnlucky winter, ſomewhat further from the eyes of the greeued Achæans. When he had laine awhile at Argos, Cleomenes was at the gates; with no great number of men, yet with more than Antigonus had then about him. The Argiues perceiuing that their Countrie would be ſpoiled, if Antigonus did not iſſue into the field; were very earneſt with him to goe forth and fight. But hee was wiſer then to be moued with their clamours; and ſuffered them to ſee their villages burnt; to bid him reſigne his Office of Protector vnto ſome that were more valiant; and to ſatisfie their paſſions with fooliſh wordes; rather than he would be ouer-come in fight, and thereby loſe more honour than could eaſily be repaired. By this Cleomenes had his deſire, in weakning the reputation of his enemie: though he thereby added neither followers, nor other ſtrength, vnto Lacedæmon.

Afterwards, when the ſeaſon was more fit for warre, Antigonus gathered together all his troups; meaning to requite theſe brauado's of his enemie, with the conqueſt of Sparta. Cleomenes on the other ſide, laboured to keepe the warre from his owne gates; and therefore entred vpon the Countrie of Argos, where he made such hauocke, as drew Antigonus thither, from his intended inuasion of Laconia. Many great affronts the Macedonian was faine to endure, in coasting the Spartan King; that ranging ouer the Countrie of the Argiues, Phliasians, and Orchomenians, draue a Garrison of his out of Oligyrtis; and did sacrifice, as it were, before his face, in the suburbs of Argos, without the Temple of Iuno, that was shut vp; sending vnto him in scorne, to borrow the keyes. These were light things; yet serued to dishearten the Achæan side, and to fill the enemy with courage, which was no matter of light importance. Therefore hee concluded to lay apart all other regard of things abroad, and to put all to hazzard; by setting vp his rest, without more delay, vpon Sparta it selfe. He had in his Armie eight and twentie thousand foot, and twelue hundred horse, collected out of sundrie Nations, as Macedonians, Illyrians, Gaules, Epirots, Bœotians, Acarnanians, and others; together with the Achæans, and their friends of Peloponnesus. Cleomenes had of all sorts, twentie thousand, with which he lay at Selasia: fortifying slightly the other passages into Laconia, through which the Macedonians were not likely to seeke entrance. Antigonus comming to Selasia, found his enemie so strongly incamped, vpon and between the hils of Eua and Olympus, that he was constrained to spend much time there, before hee could aduance any one foot: neither lay it in his power to come hastily to blowes, which he greatly desired, without the hazzard of his whole armie, in assayling their wel-defenced Campe. But at length (as it happens, when men are wearie both of their hopes and feares) both Kings being resolued to make an end one way or other; Antigonus attempted with his Illyrians, to force that part which lay on the hill Eua, but his Illyrians were so ill seconded by the Achæan foot, that the Spartan horse, & light-armed foot, incamped in the streight vallie between those hils, issuing forth, fell vpon their skirts; and not onely disordered them, but were like to haue endangered al the rest. If Cleomenes himselfe had stood in that part of the battaile, he would haue made great vse of such a faire beginning. But Euclidas, his brother, a more valiant than skilfull Souldier, commanded in that wing: who neither followed this aduantage, nor tooke such benefit as the ground affoorded, whereon he lay. Philopœmen the Arcadian of Megalopolis, who afterwards proued a famous Captaine, serued then on horse, as a priuate yong man, among the Achæans. He seeing that all was like to goe to rout, if their Illyrians were driuen to fall backe vpon the Army following them; perswaded the Captaines of the Achæan horse, to break vpon the Spartan Mercinaries. But they would not: partly despising his youth and want of charge; partly, for that Antigonus had giuen order, that they should keepe their places, vntill they receiued a signe from him, which was not as yet. Philopœmen perceiuing them to be more orderly, than well aduised; entreated some of his owne Countrimen to follow him; gaue a charge vpon the Spartans; and forced them not onely to leaue the Illyrians, but seeke how to saue themselues. Being so farre aduanced, he found the place which the Illyrians had attempted, like enough to bee wonne, through the vnskilfulnesse of him that held it. Wherefore hee alighted, and perswaded the men at armes his Companions to doe the like: the folly of Euclidas being manifest, who kept the top of the Hill, and stirred not to hinder those that ascended, but waited for them in a Plaine, where they might fight vpon euen termes. So he recouered the Hill top; where though he was sore hurt, yet yee made good the place that he had gotten, vntill the whole Armie came vp to him; by which the Lacedæmonians were beaten from it, with great slaughter of them in their descent. This ouerthrow, and death of Euclidas, made Cleomenes lose the day: who fighting brauely on the other side, vpon Olympus, against Antigonus himselfe, was like to haue beene surrounded and lost, if he had not withdrawne himselfe with an extraordinarie speede. In this battaile ended the glorie of Lacedæmon, which, as a light readie to go out, had with a great, but not long blaze, shined more brightly of late, then in many ages past.

Cleomenes

Cleomenes fled vnto Sparta: where he had no desire to stay, finding onely two hundred left, of sixe thousand Spartans that he had led vnto this battaile, and most of his hired Souldiers dead, or gone away. So hee perswaded his people to yeelde themselues vnto Antigonus; and promising to doe all that should at any time lie in his owne power, for their good, he hasted away to the Sea-side (where he had shipping long before prouided, against all that might happen) and imbarqued himselfe for Ægypt. Hee was louingly entertained by Ptolemie Euergetes; who vndertooke to restore him to his Kingdome; and (perhaps) meant no lesse, as being much delighted with his gallant behauiour and qualities. In the meane season hee had a pension allowed him, of foure and twentie talents, yeerely. But this Ptolemie died; and his sonne Ptolemie Philopater succeeded him: a vicious yong Prince, wholly gouerned by lewd Women, and base Men, vnmindefull of all vertue, and hating any in whom it was found. When therefore Cleomenes was desirous to returne into Greece, whither the troubles in Peloponnesus did seeme to inuite him; Ptolemie, and his Minions, would neither giue him aide; nor yet dared to dismisse him (as he desired) to trie his owne friends in Greece, because he was too well acquainted with the weakenesse of Ægypt: nor well knew how to detaine him against his will. At length they deuised matter against him, and made him prisoner. The last act of him was; that with thirtie of his Countrimen, he vndertooke a desperate enterprize: breaking out of the prison, and prouoking the Alexandrians to rebell and seeke their libertie. In which attempt hee slue some enemies of his that he met; and hauing walked vp and downe the streets, without resistance (no man offering to take his part, or, which is very strange, to fight against him on the Kings behalfe) he, and his Companions, agreed together to bee ministers of their owne death. Vpon his dead bodie Ptolemie was bold to shew his indignation: and slue his Mother and Children, that had beene sent thither as Hostages, together with the wiues of his Adherents, as many as were there, attending vpon the old Queene. Such was the end of Cleomones; a generous Prince, but Sonne of Leonidas, who had caused Agis, with his Mother and Grand-mother, to come to such a bloudie ende, as now befell his owne Wife, Sonne, and Grand-children.

After the Victorie at Sellasia, Antigonus without resistance entred Sparta: whereinto neuer the force of any Enemie, before him, could make way. Hee kindely entreated the Citizens, and left them to their owne Lawes and Gouernment: tarrying there no longer, than two or three dayes; after which he hastened out of Peloponnesus, and neuer returned. The cause of his speedy departure was, an aduertisement that he receiued out of Macedon; how the Illyrians ouer-ranne, and destroied the Countrie. Had these newes come a little sooner; or had Cleomenes either deferred the fight, a few dayes longer, or at least-wise tarried a few dayes after the fight, in Sparta: the Kingdome of Lacedæmon would haue stood, and perhaps haue extended it selfe ouer all Greece. But God had otherwise determined.

Antigonus fought a great battaile with the Illyrians, and ouer-came them. Yet therein he caught his bane: not by any wound, but by ouer-strayning his voice; wherewith he brake a veine that bled inwardly, and in short space finished his life, who was troubled before with a consumption of the lungs. His Kingdome descended vnto Philip, the sonne of Demetrius, being then a Boy: as also about the same time it was, that Antiochus, surnamed (I know not why) the Great; and Ptolemie Philopater; beganne to raigne in Asia, and Ægypt; Boyes all. Of these, Ptolemie, though old enough to loue Harlots, when he first was King, yet continued a Boy, all the seuenteene yeeres of his raigne. The vnripe age of Philip and Antiochus, bred such intestine inconuenience to their Kingdomes, as is vsual in the minoritie of Princes: but their elder yeares brought them acquainted with the Romans; vpon which occasion, when it comes, we shall more seasonably speake of them, and of their Kingdomes, more at large.

§. VII.

How the Illyrians infested the coast of Greece; and how they were subdued by the Romans.

WHilest things thus passed in Greece; and whilest the Carthaginians were busie in their conquest of Spaine: the Romans had found themselues worke among the Sardinians and Corsicans, that were easily subdued at first, and easily vanquished againe, when they rebelled. They made also warre with the Illyrians, wherein they got much honour with little paine. With the Gaules they had much adoe, that lasted not long; being rather, as Liuie saith, a tumult then a warre. So that by al these light exercises, their valour was hardly kept from rust. How they got the Ilands in the Mediterran Sea, it hath bene shewed before: of their dealings with the Illyrians and Gaules, it is not meet to be vtterly silent.

Liu. l. 21.

The Illyrians inhabited the Country now called Slauonia: a troublesome Nation, impatient of rest, and continually making warre for gaine, without either regard of friend or foe. They were inuited by Demetrius King of Macedon, to helpe the Mydionians, his friends, that were besieged by the Ætolians, for that they refused to be of their society. Before the Illyrian succours came, the Mydionians were so far spent, that the Ætolians contended about the booty: the old Prætor, or chiefe Magistrate of their Nation, who was going out of his Office, clayming to haue the honour of the victory, and the diuision of the spoile to be referred vnto him; for that he had in a manner brought the siege to an end, and wonne the Towne: others, that were in hope to be chosen into the Office, contradicting this, and desiring that old orders might be kept. It was a pretie strife, and somewhat like to that of the French in later ages, who thought vpon diuiding the prey, before they had wonne the victories, which anon they lost, at Poitiers and at Agincourt. The Ætolians wisely compounded the difference, ordering it thus; That the old, and the new Prætor, should be ioyntly intitled in the victorie, and haue equall authoritie in distribution of the gettings. But the Illyrians finished the strife much more elegantly, and after another fashion. They arriued, and landed, ere any was aware of them; they fell vpon the Ætolians; & though good resistance was made, yet got the victorie, partly by force of their owne multitude, partly by helpe of the Mydionians, that were not idle in their owne businesse, but stoutly sallied out of the Towne. Many of the Ætolians were slaine, more were taken, their Campe and all their baggage was lost: the Illyrians tooke the spoile, and went their way; the Mydionians erected a Trophie, inscribing the names, both of their old and new Magistrate (for they also chose new Officers at the same time) as the Ætolians had directed them by example.

The successe of this voyage, highly pleased Agron King of the Illyrians: not only in regard of the monie, wherewith Demetrius had hired his assistance; or of the bootie that was gotten; but for that hauing vanquished the stoutest of the Greeks, hee found it not vneasie, to enrich himselfe by setting vpon the lesse warlike. For ioy of this he feasted, and dranke so immoderately, that he fell into a Pleurisie, which in few daies ended his life. His Kingdome, together with his great hopes, he left vnto Teuta, his wife.

Teuta gaue her people free libertie, to rob all Nation son at Sea, making no difference betweene friend and foe; as if shee had beene sole Mistresse of the salt Waters. Shee armed a fleet, and sent it into Greece: willing hee Captaines, to make warre, Warre where they found aduantage, without any further reſpect. Theſe fell with the weſterne coaſt of Peloponneſus; where they inuaded the Eleans, and Meſſenians. Afterwards they returned along by Epirus, & ſtayed at the Citie of Phœnice, to take in victuailes and other neceſſaries. There lay in Phœnice eight hundred Gaules; that hauing beene Mercinaries of the Carthaginians, went about to betray, firſt Agrigentum, then Eryx, to the Romans; but fayling to do either, they neuertheleſſe reuolted, and were for their miſdeedes diſarmed, and ſent to Sea by the Romans, yet entertained by theſe Epirots, and truſted to lie in Garriſon within their Towne. The Gaules were ſoone growne acquainted with the Illyrians, to whom they betraied Phœnice; which deſerued none other, in truſting them. Al Epirus was preſently in armes, and haſtned to driue out theſe vnwelcome gueſts. But whileſt the Epirots lay before the Towne, there came newes into their Campe, of another Illyrian Armie, that was marching thitherward by Land, vnder one Scerdilaïdas; whom Queene Teuta had ſent to help his fellowes. Vpon this aduertiſement, a part of them is ſent away towards Antigonia, to make good that Towne, and the ſtreights adioyning, by which theſe new commers muſt enter into their Countrie; another part of them remaines at Phœnice, to continue the ſiege. Neither the one, nor the other, ſped well in their buſineſſe. For Scerdilaïdas found meanes to joyne with his fellowes; and they that were beſieged within Phœnice, ſallied out of the towne, and gaue ſuch an ouerthrow to the Epirots, as made them deſpaire of ſauing their Countrie, without great and ſpeedie helpe from abroad. Wherefore Embaſſadours were ſent to the Achæans and Ætolians: craning their helpe, with very pittifull termes of entreatie. They obtained their ſuit; neither was it long, before an Armie, ſent by theſe two Nations, was readie in Epirus, to preſent battaile vnto Scerdilaïdas. But Scerdilaïdas was called home, by letters from Teuta the Queene, that ſignified a rebellion of ſome Illyrians againſt her: ſo that he had no minde to put his forces to hazzard, but offered compoſition; which was accepted. The agreement was, That the Epirots might ranſome their Towne, and all their people that were priſoners; and that the Illyrians ſhould quietly depart, with all their bootie and ſlaues. Hauing made this profitable and honourable bargaine; the Illyrians returned into their own Countrie by Land, ſending their bootie away by Sea.

At their comming home, they found no ſuch great trouble, as that which they brought, or had occaſioned in this voyage. For in fulfilling the commandement of their Queene, they had taken many Italian Marchants, whileſt they lay at Phœnice; and made them good prize. Hereof the complaints, made vnto the Roman Senate, were ſo frequent, that Embaſſadours were ſent to require of Teuta, that ſhe ſhould abſtaine from doing ſuch iniuries. Theſe Embaſſadours found her very iolly; both for the riches which her fleet had brought in; and for that ſhee had, in ſhort ſpace, tamed her Rebels, and brought al to good order, ſaue only the towne of Iſſa, which her forces held ſtreightly beſieged. Swelling with this proſperitie, ſhee could hardly affoord a good looke to the vnmannerly Romans; that found fault with her doings; and calling them by a true name, Pyracie, required amends. Yet when their ſpeech was ended, ſhe vouchſafed to tell them, That iniurie in publike ſhee would doe them none: as for priuate matters, no account was to be made of them; neither was it the manner of Kings to forbid their Subjects to get commoditie, how they beſt could, by Sea. But (ſaid the yonger of the two Embaſſadours) we Romans haue a manner, and a very laudable one, to take reuenge in publike, of thoſe priuate wrongs that are borne out by publike authoritie: therfore we ſhall teach you, God willing, to reforme your Kingly manners, and learne better of vs. Theſe words the Queene tooke ſo impatiently, that no reuenge could ſatisfie her, but the death of him that had ſpoken them. Wherefore, without all regard of the common Law of Nations, ſhee cauſed him to be ſlaine: as if that had beene the way, to ſet her heart at reſt; which was indeede the meane, to diſquiet and afflict it euer after.

The Romans, prouoked by this outrage, prepare two great Armies; the one by Sea, consisting of two hundred saile, commanded by C. Fulvius; the other by Land, led by A. Posthumus. They trouble not themselues any more, with requiring satisfaction: for this iniurie is of such nature, as must be requited with mortall warre. It is indeede contrarie to all humane Law, to vse violence towards Embassadours: the reason and ground whereof, seemes to bee this; that since without mediation, there would neuer be an end of warre and destruction, therfore it was equally receiued by all Nations, as a lesson taught by Nature, that Embassadors should passe freely, and in safetie, betweene enemies. Neuertheless, as I take it, this generall Law is not without limitation. For if any King, or State, lay hold vpon Embassadours sent by their enemies, not vnto themselues, but vnto some third, whom they should draw into the quarrell; then it is as lawfull, to vse violence to those Embassadours (thus emploied, to make the warre more terrible) as it is to kill the men of warre, and subiects, of an enemie. And so might the Athenians haue answered it, when they slew the Lacedæmonian Embassadours, that were sent to Xerxes, to draw him into a warre vpon the Athenians. Neither are those Embassadours, which practise against the person of that Prince, in whose Countries they reside, warranted by any Law whatsoeuer. For whereas the true Office of an Embassadour residing, is the maintenance of amitie; if it be not lawfull for one Prince, to practise against the life of another, much lesse may an Embassadour doe it without incurring justly the same danger of punishment, with other Traitors; in which case, his place giues him no priuiledge at all. But we will leaue this dispute to the Ciuilians; and goe on with the reuenge; taken by the Romans, for the slaughter of their Embassadour Coruncanus.

The Illyrian Queene was secure of the Romans, as if they would not dare to stirre against her. She was indeede in an errour; that hath vndone many of all sorts, greater and lesse than she, both before and since: Hauing more regard vnto fame, than vnto the substance of things. The Greekes were at that time more famous than the Romans; the Ætolians and Epirots had the name of the most warlike people in Greece; these had shee easily vanquished; and therefore thought, that with the Romans she should be litle troubled. Had she considered, that her whole Armie, which wrought such wonders in Greece, was not much greater, than of ten thousand men; and that neuertheless, it preuailed as much, by oddes of number, as by valour, or skill in armes; shee would haue continued to vse her aduantage, against those that were of more fame than strength, with such good caution, that she should not haue needed to oppose her late-gotten reputation, against those that were more mightie than her selfe. But she was a woman, and did what she listed. Shee sent foorth a greater fleet than before, vnder Demetrius of Pharos; with the like ample commission to take all that could bee gotten. This fleet diuided it selfe; and one part of it fell with [a] Dyrrachium; the other, with Corcyra. Dyrrachium was almost surprized by the Illyrians; yet was it rescued by the stout Citizens. In [b] Corcyra the Illyrians landed; wasted the Isle; and besieged the Towne. Hereupon the Ætolians and Achæans were called in to helpe: who came, and were beaten in a fight at Sea; losing, besides others of lesse note, Marcus Carynensis, the first Prætor of Achaia, whom Aratus succeeded. The Towne of Corcyra, dismaied with the ouerthow, opened the gates vnto Demetrius Pharius; who tooke possession of it, with an Illyrian Garrison; sending the rest of his forces to besiege Dyrrachium. In the meane season, Teuta was angrie with her Captaine Demetrius: I know not why; but so, as he resolued to trie any other course, rather than to trust her.

The Romans were euen readie to put to Sea, though vncertaine which way to take, when aduertisement was brought to C. Fulvius the Consull, of Demetrius his feare and discontent. Likely it was, that such an occasion might greatly helpe to aduance the businesse in hand. Wherefore the Consull sailed thither; where hee found the Towne of Corcyra so well prepared to his hand by Demetrius, that it not only receiued him willingly, but deliuered into his power the Illyrian Garrison, and submitted it selfe vnto the Roman protection. After

[b] Corcyra, an Iland of the Adriatick Sea, not farre from Durazzo: called now Corfu, and in the possession of the Venetians.

After this good beginning, the Conſull ſailed alongſt the coaſt, to [c] Apollonia; accompanied with Demetrius, whom he vſed thenceforth as his counſailer and guide. To Apollonia came alſo Poſthumus, the other Conſull, with the Land-Armie, numbred at twentie thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe. Thence they haſten towards Dyrrachium, which the Illyrians had beſieged; but vpon newes of the Roman Armie, they diſperſe themſelues. From thence the Romans enter Illyria, and take Parthenia; beat the Illyrians by Sea, take twentie of their ſhips; and enforce the Queene Teuta to forſake the coaſt, and to couer her ſelfe in Riſon, farre within the Land. In the end, part of the Romans haſte them homeward, and leaue the beſt places of Illyria in the hands of Demetrius; another part ſtaies behinde, and proſecutes the warre, in ſuch ſort, that Teuta was forced to begge peace: which ſhee obtained vpon miſerable conditions; to wit, That ſhee ſhould quit the better part of Illyria, & pay tribute for the reſt; and from thenceforth, neuer ſend any of her ſhips of warre, towards the coaſts of Greece, beyond the Iland of Liſſa: except it were ſome one or two veſſels, vnarmed, and by way of Trade.

[c] Apollonia, a Citie neere Dyrrachium, or Durazzo, vpon the Sea-coaſt. Pinetus calls it Siſſopolis.

After this Illyrian warre, the Romans ſent Embaſſadours into diuers parts of Greece, ſignifying their loue to the Countrie, and how, for good will thereunto, they had made warre with good ſucceſſe vpon Teuta, and her people. They hoped, belike, that ſome diſtreſſed Cities would take this occaſion, to deſire their patronage: which if it hapned, they were wiſe enough to play their owne games. But no ſuch matter fell out. The Embaſſadours were only rewarded with thankes; and a decree made at Corinth, That the Romans thenceforth might be partakers of the Iſthmian paſtimes. This was an idle courteſie, but well meant by the vaine Greekes, and therefore well taken by the Romans: who by this Illyrian Expedition got nothing in Greece, ſaue a little acquaintance, that ſhall be more hereafter.

§. VIII.

Of the warre betweene the Romans and Gaules, ſomewhat before the comming of HANNIBAL into Italie.

THe Gaules that dwelt in Lumbardie, were the next, againſt whom the Romans tooke Armes. Theſe were a populous Nation, and often moleſted Rome; ſometimes with their owne forces, and ſometimes with the aſſiſtance of thoſe that inhabited France. Once their fortune was good; when they tooke Rome, and burnt it: though the iſſue of that warre proued not anſwerable to the beginning, if we may giue credit vnto Roman Hiſtorians. In following times, their ſucceſſe was variable, and commonly bad. Many ouerthrowes they receiued; and if they got any victorie, it yeelded them no profit, but was ſoone extorted out of their hands. They were indeede more fierce, than well aduiſed: lightly ſtirred vp to warre, and lightly giuing ouer. At the firſt brunt, they were ſaid to be more than men; but when that was paſt, leſſe than women. The Romans were acquainted with their temper, by long experience; and knew how to handle them: yet gaue alwaies carefull heede to their approch, were it only bruited. For the danger of them was ſudden, and vncertaine; by reaſon of their neighbourhood, and want of intelligence among them. Few of their attempts vpon Rome, were called warres, but tumultus Gallici; tumults of the Gaules; and rightly. For they gaue many alarms to Italie, and vſed to riſe with great Armies: but after a few dayes march, and ſometimes before their ſetting forth, any ſmall occaſion ſerued to diſperſe them. Hauing receiued an ouerthrow; they would reſt ten, or twelue yeeres, ſometimes twentie or thirtie: till they were ſtirred vp againe, by yonger heads, vnacquainted with the danger. Whileſt they reſted; the ſtate of Rome, that againſt theſe made only defenſiue warre, had leiſure to grow, by ſetting vpon vpon others. Herein God prouided well for that Monarchie, which hee intended to raiſe: that the Gaules neuer fell vpon Italie, with a mighty power, in the time of any other great and dangerous warre. Had they attempted to conquer it, whileſt Pyrrhus was trauailing in the ſame enterpriſe; or in either of the two former Punick warres: it may be doubted what would haue become of this imperious Citie. But it ſeemes that the Gaules had no better intelligence in the affaires of Italie, than ſtrangers had in Gaule. At leaſt, they knew not how to vſe their times: and were therefore like to ſmart, whenſoeuer the enemies, whom they had much prouoked, and little hurt, ſhould finde leiſure to viſit them at their owne home: which was now after the firſt Punick Warre. Once before this, the Romans had beene bold, to ſet vpon the Gaules in their owne Countrie: and that was three yeeres before the coming of Pyrrhus into Italie. At that time the Senones, a Tribe of the Gaules, inuading Hetruria, and beſieging Arretium, had wonne a great battaile and ſlaine L. Cæcilius with the moſt of his Armie. Mannius Curius the new Conſull, ſent Embaſſadours to them, to treat about ranſome of priſoners. But theſe Embaſſadours they ſlue. Therefore when fortune turned to the better, the Romans followed it ſo well, that they expelled theſe Senones out of their Countrie, and ſent a Colonie of their owne to inhabit it. This cauſed the [e] Boij, another people of Gaule, to feare the like meaſure: who thereupon tooke armes, and drew the Hetrurians to their ſide. But the Romans ouerthrew them in two great battailes; and thereby made them ſue for peace, which laſted vntill this end of the Illyrian warre.

e There were diuers nations of the Boij; as in Pannonia, Illyria, Germanie, in Bourbonois in France, and in Aquitane; but theſe Boij were of the French race, & dwelt at this time about the mouth of the Riuer of Po.

It vexed the Gaules, to ſee a Roman Colonie planted in their Countrie; who had beene accuſtomed to enlarge their bounds, by driuing out their Neighbours perforce. Wherefore they laboured with the Tranſalpines (ſo the Romans called thoſe in France, as lying from them beyond the Alpes, though to vs they are neerer; like as they called Ciſalpines, or by-bither the Alpes, thoſe who dwelt betweene them and the Mountaines) to draw them to their party: reaſonably preſuming, that as their diſiunction had cauſed their loſſe, ſo their vnion might recompence it, with large amends. But the buſineſſe was ſo fooliſhly carried, that the Ciſalpines and Tranſalpines, fell together by the eares, putting the Romans only to a tumult, without further trouble of warre. Soone after, they were vrged by a greater indignitie, to goe more ſubſtantially to worke. For C. Flaminius, a popular man in Rome, propoſed a Decree which was ratified by the people; That, beſides one Colonie already planted in the territorie of the Senones, as many more ſhould be caried thither, as would ſerue to people the whole Countrie betweene Ancona and Ariminum: exterminating vtterly thoſe Gaules. Such an offer, were it made in England, concerning either Virginia, or Guiana it ſelfe, would not ouer-joy the Multitude. But the Commonaltie of Rome tooke this in ſo good part, notwithſtanding all danger joyned with the benefit, that Flaminius had euer after their good will.

This dreadfull Preſident extremely diſpleaſed the Boij: who being Neighbours to Ariminum, feared the like diſplantation. And becauſe all the reſt of the Gaules had reaſon to reſolue, that themſelues alſo ſhould bee rooted out by degrees; the great Nation of the Inſubrians, which inhabited the Duchie of Milan, joyned with the Boij, & vpon a common purſe entertained the Geſſates, Nations about Rhodanus, wageable as the Switzers in theſe times. The Geſſates hauing receiued a great Impreſt, come to the field vnder the conduct of their Kings, Concolitanus & Aneroeſtus: who with the Boij and Inſubrians, compound an Armie of fiftie thouſand foot, and twentie thouſand horſe, and thoſe of the beſt men, and beſt appointed, that euer inuaded the Roman Territorie; to whom, the Seno-galli, that had beene beaten out of their poſſeſſions, gaue a great increaſe of ſtrength. On the contrarie ſide, the Venetians, and the [f] Cenomanni, adhered to the Romans: as better beleeuing in their proſperitie and riſing fortune. For feare of whoſe incurſions therefore, the Gaules were forced to leaue a good part of their Armie, on the frontier of Milan: With the reſt of their forces they entred into Tuſcane. The Romans hearing of this danger, ſend f Cenomanni, are the people about Bergamo, on the North-ſide of the Riuer Po in Italie. There were alſo of theſe Cenomanni in France, and inhabited the Countie of Maine.

ſend Æmilius to Rimine, to ſtop their paſſage; and in the place of C. Atilius their other Conſull, who then was in Sardinia, they imploy one of their Prætors, for the defence of Tuſcane.

Being at this time greatly troubled, with the conſideration of this powerfull Armie, which the Gaules had aſſembled, they cauſed a view to bee taken, as well of all their owne forces, as of thoſe of their Allies: who were no leſſe willing than themſelues, to oppoſe the incurſions of the barbarous people; fearing, as they had cauſe, that their owne deſtruction could not bee preuented otherwiſe, than by the good fortune of Rome. The numbers, found in this Muſter, deſerue to be recorded: because they ſet out the power of the Romans in thoſe dayes. With the Conſulls they ſent forth to the warre foure Legions of their owne: euery Legion conſiſting of fiue thouſand two hundred foot, and three hundred horſe; and of their Allies, thirtie thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe. There were alſo appointed for Supplies (if any miſaduenture came to theſe) of the Sabines and Hetrurians fiftie thouſand foot, & foure thouſand horſe; which Armie was to be lodged in the border of Hetruria. Of the Vmbri and Sarſinates, which inhabited the Apenines, there were twentie thouſand; and of the Venetians and Cenomans, other twentie thouſand: which latter Armies were directed, to inuade the Boij, that forcing them to defend their owne Territories, the generall Armie of the Gaules ſhould be thereby greatly diminiſhed. There were beſides theſe, to bee ready againſt all vncertaine chances of warre, thirtie thouſand foot, and fifteene hundred horſe, garriſond in Rome it ſelfe, of their owne people; and of their Allies, thirtie thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe. Ouer and aboue theſe great troupes; in the Roll of the Latines, that was ſent vnto the Senate, there were numbred foureſcore thouſand foot, and fiue thouſand horſe; in that of the Samnites, ſeuentie thouſand foot, and of horſe ſeuen thouſand, in that of the [g] Iapyges, and Meſſapyges, fiftie thouſand foot, and ſixteene thouſand horſe; the Lucans ſent a liſt of thirtie thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe; the [h] Marſi, [i] Marrucini, [k] Ferentani, and the Veſtini, of twentie thouſand foot, and foure thouſand horſe. The Romans had alſo two Legions in Sicil, and about Tarentum, containing eight thouſand foure hundred foot, and foure hundred horſe. So as of the Romans and Campans jointly, reckoning men armed, and fit to beare armes, there were regiſtred two hundred and fiftie thouſand foot; and of horſe, three and twentie thouſand: of which, reckoning the Romans apart, there were an hundred and fiftie thouſand foot and about ſixe thouſand horſe. Caſting vp the whole forces of all the Prouinces in Italie, both of the Romans and their Confederates, it amounted to ſeuen hundred thouſand foot, and ſeuentie thouſand horſe. But the number is ſomewhat miſſe-caſt by Polybius; not with a purpoſe to enrich himſelfe by the dead paies: for where he reckons nine hundred horſe too many, he falls ſhort nine thouſand two hundred of the foot.

How great ſoeuer this Muſter was, it ſeemes to haue beene like vnto that, which Lodowick Sforza made, when Lewes the twelfth inuaded Milan: at what time, the better to encourage himſelfe, and his ſubjects, hee tooke a Roll of all perſons able to beare armes, within the Duchie, though indeed he were neuer able to bring a tenth part of them into the field. Certaine it is, that the battailes of Trebia, Traſymene, and Cannæ, did not conſume any ſuch proportion, as was anſwerable to this large accompt. Yet were the Romans faine to arme their ſlaues, euen for want of other Souldiers, after their ouerthrow at Cannæ. Wherefore the marualle is not great, that the Carthaginians and others were little terrified, with report of ſuch a multitude. For all heads are not fit for helmets: though the Roman Citizens were, in generall, as good fighting men, as elſewhere might be found.

Notwithſtanding all theſe counter-preparations, the Gaules keepe on their way: and entring into Tuſcane, deſtroy, and put to fire and ſword, all that lay before them. From thence they march directly towards Rome; hoping to finde the Romans, rather in deliberation, than in the field. But their intelligence failes them. For the g Iapyges and Meſſapyges ſeeme to be one Nation; who are alſo called Salentines, Peucetians, Apulians, and Calabrians. The Countrie is now Apulia, containing the Northermoſt head-land of Calabria.

h A people of the kingdome of Naples.

i Ptolomy cals them a people of Italie.

k A people of Campania, called to this day Ferentines, ſaith Leander.

Roman Armie, ſent into Tuſcane, hauing taken ſome other way than they did, and finding that it had miſſed of them, came againe faſt after them, to arreſt them in their journie. Hereof when they heard the rumour, fearing to be charged on their backes, they turned head: and in the ſame euening diſcouered the Roman Armie, by whom they incamped. It was now a matter of apparant neceſſitie, that fight they muſt. Wherefore they helped themſelues with a ſtratageme: that ſhewed no great fineneſſe of wit, but ſuch, as well beſeemed thoſe that had none other occupation than warre; and ſtood them in good ſtead at the preſent. In the dead of the night, they cauſe their foot to march away, but not farre: leauing their horſe in guard; to whom they giue order, to come off at the firſt light of day, with ſuch a ſpeede, as might rather argue a running away, than a retrait, as if they had not dared to abide battaile. The Romans, interpreting this their haſtie departure, as the Gaules deſired they ſhould, follow them in diſorder. The Gaules returne, charge them; and kill ſixe thouſand vpon the place; the reſt take a peece of ground of aduantage, and defend themſelues, till L. Æmilius, being at Arimmum, comes to their ſuccour. Vpon the comming of the Conſull, the Gaules conſult, whether they ſhould giue the Romans battaile, or forbeare. In which diſpute, Aneroeſtus, one of their Kings, perſwades them, rather to returne into their owne Countries; where, after they had diſpoſed of the great ſpoiles and riches which they had gotten, they ſhould then renew the warre, being without carriage, peſter, or other impediment. This aduice they all embrace; for ſeeing they that were Mercinaries, had obtained what they came for, to wit, the ſpoiles of their enemies; they thought it wiſedome, to hazzard neither it, nor themſelues, any further.

This indeede had beene a good reſolution, if they had taken it, before the enemie had beene in ſight. But as well in the warres of theſe latter ages, as in former times, it hath euer beene found extreme dangerous, to make a retrait in the Head of an enemies Armie. For although they that retire, doe often turne head; yet in alwaies going on from the purſuing enemie, they finde within a few miles, either ſtreight, hedge, ditch, or place of diſaduantage, which they are inforced to paſſe in diſorder. In ſuch caſes, the Souldier knowes it, as well as the Captaine, that he which forſakes the field, perceiues, and feares ſome aduantage of the Enemies. Feare, which is the betraier of thoſe ſuccours that Reaſon offereth, when it hath once poſſeſt the heart of man, it caſteth thence both courage and vnderſtanding. They that make the retrait, are alwaies in feare to be abandoned; they that leade the way, feare to be ingaged: and ſo the hindmoſt treads on his heeles that is foremoſt, and conſequently, all disband, runne, and periſh, if thoſe that fauour the retrait, be not held to it by men of great courage. The miſerable ouerthrow, that the French receiued in Naples, in the yeere 1503. vpon a retrait made by the Marques of Sal, doth teſtifie no leſſe. For although a great troupe of French horſe, ſuſtained the purſuing enemie a long time, and gaue the foot leiſure to trot away; yet being retarded by often turnings, the Spaniſh foot ouer-tooke, and defeated them vtterly. During the warres betweene the Imperialls, and the French; Boiſi and Mont were loſt at Brignolles, who in a brauerie would needes ſee the enemie, before they left the field. So was Stroſi ouerthrowne, by the Marques of Marignan, becauſe he could not be perſwaded, to diſlodge the night before the Marques his arriuall. Therefore did the French King Francis the firſt, wiſely: when without reſpect of point of honour, he diſlodged from before Landerſey, by night; as many other, the moſt aduiſed Captaines, (not finding themſelues in caſe to giue battaile) haue done. Ie ne trouue point (ſaith the Marſhall MONLVC) au fait des armes choſe ſi difficile, qu'vne retrait; I finde nothing in the arte of warre ſo difficult, as, to make a ſafe retrait. A ſure Rule it is, that there is leſſe diſhonor to diſlodge in the darke, than to be beaten in the light. And hereof M^r. de la Noüe giues this judgement, of a daies retrait, made in France, preſently before the battaile of Moncountour. For (ſaith he) ſtaying vpon our reputation, in ſhew not to diſlodge by night; we loſt our reputation indeede, by diſlodging by day: whereby whereby we were forced to fight vpon our diſaduantage, and to our ruine, And yet did that worthy Gentleman, Count Lodowick of Naſſau, brother to the late famous Prince of Orange, make the retrait at Moncountour with ſo great reſolution, as hee ſaued the one halfe of the Proteſtant Armie, then broken and disbanded, of which my ſelfe was an eye-witneſſe; and was one of them that had cauſe to thanke him for it.

Now the Gaules, embracing the ſafe aduice (as they take it) of one of their Kings; turne their backs to the enemie, & their faces homeward. Æmilius followes them, as neere as he can, without ingaging himſelfe, attending his aduantage. In the meane while, C. Atilius the other Conſull, with the Legions of Sardinia, lands at Piſa; ſo as the Gaules, incloſed betweene two Armies, are forced to fight. They therefore equally ſtrengthen their Reare, and Front. To ſuſtaine Æmilius, they appoint the Geſſates, and the Milanois; in the Front, they range the Piemontois, and the reſt of the Gaules inhabiting vpon the Riuer of Po. The manner of the fight Polybius deſcribeth at large: which was well fought of all hands. But in the end the Gaules fell; and ſo did Atilius the Conſull: who died in the place, accompanied with the two Kings of the Gaules, Concolitanus and Aneroeſtus, with fortie thouſand of their Vaſſalls.

After this fatall ouerthrow, the Gaules loſt courage; and, ere long, all that they held in Italie. For they were inuaded the yeere following this ouerthrow, by the new Conſulls, Fuluius, and Manlius. The Romans knew well how to vſe their victorie: they gaue not ten, twentie, or thirtie yeeres time, to the Gaules, to repaire their forces, as the Gaules had done to them. Theſe new Conſulls beat the Boij; but by reaſon of the great raines that fell, and the great peſtilence that raigned, they were compelled for that preſent to ſurceaſe. In the ſecond yeere, Furius, and Flaminius, inuade the Milanois; and preuaile very farre, being ſtrongly aſſiſted by the Cenomanni and the Venetians. Neuertheleſſe theſe Conſulls were reuoked out of their Prouince, by the Senate of Rome, and compelled to reſigne their Office: becauſe the Augures, or Soothſayers, had found, that ſome token or other of the Birds (in which, and all ſorts of their diuination, the Romans were extremely ſuperſtitious) had not only foreſhewed little good, when they were choſen, but had alſo nullified the election. C. Flaminius, receiuing letters of this reuocation, from the Senate, and being otherwiſe aduertiſed of the contents, was not haſtie to open them: but firſt gaue battaile vnto the enemies, vanquiſhed them, and ſpoiled their Countrie; then perʋſed the letters; and returning home obtained a triumph, ſore againſt the will of the Senate, and not altogether with good liking of the people, who yet bare him out, for that hee ſided in faction with the Commonaltie, though a man of great Nobilitie.

This was that Flaminius, who had propoũded the Decree, for diuiding the Countrie of the Senones among the people of Rome. He was the firſt, or one of the firſt, that vnderſtanding the Majeſtie of Rome to be indeed wholly in the people, and no otherwiſe in the Senate, than by way of Delegacie, or grand Commiſſion; did not ſtand highly vpon his birth and degree, but courted the multitude, & taught them to know and vſe their power, ouer himſelfe, and his fellow-Senators, in reforming their diſorders. For this, the Commons highly eſteemed him, and the Senators as deeply hated him. But he had the ſurer ſide, and found imitatours, that roſe by the ſame arte; which in proceſſe of time, grew the only or chiefe way to preferment.

Flaminius and his Colleague, being depoſed; M. Claudius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio, were choſen Conſulls, for the reſt of that yeere. The Gaules about this time deſired peace, and were like to haue obtained it: though the new Conſulls were againſt it, as fearing to want worke. But when thirtie thouſand of the Geſſates, following their King Britomarus, were come ouer the Alpes, and joyned with the Inſubrians: all other diſcourſe, than of preſent warre, was at an end. So the Conſulls haſted into their Prouince, where they beſieged Acerræ, a towne not farre from Nouaro (ſo farre had the Romans pierced already) in the Duchie of Milan. To diuert them them from this siege, Britomarus sate downe before Clastidium, a Towne in the same Tract, with great part of his forces: leauing the rest, with the Insubrians, to attend vpon the Consulls at Acerræ, and to looke to the defence of Milan. But this would not suffice, to make the Romans breake vp their siege. Marcellus, taking with him the greatest part of the horse, & fixe hundred foot lightly armed; thought to deale well enough with those at Clastidium. Britomarus heard of the Consulls comming; and met him vpon the way: so suddenly, that the Romans had no leisure to rest themselues after their journie, but were compelled instantly to fight: Herein Britomarus had done well; if he had not forthwith, in a rash brauerie, lost his game at a cast. He had aduantage enough in number, both of horse and foot: but he thought so well of his owne personall valour, that he rode out single before his Armie, prouoking any one to fight with him. Marcellus was no lesse daring, than the barbarous King: whether more wise in this action, I will not dispute; he was more fortunate, and that sufficed to commend him. He slue and disarmed Britomarus, in presence of both Armies: whereby his owne men tooke such courage, and his enemies were so dismaied, that without much trouble of fight, the Romans obtained a great victorie.

This was the third and last time, that euer any Roman Generall slue the Generall of the enemies, with his owne hand. To this kinde of victorie, belonged a peculiar triumph; whereof only Romulus, Cossus, and this Marcellus, had the honour: yet I dare say, that the two Scipio's, and diuers other Roman Captaines, especially Cæsar, were better men of warre than any of these three; though they neuer offered vp to IVPITER, Opima spolia; The Armour of a Generall slaine by themselues, when they were Generalls, nor perhaps affected so to doe.

After this victorie, Acerræ was yeelded to the Romans; and Milan soone after: with all that belonged to the Cisalpines, or Gaules, that dwelt in Lumbardie. Thus was that valiant and mighty Nation, that had for so many yeeres vexed the State of Rome, and in former times taken the Citie it selfe, brought to nothing in a short time, their pleasant and fertile Territorie possest by the Romans; and the remainder of their Nation, inhabiting, Italie, so many as would not subject their neckes to the Roman yoke, either forced to abandon their Countries, or to hide themselues in the cold and barren Mountaines, like Out-lawes and Theeues. And thus did the Romans spend the three and twentie yeeres, following the peace made with Carthage. In part of which time, they were at such leisure, that they closed vp the Temple of Ianus: which they neuer did before, (it standing alwaies open, when they had any warre) saue once, in the raigne of Numa; nor in long time after, vntill the raigne of Augustus. But this their present happinesse was not to last long:

a dangerous warre, and perhaps the greatest that had euer beene, was to come vnto their gates; which being well ended, they might boldly vndertake, to extend their Monarchie as farre, as their ambition could reach.

CHAP. III.

§ I.

The warres of HANNIBAL in Spaine. Quarrels between the Romans and Carthaginians. HANNIBAL beſiegeth and taketh Saguntum, whileſt the Romans are buſied with the Illyrians. Warre proclaimed betweene Rome and Carthage.

HANNIBAL, the ſonne of Amilcar, was about ſixe and twentie yeeres old, when hee was choſen Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spaine. Hee was elected by the Armie, as ſoone as Aſdrubal was dead: and the election was ratified by the ſtate at Carthage; wherewith Hanno and his Complices were nothing pleaſed. This was now the third of the Barchine family (ſo called of Amilcar, whoſe ſurname was Barcas) that had command in chiefe, ouer the men of warre. Which honour would perhaps haue beene leſſe enuied, by theſe domeſticall enemies; if the Allies and Friends of the Barchine houſe, had not alſo borne the whole ſway in gouernment, and beene the only men regarded, both by the Senate and the people. This generall good-will, as it was firſt purchaſed by the moſt worthy deſerts of Amilcar, in ſauing his Countrie from imminent ruine, enlarging the Dominion thereof, and enriching it with treaſures and great reuenewes; ſo was it retained by the ſame good artes, among his friends and followers. Hanno therefore, and his Partiſans, being neither able to taxe the vertue of their enemies, that was vnreproueable; nor to performe the like ſeruices vnto the Common-weale; had nothing left, whereby to value themſelues, excepting the generall reprehenſion of Warre, and cautelous aduice of not prouoking the Romans. This they ſeaſoned otherwhiles with detraction; ſaying, that the Barchine faction went about to oppreſſe the libertie of the Citie. But their malicious words were vnregarded; and if it were factious, to beare ill will to Rome, then were all the Citizens (very few excepted) no leſſe Barchine, than Hannibal himſelfe. For it was long ſince apparent, that the oath of the Romans, to the articles of peace, affoorded no ſecuritie to Carthage; were ſhee neuer ſo quiet, and officious; vnleſſe ſhe would yeeld to become their Subiect. Since therefore the peace was like to hold no longer, than vntill the Romans could find ſome good aduantage, to renew the Warre: it was rather deſired by the Carthaginians, that whileſt their owne ſtate was in good caſe, the warre ſhould beginne; than that in ſome vnhappie time of famine or peſtilence, or after ſome great loſſe of Armie or Fleet, they ſhould be driuen to yeeld vnto the impudent demands of their enemies; & to giue away baſely their lands and treaſures, as they had lately done; or miſerably fight, vpon termes of diſaduantage.

This diſpoſition of his Countrimen, Hannibal well vnderſtood. Neither was he ignorant (for his father, and other friends, had long time deuiſed of this buſineſſe) that in making warre with the Romans, it was no ſmall aduantage to get the ſtart of them. If once he could bring an Armie into Italie, without moleſtation; there was good hope, that he ſhould finde friends and aſſiſtance, euen of thoſe people, that helped to increaſe the Roman armies in forreigne wars. But this could neuer be effected, if the matter were openly disputed at Carthage. For it was to be doubted, that the Carthaginians, how glad soeuer they would be, to heare that he had set the war on foot, would neuertheleſſe bee ſlow and timorous as commonly men are in the beginning of great enterprises, if the matter were referred to their deliberation. Which if it ſhould happen; then were the Romans like to be made acquainted, not onely with the generalities of his purpoſe, but with ſuch particulars as muſt be diſcourſed of, in procuring allowance to his deſſigne. This might ſuffice to diſorder the whole Proiect. Wherfore, he reſolued to lay ſiege vnto Saguntum; which might ſeeme not greatly to concerne the Romans; and would highly pleaſe the Carthaginians, that had freſh in mind the indignitie of that Spaniſh Townes alliance with their falſe friends. So ſhould hee aſſaie both the patience of his enemies, and the diſpoſition of his owne Citizens.

Hauing thus concluded, he neuertheleſſe went faire and orderly to worke: and beginning with thoſe that lay next in his way, approached vnto Saguntum by degrees. This he did (ſaith Liuie) to giue ſome colour to his proceedings: as if he had not principally intended the warre againſt Saguntum, but had been drawne thither by courſe of buſineſſe. Yet reaſon teacheth plainly, that without regard of ſuch formalities, it was needefull to finiſh the conqueſt of the reſt, before hee did any thing that ſhould prouoke the Romans. Firſt therefore he entred vpon the Territorie of the * Olcades; and hauing beſieged Althæa (Liuie calleth it Carteia) their chiefe Citie, he became, in a few dayes, Maſter, not only therof, but of all the other townes of their Countrie. This Nation which he firſt vndertooke, being ſubdued, and the winter at hand; he reſted his Armie in New Carthage, or Carthagena; and imparted liberally to the Souldiers, the ſpoiles he had gotten in his late conqueſt.

In the Spring following, he purſued the warre againſt the [a]Vaccæi: and without any great difficultie, wanne firſt Salmantica, now called Salamanca; and after it, [b] Arbucala, by aſſault: though not without a long ſiege, and great difficultie. But in his returne, he was put to the heighth, both of his courage, and of his Martiall iudgement. For all ſuch of the Vaccæi, as were able to beare armes, being made deſperate by the ſpoile of their Countrie, with thoſe of Salamanca, and of the Oleades, that had eſcaped in the late ouer-throw, joyning themſelues with the Toletans; compounded an Armie of an hundred thouſand able men: and ſtayed Hannibal on the bankes of the Riuer Tagus, which runneth to the Sea by Lisbourne in Portugale. Theſe foure nations, hauing had experience of Hannibals inuincible courage, and that he neuer ſaw enemie, vpon whom he durſt not giue charge; were throughly reſolued, that his natural valour would at this time no leſſe neglect the cold aduice of diſcretion, than at other times it had ſeemed to doe, when the like great occaſion perſwaded him to vſe it. But he that makes himſelfe a bodie of Cryſtall, that all men may looke through him, and diſcerne all the parts of his diſpoſition; makes himſelfe (withall) an Aſſe: and thereby teacheth others, either how to ride, or driue him. Wiſe men, though they haue ſingle hearts in al that is iuſt and vertuous; yet they are like coffers with double bottomes: which when others looke into, being opened, they ſee not all that they hold, on the ſudden, and at once. It is true, that this ſubtile Carthaginian, when he ſerued vnder Aſdrubal, was, of al the men of marke in the Armie, the moſt aduenturous. But that which may beſeeme a Captaine, or inferiour Commander, doth not alwaies become a Chiefe; though it hath ſometime ſucceeded well with ſuch great ones, as haue beene found more fortunate, than wiſe. At this time, our great Man of warre knew as well how to diſſemble his courage, as at other times to make it good. For he with-drew himſelfe from the Riuer ſide, as if fearefull to foord it; thereby to draw ouer that great multitude, from their bankes of aduantage. The Spaniards, apprehending this in ſuch ſort, as Hannibal deſired that they ſhould; thruſt themſelues in furie and diſorder, into the ſwift ſtreame, with a purpoſe to charge the Carthaginians, abandoning (as they thought for feare) the defences on the contrarie ſide. But when Hannibal ſaw ſaw them in their way, and well-neare ouer; he turned backe his Elephants to entertaine them at their landing: and thruſt his Horſe-men, both aboue and beneath them, into the Riuer. Theſe carrying a kind of Lance de gay, ſharpe at both ends, which they held in the middeſt of the ſtaffe; had ſuch an aduantage ouer the foot, that were in the Riuer, vnder their ſtrokes, clattered together, and vnable to moue or ſhift their bodies, as on firme ground: that they ſlew all thoſe, (in a manner) without reſiſtance, which were alreadie entred into the water; and purſued the reſt, that fled like men amazed, with ſo great a ſlaughter, as from that day forward, there was not any Spaniard, on that ſide the Riuer of Iberus, (the Saguntines excepted) that had the daring to lift vp their hands againſt the Carthaginians.

* A people (ſaith Stephanus) neere the Riuer of Ebro. But in the old deſcription of Spaine, in Ortelius, they are found neere Tagus; and by Suidas, not far from New Carthage.

[a] A people of Caſtile the old.

[b] Arbucala, or Albricala, an inland Citie of the Vaccæi in Aragon.

The Saguntines, perceiuing the danger towards them; cryed before they were hurt. They ſent Embaſſadours to Rome, and bemoned themſelues, as likely to ſuffer that, which afterwards they ſuffered indeede; only becauſe of their alliance and friendſhip with this honorable Citie, which the Carthaginians hated. This tale moued the Senate: but much more a report, that Saguntum was alreadie beſieged. Hereupon ſome crie out, that Warre ſhould be proclaymed by Land and Sea; as alſo that the two Conſuls ſhould be ſent with Armies, the one into Spaine, the other into Africk. But others went more Roman-like to worke; and carried it. So it was onely concluded; that Embaſſadours ſhould be ſent into Spaine, to view the ſtate of their Confederates: which were indeede none other, than the Saguntines. For if Hannibal intended warre againſt Rome, it was likely, that he would giue them, ere it were long, a more plauſible occaſion to take armes againſt him: if he had no ſuch purpoſe; yet would it bee in their power, to determine what they liſted themſelues, vpon the report of theſe Embaſſadours; and this their grauitie, in being not too raſh at firſt, would ſerue to countenance their following Decree. Of theſe Embaſſadours Liuie reports, that they found Hannibal before Saguntum; but could not get audience of him, and therefore went to Carthage, where alſo they were not regarded, nor heard. But Polybius, an Hiſtorian of ſinceritie leſſe queſtionable, tels, that they found him at Carthagena; and had conference with him, though ſuch as left them doubtfull. This is more agreeable to the reſt of Hannibal his whole courſe. And ſurely we might wonder, why the Carthaginians ſhould afterwards admit a more peremptorie Embaſſage (as Liuie confeſſeth) and fall to diſputation about the couenants of peace; if they had rejected that which was ſent vpon none other pretence, than preuention of warre.

Whileſt the Embaſſadours paſſed to and fro, Hannibal prepared not onely his forces, but ſome Roman pretences, againſt Saguntum. He found out Mamertines, or people that ſhould do as the Mamertines in Sicil had done for the Romans; and implore his helpe againſt the Saguntines. Theſe were the Turdetani; a Nation adjoyning to Saguntum, and hauing many quarrells with them: (as happens commonly among Neighbours) of which, Hannibal himſelfe had hatched ſome. Finding therefore ſuch an occaſion, whatſoeuer it was, as made him able to ſay, that the Saguntines had firſt prouoked him, ere he meddled with them; he made no more ado, but ſate downe with his whole power before their Towne. He was now more ſecure, than he had formerly been, of his own Citizens: for that they had not entertained the Roman Embaſſadours, with any trembling reuerence, as of late yeres they had beene wont. Neuertheleſſe, hee was glad of any handſome colour, to ſhadow his actions, not only becauſe the warre, which he ſo much deſired, was not proclaimed; but that he might not be checked in his courſe, as an open enemy, before he could ſet foot in Italie. The Romans had the like, though contrarie deſire. They were glad of the quarrell: as hoping, that Carthage, with all thereto belonging, ſhould therby in ſhort ſpace become their own. Yet were they not haſtie to threaten, before they were readie to ſtrike; but meant to temporize, vntill they had an Armie in readineſſe to be ſent into Spaine, where they thought to make Saguntum, the ſeat of the Warre.

In the meane while, Demetrius Pharius, whom the Romans had made King ouer a great part of Illyria, rebelled against them: either for that he found himselfe ouerstreightly tyed vp by them, with hard conditions; or rather because he was of an vnthankefull disposition. The commotion of the Gaules, and afterward, the fame of the Carthaginian warre, emboldened him to despise his Benefactors and Patrons: whom he ought to haue defended and aided, in all perills, euen with the hazard of his whole estate, which he had receiued of their gift. But hee was a Traitor to his owne Queene; and therefore dealt according to his kinde, with those that had rewarded him for being such. First, he built ships, and spoiled the Iles of Greece: against the couenants to which he was bound. Then he aduentured further and seised vpon some places, that the Romans kept in their owne hands. If he had begun sooner, or rather if he had staied somewhat longer, he might haue sped better. For the busines with the Gaules, was ended; with Hannibal, not throughly begun: when he declared himselfe, by his doings, an enemie, and was vanquished. The Roman Consul, Æmilius, was sent against him: who in seuen daies wan the strong Towne of Dimalum; and thereby brought such terror vpon the Countrie round about, that Embassadors were sent from al places, to yeeld themselues, without putting him to further paines. Only the Citie of Pharus, in which Demetrius lay, prepared to resist: which it might haue done long, if the hot-headed Rebel had not been too foolish. Æmilius landed a great part of his Armie, in the Isle of Pharus, by night; and bestowed them in couert; presenting himselfe the next morning, with twenty ships before the Towne, and offering to force the Hauen. Demetrius with all his power issued out against the Consul; and was soone intercluded from the Town, by those that lay in ambush. Wherefore he fled away through by-paths to a creeke, where he had shipping readie for him, and embarqued himselfe: leauing all his estate vnto them, of whose liberalitie he first had it.

This businesse, though it were soone dispatched, yet preuented it not the siege of Saguntum; before which Hannibal sate downe, ere Æmilius was landed in Illyria. In the beginning of the siege, the Carthaginians were much discoraged, by reason of the braue sallies made by the Saguntines; in one of which, their Generall receiued a dangerous wound in the thigh, that caused him to lie many daies vnable to moue. Neuertheless he was not vnmindfull of his worke in the meane while; but gaue order to raise certaine moueable Towers, that might equal those which were built on the walls of the Citie; and to prepare to batter the curtaines, and make a breach. These being finished and applied, had soone wrought their effect. A great & large breach was made, by the fall of diuers Towers, and a great length of wall; whereat an hot assault was giuen: but it was so well sustained by the Saguntines, as the Carthaginians were not only beaten from the breach, and out of some ground within the Town, which vpon the first furie they had won; but they were pursued euen to their own trenches and camp. Neuertheless the Carthaginian Armie, wherein were about an hundred and fiftie thousand men, did so wearie the townesmen with continual trauaile, that at length it got within the walls; and was only hindred from taking full possession of the Citie, by some counter-works of the Saguntines, that were also readie to be won. In this extremitie, there was one Alcon a Saguntine, that conueyed himselfe out of the Towne, to treat with Hannibal for some accord. But the conditions which the Carthaginian offered, were so seuere, & without al compasse of honour, as Alcon durst not returne to propound them to his countrimen. For Hannibal demanded all that they had; gold, siluer, plate, and other riches within the Citie: yea, the Citie it selfe to be abandoned by the Citizens; promising, that he would assigne some other place for their habitation: not allowing them, to carrie out with them any other thing, wherewith to sustaine themselues, than the clothes on their backs; or other armes to defend them, than their nailes and teeth. Yet might they farre better haue submitted themselues vnto this miserable appointment, (seeing thereby they might haue enioyed their liues, & saued the honor of their wiues and daughters) daughters) than to haue reſted at the diſcretion of the Conquerour, as ſoone after they did: by whom their wiues and daughters were defloured before their faces; and all put to ſword, that were aboue foureteene yeares of age. For it was a poore comfort, which a great number of them tooke; when not daring to fight, and ſell their bloud at the deareſt rate, they ſhut themſelues vp like moſt wretched creatures in their owne houſes, and therein burnt themſelues with all that they had: ſo dying vnreuenged. The treaſures found in Saguntum, which were very great, Hannibal kept, therewith to pay his Armie: the ſlaues, and other bootie, hee diuided among his Souldiers; reſeruing ſome things of choice, wherewith to preſent his friends at Carthage, and to animate them vnto the Warre.

Theſe tidings exceedingly vexed the Romans; who had good cauſe to be angry at their owne ſlowneſſe, in forbearing to ſend helpe vnto the Saguntines, that held out eight moneths, looking ſtill for ſuccour, in vaine. Wherefore they determined to repaire their honour, by taking ſharpe reuenge. To this end they ſent Embaſſadours againe to Carthage: demanding onely, Whether it were by generall conſent and allowance of the Carthaginians, that HANNIBAL had made warre vpon Saguntum; which if they granted (as it ſeemed they would) then to giue them defiance. Hereunto anſwere was made, in the Senate of Carthage, to this effect: That this their ſecond Embaſſage, howſoeuer qualified with mild words, was indeede more inſolent then the former. For in that, they only required iuſtice againſt Hannibal; but in this, the very State and Common-wealth of Carthage, was vrged to pleade guiltie, or not guiltie. But (ſaid the Carthaginian ſpeaker) whether the Generall of our Armie in Spaine, in beſieging Saguntum, haue only followed his owne counſaile; or whether he did it, by direction from vs: it is not the queſtion which the Romans ought to ask vs. That which is indeed worthy examination or diſpute, is; Whether it were lawfull, or vnlawfull, for HANNIBAL to doe as he hath done. For it belongs to vs, to call our owne Commanders in queſtion, and to puniſh them according to their faults and errours; to you, to challenge vs, if wee haue done any thing contrary to our late League and Contract. It is true, that in our negotiation with Lutatius the Conſul, the Allies of both Nations were comprehended: but the Saguntines were not then of your Allies, and therefore no parties to the peace then made; for of your Allies in the future, or of ours, there was no diſpute. As touching the laſt agreement, betweene you and Aſdrubal, wherein you will ſay, that the Saguntines were comprehended by name; it is you that haue taught vs, how to anſwere that particular. For whatſoeuer you found in the Treatie betweene vs and Lutatius, to your owne diſaduantage, you caſt it vpon your Conſuls preſumption; as promiſing thoſe things, for which he had no warrant from the Senate and People of Rome. If then it bee lawfull for the Romans, to diſauow the actions of their Conſuls and Commanders, concluding any thing without punctuall and preciſe warrant; the ſame libertie may we alſo aſſume, and hold our ſelues no way bound in honour, to performe thoſe bargaines, which Aſdrubal hath made for vs, without our commandement and conſent.

This was an impertinent anſwere, and little better then a meere cauill. For Lutatius the Conſull, in his Treatie of peace with the Carthaginians, had expreſly referred the allowance thereof to the people of Rome. It had beene therefore much better, to haue dealt plainely; and to haue alleaged, That after this League was made, and confirmed on both parts, it was broken by the Romans, in robbing the Carthaginians of the Iſle of Sardinia, and withall of twelue hundred talents: which perjurie the ſtate of Carthage, being now growne able, would reuenge with open warre. As for the Saguntines; it little skilled that the Romans had admitted them into confederacie, and forthwith inſerted their names into the Treatie of peace with Aſdrubal: ſeeing that the Treatie with Aſdrubal, and all other buſineſſe betweene Rome and Carthage, following the violence and breach of peace, in taking away Sardinia, were no better then Roman iniuries; as implying this commination, Doe whatsoeuer we require, else will we make warre, without regard of our oath, which wee haue alreadie broken.

But this the Carthaginians did not alleage, forgetting, in heat of contention (as Polybius takes it) the best of their Plea. Yet since Liuie himselfe doth remember and acknowledge, that the taking of Sardinia from the Carthaginians, did inflame the spirit of Amilcar with desire of reuenge: we may reasonably thinke, that the mention of this iniurie was omitted, not so much vpon forgetfulnesse, as for that it was not thought conuenient, by ripping vp such ancient matter of quarrell, to shew that the warre, now towards, had long beene thought vpon, and like to be made with extraordinarie force; in other manner than heretofore. In conclusion, the Carthaginian Senate moued the Roman Embassadours, to deliuer vnto them in plaine termes the purposes of those that sent them, and the worst of that, which they had long determined against them: as for the Saguntines, and the confining of their Armies within Iberus; those were but their pretences. Whereupon Q. Fabius gathering vp the skirt of his Gowne, as if somewhat had been laide in the hollow therof, made this short reply: I haue here (quoth he) in my Gown-skirt both Peace and Warre: make you (my Masters of the Senate) election of these two, which of them you like best, and purpose to embrace. Hereat all cryed out at once; Euen which of them you your selfe haue a fancy to offer vs. Marry then (quoth Fabius) take the Warre, and share it among you. Which all the Assembly willingly accepted.

This was plaine dealing. To wrangle about pretences, when each part had resolued to make warre, it was meerely friuolous. For all these disputes of breach of peace, haue euer been maintayned by the partie vnwilling, or vnable to sustaine the warre. The rustie sword, and the emptie purse, doe alwaies plead performance of couenants. There haue beene few Kings or States in the World, that haue otherwise vnderstood the obligation of a Treatie, than with the condition of their owne aduantage: and commonly (seeing peace betweene ambitious Princes and States, is but a kinde of breathing) the best aduised haue rather begunne with the sword, than with the trumpet. So dealt the Arragonois with the French in Naples; Henrie the second, of France, with the Imperialls, when he wrote to Brisac, to surprise as many places as he could, ere the warre brake out; Don Iohn, with the Netherlands; and Philip, the second, of Spaine, with the English, when in the great Imbarge he tooke all our ships and goods in his Ports.

But Hannibal, besides the present strength of Carthage, and the common feeling of injuries receiued from these enemies, had another priuate and hereditarie desire, that violently carried him against the Romans. His father Amilcar, at what time he did sacrifice, being ready to take his iourney into Spaine, had solemnely bound him by oath, to pursue them with immortall hatred, and to worke them all possible mischiefe, as soone as he should be a man, and able. Hannibal was then about nine yeeres old, when his father caused him to lay his hand vpon the Altar, and make this vow: so that it was no maruaile, if the impression were strong in him.

That it is inhumane, to bequeath hatred in this sort, as it were by Legacie, it cannot be denyed. Yet for mine owne part, I doe not much doubt, bnt that some of those Kings, with whom we are now in peace, haue receiued the like charge from their Predecessors, that as soone as their coffers shall be full, they shall declare themselues enemies to the people of England.

§. II.

HANNIBAL takes order for the defence of Spaine and Africke. His iournie into Italie.

WArre being thus proclaimed, Hannibal resolued, not to put vp his sword, which hee had drawne against the Saguntines, vntill hee had therewith opened his passage vnto the gates of Rome. So began the second Punick Warre; second to none, that euer the Senate and people of Rome sustained. Hannibal wintred at Carthagena; where hee licensed his Spanish Souldiers to visit their friends, and refresh themselues against the Spring. In the meane while he gaue instructions to his brother Asdrubal, for the gouernement of Spaine in his absence. Hee also tooke order, to send a great many troups of Spaniards into Africk, to equall the numbers of Africans formerly drawne thence into Spaine; to the end, that so the one Nation might remaine as pledges and gages for the other. Of the Spaniards, hee transported into Africk thirteene thousand, eight hundred, and fiftie foot, and twelue hundred horse; also eight hundred slingers of the Baleares*. Besides these, he selected foure thousand foot, al yong men, and of qualitie, out of the best Cities of Spaine; which he appointed to be garrisond in Carthage it selfe, not so much in regard of their forces, as that they might serue for hostages: for among those foure thousand, the best of the Spanish Citizens, and those that swayed most in their seuerall States, had their Sonnes or Kinsmen. Hee also left with his brother, to guard the coast and Ports, fiftie and seuen Gallies; whereof thirtie seuen were presently armed, and appointed for the warre. Of Africans, and other Nations strangers, he left with him aboue twelue thousand foot, and two thousand horse, besides one and twentie Elephants.

Hauing in this sort taken order for the defence of Spaine and Africk; he sent Discouerers before him, to view the passages of the Pyrenæan Mountaines, and of the Alpes. He also sent Embassadors to the Mountainers of the Pyrenes, & to the Gaules, to obtaine a quiet passage: that he might bring his Armie entire into Italie, and not be compelled to diminish his forces, by any warre in the way, till hee came to encounter the Romans. His Embassadors, & discouerers, being returned with good satisfaction; in the beginning of the Spring, he past ouer the Riuer of Iberus, with an Armie consisting of fourescore and ten thousand foot, and twelue thousand horse. All those parts of Spaine, into which he had not entred before, hee now subdued: and appointed Hanno (not that old enemie of his house, who sate still at Carthage) to gouerne Spaine on the East side of Iberus; to whom he left an Armie of ten thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Being arriued at the borders of Spaine, some of his Spanish Souldiers returned home, without asking leaue: which that others might not also doe, or attempt, he courteously dismissed many more, that seemed willing to be gone. Hereby it came to passe, that the iournie seemed the lesse tedious vnto those that accompanied him; as being not enforced by compulsion. With the rest of his armie, consisting now but of fiftie thousand foot, and nine thousand horse, he past the Pyrenees, and entred into Gaules. He found the Gaules that bordered vpon Spaine, ready in Armes, to forbid his entrance into their Countrie: but wonne them, with gentle speech, and rich presents that he bestowed vpon their Leaders, to fauour his Expedition. So without any molestation, hee came to the banke of Rhodanus; where dwelt, on each side of the Riuer, a people called Volcæ. These were vnacquainted with the cause of his comming; and therefore sought to keepe him from passing ouer the water. But he was greatly assisted by some of those Gaules, that inhabited on the West side of Rhodanus, to wit, by those of Viuaretz and Lionnois. For although many of them had transported themselues and their goods, into the Countrie of Daulphine, thinking to defend the further banke against him: yet such as remained, being desirous to free their Countrie of so many ill guests, were better pleased to haue their Countriemen beaten, which had abandoned them, than to haue their owne store of corne and cattaile wasted, by the long stay of so great an Armie, as lay vpon them. For which reason, they helped him to make boates; informed him of another more easie passage, higher vp the Riuer; and lent him guides. When the vessells for transportation of his Armie were in readinesse; he sent Hanno, the sonne of Bomilcar, vp the Riuer: himselfe in the meane while making countenance to enter the Foorde below. The end of this labour was: that Hanno charging the Gaules vnawares vpon their owne side, and Hannibal, at the same time, passing the Riuer in their faces, the further banke was wonne, though with some difficultie; and the enemies dispersed. Yet was hee greatly troubled in conueying ouer his Elephants; who maruailously feared the water. He was therefore driuen to make raffes of trees, and couer them with earth and turfe; whereof hee fastened one to each banke, that might serue as a bridge, to and from another of the same sort, but loose, vpon which the beasts were towed ouer.

Hauing past this first brunt, and ouer-come both the rage of the Riuer, and of those that defended it, he was visited by the Princes of the Gaules Cisalpines, that inhabited Piemont and Milan, who lately had reuolted from the Romans. These informed him of the passages of the Alpes, that they were not so difficult, as common report made them; & from these he receiued guides, with many other encouragements. All which notwithstanding; hee found himselfe extremely incumbred by the Savoians: and lost, both of his carriages, and of his Carthaginians, more than willingly he would, or had formerly thought that he should. For he was twice mainely assailed by them, before he could recouer the plaine Countries on the other side. And whereas this iournie ouer the Mountaines cost him fifteene dayes trauaile, he was euery day, more or lesse, not only charged by those Mountainers, but withall, extremely beaten with grieuous weather and snow: it being in the beginning of Winter, when he beganne, and ouer-came this passage. But the faire and fertile Plaines, which were now ready to receiue them; with the assistance and conduct of the Cisalpine Gaules, who by their proper forces had so often inuaded the Roman Territorie; gaue them great comfort, and encouragement to goe on: hauing nothing else of difficultie remaining, but that which from the beginning they made accompt to ouer-come, by their proper valour and resolution; namely the Roman Armies, and resistance.

§. III.

How the Romans in vaine sollicited the Spaniards and Gaules to take their part. The rebellion of the Cisalpine Gaules against the Romans.

THe countries of Spaine and Gaule, through which the Carthaginians marched thus farre, had beene sollicited before, by the same Roman Embassadours, who had denounced the warre at Carthage. These, as they were instructed by the Senate, tooke Spaine in their way homeward from Carthage, with a purpose to draw into the Roman Alliance, as many of the Cities and Princes as they could; at least, to disswade them from contracting any friendship with the Carthaginians. The first which they attempted, were the Volcians, a people in Spaine; from whom, in open assembly, they receiued by one that spake for the rest, this vncomfortable answere. With what face (saith he) can yee Romans perswade vs to valew your Alliance, or to preferre it before the friendship of the Carthaginians; seeing we are taught by the example of the Saguntines, to be more wise, than so? For they, relying on your faith and promised assistance, haue beene vtterly rooted out, and destroied by the Carthaginians; whom they

they might elſe haue held their aſſured friends, and good neighbours, as we, and other the people of Spaine haue found them. Yee may therefore be gone, with this reſolution from vs, That for our parts (and ſo I thinke, I may anſwere for the reſt of our Countriemen) the Romans henceforth are not to expect any kindneſſe at our hands: who are reſolued, neuer to make accompt of their protection, nor amitie. From the Volciars, the Embaſſadours tooke their way towards the Gaules; vſing their beſt arguments to perſwade them, not to ſuffer the Carthaginians to paſſe into Italie, through their Territorie: and withall greatly glorifying themſelues, their ſtrength, and large Dominion. But the Gaules laught them to ſcorne, and had hardly the patience, to heare them ſpeake. For ſhall we (ſaid one of their Princes) by reſiſting Hannibals paſſage into Italie, entertaine a war which is not meant to be made againſt vs? Shall we hold the warre among our ſelues, and in our owne Territorie, by force, which marcheth with a ſpeedy pace from vs, towards our ancient enemies? Haue the Romans deſerued ſo well of vs, and the Carthaginians ſo ill, that wee ſhould ſet fire on our owne houſes, to ſaue theirs from burning? No, wee know it well, that the Romans haue already forced ſome Nations of ours, out of their proper Territorie and inheritance; and conſtrained others, as free as themſelues, to pay them tribute. We will not therefore make the Carthaginians, our enemies; who haue no way as yet offended vs, nor we them.

With this vnpleaſing anſwere the Embaſſadours returned home: carrying no good newes, of friends likely to helpe them; but rather ſome aſſurance from the people of Maſſilia, which were Confederates with Rome, that the Gaules were determined to take part with their enemie. Of this inclination, the Ciſalpine Gaules gaue haſtie proofe. For when the newes was brought into Italie, that the Carthaginians had paſſed Iberus, and were on the way towards Rome; this alone ſufficed to ſtirre vp the Boij, and Inſubrians, againſt the Romans. Theſe people were lately offended at the plantation of new Roman Colonies, at Cremona, and Placentia, within their Territories. Relying therefore vpon the Carthaginian ſuccour, which they ſuppoſed to be now at hand; they laid aſide all regard of thoſe hoſtages, which they had giuen to the Romans, and fell vpon the new Colonies. The Townes it ſeemes that they could not winne; for Hannibal ſhortly after failed to get them. But they forced the Roman Commiſſioners, (who belike were abroad in the Country) to flie to Modena: where they beſieged them. The ſiege of Modena had continued ſome ſmall time; when the Gaules, hauing little skill in aſſaulting Cities, waxed wearie, and ſeemed deſirous to haue peace, and to come to ſome good accord with the Romans. This they did of purpoſe, to draw on ſome meeting; that they might therein lay hand vpon the Roman Deputies, thereby to redeeme their Hoſtages, in way of exchange. And it fell out, in part, according to their wiſh. For the Romans ſent out Embaſſadours to treat with them, and to conclude a peace; whom they detained. Manlius the Prætor, who lay in theſe quarters with an Armie, hearing this outrage; marched in all haſte to the reliefe of the beſieged. But the Gaules, hauing laid a ſtrong ambuſh in a wood ioyning to the way, fell vpon the Prætor ſo opportunely, as he was vtterly ouerthrowne, and all his followers left dead in the place; a few excepted, that recouered, by faſt running, a little village, but defencible, vpon the Riuer of Po. When this was heard at Rome, C. Atilius, another of the Prætors, was haſtily ſent, to relieue the beſieged, with one Legion, and fiue thouſand of the Roman aſſociates: which forces were taken out of the Conſuls Armie, and ſupplied by a new leuie.

As the Gaules were too raſh and haſtie: ſo were the Romans too ſlow, and indeede too ill-aduiſed, in the beginning of this warre. They were not perſwaded, that Carthage, which had almoſt ſeruilely endured ſo many indignities, in time of the late peace; would be ſo braue and couragious on the ſudden, as to attempt the conqueſt of Italie it ſelfe. Wherefore they appointed one of their Conſuls, to make warre in Spaine, the other in Africk: reſting ſecure of all danger at home. Titus Sempronius tooke his way toward Africk, with an hundred & threeſcore Quinqueremes, or Gallies, lies, of fiue to an Oare; which preparation may seeme to threaten euen the Citie of Carthage, to which it shall not come neere. P. Cornelius Scipio, the other Consull, made all possible haste, by the way of Genoa, into Prouence; and vsed such diligence, hauing the winde also fauourable, as in fiue dayes he recouered Massilia. There hee was aduertised, of Hannibal his hauing passed the Riuer of Rhodanus; whom hee thought to haue found busie yet awhile in Spaine. Hannibal had also newes of the Consuls arriuall: whereof he was neither glad, nor sorry; as not meaning to haue to doe with him. Each of them sent forth Scouts, to discouer the others number and doings: Hannibal, about fiue hundred Numidians; Scipio, three hundred of his better appointed Roman horse. These met and fought, and the Numidians were beaten: yet could not the Romans greatly bragge, hauing slaine only two hundred, and lost of their owne, one hundred and fortie. But when Scipio drew neere, to haue met with the Carthaginians; he found, that they were gone three dayes before; and that (as hee then found assuredly true) with an intent to looke vpon the walls of Rome. This interrupted his intended voiage into Spaine. Neuertheless hee sent away thither his brother Cn. Cornelius Scipio, with the greatest part of his Fleet and Armie, to trie what might bee done against Asdrubal and the other Carthaginian Lieutenants in that Countrie. He himselfe, taking with him a few choice bands, returned by Sea to Pisa; and so passing through Tuscane into Lumbardie, drew together the broken troupes of Manlius and Atilius, that lately had beene beaten by the Gaules: with which forces he made head against the enemie, thinking to finde him ouer-laboured, with trauaile of his painefull journie.

§. IIII.

SCIPIO the Roman Consul ouer-come by HANNIBAL at Ticinum. Both of the Roman Consuls beaten by HANNIBAL, in a great battaile at Trebia.

FIue moneths Hannibal had spent in his tedious journie from Carthagena; what great muster he could make, when hee had passed the Alpes, it is not easily found. Some reckon his foot at an hundred thousand, and his horse at twenty thousand; others report them to haue beene only twenty thousand foot, and sixe hundred horse. Hannibal himselfe, in his Monument which he raised, in the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, agreeth with the latter summe. Yet the Gaules, Ligurians, and others that joyned with him, are likely to haue mightily increased his Armie, in short space. But when he marched Eastward from the bankes of Rhodanus, he had with him eight and thirty thousand foot, and eight thousand horse; of which, all saue those remembred by himselfe in the Inscription of his Altar in Iuno's Temple, are like to haue perished, by diseases, enemies, Riuers, and Mountaines; which mischiefes had deuoured, each, their seuerall shares.

Hauing newly passed the Alpes, and scarce refreshed his wearied Armie in the Countrie of Piemont; he sought to winne the friendship of the [a] Taurini, who lay next in his way. But the Taurini held warre at that time with the Insubrians, which were his good friends; and refused (perhaps for the same cause) his amitie. Wherefore he assaulted their Towne; and wanne it by force in three dayes. Their spoile serued well to hearten his Armie; and their calamitie, to terrifie the Neighbour places. So the Gaules, without more adoe, fell vnto his side: many for feare, many for good-will, according to their former inclination. This disposition ranne through the whole Countrie: which joyned, or was all in a readinesse to joyne, with the Carthaginians; when the newes of Scipio the Consul his arriuall, made some to be more aduised, than the rest. The name of the Romans was terrible in those quarters; what was in the Carthaginians, experience had not yet laid open. Since therefore the Roman Conſull was already gotten through the moſt defencible paſſages, ere any ſpeech had been heard of his approch: many ſate ſtill, for very feare, who elſe would faine haue concluded a League with theſe new-come friends; and ſome, for greater feare, offered their ſeruice againſt the Carthaginians, whom neuertheleſſe they wiſhed well to ſpeede.

This wauering affection of the Prouince, whereinto they were entred, made the two Generals haſten to the triall of a battaile. Their meeting was at Ticinum, now called Pauia; where each of them wondred at the others great expedition: Hannibal thinking it ſtrange, that the Conſul, whom he had left behind him on the other ſide of the Alpes, could meet him in the face, before hee had well warmed himſelfe in the Plaines; Scipio admiring the ſtrange aduenture of paſſing thoſe Mountaines, and the great ſpirit of his Enemie. Neither were the Senate at Rome little amazed, at Hannibals ſucceſſe, and ſudden arriuall. Wherefore they diſpatched a Meſſenger in all haſte vnto Sempronius, the other Conſul, that was then in Sicilia, giuing him to vnderſtand hereof: and letting him further know, that whereas he had beene directed to make the warre in Africa, it was now their pleaſure that hee ſhould forbeare to proſecute any ſuch attempt, but that hee ſhould returne the Armie vnder his charge, with all poſſible ſpeede, to ſaue Italie it ſelfe. According to this order, Sempronius ſent off his Fleet from Lilybæum; with direction to land the Armie at Ariminum, a Port Towne not farre from Rauenna: quite another way from Carthage, whither he was making haſte. In the meane while, Scipio and Hannibal were come ſo neere, that fight they muſt, ere they could part aſunder. Hereupon, both of them prepared the minds of their Souldiers, by the beſt arguments they had: vnto which Hannibal added the Rhetorick of a preſent example, that he ſhewed vpon certaine priſoners of the Savoyans, which he brought along with him, fitted for the purpoſe, into Italie. For theſe, hauing beene no leſſe miſerably fettered and chained, than ſparingly fed; and withall ſo often ſcourged on their naked bodies, as nothing was more in their deſire, than to be deliuered from their miſeries by any kind of preſent death, were brought into the middle of the Armie: where it was openly demanded, which of them would fight hand to hand with ſome other of his Companions, till the one of them were ſlaine, with condition being the Victor, to receiue his libertie, and ſome ſmall reward. This was no ſooner propounded, than all of them together accepted the offer. Then did Hannibal cauſe lots to be caſt, which of them ſhould enter the Liſt, with ſuch weapons, as the Chieftaines of the Gaules were wont to vſe in ſingle combats. Euery one of theſe vnhappie men wiſhed, that his owne lot might ſpeede; whereby it ſhould at leaſt be his good fortune, to end his miſeries by death, if not to get a reward by victorie. That couple, whoſe good hap it was to be choſen, fought reſoluedly: as rather deſiring, than fearing death; and hauing none other hope, than in vanquiſhing. Thus were ſome few couples matched, it skilled not how equally: for all theſe poore creatures were willing, vpon whatſoeuer vneuen termes, to ridde themſelues out of ſlauerie. The ſame affection that was in theſe Combatants, and in their fellowes which beheld them; wrought alſo vpon the Carthaginians, for whom the ſpectacle was ordained. For they deemed happy, not only him, that by winning the victorie had gotten his liberty, together with an horſe and armour: but euen him alſo, who being ſlaine in fight, had eſcaped that miſerable condition, vnto which his Companions were returned. Their Generall perceiuing what impreſſion this dumbe ſhew had wrought in them, beganne to admoniſh them of their owne condition, ſpeaking to this effect: That he had laid before them an example of their owne eſtates: ſeeing the time was at hand, wherein they were all to runne the ſame fortune, that theſe ſlaues had done; all to liue victorious and rich; or all to die, or (which theſe priſoners eſteemed farre more grieuous) to liue in a perpetuall ſlauerie: That none of them all, in whom was common ſenſe, could promiſe to himſelfe any hope of life by flight; ſince the Mountaines, the Riuers, uers, the great distance from their owne Countries, and the pursuit of mercilesse Enemies, must needes retrench all such impotent imaginations. He therefore praied them to remember, that they, who had euen now praised the fortune both of the Victor, and of the vanquished, would make it their owne case; seeing there was neuer any in the world, appointed with such a resolution, that had euer been broken, or beaten by their enemies. On the contrarie, he told them, that the Romans, who were to fight vpon their owne soile, and in view of their owne Townes; who knew as many waies to saue themselues by flight, as they had bodies of men to fight withall, could no way entertaine such a resolution as theirs: seeing the same necessitie, (to which nothing seemes impossible) did no way presse them, or constraine them. In this sort did Hannibal, with one substantiall argument, That there was no meane betweene Victorie and Death, encourage his Companions. For (saith a great Captaine of France) la comodite de la retracte aduance la fuite; The commoditie of a retrait, doth greatly aduance a flat running away.

Scipio, on the other side, after that he had giuen order for the laying of a bridge ouer the Riuer of Ticinus, did not neglect to vse the best arguments and reasons hee could, to encourage the Armie he led: putting them in minde of the great conquests and victories of their Ancestors; against how many Nations they had preuailed; and ouer how many Princes, their Enemies, they had triumphed. As for this Armie commanded by Hannibal, although it were enough to tell them, that it was no better than of Carthaginians, whom in their late warre they had so often beaten, by Land and Sea; yet he prayed them withall to consider, that at this time it was not only so diminished in numbers, as it rather seemed a troupe of Brigants and Theeues, than an Armie like to encounter the Romans; but so weather-beaten, and starued, as neither the men, nor horses, had strength or courage to sustaine the first charge that should be giuen vpon them. Nay (said he) yee your selues may make iudgement what daring they haue now remaining, after so many trauailes and miseries; seeing when they were in their best strength, after they had past the Roane, their horse-men were not only beaten by ours, and driuen backe to the very Trenches of their Campe, but Hannibal himselfe, fearing our approch, ranne head-long towards the Alpes: thinking it a lesse dishonour, to die there by frost, famine, and precipitation, than by the sharpe swords of the Romans, which had so often cut downe his people, both in Africa, and in Sicil.

It was not long after this, ere the two Generalls met: each being farre aduanced before the grosse of his Armie, with his Horse; and the Roman hauing also with him some light-armed foot, to view the ground, and the enemies countenance. When they discouered the approch one of the other; Scipio sent before him his horsemen of the Gaules, to beginne the fight, and bestowing his Darters in the void ground betweene their troupes, to assist them: himselfe with his Roman men at armes, following softly in good order. The Gaules (whether desirous to trie the metall of the Carthaginians, or hoping thereby to get fauour of the Romans) behaued themselues couragiously, and were as couragiously opposed. Yet their foot that should haue aided them, shranke at the first brunt, or rather fled cowardly away, without casting a Dart; for feare of being troden downe by the enemies horse. This notwithstanding, the Gaules maintained the fight, and did more hurt than they receiued; as presuming that they were well backt. Neither was the Consull vnmindfull to relieue them: their hardinesse deseruing his aide; and the hastie flight of those that should haue stood by them, admonishing him that it was needfull. Wherefore hee aduentured himselfe so farre, that he receiued a dangerous wound; and had beene left in the place, if his sonne (afterward surnamed Africanus) had not brought him off: though others giue the honour of this rescue, to a Ligurian slaue. Whilest the Romans were busied in helping their Consull; an vnexpected storme came driuing at their backs, and made them looke about how to helpe themselues. Hannibal had appointed his Numidian light-horse, to giue vpon the Romans in flanke, and to com-

paſſe them about, whileſt he with his men at armes ſuſtained their charge, and met them in the face. The Numidians performed this very well: cutting in peeces the ſcattered foot, that ranne away at the firſt encounter; and then falling on the backs of thoſe, whoſe lookes were faſtened vpon Hannibal and Scipio. By this impreſſion, the Romans were ſhuffled together, and rowted: ſo that they all betooke them to their ſpeede, and left vnto their enemies the honour of the day.

When Scipio ſaw his horſe thus beaten, and the reſt of his Armie thereby greatly diſcouraged; hee thought it a point of wiſdome, hauing loſt ſo many of his Fleet vpon the firſt puffe of winde, to take Port with the reſt, before the extremeſt of the tempeſt ouer-tooke him. For he ſaw by the lowring morning what manner of day it was like to proue. Therefore his battaile of foot being yet vnbroken, hee in a manner ſtole the retrait; and recouered the bridge ouer Ticinus, which hee had formerly built. But notwithſtanding all the haſte that he made, he left ſixe hundred of his Reare behinde him: who were the laſt that ſhould haue paſſed, and ſtaid to breake the bridge. Herein he followed this rule of a good man of warre, Si certamen quando dubium videatur: tacitam miles arripiat fugam: fuga enim aliquando laudanda: which muſt be vnderſtood in this ſort; If a Generall of an Armie, by ſome vnproſperous beginnings doubt the ſucceſſe; or find his Armie fearefull or wauering; it is more profitable to ſteale a ſafe retrait, than to abide the vncertaine euent of battaile.

It was two daies after, ere Hannibal could paſſe the Riuer; Scipio the whileſt refreſhing his men, and eaſing himſelfe of his wound in Placentia. But as ſoone as Hannibal preſented his Armie before the Towne, offering battaile to the Romans, who durſt not accept it, nor iſſue forth of their campe; the Gaules, that hitherto had followed Scipio for feare, gathered out of his feare, courage to forſake him. They thought that now the long-deſired time was come, in which better Chieftaines and Souldiers, than Aneroeſtus, Britomarus, and the Geſſates, were come to helpe them; if they had the hearts to helpe themſelues. Wherefore the ſame night they fell vpon the Roman campe; wounded and ſlue many; eſpecially of thoſe guards that kept watch at the gate; with whoſe heads in their hands, they fled ouer to the Carthaginians, and preſented their ſeruice. Hannibal receiued them exceeding courteouſly, and diſmiſt them to their owne places: as men likely to bee of more vſe to him, in perſwading the reſt of their Nation to become his Confederates, than in any other ſeruice at the preſent.

About the fourth watch of the night following, the Conſul ſtale a retrait, as hee had done before; but not with the like eaſe and ſecuritie. Hannibal had a good eye vpon him; and ere he could get farre, ſent the Numidians after him: following himſelfe with all his Armie. That night the Romans had receiued a great blow, if the Numidians, greedie of ſpoile, had not ſtaid to ranſack their campe; and thereby giuen time to all, ſaue ſome few in Reare, that were ſlaine or taken, to paſſe the Riuer of Trebia, and ſaue themſelues. Scipio, being both vnable to trauaile by reaſon of his wound, and withall finding it expedient to attend the comming of his fellow-Conſul; incampes himſelfe ſtrongly vpon the bankes of Trebia. Neceſſitie required that he ſhould ſo doe; yet this diminiſhed his reputation. For euery day, more & more of the Gaules fel to the Carthaginian ſide; among whō came in the Boij, that brought with them the Roman Commiſſioners, which they had taken in the late Inſurrection. They had hitherto kept them as Pledges, to redeeme their owne Hoſtages: but now they deliuer them vp to Hannibal, as tokens and pledges of their affections towards him; by whoſe helpe they conceiued better hope of recouering their owne men and lands. In the meane while, Hannibal, being in great ſcarcity of victuals, attempted the taking of Claſtidium, a Towne wherein the Romans had laid vp all their ſtore and munition. But there needed no force; a Brunduſian, whom the Romans had truſted with keeping it, ſold it for a little monie.

The newes of theſe diſaſters, brought to Rome, filled the Senate and People, rather with a desire of hastie reuenge, than any great sorrow for their losse receiued; seeing that, in a manner, all their foot, wherein their strength and hope consisted, were as yet entire. They therefore hasted away Sempronius, that was newly arriued, towards Ariminum, where the Armie, by him sent out of Sicil, awaited his comming. He therefore hasted hither; and from thence hee marched speedily towards his Colleague: who attended him vpon the bankes of Trebia. Both the Armies being joyned in one, the Consuls deuised about that which remained to bee done: Sempronius receiuing from Scipio the relation of what had passed since Hannibal; arriuall; the fortune of the late fight; and by what errour or misaduenture the Romans were therein foiled: which Scipio chiefly laid on the reuolt and treason of the Gaules.

Sempronius, hauing receiued from Scipio the state of the affaires in those parts; sought by all meanes to trie his fortune with Hannibal, before Scipio were recouered of his wounds, that thereby he might purchase to himselfe the sole glorie of the victorie, which he had alreadie, in his imagination, certainely obtayned. He also feared the election of the new Consuls: his owne time being well-neere expired. But Scipio perswaded the contrarie; obiecting the vnskilfulnesse of the new-come Souldiers: and withal gaue him good reason, to assure him that the Gaules, naturally vnconstant, were vpon termes of abandoning the partie of the Carthaginians; those of them inhabiting betweene the Riuers of Trebia, and Po, being alreadie reuolted. Sempronius knew all this as well as Scipio: but being both guided and blinded by his ambition, he made haste to finde out the dishonour, which he might otherwise easily haue auoided. This resolution of Sempronius was exceeding pleasing to Hannibal: who feared nothing so much as delay and losse of time. For the strength of his Armie, consisting in strangers, to wit, in Spaniards and Gaules; he no lesse feared the change of affection in the one, than the impatiencie of the other: who being farre from their owne home, had many passions mouing them to turne their faces towards it. To further the desire of Sempronius, it fell out so, that about the same time, the Gaules inhabiting neere vnto Trebia, complayned of injuries done by the Carthaginians. They did not supply Hannibal with necessaries, as hee supposed that they might haue done; although he daily reprehended their negligence, telling them, that for their sakes, and to set them at libertie, he had vndertaken this Expedition. Seeing therefore how little they regarded his words, he was bold to bee his owne Caruer; and tooke from them by force, as much as he needed of that which they had. Hereupon they flie to the Romans for helpe: and, to make their tale the better, say that this wrong is done them, because they refused to joyne with Hannibal. Scipio cared not much for this: he suspected their falshood, and was assured of their mutability. But Sempronius affirmed, that it stood with the honor of Rome, to preserue the Confederates from suffering injurie: and that hereby might be won the friendship of all the Gaules. Therfore he sent out a thousand horse: which comming vnlooked for vpon Hannibal his forragers, and finding them heauy loaden, cut many of them in pieces, and chaced the rest euen into their owne campe. This indignitie made the Carthaginians sallie out against them: who caused them to retire faster then they came. Sempronius was readie to back his owne men; and repelled the enemies. Hannibal did the like. So that at length, all the Roman Armie was drawne forth; and a battaile readie to bee fought, if the Carthaginian had not refused it.

This victorie (for so the Consul would haue it called) made the Romans in generall desirous to try the maine chance in open field: all the perswasions of Scipio to the contrarie notwithstanding. Of this disposition Hannibal was aduertised by the Gaules, his spies, that were in the Roman Campe. Therefore he bethought himselfe how to helpe forward the victorie, by adding some stratagem to his forces: Hee found in the hollow of a water-course, ouer-growne with high reede, a fit

trench to couer an ambuſh. Thereinto he caſt his brother Mago, with a thouſand choice horſe, and as many foot. The reſt of his Armie, after they had well warmed and well fed themſelues in their campe, he led into the field, and marched towards the Conſul. Earely in the morning, he had ſent ouer Trebia ſome companies of Numidian light-horſe: to braue the enemie, and draw him forth to a bad dinner, ere he had broken his faſt. Sempronius was ready to take any opportunitie to fight: and therefore not onely iſſued out of his campe, but foorded the Riuer of Trebia, in a moſt cold and miſerable day; his foot being wet almoſt to the arme-holes: which, together with the want of foode, did ſo enfeeble and coole their courages, as they wanted force to handle the armes they bare. Strong they were in foor, as well of their owne Nation, as of the Latines: hauing of the one, ſixteene, of the other, twentie thouſand. The maſſe of theſe they ranged in a groſſe Battalion, guarded on the flanks with three thouſand horſe: thruſting their light-armed, and Darters, in looſe troups in the head of the reſt, in the nature of a Vantguard. The Carthaginian numbers of foot, were in a manner equall to their enemies; in horſe, they had by farre the better, both in number and goodneſſe. When therefore the Roman horſe, ranged on the flankes of their foor, were broken by the Numidians; when their foot were charged both in front and flanke, by the Spaniards, Gaules, and Elephants; when finally the whole Armie was vnawares preſt in the Reare, by Mago and his two thouſand, that roſe out of their place of ambuſh: then fell the Romans, by heapes, vnder the enemies ſwords; and being beaten downe, as well fighting in diſorder, as flying towards the Riuer, by the horſe-men that purſued them, there eſcaped no more of ſixe and thirtie thouſand, than ten thouſand of all ſorts, Horſe and Foot.

Three great errours Sempronius committed, of which euery one deſerued to bee recompenced with the loſſe that followed. The firſt was, that hee fought with Hannibal in a Champaine, being by farre inferiour in horſe, and withall thereby ſubiect to the African Elephants, which in incloſed or vn-euen grounds, and woodlands, would haue beene of no vſe. His ſecond errour was, that he made no diſcouerie of the place vpon which he fought; whereby he was groſſely ouer-reacht, and inſnared, by the ambuſh which Hannibal had laid for him. The third was, that hee drencht his foot-men with emptie ſtomachs, in the Riuer of Trebia, euen in a moſt cold and froſtie day, whereby in effect they loſt the vſe of their limbs. For as one ſaith well; There is nothing more inconuenient and perilous, than to preſent an Armie tyred with trauaile, to an enemie freſh and fed; ſince where the ſtrength of bodie faileth, the generoſitie of minde is but as an vnprofitable vapour.

The broken remainder of the Roman Armie, was collected by Scipio, who got therewith into Placentia; ſtealing away the ſame night, which was exceeding rainy, from the Carthaginians; who either perceiued him not, becauſe of the ſhewres; or would not perceiue him, becauſe they were ouer-wearied. Sempronius eſcaped with extreme danger; flying through the Countrie that was ouer-runne by the enemies horſe. Hee was attended by more, than were requiſite in a ſecret flight; yet by fewer, than could haue made reſiſtance, if the enemie had met with him. Neuertheleſſe he got away, and came to Rome, where hee did his office in chooſing new Conſuls for the yeere following: and then returned into his Prouince, with a freſh ſupply againſt Hannibal.

§. V.

The departure of HANNIBAL from the Cisalpine Gaules into Hetruria. FLAMINIVS the Roman Consul slaine; and his Armie destroyed by the Carthaginians, at the Lake of Thrasymen.

THe Winter growing on apace, was very sharpe, and vnfit for seruice: to the great contentment of the Romans, who being not able to keepe the field, lay warme in Placentia, and Cremona. Yet Hannibal did not suffer them to rest very quiet: but vexed them with continuall alarmes; assayling diuers places; taking some; beating the Gaules their adherents; and winning the Lygurians to his partie, who presented him, in token of their faithfull loue, with two Roman Quæstors or Treasurers, two Colonels, and fiue Gentlemen the Sonnes of Senatours, which they had intercepted. These, and in generall all such prisoners as he had of the Romans, he held in streight places, loden with yrons, and miserably fed: those of their followers he not onely well entreated, but sent them to their Countries without ransome; with this protestation, That he therefore vndertooke the Warre in Italie to free them from the oppression of the Romans. By these meanes he hoped, and not in vaine, to draw many of them to his partie and assistance. But the Gaules were not capable of such perswasions. They stood in feare, lest he should make their Countrie the seate of the Warre, and perhaps take it from them. They were also more grieued than reason willed them, at his feeding vpon them, and wasting their Territorie. Wherefore some of them conspired against his life; others admonished him of the danger: and these that gaue him the aduice, were readie soone after to practise against him; but were in like sort detected. He was therefore glad to vse Perwigs of haire, and false beards of diuers colors, to the end that he might not be described, nor known, to those that should vndertake to make him away. Faine hee would haue passed the Apennines, vpon the first appearance of Spring; but was compelled by the violence of weather, to tarrie among the Gaules, till he had seene more Swallowes than one. At length, when the yeare was somewhat better opened, he resolued to take his leaue of these giddie Companions, and bring the warre neerer to the gates of Rome. So away hee went, hauing his Armie greatly increased with Ligurians and Gaules; more seruiceable friends abroad, than in their owne Countrie. That the passage of the Apennine Mountaines was troublesome, I hold it needlesse to make any doubt. Yet since the Roman Armies found no memorable impediment, in their marches that way: the great vexation which fell vpon Hannibal, when hee was trauailing through and ouer them, ought in reason to be imputed rather to the extremitie of Winter, that makes all wayes foule, than to any intolerable difficultie in that iournie. Neuertheless to auoide the length of way, together with the resistance and fortifications, which may not improbably be thought to haue beene erected vpon the ordinarie passages towards Rome: he chose at this time, though it were with much trouble, to trauaile through the Fennes and rotten grounds of Tuscane. In those Marishes and bogges, he lost all his Elephants, saue one, together with the vse of one of his eyes; by the moystnesse of the aire, and by lodging on the cold ground, and wading through deepe mire and water. In briefe, after hee had with much adoe recouered the firme and fertile Plaines; he lodged about Arretium: where he somewhat refreshed his wearied followers, and heard newes of the Roman Consuls.

C. Flaminius, and Cn. Seruilius had of late beene chosen Consuls for this yeere: Seruilius, a tractable man, and wholly gouerned by aduice of the Senate; Flaminius, an an hot-headed popular Orator; who hauing once beene robbed (as hee thought) of his Conſulſhip, by a deuice of the Senators, was afraid to be ſerued ſo againe, vnleſſe he quickly finiſhed the warre. This jealous Conſul thought it not beſt for him to be at Rome, when he entred into his Office, leſt his aduerſaries, by fayning ſome religious impediment, ſhould detaine him within the Citie, or find other buſineſſe for him at home, to diſappoint him of the honour, that hee hoped to get in the Warre. Wherefore he departed ſecretly out of the Towne; and meant to take poſſeſſion of his Office, when the day came, at Ariminum. The Fathers (ſo the Senators were called) highly diſpleaſed with this, reuoked him by Embaſſadors: but he neglected their injunction; and haſting to meet with the Carthaginians, tooke his way to Arretium, where he ſhortly found them.

The fierie diſpoſition of this Conſul, promiſed vnto Hannibal great aſſurance of victorie. Therefore he prouoked, with many indignities, the vehement nature of the Roman: hoping thereby to draw him vnto fight, ere Seruilius came with the reſt of the Armie. All the Countrie betweene Feſulæ and Arretium he put to fire and ſword, euen vnder the Conſuls noſe; which was enough to make him ſtirre, that would not haue ſitten ſtill, though Hannibal had beene quiet. It is true, that a great Captaine of France hath ſaid; Pays gaſte veſte pas perdu; A waſted Countrie is not thereby loſt. But by this waſte of the Countrie, Flaminius thought his owne honour to be much impaired; and therefore aduanced towards the Enemie. Many aduiſed him (which had indeede beene beſt) to haue patience awhile, and ſtay for his Colleague. But of this he could not abide to heare: ſaying, that he came not to defend Arretium, whileſt the Carthaginians went, burning downe al Italie before them, to the gates of Rome. Therefore he tooke horſe; and commanded the Armie to march. It is reported as ominous, that one of their Enſignes ſtucke ſo faſt in the ground, as it could not be plucked vp by the Enſigne-bearer. Of this tale, whether true or falſe, Tullie makes a jeaſt: ſaying, that the cowardly knaue did faintly pull at it (as going now to fight) hauing hardily pitched it into the earth. Neither was the anſwere of Flaminius (if it were true) diſagreeable hereto: for he commanded, that it ſhould be digged vp, if feare had made the hands too weak to lift it: asking withall; whether letters were not come from the Senate, to hinder his proceedings. Of this jealouſie both hee, and the Senate that gaue him cauſe, are likely to repent.

All the Territorie of Cortona, as farre as to the Lake of Thraſymene, was on a light fire, which whileſt the Conſul thought to quench with his enemies bloud, he purſued Hannibal ſo vnaduiſedly, that he fell, with his whole Armie, into an ambuſh cunningly laid for him, betweene the Mountaines of Cortona, and the Lake. There was he charged vnawares, on all ſides, (ſaue only where that great Lake of Peruſia permitted neither his enemies to come at him, nor him to flie from them) knowing not which way to turne, or make reſiſtance. So was hee ſlaine in the place, accompanied with fifteene thouſand dead carkaſſes of his Countrimen. About ſixe thouſand of his men, that had the Vantgard, tooke courage as for the moſt part happens, out of deſperation; and breaking through the enemies, that ſtood in their way, recouered the tops of the Mountaines. If theſe had returned, and giuen charge vpon the Carthaginians backs, it was thought that they might haue greatly amended, if not wholly altered, the fortune of the day. But that violence of their feare, which kindled by neceſſitie, had wrought the effects of hardineſſe; was well aſſwaged, when they ceaſed to deſpaire, of ſauing their liues by flight. They ſtood ſtill, in a could ſweat, vpon the Hill-top; hearing vnder them a terrible noiſe, but not diſcouering how things went, becauſe of the great fogge that held all the morning. When it grew toward noone, the aire was cleared, and they might plainly diſcerne the lamentable ſlaughter of their fellowes. But they ſtaid not to lament it: for it was high time, they thought, to be gone, ere they were deſcried, and attached by the enemies horse. This they should haue thought vpon sooner; since they had no minde to returne vnto the fight. For descryed they were, and Maharbal sent after them; who ouer-tooke them by night in a Village, which hee surrounded with his horse: and so they yeelded the next day, rendring their armes, vpon his promise of their liues and liberties. This accord Hannibal refused to confirme; saying, that it was made by Maharbal, without sufficient warrant, as wanting his authoritie to make it good. Herein hee taught them (yet little to his owne honour) what it was to keepe no faith: and fitted them with a tricke of their owne. For if it were lawfull vnto the Romans, to alter couenants, or adde vnto them what they listed; if the Carthaginians must be fain to pay certaine hundreds, and yet more hundreds of talents, besides their first bargaine; as also to renounce their interest in Sardinia, and bee limited in their Spanish Conquests, according to the good pleasure of the Romans, whose present aduantage is more ample, than the conditions of the late concluded peace: then can Hannibal bee as Roman, as themselues; and make them know, that perfidiousnesse gaineth no more in prosperitie, than it looseth in the change of fortune. Fifteene thousand Italian Prisoners, or thereabout, hee had in his hands: of which all that were not Romans, hee set free without ransome; protesting, as he had done before, that it was for their sakes, and to free them and others from the Roman tyrannie, that he had vndertaken this warre. But the Romans hee kept in straight prison, and in fetters; making them learne to eate hard meate. This was a good way, to breede in the people of Italie, if not a loue of Carthage, yet a contempt of Rome: as if this warre had not concerned the generall safetie, but only the preseruing of her owne neck from the yoke of slauerie, which her ouer-strong enemies would thrust vpon her in reuenge of her oppressions. But an ancient reputation, confirmed by succesſe of many ages, is not lost in one or two battailes. Wherefore more is to bee done, ere the Carthaginian can get any Italian Partisans.

Presently after the battaile of Thrasymene, C. Centronius, with foure thousand Roman horse, drew neere vnto the Campe of Hannibal. Hee was sent from Ariminum, by Seruilius the other Consul, to increase the strength of Flaminius: but comming too late, hee increased only the misaduenture. Maharbal was imployed by Hannibal, to intercept this companie; who finding them amazed with report which they had newly heard of the great ouerthrow, charged them, and brake them: and killing almost halfe of them, draue the rest vnto an high piece of ground, whence they came downe, and simply yeelded to mercie, the next day. Seruilius himselfe was in the meane while skirmishing with the Gaules; against whom hee had wrought no matter of importance, when the newes was brought him, of his Colleagues ouerthrow and death in Hetruria; that made him hasten backe to the defence of Rome.

In these passages, it is easie to discerne the fruits of popular iealousie, which perswaded the Romans to the yeerely change of their Commanders in the wars; which greatly endangered, and retarded the growth of that Empire. Certaine it is, that all men are farre better taught by their owne errours, than by the examples of their fore-goers. Flaminius had heard, in what a trap Sempronius had bin taken vp but the yeere before, by this subtile Carthaginian; yet suffered he himselfe to be caught soone after in the same manner. Hee had also belike forgotten, how Sempronius, fearing to be preuented by a new Consul, and ambitious of the sole honour of beating Hannibal in battaile, without helpe of his companion Scipio, had beene rewarded with shame and losse: else would he not, contrarie to all good aduice, haue beene so hasty to fight, before the arriuall of Seruilius. If Sempronius had beene continued in his charge, it is probable that he would haue taken his companion with him the second time, and haue searched all suspected places, proper to haue shadowed an ambush: both which this new Consul Flaminius neglected. We may boldly avow it, that by being continued in his Gouernment of France ten yeeres, Cæsar brought that mightie Nation, together with the Heluetians and many of the Germans, vnder the Roman yoke; into which parts had there beene euery yeere a new Lieutenant sent, they would hardly, if euer, haue beene ſubdued. For it is more than the beſt wit in the World can doe, to informe it ſelfe, within one yeeres compaſſe, of the nature of a great Nation, of the Factions, of the Places, Riuers, and of all good helpes, whereby to proſecute a warre to the beſt effect. Our Princes haue commonly left their Deputies in Ireland three yeeres; whence, by reaſon of the ſhortneſſe of that their time, many of them haue returned as wiſe, as they went out; others haue profited more, and yet when they beganne but to know the firſt rudiments of Warre, and Gouernement, fitting the Countrie, they haue beene called home, and new Apprentices ſent in their places, to the great preiudice both of this and that Eſtate. But it hath euer beene the courſe of the World, rather to follow old errours, than to examine them: and of Princes and Gouernours, to vp-hold their ſlothful ignorance, by the old examples and policie of other ages and people; though neither likeneſſe of time, of occaſion, or of any other circumſtance, haue perſwaded the imitation.

§ VI.

How Q. FABIVS the Roman Dictator, ſought to conſume the force of HANNIBAL, by lingring warre. MINVTIVS, the Maſter of the Horſe, honoured and aduanced by the People, for bold and ſucceſſefull attempting, aduentures raſhly vpon HANNIBAL; and is like to periſh with his Armie, but reſcued by FABIVS.

GReatly were the Romans amazed, at this their ill ſucceſſe, and at the danger apparent; which threatned them in more terrible manner, than euer did warre, ſince Rome it ſelfe was taken. They were good Souldiers; and ſo little accuſtomed to receiue an ouerthrow; that when Pyrrhus had beaten them, once and againe, in open field, all Italie was ſtrangely affected with his ſucceſſe, and held him in admiration, as one that could worke wonders. But Pyrrhus his quarrell was not grounded vpon hate: hee only ſought honour, and fought (as it were) vpon a brauerie: demeaning himſelfe like a courteous enemie. This Carthaginian deteſted the whole Roman name; againſt which he burned with deſire of reuenge. Ticinum, Trebia, and Thraſymene, witneſſed his purpoſe, and his abilitie. Which to withſtand, they fled vnto a remedie that had long beene out of vſe, and created a Dictator. The Dictators power was greater than the Conſuls, and ſcarcely ſubject vnto comptroll of the whole Citie. Wherefore this Officer was ſeldome choſen, but vpon ſome extremitie, and for no longer time than ſixe moneths. He was to be named by one of the Conſuls, at the appointment of the Senate: though it were ſo, that the Conſul (if he ſtood vpon his prerogatiue) might name whom he pleaſed. At this time, the one Conſul being dead, and the other too farre off; the People tooke vpon them, as hauing ſupreme authoritie, to giue the Dignitie by their election, to Q. Fabius Maximus, the beſt reputed man of warre in the Citie, Nouum factum, nouum conſilium expetit; Contrarie winds, contrarie courſes. Q. Fabius choſe M. Minutius Rufus Maſter of the horſe: which Officer was cuſtomarily, as the Dictators Lieutenant; though this Minutius grew afterwards famous, by taking more vpon him.

The firſt act of Fabius, was the reformation of ſomewhat amiſſe in matter of religion: a good beginning, and commendable; had the Religion beene alſo good. But if it were true (as Liuie reports it) that the bookes of Sybil were conſulted, and gaue direction in this buſineſſe of deuotion; then muſt we beleeue, that thoſe books of Sybil, preſerued in Rome, were dictated by an euill ſpirit. For it was ordayned, that ſome Vow, made in the beginning of this warre to Mars, ſhould be made anew, and amplified; as hauing not been rightly made before: alſo that great Plaies ſhould be vowed vnto Iupiter, and a Temple to Venus; with other ſuch trumperie. This Liu. l. 22.

vehemencie of superstition, proceeds alwaies from vehemencie of feare. And surely this was a time, when Rome was exceedingly distempered with passion: whereof that memorable accident, of two women that suddenly died, when they saw their sonnes returne aliue from Thrasymene, may serue to beare witnesse; though it bee more properly an example of motherly loue. The walls and towers of the Citie were now repaired and fortified; the bridges vpon Riuers were broken downe; and all care taken, for defence of Rome it selfe. In this tumult, when the Dictator was newly set forth against Hannibal; word was brought, that the Carthaginian fleet had intercepted all the supply, that was going to Cn. Scipio in Spaine. Against these Carthaginians, Fabius commanded Seruilius the Consul to put to Sea; and taking vp all the ships about Rome, and Ostia, to pursue them: whilest he, with the Legions, attended vpon Hannibal. Foure Legions he had leuied in haste: and from Ariminum he receiued the Armie, which Seruilius the Consul had conducted thither.

With these forth-with he followed apace after Hannibal; not to fight, but to affront him. And knowing well, what aduantage the Numidian horse had ouer the Romans, he alwaies lodged himselfe on high grounds, and of hard accesse. Hannibal in the meane while, pursuing his victorie, had ranged ouer all the Countrie, and vsed all manner of crueltie towards the inhabitants; especially to those of the Roman Nation, of whom he did put to the sword, all that were able to beare armes. Passing by Spoletum and Ancona, he incamped vpon the Adriatick shores; refreshed his diseased, and ouer-trauailed Companies; armed his Africans after the manner of the Romans; and made his dispatches for Carthage, presenting his friends, which were in effect all the Citizens, with part of the spoiles that hee had gotten. Hauing refreshed his Armie; fed his horses; cured his wounded Souldiers; and (as Polybius hath it) healed his horse heeles of the scratches, by washing their pasternes in old wine: he followed the coast of the Adriatick Sea towards Apulia, a Northerne Prouince of the Kingdome of Naples; spoiling the Marrucini, and all other Nations lying in his way. In all this ground that he ouer-ranne, he had not taken any one Citie: only he had assaied Spoletum, a Colonie of the Romans; and finding it well defended, presently gaue it ouer.

The malice of a great Armie is broken, and the force of it spent, in a great siege. This the Protestant Armie found true at Poictiers, a little before the battaile of Moncounter; and their victorious enemies, anon after, at S^t. Iean d'Angeley. But Hannibal was more wise. He would not engage himselfe in any such enterprize, as should detaine him, and giue the Romans leaue to take breath. All his care was to weaken them in force and reputation: knowing, that when once hee was absolute Master of the field, it would not be long ere the walled Cities would open their gates, without expecting any engine of battery. To this end he presented Fabius with battaile, as soone as he saw him; and prouoked him with all manner of bravado's. But Fabius would not bite. Hee well knew the differences, betweene Souldiers bred vp, euer since they were Boyes, in warre and in bloud, trayned and hardened in Spaine, made proud and aduenturous by many victories there, and of late by some notable acts against the Romans; and such, as had no oftner seene the enemie, than bin vanquished by him. Therefore he attended the Carthaginian so neere, as hee kept him from straggling too farre; and preserued the countrie from vtter spoile. He inured his men by little and little, and made them acquainted with dangers by degrees; and hee brought them first to looke on the Lyon a farre off, that in the end they might sit on his taile.

Now Minutius had a contrarie disposition, and was as fierie as Flaminius; taxing Fabius with cowardise and feare. But all stirred not this well-aduised Commander. For wise men are no more moued with such noise, than with winde bruised out of a bladder. There is nothing of more indiscretion, and danger, than to pursue misfortune: It wasteth it selfe sooner by sufferance, than by opposition. It is the inuading Armie that desires battaile: and this of Hannibal, was both the inuading, and the victorious. Fabius therefore ſuffered Hannibal to croſſe the Apennines, and to fall vpon the moſt rich and pleaſant Territorie of Campania; neither could he by any arguments be perſwaded, to aduenture the Roman Armie in battaile: but being farre too weake in horſe, he alwaies kept the Hills and faſt grounds. When Hannibal ſaw he could by no means draw this warie Dictator to fight, that the Winter came on; and that the towns ſtood firme for the Romans, whoſe Legions were in ſight, though a-farre off; he reſolued to reſt his Armie, that was loaden with ſpoile, in ſome plentifull and aſſured place, till the following Spring. But ere this can be done, he muſt paſſe along by the Dictators campe, that hung ouer his head vpon the Hills of Callicula, and Caſilinum: for other way there was none, by which hee might iſſue out of that goodly Garden-countrie, which hee had already waſted, into places more aboundant of prouiſion for his wintering. It was by meere error of his guide, that he firſt entred within theſe ſtreights. For he would haue bin directed vnto Caſinum, whence he might both aſſay the faire Citie of Capua, which had made him friendly promiſes vnder hand, and hinder the Romans from comming neere it to preuent him. But his guide miſ-vnderſtood the Carthaginian pronunciation, and conducted him awry another way, from Caſinum to Caſilinum, whence Fabius hoped that he ſhould not eaſily eſcape. Now beganne the wiſdome of Fabius to grow into credit; as if he had taken the Carthaginians in a trap, & wonne the victorie, without blowes. But Hannibal reformed this opinion, and freed himſelfe, by a ſlight inuention, yet ſeruing the turne as well as a better. In driuing the country, hee had gotten about two thouſand Kine; whoſe hornes he dreſſed with drie faggots, and ſetting fire to them in the darke night, cauſed them to be driuen vp the hills. The ſpectacle was ſtrange, and therefore terrible; eſpecially to thoſe, that knew it to be the worke of a terrible enemie. What it ſhould meane, Fabius could not tell: but thought it a deuice to circumuent him; and therefore kept within his Trenches. They that kept the hill-tops, were horribly afraid, when ſome of theſe fierie Monſters were gotten beyond them; and ran therefore haſtily away, thinking that the enemies were behind their backs, and fell among the light-armed Carthaginians, that were no leſſe afraid of them. So Hannibal, with his whole Armie, recouered ſure ground, without moleſtation: where he ſtayed till the next morning; and then brought off his light footmen, with ſome ſlaughter of the Romans, that began to hold them in skirmiſh: After this, Hannibal made ſemblance of taking his journie towards Rome: and the Dictator coaſted him in the wonted manner; keeping ſtill on high grounds, between him and the Citie, whileſt the Carthaginian waſted all the Plaines. The Carthaginian tooke Geryon, an old ruinous Towne in Apulia, forſaken by the Inhabitants; which he turned into Barnes and Store-houſes for winter, and incamped vnder the broken walls. Other matter of importance he did none: but the time paſſed idlely, till the Dictator was called away to Rome, about ſome buſineſſe of Religion, and left the Armie in charge with Minutius, the Maſter of the horſe.

Minutius was glad of this good occaſion to ſhew his owne ſufficiencie. Hee was fully perſwaded, that his Romans, in plaine field, would be too hard for the Africans and Spaniards: by whom if they had beene foiled already twice or thrice, it was not by open force, but by ſubtiltie & ambuſh, which he thought himſelfe wiſe enough to preuent. All the Armie was of his opinion; and that ſo earneſtly, as he was preferred by iudgement of the Souldiers, in worthineſſe to command, before the cold and warie Fabius. In this jollitie of conceit, hee determined to fight. Yet had hee beene peremptorily forbidden ſo to doe, by the Dictator; the breach of whoſe command was extreme perill of death. But the honour of the victorie, which hee held vndoubtedly his owne; the loue of the Armie; and the friends that he had at home bearing Office in Rome, were enough to ſaue him from the Dictators rods and axes, tooke he the matter neuer ſo hainouſly. Hannibal on the other ſide was no leſſe glad, that he ſhould play with a more aduenturous gameſter. Therefore hee drew neere: and to prouoke the Romans, ſent forth a third part of his Armie to waſte the Countrie. This was boldly done, seeing that Minutius incamped hard by him: but it seemes, that hee now despised those whom hee had so often vanquished. There was a peece of high ground betweene the two camps; which because it would bee commodious to him that could occupie it, the Carthaginians seized vpon by night with two thousand of their light-armed. But Minutius, by plaine force, wanne it from them the next day; and entrenching himselfe thereupon, became their neerer neighbour.

Countrie,

The maine businesse of Hannibal at this time was, to prouide abundantly, not only for his men, but for his horses, which hee knew to bee the chiefe of his strength; that he might keepe them in good heart against the next Summer: if besides this he could giue the Romans another blow, it would increase his reputation, encourage his owne men, terrifie his enemies, and giue him leaue to forrage the Countrie at will. Since therefore Minutius did not in many dayes issue forth of his campe, the Carthaginian sent out (as before) a great number of his men, to fetch in haruest. This aduantage Minutius wisely espied, and tooke. For he led forth his Armie, and setting it in order presented battaile to Hannibal, that was not in case to accept it, euen at his owne Trenches. His horse, and all his light Armature, diuided into many companies, hee sent abroad against the forragers; who being dispersed ouer all the fields, and loaden with bootie, could make no resistance. This angred Hannibal, that was not able to helpe them; but worse did it anger him, when the Romans tooke heart to assaile his Trenches. They perceiued that it was meere weakenesse, which held him within his campe, & therefore were bold to despise his great name, that could not resist their present strength. But in the heat of the businesse, Asdrubal came from Geryon with foure thousand men, being informed of the danger, by those that had escaped the Roman horse. This emboldened Hannibal to issue forth against the Romans; to whom neuertheless hee did not such hurt, as hee had receiued.

For this peece of seruice Minutius was highly esteemed by the Armie, & more highly by the People at Rome, to whom he sent the newes, with somewhat greater boast than truth. It seemed no small matter, that the Roman Armie had recouered spirit, so farre forth that it dared to set vpon Hannibal in his owne campe; and that in so doing, it came off with the better. Euery man therefore praised the Master of the horse, that had wrought this great alteration; and consequently, they grew as farre out of liking with Fabius, and his timorous proceedings, thinking that hee had not done any thing wisely, in all his Dictatorship: sauing that he chose such a worthy Lieutenant; whereas indeede in no other thing hee had so greatly erred. But the Dictator was not so joyfull of a little good luck, as angry with the breach of discipline; and fearefull of greater danger, thereon likely to ensue. Hee said that hee knew his owne place, and what was to be done; that he would teach the Master of the horse to doe so likewise; and make him giue account of what he had done, if hee were Dictator: speaking it openly, That good successe, issuing from bad counsaile, was more to be feared, than calamitie; for as much as the one bred a foolish confidence; the other taught men to be warie. Against these Sermons euery one cryed out; especially Metellus, a Tribune of the people: which Office warranted him to speake, and doe what he list, without feare of the Dictator. Is it not enough (said he) that this our only Man, chosen to be Generall, and Lord of the Towne, in our greatest necessitie, hath done no manner of good, but suffered all Italie to bee wasted before his eyes, to the vtter shame of our State; vnlesse he also hinder others, from doing better than himselfe can, or dares? It were good to consider what he meanes by this. Into the place of C. Flaminius hee hath not chosen any new Consul all this while; Seruilius is sent away to Sea, I know not why; Hannibal and Hee, haue as it were taken Truce; Hannibal sparing the Dictators grounds: (for Hannibal had indeede forborne to spoile some grounds of Fabius, that so hee might bring him into enuie & suspition) & the Dictator giuing him leaue to spoile all others, without impeachment.

peachment. Surely his drift is euen this: He would haue the warre to last long, that he himselfe might be long in Office, and haue the sole Gouernement both of our Citie, and Armies. But this must not be so. It were better, that the Commonaltie of Rome, which gaue him this authoritie, should againe take it from him, and conferre it vpon one more worthy. But lest, in mouing the people hereto, I should seeme to doe him injurie; thus farre forth I will regard his honour: I will only propound, That the Master of the Horse may be joyned in equall authority with the Dictator; a thing not more new, nor lesse necessarie, than was the electing of this Dictator, by the People.

Though all men, euen the Senators, were ill perswaded of the course which Fabius had taken against Hannibal, as being neither plausible, nor seeming beneficiall at the present; yet was there none so injurious, as to thinke that his generall intent, and care of the Weale publike, was lesse than very honourable. Whereas therefore it was the manner, in passing of any Act, that some man of credit and authority, besides the Propounder, should stand vp, and formally deliuer his approbation; not one of the principall Citizens was found so impudent, as to offer that open disgrace, both vnto a worthy Personage, and (therewithall) vnto that Dignitie, whose great power had freed the State at seuerall times, from the greatest dangers. Only C. Terentius Varro, who the yeere before had beene Prætor, was glad of such an opportunitie, to winne the fauour of the Multitude. This fellow was the sonne of a Butcher; afterwards became a shop-keeper; and being of a contentious spirit, grew, by often brabblings, to take vpon him as a Pleader, dealing in poore mens causes. Thus by little and little he got into Office; and rose by degrees, being aduanced by those, who in hatred of the Nobilitie fauoured his very baseneſſe. And now hee thought the time was come, for him to giue an hard push at the Consulship; by doing that, which none of the great men, fearing or fauouring one another, either durst or would. So he made an hot inuectiue, not only against Fabius, but against all the Nobilitie; saying, that it grieued them to see the people doe well, and take vpon them what belonged vnto them, in matter of Gouernement; that they sought to humble the Commons by pouertie, and to impouerish them by warre; especially by warre at their owne doores, which would soone consume euery poore mans liuing, and finde him other worke to thinke vpon, than matter of State. Therefore he bade them to be wise: and since they had found one, (this worthy Master of the horse) that was better affected vnto them and his Countrie, to reward him according to his good deserts; and giue him authoritie, accordingly as was propounded by the Tribune, that so hee might be encouraged and enabled, to proceede as he had begunne. So the Act passed.

Before this busie day of contention, Fabius had dispatched the election of a new Consul, which was M. Atilius Regulus, in the roome of C. Flaminius: and hauing finished all requisite businesse, went out of Towne, perceiuing well, that he should not bee able to withstand the Multitude, in hindering the Decree. The newes of Minutius his aduancement, was at the campe as soone as Fabius: so that his old Lieutenant, and new Colleague, beganne to treat with him as a Companion; asking him at the first, in what sort he thought it best to diuide their authoritie: whether that one, one day; and the other, the next; or each of them, successiuely, for some longer time, should command in chiefe. Fabius briefly told him, That it was the pleasure of the Citizens, to make the Master of the horse equal to the Dictator; but that he should neuer be his superiour: He would therefore diuide the Legions with him, by lot, according to the custome. Minutius was not herewith greatly pleased; for that with halfe of the Armie he could not worke such wonders, as otherwise he hoped to accomplish. Neuertheless hee meant to doe his best; and so taking his part of the Armie, incamped about a mile and an halfe from the Dictator. Needfull it was (though Liuie seeme to taxe him for it) that he should so doe. For where two seuerall Commanders are not subordinate one vnto the other, nor ioyned ned in Commission, but haue each entire & absolute charge of his owne followers there are the forces (though belonging vnto one Prince or State) not one, but two distinct Armies: in which regard, one campe shall not hold them both, without great inconuenience. Polybius neither findes fault with this disiunction; nor yet reports, that Fabius was vnwilling to command in chiefe successiuely (as the two Consuls vsed) with Minutius, by turnes. Hee saith that Minutius was very refractarie; and so proud of his aduancement, that continually he opposed the Dictator: who thereupen referred it to his choice, either to diuide the forces betweene them, as is said before, or else to haue command ouer all by course. This is likely to bee true. For natures impatient of subjection, when once they haue broken loose from the rigour of authority, loue nothing more, than to contest with it: as if herein consisted the proofe and assurance of their libertie.

It behoued the Master of the horse, to make good the opinion which had thus aduanced him. Therefore he was no lesse carefull, of getting occasion to fight, than was Fabius of auoiding the necessitie. That which Minutius and Hannibal equally desired, could not long be wanting. The Countrie lying betweene them was open and bare, yet as fit for ambush, as could be wished: for that the sides of a naked valley adjoyning, had many, and spacious caues; able, some one of them, to hide two or three hundred men. In these lurking places, Hannibal bestowed fiue hundred horse, and fiue thousand foot; thrusting them so close together, that they could not be discouered. But lest by any misaduenture they should be found out, and buried in their holes; he made offer betimes in the morning, to seize vpon a peece of ground that lay on the other hand: whereby he drew the eies and thoughts of the Romans, from their more needfull care, to businesse little concerning them. Like vnto this was the occasion, which, not long before, had prouoked Minutius, to aduenture vpon the Carthaginians. Hoping therefore to increase his honour, in like sort as hee got it; he sent first his light armature, then his horse, and at length (seeing that Hannibal seconded his owne troupes with fresh companies) hee followed in person with the Legions. He was soone caught; and so hotly charged on all sides, that he knew neither how to make resistance, nor any safe retrait. In this dangerous case, whilest the Romans defended themselues, loosing many, and those of their best men: Fabius drew neere, in very good order, to relieue them. For this old Captaine, perceiuing a farre off, into what extremitie his new Colleague had rashly throwne himselfe, and his followers; did the office of a good Citizen; and regarding more the benefit of his Country, than the disgrace which he had wrongfully sustained, sought rather to approue himselfe by hasting to doe good, than by suffering his enemie to feele the reward of doing ill. Vpon Fabius his approch, Hannibal retyred: fearing to be well wetted with a showre, from the cloud (as he termed the Dictator) that had hung so long on the Hill-tops. Minutius forthwith submitted himselfe to Fabius; by whose benefit hee confessed his life to haue beene saued. So from this time forwards, the Warre proceeded coldly, as the Dictator would haue it; both whilest his Office lasted, which was not long, and likewise afterwards, when he deliuered vp his charge vnto the Consuls, that followed his instructions.

Seruilius the Consul had pursued in vaine a Carthaginian fleet, to which he came neuer within kenning. He ranne along all the coast of Italie; tooke hostages of the Sardinians and Corsicans; passed ouer into Africk; and there negligently falling to spoile the Countrie, was shamefully beaten aboord his ships, with the losse of a thousand men. Weighing anchor therefore in all haste, hee returned home by Sicil; and (being so required by the Dictators letters) repaired to the campe, with his fellow-Consul, where they tooke charge of the Armie.

§. VII.

The Roman people, desirous to finish the warre quickly, choose a rash and vnworthie Consul. Great forces leuied against HANNIBAL. HANNIBAL taketh the Romans prouisions in the Castle of Cannæ. The new Consuls set forth against HANNIBAL.

WIth little pleasure did they of the poorer sort in Rome, heare the great commendations, that were giuen to Fabius by the principal Citizens. He had indeed preserued them from receiuing a great ouerthrow: but he had neither finished the warre, nor done any thing in apparance thereto tending. Rather it might seeme, that the reputation of this his one worthy act, was likely to countenance the slow proceedings, or perhaps the cowardize (if it were no worse) of those that followed him, in protracting the work to a great length. Else, what meant the Consuls to sit idle the whole winter, contrarie to all former custome; since it was neuer heard before, that any Roman Generall had willingly suffered the time of his command to run away without any performance, as if it were honorable to doe iust nothing? Thus they suspected they knew not what; and were readie euery man, to discharge the griefe and anger of his own priuate losse, vpon the ill administration of the publique.

This affection of the people, was very helpful to C. Terentius Varro, in his suit for the Consulship. It behoued him to strike, whilst the Iron was hot: his owne worth being little or none, and his credit ouer-weake, to make way into that high Dignity. But the Cõminaltie were then in such a moode, as abundantly supplied all his defects. Wherein to help, he had a kinsman, Bibius Herennius, then Tribune of the People; who spared not to vse the libertie of his place: in saying what he listed, without all regard of truth, or modestie. This bold Orator stuck not to affirme, That Hannibal was drawn into Italie, and suffered therein to range at his pleasure, by the Noblemen; That Minutius indeed with his two Legions, was likely to haue been ouerthrowne, and was rescued by Fabius with the other two: but had al been joyned together, what they might haue done, it was apparent, by the victorie of Minutius, when he cõmanded ouer al as Master of the horse; That without a Plebeian Consul, the warre would neuer be brought to an end; That such of the Plebeians, as had long since been aduanced to honour by the people, were grown as proud as the old Nõbilitie, and contemned the meaner sort, euer since themselues were freed from contempt of the more mightie; That therefore it was needful to choose a Consul, who should be altogether a Plebeian, a meere new man, one that could boast of nothing but the Peoples loue, nor could wish more, than to keep it, by well deseruing of them. By such perswasions, the Multitude was won, to be wholly for Terẽtius: to the great vexatiõ of the Nobles, who could not endure, to see a man raised for none other vertue, than his detracting from their honor; and therfore opposed him with al their might. To hinder the desire of the People, it fel out, or at least was alleaged, that neither of the two present Consuls could well be spared, from attending vpon Hannibal, to hold the Election. Wherefore a Dictator was named for that purpose: and he againe deposed; either (as was pretended) for some religious impediment, or because the Fathers desired an Inter-regnum, wherein they might better hope to preuaile in choice of the new Consuls. This Inter-regnum tooke name and being in Rome, at the death of Romulus; and was in vse at the death of other Kings. The order of it was this. Al the Fathers, or Senators, who at the first were an hundred, parted themselues into Tens, or Decuries; and gouerned successiuely, by the space of fiue daies, one Decurie after another in order: yet so, that the Lictors, or Virgers, carrying the Fasces, or bundles of rods and axes, waited only vpon the chiefe of them with these Ensignes of power. This custome was retained, in times of the Consuls; and put in vse, when by death, or any casualtie, there wanted ordinary Magistrates of the old yeare, to substitute new for the yeare following. The aduantage of the Fathers herein was, that if the Election were not like to goe as they would haue it, there needed no more, than to let slip fiue daies, & then was all to begin anew: by which interruption, the heat of the Multitude was commonly well asswaged. Vpon such change of those, that were Presidents of the Election; it was also lawfull vnto new Petitioners, to sue for the Magistracies that lay void: which otherwise was not allowed; but a time limited, wherein they should publiquely declare themselues to seeke those Offices. But no deuice would serue, against the generall fauour borne vnto Terentius. One Inter-regnum passed ouer; and the malice of the Fathers, against the vertue (as it was beleiued) of this meane, but worthie man, seemed so manifest, that when the People had vrged the businesse to dispatch, only Terentius was chosen Consul: in whose hand it was left, to hold the election of his Colleague. Hereupon all the former Petitioners gaue ouer. For whereas men of ordinary marke had stood for the place before; it was now though meet, that, both to supply the defect, and to bridle the violence of this vnexpert, and hot-headed man, one of great sufficiencie, and reputation, should be joyned with him, as both Companion and opposite. So L. Æmilius Paulus, he who few yeares since had ouer-come the Illyrians, and chaced Demetrius Pharius out of his Kingdome, was vrged by the Nobility to stand for the place; which he easily obtained, hauing no Competitor. It was not the desire of this honourable man, to trouble himselfe any more in such great businesse of the Common-wealth. For, notwithstanding his late good seruice; He, and M. Liuius that had been his companion in Office, were afterwards iniuriously vexed by the People, and called vnto judgement: wherin Liuius was condemned, and Æmilius hardly escaped. But of this iniustice they shall put the Romans well in minde each of them in his second Consulship, wherein they shall honorably approue their worth; the one of them nobly dying, in the most grieuous losse; the other brauely winning, in the most happie victorie, that euer befell that Common-wealth.

These new Consuls, Varro and Paulus, omitted no part of their diligence in preparing for the warre: wherein though Varro made the greater noise, by telling what wonders he would worke, and that hee would aske no more, than once to haue a sight of Hannibal, whom he promised to vanquish the very first day; yet the prouidence and care of Paulus, trauailed more earnestly toward the accomplishment of that, wherof his fellow vainely boasted. He wrote vnto the two old Consuls Seruilius and Atilius; desiring them to abstaine from hazard of the maine chance; but neuertheless, to ply the Carthaginians with daily skirmish, and weaken them by degrees: that when he and his Colleague should take the field, with the great Armie which they were now leuying, they might find the foure old Legions well accustomed to the Enemie, and the Enemie well weakened to their hands. He was also very strict in his Musters; wherein the whole Senate assisted him so carefully, as if in this Action they meant to refute the slanders, with which Terentius and his Adherents had burdened them. What number of men they raised it is vncertaine. Foure-score thousand foot, at the least, and sixe thousand horse, they were strong in the field, when the day came, which Varro had so greatly desired, of looking vpon Hannibal.

Hiero, the old King of Syracuse, as he had relieued the Carthaginians, when they were distressed by their owne Mercinaries; so did he now send helpe to Rome, a thousand Archers, and Slingers, with great quantity of Wheat, Barlie, and other prouisions: fearing nothing more, than that one of these two mighty Cities should destroy the other, whereby his owne estate would fall to ruine; that stood vpright, by hauing them somewhat euenly ballanced. He gaue them also counsaile, to send forces into Africa; if (perhaps) by that meanes they might diuert the warre from home. His gifts, and good aduice were louingly accepted; and instructions were giuen to Titus Octacilius the Prætor, which was to goe into Sicil, that he should accordingly passe ouer into Africk, if he fonnd it expedient.

The

The great Leuies, which the Romans made at this time, doe much more ſerue to declare their puiſſance, than any, though larger accompt by Poll, of ſuch as were not eaſily drawne into the field, and fitted for ſeruice. For beſides theſe Armies of the Conſuls, and that which went into Sicil; twentie fiue thouſand, with L. Poſthumius Albinus another of the Prætors, went againſt the Gaules, to reclaime that Prouince, which the paſſage of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of this their preſent ſtrength, might well embolden them to do as they did. They ſent Embaſſadors to Philip the ſonne of Demetrius, King of Macedon; requiring him to deliuer into their hands Demetrius Pharius: who hauing been their ſubiect, and rebel, was fled into his Kingdom. They alſo ſent to the Illyrians, to demand their tribute; whereof the day of payment was alreadie paſt. What anſwere they receiued, it is not knowne: only this is known, that Demetrius Pharius was not ſent vnto them; and that Philip henceforth beganne to haue an eye vpon them, little to their good. As for the Illyrian monie; by the ſhifts that they were driuen ſoone after to make, it will appeare, that the one halfe of it (how little ſoeuer) would haue beene welcome to Rome, and accepted, without any cauil about forfeiture for non paiment of the whole.

Whilſt the Citie was buſied in theſe cares, the old Conſuls lay as neere vnto Hannibal, as poſſibly as they could, without incurring the neceſſitie of a battaile. Many skirmiſhes they had with him; wherein their ſucceſſe for the moſt part, was rather good than great. Yet one miſchance not only blemiſhed the honour of their other ſeruices, but was indeed the occaſion, to draw on the miſerie following. Hannibal, for the moſt part of that time, made his abode at Geryon, where lay all his ſtore for the Winter. The Romans, to be neere him lodged about Cannuſium; and, that they might not be driuen to turne aſide for all neceſſaries, to the loſſe of good opportunities, they beſtowed much of their prouiſions in the Caſtle of Canna: for the town was razed the yeere before. This place Hannibal wanne; and thereby not only furniſhed himſelfe, but compelled his enemies to want many needfull things, vnleſſe they would be troubled with farre carriage. Beſides this, and more to his aduantage, he enabled himſelfe to abide in that open Countrie, fit for the ſeruice of his horſe: longer then the Romans, hauing ſo many mouthes to feed, could wel endure to tarrie; without offering battaile; which he moſt deſired. Of this miſhap when Seruilius had informed the Senate, letting them vnderſtand, how this Peece, taken by Hannibal, would ſerue him to command no ſmall part of the Country adjacent; it then ſeemed needfull, euen vnto the Fathers themſelues, to aduenture a battaile with the Carthaginian, rather than ſuffer him thus to take roote in the ground of Italie. Neuertheleſſe, anſwere was returned vnto Seruilius, that hee ſhould haue patience yet awhile: for that the Conſuls would ſhortly be there, with a power ſufficient to doe as need required.

When all things were readie in the Citie, and the ſeaſon of the yere commodious to take the field; the two Conſuls, with their armie, ſet forth againſt Hannibal. This was alwaies done with great ſolemnitie: eſpecially, whenſoeuer they went forth to warre againſt any noble or redoubted Enemie. For Sacrifices, and ſolemne Vowes, were made vnto Iupiter, and the reſt of their gods, for good ſucceſſe and victorie: which being performed; the Generals in warlike attire, with an honorable traine of the principall men, not only ſuch as were of their kindred and alliance, or followed them to the warre, as Voluntaries, for loue, but a great number of others that meant to abide at home, were accompanied on their way, & diſmiſſed with friendly leaue-taking, and good wiſhes. At this time, all the Fathers, and the whole Nobility, waited vpon Æmilius Paulus, as the only Man, whom they thought either worthie of this honor, or likely to do his countrie remarkable ſeruice. Terentius his Attendants were the whole multitude of the poorer Citizens; a troupe no leſſe in greatnes, than the other was in dignitie. At the parting; Fabius the late Dictator, is ſaid to haue exhorted the Conſul Paulus, with many graue words, to ſhew his magnanimitie, not onely in dealing with the Carthaginians, but (which he thought harder) in bridling the outragious follie of his fellow-Consul. The answere of Paulus was, That hee meant not againe to runne into danger of condemnation, by offending the multitude; that he would doe his best for his countrie: but if he saw his best were likely to be ill taken, he would thinke it lesse rashnesse to aduenture vpon the Enemies sword, than vpon the malice of his owne Citizens.

§. VIII.

Dissension betweene the two Roman Consuls. Whether it be likely, that HANNIBAL was vpon point of flying out of Italie, when the Romans pressed him to fight. The great battaile of Cannæ.

THese new Generals, arriuing at the Camp, dismissed M. Atilius one of the last yeares Consuls, requesting it because of his age and weakenes: Seruilius they retained with them, as their Assistant. The first thing that Æmilius thought necessarie, was, to hearten his Souldiers with good words; who out of their bad successe hitherto, had gathered more cause of feare, than of courage. Hee willed them to consider, not only now, their victories in times past against the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but euen their own great numbers: which were no lesse than all that Rome at the present was able to set forth. Hee told them in what danger their Countrie stood; how the state and safety thereof rested vpon their hands; vsing some such other common matter of perswasion. But the most effectual part of his Oration was, That Hannibal with this his terrible Army, had not yet obtained one victorie by plaine force and valour: but that only by deceit and ambush he had stolne the honor, which he had gotten at Trebia and Thrasymene. Herewithall he taxed the inconsiderate rashnesse of Sempronius and Flaminius; of whom the one saw not his enemies, vntill he was surrounded by them; the other scarce saw them, when they struck off his head, by reason of the thick mist, through the darkenesse whereof he went groping (as it were blinde-fold) into their snares. Finally, declaring what aduantages they had against the Enemie; and how destitute the Enemie was of those helps, by which he had hitherto preuailed against them; hee exhorted them to play the men, and doe their best. They were easily perswaded: for the contemplation of their owne multitude, and confidence of the Roman vertue in matter of armes, gaue them cause to thinke, that vnder a Captaine so well experienced, and euery way sufficient, as Æmilius was knowne to bee, they should easily preuaile against the Carthaginians: that came farre short of them in all things else, saue craft; which would not alwaies thriue. But in one thing they mistooke the meaning of their Generall. It was his desire that they should haue heart to fight; not that they should lose the patience of awaiting a conuenient season. But they, hauing preconceiued a victorie, thought all delaies to be impediments: and thereby sought to robbe themselues of their best helpe; which was, good conduct. They remembred what talke they had heard at Rome: and were themselues affected with the Vulgar desire, of ending the warre quickly; wherein since Æmilius had acknowledged, that the aduantage was theirs, why did he make them forbeare to vse it? Thus thought the common Souldier: and thus also thought the Consul Terentius; who was no lesse popular in the Campe, than he had been in the Citie. Expectation is alwaies tedious; and neuer more, than when the Euent is of most importance. All men longed, both at Rome, and in the Armie, to be freed from the doubtfull passions of Hope and Feare: therfore Terentius, who hastned their desire to effect, was likely to winne more thankes, than should his Colleague, though greater in performance.

Thus while the Romans thinke themselues to haue the better of their Enemies, they fall into an inconuenience, than which few are more dangerous; Dissension

of their chiefe Commanders. Varro would fight: Æmilius would so too, but said that it was not yet time; why? because the enemie must shortly dislodge, and remoue hence, into places lesse fit for his horse. But shall the Romans wait, till Hannibal, hauing eaten vp his last yeares prouisions, returne into Campania to gather a second Harueſt? This would (said Varro) sauour too much of Q. Fabius: And your haste (said Paulus) doth sauour no lesse of C. Flaminius. Their deedes were like their wordes: for they commanded by turnes interchangeably euery day. Æmilius lodged sixe miles from Hannibal, where the ground was somewhat vneuen. Thither if the Carthaginians would take paines to come; hee doubted not to send them away in such haste, as they should not leaue running till they were out of Italie. But they came not. Terentius therefore the next day descended into the Plaines; his Colleague holding him, and beseeching him to stay. Neuertheleſſe he sate downe close by Hannibal: who as an vnbidden gueſt gaue him but a rude welcome and intertainement. The Carthaginian Horse, and light Armature, fel vpon the Roman Vantcourrers; and put the whole Armie in tumult, whilest it was yet in march: but they were beaten off, not without losse, for that the Romans had among their Veliters, some troupes weightily armed, whereas the Carthaginians had none. The day following, Æmilius, who could not handsomly withdraw the Army out of that leuel ground, incamped vpon the Riuer Aufidus; sending a third part of his forces ouer the water, to lie vpon the Easterne banke, where they entrenched themselues. Hee neuer was more vnwilling to fight, than at this present: because the ground serued wholly for the aduantage of his enemie; with whom he meant to deale, when occasion should draw him to more equal termes. Therefore he stirred not out of his Trenches, but fortified himselfe; expecting when Hannibal should dislodge, and remoue toward Geryon, Cannæ, or some other place, where his store lay, for want of neceſsaries: whereof an Armie forraging the country, was not likely to carrie about with it sufficient quantitie, for any long time.

Here it would not be passed ouer with silence, That Liuie differeth much in his Relation from Polybius: telling many strange tales, of the miserie into which Hannibal had been driuen; and of base courses that he deuised to take, if the Romans could haue retained their patience a little longer. He had (saith Liuie) but ten daies prouision of meat. He had not monie to pay his Souldiers. They were an vnruly Rabble, gathered out of seuerall Nations, so that he knew not how to keepe them in order; but that from murmuring, they fell to flat exclamations, first, about their Pay, and Prouant, and afterwards for very famine. Especially the Spaniards were readie to forsake him, and runne ouer to the Roman side. Yea Hannibal himselfe was once vpon the point, to haue stolne away into Gaule with all his horse, and left his foot vnto their miserable destinies. At length for lacke of all other counsaile, he resolued to get him as farre as he could from the Romans, into the Southermost parts of Apulia; to the end, that both his vnfaithfull Souldiers might finde the more difficultie in running from him; and that his hunger might be relieued with the more early harueſt. But whilest he was about to put this deuice in execution, the Romans pressed him so hard, that they euen forced him vnto that, which hee most defired; euen to fight a battaile vpon open Champaine ground: wherein hee was victorious: It was not vncommendable in Liuie, to speake the best of his owne Citizens; and, where they did ill, to say, That, without their owne great folly, they had done passing well. Further also he may be excused; as writing onely by report. For thus hee saith; HANNIBAL de fugâ in Galliam [dicitur] agitâsse; HANNIBAL [is said] to haue bethought himselfe of flying into Gaule: where he makes it no more then a matter of heare-say; as perhaps was all the rest of this Relation. As for the processe it selfe, it is very incredible. For if Hannibal, comming out of Gaule, through the Marishes and Bogs of Hetruria, could finde victuailes enough, and all things needfull vnto his Armie, the Summer forgoing: what should hinder him to doe the like this yeare; especially seeing he had plaid the carefull husband in making a great harueſt, since he had long beene Maſter of the open field; and beſides, had gotten, by ſurpriſe, no ſmall part of the Romans prouiſions? Suteable hereunto is all the reſt. If Hannibal had taken nothing but corne and cattaile; his Souldiers might perhaps haue fallen into mutinie for pay. But he brought gold with him into Italie: and had ſo well increaſed his ſtock, ſince he came into that Countrie, that hee had armed his African Souldiers, all Roman-like; and loaden his followers with ſpoile: hauing left wherewith to redeeme as many of his owne, as were taken by the Enemie; when the Romans were not willing, as finding it not eaſie to doe the like. In this point therefore, we are to attend the generall agreement of Hiſtorians: who giue it as a principall commendation vnto Hannibal, That hee alwaies kept his Armie free from ſedition, though it were compoſed of ſundrie Nations; no leſſe different in Manners, Religion, and almoſt in Nature, than they were in languages: and well might he ſo doe, hauing not only pronounced, That which of his men ſoeuer fought brauely with an Enemie, was thereby a Carthaginian; but ſolemnely proteſted and ſworne, (beſides other rewards) to make as many of them, as ſhould deſerue and ſeeke it, free Citizens of Carthage. The running away into Gaule, was a ſenleſſe deuice. Hannibal, being there with his whole Armie, tooke ſo little pleaſure in the Countrie and People, that he made all haſte to get him out of it. And what ſhould he now doe there with his horſe? or how could hee bee truſted, either there or elſewhere? yea, how could he deſire to liue; hauing betrayed all his Army; and relinquiſhed his miſerable foot, to the butcherie of their enemies? This tale therfore Plutarch omitteth; who in writing the life of Hannibal, takes in a maner al his directions from Liuie. But of this and the like it is enough to ſay, That all Hiſtorians loue to extoll their owne countrimen; and where a loſſe cannot be diſſembled, nor the honour of the victorie taken from the Enemie, and giuen vnto blind Fortune, there to lay all the blame on ſome ſtrange miſgouernment of their own forces: as if they might eaſily haue wonne all, but loſt all through ſuch folly, as no Enemie can hope to find in them another time.

Now let vs returne backe to the two Armies, where they lie emcamped on the Riuer Aufidus. Varro was perſwaded, that it concerned him in honor, to make good his word vnto the people of Rome: and ſince he had thus long waited in vaine, to get the conſent of Paulus, now at length to vſe his owne authority; and, without any more diſputing of the matter, to fight when his owne day came. When therefore it was his turne to command; at the firſt breake of day he beganne to paſſe the Riuer, without ſtaying to bid his Colleague good morrow. But Paulus came to him; and ſought, as in former times, to haue diſſwaded him, from putting the eſtate of his Countrie to a needleſſe hazard. Againſt whoſe wordes and ſubſtantiall arguments, Terentius could alleage none other, than point of Honour. Hannibal had preſented them battaile at their Trenches: ſhould they endure this Brauado? He had ſent his Numidians ouer the Riuer but euen the day before, who fel vpon the Romans that were fetching water to the leſſer Campe; and draue them ſhamefully to runne within their defences, which alſo they made offer to aſſaile: muſt this alſo be ſuffered? He would not endure it: for it could not but weaken the ſpirit of the Roman Souldier; which as yet was liuely, and full of ſuch courage, as promiſed aſſured victorie. When Æmilius perceiued, that he could not hinder the obſtinate reſolution of his Companion; he tooke all care, that what he ſaw muſt be done, might be done well. Ten thouſand Roman foot he cauſed to be left behind, in the greater campe, oppoſite vnto the Carthaginian; to the intent, that either Hannibal might bee compelled, to leaue behind him ſome anſwerable number, for defence of his Trenches: (which out of his paucity he was leſſe able to ſpare from the battaile, than were the Romans) or that theſe ten thouſand, falling vpon the Carthaginian Campe, when the fight beganne, and taking it with all the wealth therein, might therby (as commonly doe ſuch accidents) terrifie and diſtract the Enemies in the heate of fight. This done; the two Conſuls went ouer the water with their Armie to the leſſer Cump, whence also they drew forth their men, and ranged them in order of battaile: the ground on the East part of the Riuer, seeming perhaps more fit for marshalling of their Armie. Hannibal was glad of this, as he had great cause; and, without any delay, passed likewise ouer, somewhat higher vp the streame, which ranne from the South; leauing in his owne campe so many, as he thought would serue to defend it, and no more. To encourage his men; He bade them looke about them, and view the ground well, vpon which they were to fight. They did so. And could you (said he) pray for any greater fortune, than to joyne battaile with the Romans vpon such a leuell ground, where the stronger in horse are sure to preuaile? They all assented to him; and shewed by their countenances, that they were very glad of it. Well then (said he further) ye are first of all to thanke the gods, that haue brought them hither; and then Vs, that haue trained them along, and drawne them into necessitie of playing for their liues, where they are sure to loose them. As for these Romans, I was faine to encourage you against them, when yee met them first: but now yee may euen encourage your selues, by calling to minde that they are the men, whom ye haue as often beaten as seene. Of one thing only I will put you in minde: That whereas hitherto you fought for other respects; as, to driue them before you out of Gaule; and to winne the open Countrie, and fields of Italie; both of which yee haue obtained: now are yee to fight for the Townes themselues, and all the riches within them; which this victorie shall make yours. Therefore play the stout Souldiers: and ere many houres passe, yee shall bee Lords of all that the Romans hold.

When he had said this; his brother Mago came to him, whom hee had sent to view the countenance of the Enemie. Hannibal asked him, what newes; and what worke they were likely to haue with these Romans? Worke enough (answered Mago) for they are an horrible many. As horrible a many as they are (thus Hannibal replied) I tell thee, brother, that among them all, search them neuer so diligently, thou shalt not finde one man, whose name is Mago. With that hee fell a laughing, and so did all that stood about him: which gladded the souldiers, who thought their Generall would not be so merry, without great assurance. Whether it were so, that Hannibal, in the pride of his victories already gotten, valued one Mago aboue many thousand Romans; or whether he intimated, that the Romans were no lesse troubled with thinking vpon Mago and his Companions, than was Mago with beholding their huge multitude; or whether hee meant only to correct the sad moode of his brother with a jest, and shew himselfe merry vnto the Souldiers: this his answere was more manly, than was the relation of his discoueren. But if Hannibal himselfe had beene sent forth by Mago, to view the Romans; he could not haue returned with a more gallant report in his mouth, than that which Captaine Gam, before the battaile of Agincourt, made vnto our King Henrie the fift: saying, that of the Frenchmen, there were enow to bee killed; enow to bee taken prisoners; and enow to run away. Euen such words as these, or such pleasant jests as this of Hannibal, are not without their moment; but serue many times, when battaile is at hand, to worke vpon such passions, as must gouerne more of the businesse: especially, where other needfull care is not wanting; without which they are but vaine boasts.

In this great day, the Carthaginian excelled himselfe; expressing no lesse perfection of his militarie skill, than was greatnesse in his spirit and vndertakings. For to omit the commodiousnesse of the place, into which hee had long before conceiued the meanes to draw his enemies to battaile; He marshalled his Armie in such conuenient order, that all hands were brought to fight, where euery one might doe best seruice. His Darters, and Slingers of the Baleares, hee sent off before him, to encounter with the Roman Velites. These were loose troupes, answerable in a manner to those, which we call now by a French name Enfans perdues; but when we vsed our owne termes, the forlorne hope. The grosse of his Armie following them, he ordered thus. His Africans, armed after the Roman manner, with the spoiles which they had had gotten at Trebia, Thrasymene, or elsewhere; and well trained in the vse of those weapons, that were of more aduantage, than those wherewith they had formerly serued; made the two wings, very deepe in File. Betweene these hee ranged his Gaules and Spaniards, armed, each after their owne Countrie manner; their shields alike; but the Gaules vsing long broad swordes, that were forcible in a downe-right stroke; the Spaniards, short and well-pointed blades, either to strike or thrust; the Gaules, naked from their nauell vpwards, as confident in their owne fiercenesse: the Spaniards, wearing white cassocks embroidered with purple. This medley of two Nations, differing as well in habit and furniture, as in qualitie, made a gallant shew; and terrible, because strange. The Gaules were strong of body, and furious in giuing charge; but soone wearied, as accustomed to spend their violence at the first brunt, which disposition all that come of them haue inherited to this day. The Spaniards were lesse eager, but more warie; neither ashamed to giue ground, when they were ouer-prest; nor afraid to returne, and renew the fight, vpon any small encouragement. As the roughnesse of the one, and patience of the other, serued mutually to reduce each of them to a good and firme temper; so the place which they held in this battaile, added confidence joyntly vnto them both. For they saw themselues well and strongly flanked with Carthaginians and other Africans; whose name was growne terrible in Spaine, by their Conquests; and in Gaule, by this their present warre. Since therefore it could not bee feared, that any great calamitie should fall vpon them, whilest the wings on either side stood fast: these Barbarians had no cause to shrinke, or forbeare to imploy the vtmost of their hardines, as knowing that the Enemie could not presse farre vpon them, without further engaging himselfe than discretion would allow. Hereunto may be added that great aduantage, which the Carthaginian had in horse: by which he was able, if the worst had happened, to make a good retrait. The effect of contraries is many times alike. Desperation begetteth courage; but not greater, nor so liuely, as doth assured Confidence. Hannibal therefore caused these Gaules and Spaniards to aduance; leauing void the place wherein they had stood, and into which they might fall backe, when they should bee ouer-hardly prest. So, casting them into the forme of a Crescent; Hee made them as it were his Vantguard: the two points of this great halfe Moone, that looked toward the emptie space from which he had drawne it, being narrow and thinne, as seruing only to guide it orderly backe, when neede should require; the foremost part of the Ring, swelling out toward the enemies, being well strengthned & thickned against all impression. The circle hereof seemeth to haue beene so great, that it shadowed the Africans, who stood behinde it: though such figures, cut in brasse, as I haue seene of this Battaile, present it more narrow; with little reason, as shall anon appeare: as also in the same figures it is omitted, That any Companies of Africans, or others, were left in the Reare, to second the Gaules and Spaniards, when they were driuen to retrait; though it be manifest, that Hannibal in person stood betweene the last rancks of his long battalions, & in the head of his Reare, doubtles well accompanied with the choice of his owne Nation. Betweene the left battalion and the Riuer Ausidus, were the Gaules and Spanish horse, vnder the command of Asdrubal: On the right wing, toward the wide Plaines, was Hanno (Liuie saith Mabarbal) with the Numidian light-horse. Hannibal himselfe, with his brother Mago, had the leading of the Reare. The whole summe of Hannibals Armie in the field this day, was tenne thousand horse, and fourtie thousand foot; his enemies hauing two to one against him in foot; and Hee, fiue to three against them in horse.

The Roman Armie was marshalled in the vsuall forme: but somwhat more narrow, and deepe, than was accustomed; perhaps, because this had beene found conuenient against the Carthaginians, in the former warre. It was indeede no bad way of resistance against Elephants, to make the Ranks thick and short, but the Files long; as also to strengthen well the Reare, that it might stand fast compacted as a wall, vnder shelter whereof the disordered troupes might re-allie themselues. it seemes, that Terentius had learned of some old Souldiers; and therefore he now ordered his Battailes accordingly, as meaning to shew more skill, than was in his vnderstanding. But the Carthaginians had here no Elephants with them in the field: their aduantage was in Horse; against which, this manner of embattailing was very vnprofitable, forasmuch as their charge is better sustained in front, than vpon a long flanke. As for Æmilius; it was not his day of command: He was but an Assistant; and in such cases it happens often, that wise men yeeld for very wearinesse vnto the more contentious. Vpon the right hand, and toward the Riuer, were the Roman horse-men, vnder the Consul Paulus: On the left wing, was C. Terentius Varro the other Consul, with the rest of the horse, which were of the Latines, and other Associates: Cn. Seruilius the former yeeres Consul, had the leading of the battaile. The Sunne was newly risen, and offended neither part; the Carthaginians hauing their faces North ward; the Romans toward the South.

After some light skirmish, betweene the Roman Velites and Hannibal his Darters and slingers of the Baleares: Asdrubal brake vpon the Consul Paulus, and was roughly encountred; not after the manner of seruice on horse-backe, vsed in those times, wheeling about Alman-like; but each giuing on in a right line, Pouldron to Pouldron, as hauing the Riuer on the one hand, and the shoulder of the foot on the other hand; so that there was no way left, but to pierce and breake thorow. Wherfore they not only vsed their Lances and Swordes; but rushing violently amongst the Enemies, grasped one another: and so, their horses running from vnder them, fell many to the ground; where starting vp againe, they beganne to deale blowes like foot-men. In conclusion, the Roman horse were ouer-borne, and driuen by plaine force to a staggering recoile. This the Consul Paulus could not remedy. For Asdrubal, with his boisterous Gaules and Spaniards, was not to bee resisted by these Roman Gentlemen, vnequall both in number, and in horsemanship. When the battailes came to joyning, the Roman Legionaries found worke enough, and somewhat more than enough, to breake that great Crescent, vpon which they first fell: so strongly, for the while, did the Gaules and Spanish foot make resistance. Wherefore the two points of their battaile drew towards the midst; by whose aide, these Opposites were forced to disband, and flie backe to their first place. This they did in great haste and feare: and were with no lesse haste, and follie pursued. Vpon the Africans, that stood behinde them, they needed not to fall foule; both for that there was void roome enough; and forasmuch as the Reare, or Hornes of this Moone, pointed into the safe retrait, where Hannibal with his Carthaginians was ready to reenforce them, when time should require. In this hasty retrait, or flight, of the Gaules and Spaniards; it hapned, as was necessarie, that they who had stood in the limbe or vtter compasse of the halfe Moone, made the innermost or concaue surface thereof (disordered and broken though it were) when it was forced to turne the inside outward: the hornes or points thereof, as yet, vntouched, only turning round, and recoiling very little. So the Romans, in pursuing them, were inclosed in an halfe-circle; which they should not haue needed greatly to regard, (for that the sides of it were exceeding thinne & broken; and the bottome of it, none other than a throng of men rowted, and seeming vnable to make resistance) had all the enemies foot bin cast into this one great body, that was in a manner dissolued. But whilest the Legions, following their supposed victorie, rushed on vpon those that stood before them, and thereby vnwittingly engaged themselues deepely within the principall strength of the Enemies, hedging them in on both hands; the two African Battalions on either side aduanced so farre, that getting beyond the Reare of them, they inclosed them, in a manner, behinde: and forward they could not passe farre, without remouing Hannibal and Mago; which made that way the least easie. Hereby it is apparent, That the great Crescent, before spoken of, was of such extent, as couered the Africans; who lay behinde it vndiscerned, vntill now. For it is agreed, that the Romans were thus empaled vnawares; and that they behaued themselues, as men Plut. in vit. Hannib.

men that thought vpon no other worke, than what was found them by the Gaules. Neither is it credible, that they would haue beene so mad, as to runne head-long, with the whole bulke of their Armie, into the throat of slaughter; had they seene those weapons bent against them at the first, which when they did see, they had little hope to escape. Much might be imputed to their heat of fight, and rashnesse of inferiour Captaines: but since the Consul Paulus, a man so expert in warre, being vanquished in horse, had put himselfe among the Legions; it cannot bee supposed, that hee and they did wilfully thus engage themselues. Asdrubal, hauing broken the troupes of Roman horse, that were led by the Consul Paulus, followed vpon them along the Riuer side, beating downe and killing, as many as he could, (which were almost all of them) without regard of taking prisoners. The Consul himselfe was either driuen vpon his owne Legions, or willingly did cast himselfe among them; as hoping by them to make good the day, notwithstanding the defeat of his horse. But he failed of this his expectation. Neuertheless hee cheared vp his men as well as hee could, both with comfortable wordes, and with the example of his owne stout behauiour: beating downe, and killing many of the enemies with his owne hand. The like did Hannibal among his Carthaginians, in the same part of the battaile; and with better successe. For the Consul receiued a blow from a sling, that did him great hurt: and though a troupe of Roman Gentlemen, riding about him, did their best to saue him from further harme; yet was he so hardly laid at, that he was compelled, by wounds and weakenesse, to forsake his horse. Hereupon all his company alighted, thinking that the Consul had giuen order so to doe: as in many battailes, the Roman men at armes had left their horses, to helpe their foot in distres. When Hannibal (for he was neere at hand) perceiued this, and vnderstood that the Consul had willed his horse-men to dismount; He was very glad of it, and pleasantly said, I had rather he would haue deliuered them vnto me, bound hand and foot: meaning, that he had them now almost as safe, as if they were so bound. All this while C. Terentius Varro, with the horse of the Associates, in the left wing, was maruailously troubled by Hanno (or Maharbal) and the Numidians: who beating vp and downe about that great sandy Plaine, raised a foule dust; which a strong Southwinde, blowing there accustomarily, draue into the eyes & mouthes of the Romans. These, vsing their aduantage both of number and of lightnesse, wearied the Consul and his followers exceedingly: neither giuing, nor sustaining any charge, but continually making offers, and wheeling about. Yet at the first they seemed to promise him an happy day of it. For when the battailes were euen ready to joyne; fiue hundred of these Numidians came pricking away from their fellowes, with their shields cast behinde their backes, (as was the manner of those which yeelded) and, throwing downe their armes, rendred themselues. This was good lucke to beginne withall, if there had beene good meaning. Varro had not leasure to examine them; but caused them, vnweaponed as they were, to get them behind the Armie, where he bade them rest quietly till all was done. These crafty aduentures did as hee bade them, for a while; till they found opportunitie to put in execution the purpose, for which they had thus yeelded. Vnder their Iackets they had short swords and ponyards; besides which, they found other scattered weapons about the field, of such as were slaine, and therewithall flew vpon the hindmost of the Romans, whilest all eyes and thoughts were bent another way: so that they did great mischiefe, and raised yet a greater terrour. Thus Hannibal, in a plaine leuell ground, found meanes to lay an ambush at the back of his enemies. The last blow, that ended all fight & resistance, was giuen by the same hand which gaue the first. Asdrubal, hauing in short space broken the Roman troupes of horse, and cut in peeces all, saue the Companie of Æmilius that rushed into the grosse of his foot, and a very few besides, that recouered some narrow passage, betweene the Riuer and their owne Battalions; did not stay to charge vpon the face of the Legions, but fell back behind the Reare of his owne, and fetching about, came vp to the Numidians: with whom hee joyned, and gaue vpon Terentius. This fearefull cloude, as it ſhewed at the firſt appearance what weather it had left behinde it, on the other ſide: ſo did it prognoſticate a diſmall ſtorme vnto thoſe, vpon whom it was ready now to fall. Wherefore Terentius his followers, hauing wearied themſelues much in doing little, and ſeeing more worke toward, than they could hope to ſuſtaine; thought it the beſt way, to auoide the danger by preſent flight. The Conſul was no leſſe wiſe than they, in apprehending the greatneſſe of his owne perill; nor more deſperate, in ſtriuing to worke impoſſibilities: it being impoſſible, when ſo many ſhranke from him, to ſuſtaine the impreſſion alone, which he could not haue endured with their aſſiſtance. Now hee found, that it was one thing to talke of Hannibal at Rome; and another, to incounter him. But of this; or of ought elſe, excepting haſty flight, his preſent leiſure would not ſerue him to conſider. Cloſe at the heeles of him and his flying troupes, followed the light Numidians: appointed by Aſdrubal vnto the purſuit, as fitteſt for that ſeruice. Aſdrubal himſelfe, with the Gaules and Spaniſh horſe, compaſſing about, fell vpon the backes of the Romans; that were ere this hardly diſtreſſed, and in a manner ſurrounded on all parts elſe. He brake them eaſily; who before made ill reſiſtance, being incloſed, & laid at on euery ſide, not knowing which way to turne. Here beganne a pittifull ſlaughter: the vanquiſhed multitude thronging vp and downe, they knew not whither or which way, whileſt euery one ſought to auoide thoſe enemies, whom hee ſaw neereſt. Some of the Roman Gentlemen that were about Æmilius, got vp to horſe, and ſaued themſelues: which though it is hardly vnderſtood how they could doe; yet I will rather beleeue it, than ſuppoſe that Liuie ſo reporteth, to grace therby his Hiſtorie with this following tale. CN. CORNELIVS LENTVLVS, galloping along by a place, where he ſaw the Conſul ſitting all bloudied vpon a ſtone, entreated him to riſe and ſaue himſelfe; offering him his aſſiſtance and horſe. But PAVLVS refuſed it; willing LENTVLVS to ſhift for himſelfe, and not to looſe time: ſaying, That it was not his purpoſe to be brought againe into iudgement by the People, either as an accuſer of his Colleague, or as guiltie himſelfe of that dayes loſſe. Further hee willed LENTVLVS to commend him to the Senate, and in particular to FABIVS: willing them to fortifie Rome, as faſt and well as they could; and telling FABIVS, that Hee liued and died mindfull of his wholeſome counſaile. These words (peraduenture) or ſome to like purpoſe, the Conſul vttered to Lentulus, either when againſt his will hee was drawne to that Battaile, or when hee beheld the firſt defeat of his Horſe; at what time he put himſelfe in the head of his Legions. For I doubt not, but Hannibal knew what he ſaid a good while before this; when he thought the Conſul and his troupe, in little better caſe than if they had beene bound. The whole Groſſe of the Romans, was incloſed indeede as within a ſacke; whereof the African Battalions made the ſides; the Spaniards, Gaules, and Hannibal with his Carthaginians, the bottome; and Aſdrubal with his horſe, cloſed vp the mouth: in which part, they firſt of all were ſhuffled together, and beganne the Rout, wherein all the reſt followed. Æmilius therefore, who could not ſit his horſe, whileſt the battaile yet laſted, and whileſt the ſpaces were ſomewhat open, by which hee might haue withdrawne himſelfe; was now (had hee neuer ſo well beene mounted) vnable to flie, hauing in his way ſo cloſe a throng of his owne miſerable followers, and ſo many heapes of bodies, as fell apace in that great Carnage. It ſufficeth vnto his honour, That in the Battaile hee fought no leſſe valiantly, than hee had warily before, both abſtained himſelfe, and diſſwaded his fellow-Conſul, from fighting at all. If, when the day was vtterly loſt, it had laine in his power to ſaue his owne life, vnto the good of his Countrie, neuer more needing it; I ſhould thinke, that he either too much diſeſteemed himſelfe; or being too faintly minded, was wearie of the World, and his vnthankefull Citizens. But if ſuch a reſolution were praiſe-worthy in Æmilius, as proceeding out of Roman valour; then was the Engliſh vertue of the Lord Iohn Talbot, Vicount Liſle, ſonne to that famous Earle of Shrewesburie, who died in the Battaile of Chaſtillon, more highly to be honoured. For Æmilius was old, grieuouſly,

if not mortally,wounded,and accomptable for the ouerthrow receiued: Talbot was in the flowre of his youth, vnhurt, easily able to haue escaped, and not answerable for that dayes misfortune,when he refused to forsake his father;who foreseeing the losse of the battaile, and not meaning to staine his actions past by flying in his old age,exhorted this his noble sonne to be gone,and leaue him.

In this terrible ouerthrow died all the Roman foot, saue two or three thousand, who(as Liuie saith) escaped into the lesser campe; whence, the same night, about sixe hundred of them brake forth, and joyning with such of those in the greater campe, as were willing to trie their fortune, conueyed themselues away ere morning, about foure thousand foot, and two hundred horse, partly in whole troups, partly dispersed, into Cannusium: the next day, the Roman Camps, both lesse and greater, were yeelded vnto Hannibal by those that remained in them. Polybius hath no mention of this escape: only he reports, that the ten thousand,whom Æmilius had left on the West side of Aufidus (as was shewed before) to set vpon the campe of Hannibal,did as they were appointed;but ere they could effect their desire,which they had well-neere done, the battaile was lost: and Hannibal, comming ouer the water to them, draue them into their owne campe; which they quickly yeelded, hauing lost two thousand of their number. Like enough it is,that at the first sight of Hannibal, comming vpon them with his victorious Armie, a great number of these did flie; and thereby escaped,whilest their fellowes,making defence in vaine, retired into their campe, and held the Enemie busied. For about two Legions they were(perhaps not halfe full, but made vp by addition of others, whose fault or fortune was like) that hauing serued at Cannæ, were afterwards extremely disgraced by the State of Rome, for that they had abandoned their Companions fighting. Of the Roman horse what numbers escaped,it is vncertaine:but very few they were that saued themselues in the first charge,by getting behinde the River; and Terentius the Consul recouered Venusia,with threescore and ten at the most in his companie. That he was so ill attended,it is no maruaile: for Venusia lay many miles off to the Southward; so that his neerest way thither, had beene through the midst of Hannibals Armie,if the passage had beene open. Therefore it must needes be, that when once he got out of sight,he turned vp some by-way;so disappointing the Numidians that hunted contre. Of such as could not hold pace with the Consul, but tooke other waies,and were scattered ouer the fields;two thousand, or therabouts, were gathered vp by the Numidians, & made prisoners: the rest were slaine,all saue three hundred; who dispersed themselues in flight,as chance led them,and got into sundry Townes. There died in this great Battaile of Cannæ, besides L. Æmilius Paulus the Consul; two of the Roman Quæstors or Treasurers, and one and twentie Colonells or Tribunes of the Souldiers,fourscore Senators,or such as had borne Office, out of which they were to be chosen into the Senate. Many of these were of especiall marke,as hauing beene Ædiles, Prætors, or Consuls: among whom was Cn. Seruilius the last yeeres Consul, and Minutius, late Master of the horse. The number of prisoners, taken in this battaile, Liuie makes no greater than three thousand foot,and three hundred horse: too few to haue defended,for the space of one halfe houre,both the Roman camps; which yet the same Liuie saith,to haue beene ouercowardly yeelded vp. We may therefore doe better,to giue credit vnto one of the prisoners, whom the same Historian shortly after introduceth speaking in the Senate, and saying, That they were no lesse than eight thousand. It may therefore be,that these three thousand were only such as the Enemie spared, when the furie of Execution was past: but to these must be added about fiue thousand more,who yeelded in the greater campe, when their companie were either slaine or fled. So the reckoning falls out right: which the Romans, especially the Consul Varro, had before cast vp (as we say) without their Host; nothing so chargeable, as now they finde it. On the side of Hannibal there died some foure thousand Gaules, fifteene hundred Spaniards and Africans, and two hundred horse, or thereabouts: a losse not ſenſible, in the joy of ſo great a victorie; which if he had purſued, as Maharbal aduiſed him, and forthwith marched away towards Rome; it is little doubted, but that the Warre had preſently beene at an end. But he beleeued not ſo farre in his owne proſperitie; and was therefore told, That he knew how to get, not how to vſe a victorie.

Of things following the battaile at Cannæ.

NOt without good cauſe doth Polybius reprehend thoſe two Hiſtorians, Fabius the Roman, and Philinus the Carthaginian: who regarding more the pleaſure of them, vnto whoſe honour they conſecrated their trauailes, than the truth of things, & information of poſteritie, magnified indifferently, whether good or bad, all actions and proceedings, the one of his Carthaginians, the other of his Roman Quirites and Fathers conſcript. No man of ſound judgement will condemne this libertie of cenſure, which Polybius hath vſed. For, to recompence his junioritie, (ſuch as it was) he produceth ſubſtantiall arguments, to iuſtifie his owne Relation; and confuteth the vanitie of thoſe former Authors, out of their owne writings, by conference of places ill cohering: which paines it is to be ſuſpected, that he would not haue taken, had hee beene borne in either of theſe two Cities, but haue ſpared ſome part of his diligence, and beene contented, to haue all men thinke better and more honourably than it deſerued, of his owne Countrie. The like diſeaſe it is to be feared, that wee ſhall hereafter finde in others; and ſhall haue cauſe to wiſh, that either they were ſomewhat leſſe Roman, or elſe, that ſome Works of their oppoſite Writers were extant, that ſo we might at leaſt heare both ſides ſpeake: being henceforth deſtitute of Polybius his helpe, that was a man indifferent. But ſince this cannot be, we muſt be ſometimes bold, to obſerue the coherence of things; and beleeue ſo much only to be true, as dependeth vpon good reaſon, or (at leaſt) faire probability. This attentiue circumſpection is needfull euen at the preſent: ſuch is the repugnancie, or forgetfulneſſe, which we find in the beſt Narration, of things following the Battaile of Cannæ. For it is ſaid, that foure thouſand foot and horſe gathered together about the Conſul Terentius at Venuſia; that others, to the number of ten thouſand, got into Cannuſium, chooſing for their Captaines, yong P. Scipio, and Ap. Claudius; yet that the Conſul Terentius Varro, joyning his companie vnto thoſe of Scipio at Cannuſium, wrote vnto the Senate, that he had now well-neere ten thouſand men about him; that theſe letters of the Conſul were brought to Rome, when the Senate was newly riſen, that had bene taking order for pacifying thoſe tumults in the Citie, which grew vpon the firſt bruit of the ouerthrow; and yet, that Embaſſadours from Capua (after ſome conſultation, whether it were meet to ſend any, or, without further circumſtance, to ſide with Hannibal) were ſent vnto Terentius, and found him at Venuſia, a pretie while before he wrote thoſe letters, which ouer-tooke (in a maner) at Rome the firſt newes of the ouerthrow. Among ſuch incoherences, I hold it the beſt way, to omit ſo much as hath not ſome particular connexion with matter enſuing: mutuall dependencie in things of this nature, being no ſmall argument of truth.

When Hannibal had ſacked the Roman campe, and truſſed vp the ſpoiles, forthwith he diſlodged, and marched away into Samnium; finding a diſpoſition in the Hirpines, and many other people thereabout, to forſake the Roman partie, and make alliance with Carthage. The firſt Towne that opened the gates vnto him, was Coſſa, where he laid vp his baggage: and leauing his brother Mago to take in other places, He haſted into Campania. The generall affection of the Multitude, in all the Cities of Italie, was inclinable vnto him; not only in regard of their grieuous losses, sustained abroad in the fields, which the Romans themselues, who could not hinder him from spoyling the Countrie, especially the poorer sort of them, did hardly endure; but in a louing respect vnto that great courtesie (as it seemed) which he vsed, vnto such of them as became his prisoners. For as at other times, so now also after his great victorie at Cannæ, He had louingly dismissed as many of the Italian Confederates of Rome, as fell into his hands: rebuking them gently for being so obstinate, against him that had sought to deliuer them from bondage. Neither spared hee to winne their loue with gifts; pretending, to admire their valour; but seeking indeede, by all waies and meanes, to make them his, whilest all other motiues were concurrent. At this time also hee beganne to deale kindly (though against his nature) with his Roman prisoners: telling them, that he bore no mortall hatred vnto their Estate; but being prouoked by iniuries, sought to right himselfe and his countrie; and fought with them, to trie which of the two Cities, Rome or Carthage, should beare soueraigne Rule, not, which of them should be destroyed. So he gaue them leaue to choose ten of their number, that should be sent home to treat with the Fathers about their ransome: and together with these, he sent Carthalo a Nobleman of Carthage, and Generall of his Horse, to feele the disposition of the Senate; whether it were bowed as yet by so much aduersitie, and could stoope vnto desire of peace. But with the Romans these artes preuailed not, as shall be shewed in due place. The people of Italie, all or most of them, saue the Roman Colonies, or the Latines, were not only weary of their losses past, but entertained a deceiuable hope, of changing their old Societie for a better. Wherefore not onely the Samnites, Lucans, Brutians, and Apulians, ancient enemies of Rome, and not vntill the former generation vtterly subdued, beganne to re-assume their wonted spirits: but the Campans, a Nation of all other in Italie most bound vnto the state of Rome, and by many mutuall affinities therewith as streightly conjoyned, as were any saue the Latines, changed on a sudden their loue into hatred; without any other cause found, than change of fortune.

Campania, is the most goodly and fruitfull Prouince of Italie, if not (as some then thought) of all the Earth: and the Citie of Capua, answerable vnto the Countrie, whereof it was Head, so great, faire, and wealthie, that it seemed no lesse conuenient a seat of the Empire, than was either Rome or Carthage. But of all qualities, brauerie is the least requisite vnto soueraigne command. The Campans were luxurious, idle, and proud: and valuing themselues like Iayes by their feathers, despised the vnfortunate vertue of the Romans their Patrons and Benefactors. Yet were there some of the principall among them, as in other Cities, that bore especiall regard vnto the maiestie of Rome, and could not endure to heare of Innouation. But the Plebeian faction had lately so preuailed within Capua, that all was gouerned by the pleasure of the Multitude; which wholly followed the direction of Pacuvius Calauius an ambitious Noble-man, whose credit grew, and was vp-held by furthering al popular desires: whereof, the coniunction with Hannibal was not the least. Some of the Capuans had offred their Citie to the Carthaginian, shortly after the battaile of Thrasymene: whereupon chiefly it was, that Hannibal made his iournie into Campania; the Dictator Fabius waiting vpon him. At that time, either the nerues of the Roman Armie, or some other feare of the Capuans, hindred them from breaking into actual rebellion. They had indeed no leisure to treat about any article of new Confederacie: or had leisure serued, yet were the Multitude (whose inconstant loue Hannibal had wonne from the Romans, by gentle vsage, and free dismissing, of some prisoners in good account among them) vnable to hold any such negotiation, without aduice of the Senate; which mainely impugned it. So they that had promised to yeeld vp their town to Hannibal, & to meet him on the way, with some of their nobility, that should assure him of all faithfull meaning; were driuen to sit still, in a great perplexitie: as hauing failed to let in this their new friend, yet sufficiently discouered themselues, ſelues, to draw vpon them the hatred of the Romans. In this caſe were no ſmall number of the Citizens: who thereupon grew the more incenſed againſt their Senate; on whom they caſt all the blame, eaſily pardoning their owne cowardize. The People holding ſo tender a regard of libertie, that euen the lawfull Gouernement of Magiſtrates grieued them, with an imaginarie oppreſſion; had now good cauſe to feare leſt the Senators would become their Lords indeed, and by helpe of the Romans, bring them vnder a more ſtreight ſubiection, than euer they had endured. This feare, being readie to breake into ſome outrage, Pacuvius made vſe of, to ſerue his owne ambition. He diſcourſed vnto the Senate, as they ſate in Councell, about theſe motions troubling the Citie: and ſaid, That he himſelfe had both married a Roman Ladie, and giuen his Daughter in marriage to a Roman: but, that the danger of forſaking the Roman partie was not now the greateſt: for that the People were violently bent euen to murder all the Senate, and afterward to joyne themſelues with Hannibal; who ſhould countenance the fact, and ſaue them harmeleſſe. This he ſpake, as a man well known to be beloued himſelfe by the People, and priuie vnto their deſignes. Hauing throughly terrified the Senate, by laying open the danger hanging ouer them: He promiſed neuertheleſſe to deliuer them all, and to ſet things in quiet, if they would freely put themſelues into his hands; offering his oath, or any other aſſurance that they ſhould demand, for his faithfull meaning. They all agreed. Then ſhutting vp the Court, and placing a Guard of his owne followers about it, that none might enter, nor iſſue forth, without his leaue; Hee called the People to aſſembly: and ſpeaking as much ill of the Senate, as he knewe they would be glad to heare, he told them, that theſe wicked Gouernours were ſurpriſed by his policie, and all faſt, readie to abide what ſentence they would lay vpon them. Only thus much he aduiſed them, as a thing which neceſſitie required, That they ſhould chooſe a new Senate, before they ſatisfied their anger vpon the old. So rehearſing vnto them the names of one or two Senators, hee asked what their judgement was of thoſe. All cried out, that they were worthy of death. Chooſe then (ſaid he) firſt of all ſome new ones into their places. Hereat the Multitude, vnprouided for ſuch an election, was ſilent; vntill at laſt, ſome one or other aduentured to name whom he thought fit. The men ſo nominated, were vtterly diſliked by the whole Aſſembly; either for ſome knowne fault, baſeneſſe, and inſufficiencie; or elſe euen becauſe they were vnknowne, and therefore helde vnworthie. This difficultie in the new Election appearing more and more, whileſt more were to be choſen; (the fitteſt men to be ſubſtituted, hauing beene named among the firſt, and not thought fit enough) Pacuvius entreated, and eaſily preuailed with the people, that the preſent Senate might for this time be ſpared, in hope of amends hereafter; which (doubtleſſe) they would make, hauing thus obtained pardon of all offences paſt. Henceforth, not only the People, as in former times, honoured Pacuvius, and eſteemed him their Patron; but the Senators alſo were gouerned by him, to whom they acknowledged themſelues indebted, for ſauing all their liues. Neither did the Senate faile after this, by all obſequiouſneſſe, to court the People; giuing the reines vnto their lawleſſe Wil, who elſe were likely to caſt them downe: All the Citie being thus of one minde; onely feare of the Romans kept them from opening their gates to Hannibal. But after the Battaile at Cannæ, this impediment was remoued: and few there were, that would open their mouthes to ſpeake againſt the Rebellion. Yet foraſmuch as three hundred principal Gentlemen of the Campans, did then ſerue the Romans in the Iſle of Sicil: the Parents and Kinſmen of theſe preuailed ſo farre, that Embaſſadors were ſent vnto Terentius the Conſul; to ſee his preſent caſe, and what it could miniſter of Hope or Feare. Theſe, whereſoeuer they found him, found him weakely attended, and as weake in ſpirit, as in followers. Yet they offered him formally the ſeruice of their State; and deſired to know what he would command them. But he moſt baſely lamented vnto them the greatneſſe of the Roman misfortune: ſaying, that all was loſt; and that the Campans muſt now, not helpe the Romans, who had nothing left wherewith to helpe themselues, but, make warre in their defence against the Carthaginians; as the Romans had sometimes done for the Campans against the Samnites. Hereunto hee is said to haue added a fooliſh Inuectiue, against Hannibal & his Carthaginians: telling, How he had taught them to make bridges of slaughtered carkases, and to feede vpon mans flesh; with such other stuffe, as onely bewraied his owne feare. As for the Campans themselues, He put them in minde of their present strength: they hauing thirty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse; with monie, and all prouisions, in aboundance. Thus he dismissed them, prouder then they came, and filled them with conceit of getting a great Lordship; whereas before, they were somewhat timorous, in aduenturing to seeke their owne libertie. Hauing reported this at Capua: the same Embassadors were dispatched away to Hannibal, with whom they easily made Alliance, vpon these conditions; That the Campans should be absolutely free, and ruled by their owne Lawes; That no Citizen of theirs should be subiect vnto any Carthaginian Magistrate, in what case soeuer, whether in Warre or Peace; and, That Hannibal should deliuer vnto the Campans three hundred Roman prisoners, such as they themselues would choose, whom they might exchange for their Gentlemen which were in Sicil.

Against all this Negotiation, Decius Magius an honourable Citizen opposed himselfe earnestly: vsing, in vaine, many perswasions, to the wilfull and head-strong Multitude; whom he put in minde of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, wishing them not to change old friends for new acquaintance. This did he, when they were sending Embassadors to Hannibal: and this also did he, when the new Alliance was concluded; but most earnestly, when a Carthaginian Garrison was entring the Towne: at which time he gaue aduice, either to keepe it out, or to fall vpon it and to cut it in pieces, that, by such a notable piece of seruice, they might make amends vnto the Romans, whom they had forsaken.

Aduertisement hereof was giuen to Hannibal: who lying about Naples not farre off, sent for Magius to come speake with him in the campe. This Magius refused: alleaging, that he was, by the late concluded Articles, free from subiection vnto any Carthaginian; and therefore would not come. Hannibal thereupon hasted himselfe towards Capua: forbearing to attempt any further vpon Naples; which he thought to haue taken in his way by Scalado, but found the walls too high, and was not well prouided, to lay siege vnto it. At Capua hee was entertained with great solemnitie and pompe: all the people issuing forth of the Towne, to behold that great Commander, which had wonne so many noble victories. Hauing taken his pleasure in the sight of that goodly Citie, and passed ouer his first Entertainements; He came into their Senate: where he commended their resolution, in shaking off the Roman yoke; promising, that ere long all Italie, and Rome it selfe, should bee driuen to acknowledge Capua as chiefe, and receiue Law from thence. As for Decius Magius, who openly tooke part with the Romans their enemies; Hee prayed them, that they would not thinke him a Campan, but a Traitor to the State: and vse him accordingly, giuing sentence out of hand vpon him, as he deserued. This was granted: and Magius deliuered vnto Hannibal; who vnwilling to offend the Capuans, at his first comming, by putting so great a man to death, yet fearing that they might sue for his libertie, if he kept him aliue, thought it best to send him away to Carthage. Thus Hannibal settled his friendship with the Campans: among whom, only this Decius Magius had openly dared to speake against him; being assisted by Perolla the sonne of Pacuvius. This Perolla would haue murdered Hannibal, whilest hee was at supper, the first night of his comming; had not his Fathers authoritie kept him from making any such attempt. All the Towne (besides) were so earnest in the loue of their new Societie, that they are said to haue murdered all the Romans, vpon whom at the present they could lay hand; or, (which is all one) to haue smothered them to death in an hot Bath.

The

The ſame courſe of fortune, with thoſe of Capua, ranne ſome other Townes thereabouts, which depended on this, as their Mother-Citie. Nola, Nuceria, Naples, Caſiline, and Acerræ, were the Cities next adioyning, that ſtood out for the Romans. Againſt theſe Hannibal went, thinking to finde them weakely manned, as they were indeede, though ſtoutly defended.

The Romans at this time were not in caſe, to put Garriſons into all their walled Townes; but were faine to leaue all places, except a few of the moſt ſuſpected, vnto the faith and courage of the Inhabitants. Rome it ſelfe was in extreme feare of Hannibals comming, at the firſt report of the ouerthrow at Cannæ: and the griefe of that loſſe was ſo generall, and immoderate, that it much diſturbed the prouiſion againſt apparent danger. It was hard to iudge, whether the loſſe alreadie receiued, or the feare of deſtruction preſently threatning, were the more terrible. All the Senators found worke enough, to ſtint the noiſe and lamentable bewailings, whereof the ſtreets were full. Courriers were ſent forth, to bring aſſured tidings how all went: whereof when letters from the Conſul Varro had throughly informed them, they were ſo amazed, that they ranne into barbarous ſuperſtition; and taking direction (as was ſaid) from their fatall bookes, buried aliue two men and women Gaules and Greekes, in their Oxe-market. If the bookes of Sibyl gaue them ſuch inſtructions; we may iuſtly thinke, that Sibyl herſelfe was inſtructed by the Deuill. Yet is it not improbable, that extremity of feare cauſed them to harken to wicked Sooth-ſayers; whoſe deteſtable counſailes they afterwards, for their owne honour, (as aſhamed of ſuch Authors) imputed to the bookes of Sibyl. An Embaſſadour was ſent to Delphi, to conſult the Oracle of Apollo; and enquire with what prayers and ſupplications they might pacifie the gods, and obtaine an ende of theſe calamities. This is enough to diſcouer the greatneſſe of their feare; though not ſeruing to giue remedie. At the ſame time came letters out of Sicil, from the Prætor Octacilius; whom the Senate had appointed, if he found it meet, to paſſe ouer into Africk. In theſe were contained newes, of one Carthaginian fleet, that waſted the Kingdome of Hieron their good friend and confederate; and of another fleet, riding among the Iles Ægateis, which was in readineſſe to ſet vpon Lilybæum, and the reſt of the Roman Prouince, if the Prætor ſtirred aſide to the reſcue of Hieron.

In the middeſt of theſe extremities, it was thought needful to call home Terentius the Conſul, that he might name a Dictator, to take ſoueraigne charge of the Weale publique, with abſolute power, as neceſſitie required. It muſt needes ſeeme ſtrange, that all ſorts of people went forth to meet the Conſul, & bid him welcome home, giuing him thankes for that he had not deſpaired of the Weale publique. But this was done (as may ſeeme) by order from the Senate: which therein (doubtleſſe) prouided wiſely, for vpholding the generall reputation. If his comming into the Citie, had renewed the lamentations and out-cries of the people: what elſe would haue followed, than a contempt of their wretchednеſſe, among thoſe that were ſubiect vnto their Dominion? Now in finding this occaſion (though indeed he gaue it not) of beſtowing vpon him their welcome, and thankes; they noyſed abroad a fame, which came perhaps vnto the eares of Hannibal, of their Magnanimitie and Confidence: that might ſeeme grounded on their remayning ſtrength. This therefore was wiſely done: But whereas Liuie would haue vs thinke, that it was done generouſly, and out of great ſpirit; let me be pardoned, if I beleeue him not. It was done fearefully, and to couer their griefe: had they dared to ſhew their indignation, they would haue ſtruck off his head; as in few yeres after, Cn. Fuluius had his life brought into queſtion, and was baniſhed by them, being leſſe blame-worthy, for a ſmaller offence. M. Iunius, by appointment of the Senate, was nominated Dictator; and T. Sempronius, Maſter of the horſe. Theſe fell preſently to muſtering of Souldiers, of whom they raiſed foure new Legions, and a thouſand horſe: though with much difficultie; as being faine to take vp ſome, that were very Boies. Theſe foure Legions, are elſewhere forgotten, in accompt of the forces leuied by this Dictator; and Liu. l. 26. Liu. l. 22.

Liu. l. 23. two Legions only set downe, that had beene enrolled in the beginning of the yeere for custodie of the Citie. Wherfore it may be, that these two Legions being drawne into the field; foure new ones of Prætextati, or Stripplings, were left in their places. In such raw Souldiers, and so few, little confidence was to bee reposed; for which reason they increased their number, by adding vnto them eight thousand sturdie slaues, that were put in hope of libertie, if they should deserue it by manfull seruice. This not sufficing; The Dictator proclaimed, that whosoeuer ought money and could not pay it, or had committed any capitall offence, should forthwith bee discharged of his debt, or punishment, if he would serue in the Warre. To arme these Companies, they were faine to take downe, out of their Temples and Porches, the spoiles of their enemies that had beene there set vp: among which, were sixe thousand Armours of the Gaules, that had beene carried in the Triumph of C. Flaminius, a little before the beginning of this Warre. To such mockerie had God brought the pride of the Romans, as a due reward of their insolent oppressions, that they were faine to issue forth of their own gates, in the habit of strangers, when Hannibal was readie to encounter them with his Africans, armed Roman-like.

About the same time it was, that Carthalo, with the Agents of the prisoners taken at Canne, came to Rome. Carthalo was not admitted into the Citie, but commanded, whilest he was on the way, to be gone ere night out of the Roman Territorie. To the messengers of the captiues, audience was giuen by the Senate. They made earnest Petition, to be ransomed at the publike charge; not only the teares and lamentation of their poore kins-folke, but the great neede, wherein the Citie then stood, of able Souldiers, commending their sute; which yet they obtained not. Besides the generall custome of the Romans (held by long Tradition, and strengthned by a notable Precedent, when Regulus was ouerthrowne, and taken prisoner in the former warre) not to bee too tender of such as had yeelded to the Enemie; much was alleaged against these who now craued ransome: but the speciall point was, that they were wilfully lost, since they might haue saued themselues, as others did. It sufficed not vnto these poore men, to say, that their offence was no greater than the Consuls: they were told, that this was great presumption. The truth was, the State wanted money: and therefore could not want excuses, whereby to auoid the disbursement: whether it were so, or not, that any such Plea was held about this matter of redemption, as wee find recorded. Neyther must wee regard it, that the slaues which were armed for the warre, are said to haue cost more, than the summe did amount vnto, that would haue ransomed these prisoners. For this is but a tale, deuised to countenance the Roman proceedings as if they had beene seuere; when as indeed they were suteable to the present fortune, poore, and somewhat beggerly. Hereof it is no little proofe, That Hannibal valued those Roman slaues, whom he had taken in the Campe among their Masters, at no more, than euery one the third part of a common Souldiers ransome: and likely it is, that hee offered them at the price, whereat hee thought them current. But if wee should suppose, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargaine for slaues might haue been made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with priuate men; yet must we withall consider, that these priuate men did only lend these slaues for a while vnto the Common-wealth, and were afterwards contented to forbeare the price of them (when by order from the Senate they were enfranchised) vntill the warre should be ended. If Hannibal would haue giuen such long day of paiment; it is likely that the Romans would haue beene his chapmen: but seeing he dealt only for ready monie, they chose rather to say, We will not giue, than, We cannot. The like austeritie, vpon the same reason, but contrarie pretence, was vsed toward the Souldiers that escaped from that great Battaile. These were charged for hauing fled: as the prisoners were, for not flying, when they might haue done so. True it is, that in such cases (if euer) that which they call raggione del Stato may serue for an excuse: when the Common-wealth being driuen to a miserable Exigent, is faine to helpeit selfe, by doing iniuries to

priuate men. And ſo dealt the Romans now: condemning all thoſe that had ſerued at Cannæ, to be tranſported into Sicil; and there to ſerue, not as others did, vntill they had fulfilled twentie yeeres in the warres, or elſe were fiftie yeeres of age; but vntill this warre ſhould be ended, how long ſoeuer it laſted, and that without reward. The ſame thriftie cenſure, was afterwards laid vpon others, for their misbehauiour: but neuer vpon any man of qualitie, ſaue only (a good while after this, at better leiſure) vpon Cæcilius Metellus, and a few other hare-braind fooles his companions; who being frighted out of their wits, with the terrour of ſo great a loſſe, were deuiſing, after the battaile, which way to runne out of Italie, when Hannibal as yet had ſcarce one Towne within it. The inequalitie of this rigour grew ſhortly diſtaſtfull to the Commonaltie: and was openly blamed by a Tribune of the People; neuertheleſſe it was quietly digeſted, the excuſe being no leſſe apparent than the fault. Liu. l. 23.

M. Iunius the Dictator, hauing diſpatched all needfull buſineſſe within the Citie, tooke the field with fiue and twentie thouſand men. What he did with this Armie, I cannot finde: nor more of him, than this, That he ſpent the time about Campania; where (as may be preſumed) he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be aſcribed, that Hannibal did no greater euill: for of any euill done to Hannibal, by the Romans in this their weake eſtate, only Marcellus had the honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Prætors, lay at Oſtia with a fleet, ready to ſet ſaile for Sicil, hauing one Legion aboord his ſhips, & fifteene hundred other Souldiers newly taken vp: with which forces he was to defend that Iland, and doe what harme hee could in Africk. But hearing of the ouerthrow at Cannæ, hee ſent theſe of his new Leuie to Rome, for defence of the Citie; and marched haſtily with his Legion toward Cannuſium: deliuering the fleet, empty of Souldiers, to P. Furius his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magiſtrates, & chiefe Citizens of Nola, to helpe them; who were like to be forced by the Multitude (affected, as were the reſt of the Campans) to let in the Carthaginian; and knew not how to auoid this otherwiſe, than by ſeeming to deliberate about the Articles of this new Confederacie. Wherefore he made great iournies thitherward; and arriued euen time enough to preuent the Enemie. Many idle walkes Hannibal made, betwixt Nola and Naples: aſſaying by faire words, and terrible threats, the one and the other Citie. Naples was ſtrong, and not infected with any the leaſt touch of diſloialtie: it had alſo a ſure Hauen; whereby it ſtood in the leſſe feare, of ſuſtayning much inconuenience, by ſpoile of the Lands and Villages abroad in the Countrie. But at Nola it was thought a valuable conſideration, That Hannibal was Maſter of the field: which if he laid waſte, all the poore people were vtterly vndone. So thought the Multitude: and ſuch talke vſed ſome, that had little feare of their owne priuate want or pouertie, but a great deſire to gratifie the Carthaginian. Of theſe, one L. Bantius was chiefe; a ſtout yong Gentleman, and Souldier of eſpeciall marke, well beloued in the Citie, and one that had done good ſeruice to the Romans: but was found by Hannibal, halfe dead at Cannæ, and after much gentle vſage, good attendance, and cure of his wounds, friendly diſmiſſed with liberall gifts. He therefore thought, that it concerned him in honour, to returne the greateſt thankes he could vnto ſo courteous an Enemie. Marcellus perceiuing this, wrought vpon the ſame eaſie nature of the Gentleman: and taking notice of him, as if it had beene by chance, ſeemed to wonder, why one that had ſo well deſerued of the Roman ſtate, had not repaired vnto him the Prætor, who deſired nothing more than ſuch acquaintance. So with many commendations, gifts, and louing entertainement, being himſelfe alſo a man highly reputed for his perſonall valour, he made this Bantius ſo far in loue with him, that nothing could be attempted within Nola, againſt the Romans, whereof he had not preſently aduertiſement. At the comming of Marcellus, Hannibal remoued from about Nola; and aſſaied, as formerly he had done, the Neapolitans: but they had lately taken in a Roman Garriſon; vpon confidence whereof they gaue him a peremptorie anſwere, to his diſcontent. Thence went he to Nuceria: which he tooke by compoſition; and ſo returned back

againe to Nola. Hee was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nola bore vnto him: who although they durſt not ſtirre in his quarrell, being ouerawed by the Roman Garriſon; yet if they ſaw Marcellus hardly beſtead, and forced to turne his care from watching them within, to repelling the enemies aſſailing him without, like enough it ſeemed, that they would not bee wanting vnto the accompliſhment of their owne deſires. Hee therefore brought his Armie cloſe to the Towne, and skirmiſhed often with Marcellus: not in hope thereby to doe much good, but only to make ſhew of a meaning to force the Towne; which hee ſought in the meane while to take by intelligence. In the night-time there paſſed meſſages betweene him and the Citizens his partakers: whereby it was concluded, That if once Marcellus, with all his forces, could bee trained into the field, the Multitude within the Towne ſhould preſently riſe; and ſeizing vpon the gates, exclude him as an Enemie. Of this Negotiation Marcellus was aduertiſed: and fearing, leſt the Conſpirators would ſhortly aduenture, euen to finde him buſied within the Citie, whileſt the Carthaginians ſhould ſcale the walls; he thought it the ſureſt way, to cut off the enemies hope, and ſend him away betimes. Wherefore ordering his men in three Companies, within three ſeuerall gates looking towards the Enemie: He gaue a ſtreight command, that all the Citizens ſhould keepe their houſes. Thus hee lay cloſe a good part of the day, to the enemies great wonder; againſt whom he had cuſtomarily iſſued forth before more early, euery day, to skirmiſh. But when it was further noted, that the walls were bare, and not a man appearing on them; then thought Hannibal, that ſurely all was diſcouered, and Marcellus now buſied with the Citizens. Whereupon he bade his men bring ladders, and make ready for the aſſault; which was done in all haſte. But when the Carthaginians were at the very walls, and thought nothing leſſe, than that the Romans would meet them in the field: ſuddenly the middle gate was opened, wherat Marcellus, with the beſt and oldeſt of his Souldiers, brake forth vpon them, with a great noiſe, to make his vnexpected ſallie the more terrible. Whileſt the Carthaginians, much out of order, were ſome of them flying before Marcellus, the reſt making head againſt him: the other two gates opened, whereat in like ſort iſſued they of the new-leuied Companies, vpon the enemies backes. The ſudden terrour was more availeable vnto the Romans, than their force: yet the Execution was ſo great, that this was accounted as a victorie, and reputed one of the braueſt Acts performed in all that warre; foraſmuch as hereby it was firſt proued, that Hannibal might be ouer-come. After this, Marcellus, being freed from his enemies that were departed, tooke a ſtrict accompt of the Citizens of Nola: condemning aboue threeſcore and ten of high Treaſon, whoſe heads he ſtruck off; and ſo leauing the Towne in quiet obedience vnto their Senate, went and incamped hard by about Sueſſula. Hannibal in the meane ſeaſon was gone to Acerræ: where being excluded, he thought it no wiſdome to looſe time in perſwaſions, but laid ſiege vnto it, and beganne on all ſides to cloſe it vp. This terrified the People, who knew themſelues vnable to hold out. Therefore, before his Workes were finiſhed, and they quite ſurrounded; they ſtole out by night, and left him the Towne emptie: which he ſacked and burnt. Then hearing newes of the Dictator, that he was about Caſiline, thither went Hannibal: as being vnwilling, that an Enemie ſo neere ſhould diſquiet him at Capua; where hee meant to Winter. It ſeemes, or rather indeede it is plaine, that the late victorie of Marcellus had nothing abated the ſpirit of the Carthaginian: who durſt with a ſmall part of his Armie ſeeke out the Dictator, that had with him the heart of the Roman ſtrength. Wherefore the joy of his Enemies, vpon ſo ſlight an occaſion as the death of ſome two thouſand of his men, at the moſt, and thoſe not ſlaine in plaine battaile, but by a ſudden eruption; witneſſeth chiefly, in what great feare they ſtood of Hannibal, and how Creſt-fallen they were: that hauing three yeeres ſince demanded at Carthage, the body of Hannibal, to be deliuered vnto their pleaſure, by his owne Citizens; could now pleaſe themſelues, as with good newes, to heare, That in a skirmiſh not farre

from Rome he appeared to be a man, and not reſiſtleſſe. At Caſilinum the Dictator was not: but many Companies of Italians, Confederates of Rome, were gotten into the towne, and held it. Fiue hundred of the Praneſtines there were, and aboue foure hundred of Peruſia, with ſome of the Latines. All theſe had the good hap, to come too late to the Battaile of Cannæ, being ſent by their ſeuerall States to the campe: whither whileſt they were marching, the tidings of that great misfortune encountred them, and ſent them backe ſorrowfull; for they loued well their Lords the Romans, vnder whoſe gouernement they liued happily. So came they all, one after another, to Caſiline, where they met and ſtaied. Neither had they ſtaied there long, ere they heard newes from Capua, How that great Citie became the Ring-leader of all the Campans into rebellion. The people of Caſiline were affected as they of Capua: and therefore ſought how to rid their hands of thoſe Praneſtines and their fellowes; but the Souldiers were too hard for them, and after many traines laid one for another, at laſt they ſlew all the Townesmen in a night, and fortified the Weſterne part of the Towne (for it was diuided by the Riuer Vulturnus) againſt the Enemie. If they had runne away with the goods, and pretended, that theſe of Caſiline were as the reſt of the Campans, all Traitors; they themſelues might haue been reputed, as no better than the Mamertines. But their conſtancie in defence of the place witneſſeth, vpon what honeſt reaſons they ſurpriſed it. Hannibal came thither, thinking to haue encountred with greater forces: but theſe few found him more worke than he expected. Diuers aſſaults hee gaue, but was ſtill repelled with loſſe: and many ſallies they made, with variable euent. The Enemie mined; and they countermined: oppoſing ſo much induſtrie to his force, that he was driuen to cloſe them vp, and ſeeke to winne them by famine. T. Sempronius Gracchus, that was Maſter of the horſe, lay with the Roman Armie higher vp the Riuer: who faine would haue relieued Caſiline, but that the Dictator, being gone to Rome about ſome matters of Religion, had giuen him expreſſe charge not to fight till his returne. Marcellus from Sueſſula could not come: his way being ſtopped by the ouer-flowings of Vulturnus; the Nolans alſo beſeeching him not to leaue them, who were in danger of the Campans, if he departed. Thus it is reported: but if the water ſtaied his iournie, ſuch entreaties were needleſſe. Neither is it like, that the Dictator tarried at Rome ſo long, as till extreme famine had conſumed the Garriſon in Caſiline. Wherefore it may be thought, that the Towne was loſt, becauſe the Romans durſt not aduenture to raiſe the ſiege. Barrells of corne were ſent by night, floting downe the Riuer; and when ſome of theſe, being carried awry by an Eddie of the water, ſtuck among the Willowes on the banke, whereby this manner of reliefe was diſcouered and preuented; Gracchus caſt a great quantitie of Nuts into the ſtreame, which faintly ſuſtained the poore beſieged men. At length, when all foode was ſpent, and whatſoeuer grew greene vnder the walls was gathered for ſallets; the Carthaginians ploughed vp the ground: whereon the beſieged preſently ſowed Rape-ſeede. Hannibal ſeeing this, admired their patience; and ſaid, That he meant not to ſtay at Caſiline, vntill the Rapes were growne. Wherefore, though hitherto hee had refuſed to hearken vnto any Compoſition, as intending to make them an example to all others, by puniſhing their obſtinacie; yet now he was content, to grant them their liues at an indifferent ranſome, which when they had paid, hee quietly diſmiſſed them according to his promiſe. Seuen hundred Carthaginians he placed in Caſiline, as a Garriſon for defence of the Campans; vnto whom he reſtored it. To the Praneſtine Souldiers great thankes were giuen, and louing rewards; among which they had offer, in regard of their vertue, to be made Citizens of Rome. But their preſent condition pleaſed them ſo well, that they choſe rather to continue, as they were, in Praneſte: which is no weake proofe, of the good eſtate wherin the Cities flouriſhed, that were ſubject to the Roman Gouernement. This ſiege of Caſiline was not a little beneficiall to the Romans; as hauing long detained Hannibal, and conſumed much of his time, that might otherwiſe haue beene better ſpent. For Winter ouer-tooke him, long before he could dispatch the businesse: which how to quit with his honor he knew not, when hee was once engaged. Therefore he wintered at Capua: where he refreshed his Armie, or rather corrupted it, as all Historians report, and made it effeminate; though, effeminate as it was, He therewithall did often beate the Romans in following times, as shall appeare hereafter.

§. X.

Of the great supply that was decreed at Carthage to be sent to HANNIBAL in Italie. How by the malice of HANNO, and sloth or parsimonie of the Carthaginians, the supply was too long deferred. That the riches of the Carthaginians grew faster, than of the Romans. Of FABIVS and other old Roman Historians, how partiall they were in their writings.

WHen Mago, the sonne of Amilcar, had spent some time about the taking in of such Italians, as fell from the Romans after the battaile at Cannæ; his brother Hannibal sent for him to Capua, and thence dispatched him away to Carthage, with the joyfull message of Victorie. He told the Carthaginian Senate, with how many Roman Generalls his brother had fought; what Consuls he had chaced, wounded, or slaine; how the stout Romans, that in the former war neuer shunned any occasion of fight, were now growne so calme, that they thought their Dictator Fabius the only good Captaine, because he neuer durst aduenture to come to battaile; that, not without reason, their spirits were thus abated, since Hannibal had slain of them aboue two hundred thousand, and taken aboue fiftie thousand prisoners. He further told them of the Brutians, Apulians, Samnites, Lucans, and other people of Italie, that following the fortune of those great victories, had reuolted vnto the Carthaginians. Among the rest he magnified Capua, as a goodly Citie, and fit to be not only (as already it was) Head of all the Capuans, but the chiefe seat of their Dominion in Italie: and there he informed them, how louingly his brother had beene entertained, where he meant to rest that winter, attending their supply. As for the warre, He said it was euen at an end, if they would now pursue it closely, and not giue the Romans any breathing time, wherein to recollect themselues, and repaire their broken forces. Hee willed them to consider, that the warre was farre from home, in the Enemies Countrie; that so many Battailes had much diminished his brothers Armie; that the Souldiers, who had so well deserued, ought to be considered with liberall rewards; and that it was not good to burden their new Italian friends, with exactions of monie, corne, and other necessaries; but that these things must bee sent from Carthage: which the victorie would requite with large amends. Finally hee caused the golden rings, taken from the fingers of the Roman Knights that were slaine, to be powred out openly in the Court: which being measured, filled (as some say) three bushels, or (as others would rather haue it) no more than one; adding, that by this might appeare the greatnesse of the Roman calamitie, forasmuch as none but the * principall of that Order, were accustomed to weare that ornament.

Whoso considers the former Punick Warre, may easily find, that the State of Carthage neuer did receiue, in all the durance thereof, any such hopefull aduertisements from their Captaines abroad. Wherefore it is no meruaile, if the Errand of Mago found extraordinarie welcome. In the vehemencie of this joy, Himilco, a Senator aduerse to the faction of Hanno, is said to haue demanded of that great perswader vnto peace with Rome, Whether he were still of opinion, that Hannibal should bee yeelded vp vnto the Romans; or whether he would forbid them to giue thankes vnto the gods, for this their good successe. Hereunto though it bee not likely that Hanno

* Thus Liuie reports it: and credible it is, that while Rome was poore, the brauerie of priuate men was not altogether so great, as the Law would haue permitted; though otherwise Ius Annuli, The wearing of the Ring, was the generall priuiledge of the Roman Equites.

Hanno made the ſame formall anſwere, which Liuie puts into his mouth, calling the Carthaginian Senators Patres conſcripti, by a terme proper to the Romans, and putting them in minde of his owne ſhamefull ouerthrow receiued at the Ilands Ægateis: yet the ſumme of his ſpeech appeares to haue beene no leſſe malicious, than it is ſet downe, foraſmuch as Hannibal himſelfe, at his departure out of Italie, exclaimed againſt the wickedneſſe of this Hanno; ſaying, that his hatred againſt the Barchines, had oppreſſed their Familie, when otherwiſe it could not, with the ruine of Carthage. Therefore it may well be, that he made ſuch a jeſt of theſe victories, as is reported; ſaying, It ill beſeemed him, who had vanquiſhed the Romans, to call for more helpe, as if he had beene beaten; or him, that had taken their campe, filled forſooth with ſpoile, to make requeſt for meat and monie. To theſe cauills, if anſwere were needfull, it might be ſaid, That other bootie than of horſes and ſlaues; little was to be found in the Roman campe: the beſt of the Souldiers carrying no other wealth into the field, than a few [a] ſiluer ſtuds in the bridles and trappings of their horſes. If Hannibal had taken any maine conuoy of mony and prouiſions, going to ſupply all wants of a great Armie in ſome other Prouince, (as the two Scipio's are afterwards ſaid to haue done, when they wanne the campe of Aſdrubal, that carried along with him all the wealth of Spaine, in his journie towards Italie) then might ſuch an objection more juſtly haue beene made vnto his demand of a ſupply. But the moſt likely part of Hanno his Oration, and wherein hee beſt might hope to preuaile, contained a perſwaſion to vſe their fortune with moderation; and now to ſeeke peace, whileſt they had ſo much the better in warre. [a] Liu. l. 22.

What would haue beene the iſſue of this counſaile, if it had beene followed, it were not eaſie to ſay. For though it bee likely, that the Roman pride would haue brooked much indignitie, in freeing Italie from the danger of warre, yet it is not likely, that the faith, ſo often broken to the Carthaginians in former times, would haue beene kept entire, when any opinion of good aduantage had called for reuenge of ſo many ſhamefull ouerthrowes; ſince after this warre ended, and a new league concluded, no ſubmiſſiue behauiour could preſerue Carthage from ruine, longer than vntill ſuch time, as Rome was at leiſure from all other warres. This counſaile therefore of Hanno, though it might ſeeme temperate, was indeede very peſtilent; and ſerued only to hinder the performance of a noble reſolution. For it was concluded by a maine conſent of the Senate, that fortie thouſand Numidians, fortie Elephants, and great abundance of ſiluer, ſhould bee ſent ouer to Hannibal: and that, beſides theſe, twentie thouſand foot, and foure thouſand horſe, ſhould be leuied in Spaine; not only to ſupply, as neede ſhould require, the Armies in that Prouince, but to be tranſported into Italie.

This great aide, had it beene as carefully ſent, as it was readily decreed, the Roman Hiſtorians would not haue found cauſe, to taxe the rechleſſe improuidence of Hannibal, in forbearing to march directly from Cannæ to Rome, or in refreſhing his Armie among the delights of Capua: the next yeeres worke would haue finiſhed the buſineſſe, with leſſe dangerous aduenture; and the pleaſures, which his men enjoyed among the Campans, would haue beene commended, as rewards by him well thought vpon, wherewith to animate both them and others, that were to bee imploied in the following warre. But either the too much careleſneſſe of thoſe, that were loth to make haſte in laying out their monie, before extreme neceſſitie required it; or the craftie malice of Hanno, and his fellowes, working vpon the priuate humours of men, that had more feeling of their owne commoditie, than ſenſe of the publike neede; vtterly peruerted, and made vnprofitable in the performance, the order that had beene ſo well ſet downe. The [b] Elephants were ſent: and ſome monie peraduenture; vncertaine it is, how long after. But thoſe great forces of threeſcore thouſand foot, and foure thouſand horſe, came not into Italie, till much was loſt of that which already had beene gotten, and a great part of the old Carthaginian Armie, was firſt conſumed by time, and ſundry accidents of warre. Only [b] Liu. l. 26.

some small numbers, no way answering vnto the proportion decreed, were sent into Spaine; and the journie of Asdrubal thence through France into Italie much talked of, but he not enabled therevnto, till many yeeres were past, and the Romans had recouered their strength.

Heere wee may note, what great riches the Carthaginians drew into their Citie, both by the Tributes receiued from their subiects, and by their wealthy Trade of merchandize. For it is not long, since the warre of the Mercinaries; and the perfidious tyrannie of the Romans, extorting in time of greatest necessity twelue hundred talents; had exceedingly impouerished Carthage: which was before brought into great want, euen by the expence of so much monie, as was to bee disbursed for redeeming of peace, after the losse at Ægateis. Yet we see, what great Armies of Numidians, and Spaniards, besides those already on foot, are appointed to the seruice in Italie, and how little the Carthaginians feare the want of mony in these chargeable vndertakings: whereas the Romans, on the other side, hauing three or foure yeeres together beene forced to some extraordinary cost, are faine to goe vpon credit, euen for the price of those slaues, which they bought of their owne Citizens to arme for their defence. Such aduantage, in meanes to enrich their Treasurie, had the wealthy merchants of Carthage, trading in all parts of the Mediterran Sea, euen from Tyrus their Mother-City in the bottome of the streights vnto the great Ocean, aboue the Romans: who liued on the fruits of their ground; and receiued their Tributes from people following the same course of life. When time therefore was come, that the hatred of Rome found leisure to shew it selfe, in the destruction of Carthage; the impudence of Roman falshood, in seeking an honest colour wherewith to shadow the intended breach of faith, discouered plainely whence the jealousie was bred, that this mighty Citie would againe rebell. For the Carthaginians, hauing giuen vp hostages, euen before the Roman Armie did set forth, to performe what soeuer should bee enjoyned them, with condition that their Citie might not bee destroyed; and hauing accordingly, when they were so required, yeelded vp all their weapons, and engines of warre; the Romans told them plainly, That the Citie of Carthage, which was the Bodie of the Citizens, should be friendly dealt withall, but the Towne must needes be demolished, and remoued into some other place, that should be twelue miles distant from the Sea. For (said the Romans) this Trade of merchandize, by which ye now liue, is not so fit for peaceable men, such as yee promise to become hereafter, as is the Trade of husbandrie; an wholsome kind of life, and enduing men with many laudable qualities, which enable their bodies, and make them very apt for conuersation. This villainous dealing of the Romans, though sugred with glosing words, plainly shewes, what good obseruation the elder Cato had made of the hastie growth of Carthage in riches. For when, being demanded his opinion in the Senate about any matter whatsoeuer it were, added still this conclusion, Thus I thinke; and that Carthage should be destroied; Hee may seeme, not only to haue had regard vnto that present wealth, which at his being there hee had found in the Citie, but much more vnto these times, & the great height whervnto it rose, euen suddenly as wee see, out of many calamities, whilest the Romans thought, that it had not beene in case to dare so terrible a warre.

But as the Carthaginians, in gathering wealth, were more industrious and skilfull than the Romans; so came they farre short of them, in the honourable care of the publike good: hauing euery one, or most of them, a more principall regard of his owne priuate benefit. This made them (besides the negligence commonly found in victors) when the first heat of their affection, wherein they concluded to pursue the warre strongly, was ouer-past, goe more leisurely to worke, than had beene requisite in the execution. It was easie for Hanno to perswade couetous men, that they should first of all defend their owne in Spaine. This might be done with little charges. Afterwards, when that Prouince was secured, they might send an Armie into Italie; so going to worke orderly by degrees. For it were no wisedome, to commit all the ſtrength of the Common-wealth to one hazard of fortune, againſt the Enemies; or (which perhaps were worſe) to the Gouernment of an ambitions man, and his brethren; who hauing once (if they could ſo doe) finiſhed the warre, might eaſily make * Hannibal a King, and ſubdue Carthage, with the forces that he had giuen them to the conqueſt of Rome.

By ſuch malicious working of Hanno, and by their owne ſlackneſſe, incredulitie, dulneſſe, or niggardize, the Carthaginians were perſwaded rather to make ſmall diſburſements in Spaine, than to ſet vp all their reſt at once in Italie. Yet was it indeed impoſſible, to hold a Countrie of ſo large extent, and ſo open a coaſt as that of Spaine, free from all incurſion of the Enemie: eſpecially the affection of the Naturalls being (as in a new Conqueſt) ill eſtabliſhed. A better way therfore it had been to make a running warre, by which the Romans might haue beene found occupied, euen with the ordinarie Carthaginian Garriſons, or ſome little addition thereunto. For if it were thought meet, to deferre the proſecution of their maine intendment againſt Rome it ſelfe, vntill ſuch time as euery little thorne were pulled out of the ſides of ſo great a Prouince, then muſt Emporiæ haue bin beſieged & forced: which by reaſon of alliance with the Maſſilians, gaue vnto the Romans, at all times when they pleaſed, a readie and ſecure Harbour. But the Towne of Emporiæ was too ſtrong to be wonne in haſte: it had long defended it ſelfe againſt the Barbarians; hauing not aboue foure hundred paces of wall to the maine Land, and exceedingly well fortified; a great Spaniſh Towne of the ſame name, lying without it, that was three miles in compaſſe, very ſtrong likewiſe, and friend vnto the Græcians, though not ouer-much truſted. Wherefore to force this Towne of Emporiæ, that was, beſides the proper ſtrength, like to be ſo well aſſiſted by the Maſſilians, Romans, and ſome Spaniards; would haue been a worke of little leſſe difficultie, than was the Roman warre (in appearance) after the battaile at Cannæ: yea it had bin in effect none other, than to alter the ſeat of the warre; which Hannibal had already fixed, with better iudgement, neere vnto the gates of Rome. The difficultie of this attempt being ſuch as cauſed it altogether to be forborne; great follie it was, to bee much troubled about expelling the Romans vtterly out of Spaine: whom they might more eaſily haue diuerted thence, and drawne home to their owne doores, by making ſtrong warre vpon their Citie. For euen ſo the Romans afterwardes remoued Hannibal into Africk, by ſending an Armie to Carthage; & by taking the like courſe, they now endeuoured to change the ſeat of the warre, transferring it out of Italie into Spaine. But the priuate affections of men, regarding the common good no otherwiſe, than as it is acceſſary to their owne purpoſes, did make them eaſily winke at opportunities, and hope, that ſomewhat would fall out well of it ſelfe, though they ſet not to their helping hands. Hanno was a malicious wretch: yet they that thought him ſo, were wel enough contented to harken vnto his diſcourſes, as long as they were plauſible, and tended to keepe the purſe full. In the meane while they ſuffered Hannibal, and all the noble houſe of Amilcar, to wearie themſelues in trauaile for the Common-wealth: which all Carthage in generall highly commended, but weakely aſſiſted; as if the induſtrie of theſe Barchines had been ſomewhat more than needfull. Surely the Carthaginians, in general, were farre leſſe honourable than the people of Rome: not only in gouernement of their ſubiect Prouinces, but in adminiſtration of their owne Eſtate; few of them preferring the reſpect of the Weale publike aboue their priuate intereſt. But as they thriued little in the end, by their parſimonie vſed toward their own Mercinaries, when the former Roman warre was finiſhed: ſo the concluſion of this warre preſent, will make them complaine, with feeling ſighes, of their negligence in ſupplying Hannibal, after the victorie at Cannæ; when gladly they would giue all their Treaſures, to redeeme the opportunitie, that now they let paſſe, as if it were coſt enough to ſend a few handfulls into Spaine.

* Of ſuch ambition Hanno directly accuſed Hannibal, ſaying that he made warre that ſo hee might liue compaſſed with Legions, as knowing no other way to make himſelfe a King. Liu. lib. 31.

That both the Spaniſh buſineſſe, and the ſtate of Africk it ſelfe, depended wholly, or for the most part, vpon successe of things in Italie; the course of actions following will make manifest. Particularly how matters were ordered in Spaine by the Carthaginian Gouernours, it is very hard, and almost impossible, to set downe. For though we must not reprehend, in that worthy Historian Liuie, the tender loue of his owne Country, which made him giue credit vnto Fabius and others: yet must we not, for his sake, beleeue those lies, which the vnpartiall iudgement of Polybius hath condemned, in the Writers that gaue them originall. It were needlesse to rehearse all that may be found in Polybius, concerning the vntruth of that Roman Historian Fabius. One example may suffice. He saith of Amilcar and his men at Eryx, in the former warre, That hauing cleane spent their strength, and being euen broken with many miseries, they were glad to submit themselues vnto the Romans. Contrarie hereunto we finde in the life of AMILCAR, set downe by Æmilius Probus, That Eryx was in such sort held by the Carthaginians, that it seemed to be in as good condition, as if in those parts there had not beene any warre. These wordes, being referred to the braue resolution of the Carthaginian Souldiers, and the singular vertue of their General infusing such spirit into them; may be taken as not ouerliberall. For in the treatie of peace betweene Amilcar and Catulus, when the Roman first of all required, that this Garrison of Eryx should lay downe their Armes, and forsake Sicil, threatning, that otherwise he would not talke of any composition: Amilcar boldly bade him choose, whether he would talke of it, or no; for that the Armes, which his Countrie had put into his hands to vse against her Enemies, it was not his purpose to yeeld vp vnto them. Now since the Romans, contrarie to their custome vpon like aduantages, were content to let Amilcar haue his will, and not to stand with him vpon point of honour, whilest otherwise they might quietly rid their hands of him; plaine enough it is, that they were farre from thinking him a man consumed with miseries, as Fabius would haue him seeme. Hereunto agrees the relation of Polybius: who flatly, and by name, chargeth Fabius with vntruth; saying, that howsoeuer Amilcar, and his Souldiers, had endured all extremitie, yet they behaued themselues as men that had no sense thereof; and were as farre from being either vanquished, or tired, as were their Enemies. Such being the difference betweene Fabius (as also perhaps betweene other old Writers of the Roman storie) and those that had more regard of truth, than of flattering the mightie Citie of Rome: we must take it in good part, that howsoeuer Liuie introduceth Hanno, in one place, ioyning very foolishly his owne shamefull ouerthrow at the Ilands, * Ægateis, with the great seruices of Amilcar at Eryx, as if both of them had had a like event; yet [a] elsewhere he forbeareth not to put a more likely tale (though with as impudent a commemoration of his owne vnhappie conduct) into the same Hanno his mouth, making him say, That the affaires of Carthage went neuer better, than a little before the losse of their fleet in that battaile at Sea: wherein himselfe was Generall. Now, concerning the doings of the Scipio's in Spaine, there is cause to wish, that this Fabius, with Val. Antias, and others of the like stampe, had either written (if they could not write more temperately) nothing at all; or that the tender affection of Liuie to his Rome, had not caused him to thinke too well of their relations: which are such as follow.

Strange reports of the Roman victories in Spaine, before ASDRVBAL the ſonne of AMILCAR followed thence his brother HANNIBAL into Italie.

IT hath beene ſhewed already, how P. Cornelius Scipio the Conſul, returning from Gaule into Italie, to encounter with Hannibal at his diſcent from the Alpes, ſent before him his brother Cneus, with part of his Fleet and Armie, into Spaine. Two Roman Legions, with foureteene thouſand foot of the Confederates, and twelue hundred horſe, had beene alotted vnto this Conſul, therewith to make warre in Spaine againſt Hannibal: who ſince he was marching into Italie with the ſtrength of his Armie, P. Scipio beleeued, that a good part of theſe his owne forces might well be ſpared from the Spaniſh Expedition; and therefore made bold to carrie ſome of the number backe with him, ſending on his brother with the reſt, as his Lieutenant. Publius himſelfe remayned in Italie all the time of his Conſulſhip: which being expired, He was ſent Proconſul into Spaine by the Senate, with an Armie of eight thouſand men, and a fleet of thirtie Gallies.

The Acts of theſe two Brethren in their Prouince, were very great; and, as they are reported, ſomwhat maruailous. For they continually preuailed in Spaine, againſt the Carthaginians: whom they vanquiſhed in ſo many battailes, & with-drew from their Alliance ſo many of the Spaniards their Confederates; that we haue cauſe to wonder, how the Enemie could ſo often finde meanes to repaire his forces, and returne ſtrong into the field. But as the Romans, by pretending to deliuer the Countrie from the tyrannie of Carthage, might eaſily winne vnto their Confederacie, as many as were galled with the African yoke, and durſt aduenture to breake it: ſo the ancient reputation of the firſt Conquerours might ſerue to arme the Naturalls againſt theſe Inuaders; and to reclaime thoſe, that had reuolted vnto the Romans, were it onely by the memorie of ſuch ill ſucceſſe, as the like rebellions in former times had found. Hereto may be added the Carthaginian treaſure: which eaſily raiſed ſouldiers, among thoſe valiant, but (in that Age) poore, and gold-thirſtie Nations. Neither was it of ſmall importance, that ſo many of the Spaniards had their children, kinſmen, and friends, abroad with Hannibal in his Italian warres; or ſeruing the Carthaginians in Africk. And peraduenture, if we durſt be bold to ſay it; the victories of the Scipio's were neither ſo many, nor ſo great, as they are ſet out by Liuie. This we may be bold to ſay, That the great Captaine Fabius, or Liuie in his perſon, maketh an obiection vnto Scipio, which neither Scipio, nor Liuie for him, doth anſwer, That if ASDRVBAL were vanquiſhed, as SCIPIO would ſay, by him in Spaine: ſtrange it was, and as little to his honour, as it had beene extremely dangerous to Rome, that the ſame vanquiſhed man ſhould inuade Italie. And it is indeede an incredible narration, That Aſdrubal being cloſed in on all ſides, and not knowing how to eſcape out of a battaile, ſaue only by the ſteepe deſcent of Rocks, ouer a great Riuer that lay at his backe, ranne away with all his monie, Elephants, and broken troups, ouer Tagus, directly towards the Pyrenees, and ſo toward Italie; vpon which he fell with more than threeſcore thouſand armed Souldiers. Neither doe I ſee, how it hangs wel together, That he choſe a piece of ground very defenſible, but moſt incommodious for his retrait, if he ſhould happen to be vanquiſhed; and yet, that he ſent al his monie and Elephants away before him, as not intending to abide the Enemie: Or how it could be true, that theſe his Elephants, being ſo ſent before, could hinder the Romans (for ſo are they ſaid to haue done in the laſt battaile betweene him and Scipio) from breaking into his camp. Wherfore we can no more than be ſorry, that all Carthaginian records of this warre, and Spaniſh, (if there were any) being vtterly loſt, we can know no more thereof, than what it hath pleaſed the Romans to tell vs: vnto whom it were no wiſdome to giue too much credit. In this regard, I will ſummarily runne ouer the doings of the Scipio's in Spaine; not greatly inſiſting on particulars, whereof there is no great certaintie.

Liu. lib. 28.

Cn.Cornelius landed at Emporiæ, an Hauen-towne, not farre within the Pyrenees, retaining ſtill the ſame name with little inflexion. That by the fame of his clemencie he allured many Nations to become ſubiect vnto Rome, as the ſtorie beginnes of him, I could eaſily beleeue, if I vnderſtood by what occaſion they had need to vſe his clemencie, or he to giue ſuch famous example thereof, being a meere ſtranger, and hauing no iuriſdiction in the Countrie. Yet is it certaine, that he was a man verie courteous, and one that could well inſinuate himſelfe into the loue of the Barbarians; among whom, his dexteritie in practice had the better ſucceſſe, for that hee ſeemed to haue none other errand, than ſetting them at libertie. This pretext auailed with ſome: others were to be hired with monie: and ſome hee compelled to yeeld by force or feare; eſpecially, when he had wonne a battaile againſt Hanno. Into all Treaties of accord, made with theſe people, likely it is that he remembred to inſert this Article, which the Romans in their Alliances neuer forgate, vnleſſe in long times paſt, and when they dealt with the Carthaginians, or their Superiours; Maieſtatem Pop. Rom. comiter conſeruent, which is, as Tullie interprets it, That they ſhould gently (or kindely) vphold the Maieſtie of the People of Rome. This was in appearance nothing troubleſome: yet implied it indeed an obſcure couenant of ſubiection. And in this reſpect it may be true, That the Spaniards became ditionis Romanæ; of the Roman iuriſdiction; though hereafter they will ſay, they had no ſuch meaning. That part of the Countrie wherein Scipio landed, was newly ſubdued by Hannibal in his paſſage toward Italie; and therefore the more eaſily ſhaken out of obedience. Particularly in the Bargutians; Hannibal had found, at his comming among them, ſuch an apprehenſion of the Roman greatneſſe, as made him ſuſpect, that any light occaſion would make them ſtart from the Carthaginians. Wherefore he not only appointed Hanno Gouernor ouer them, as ouer the reſt of the Prouince betweene Iberus and the Pyrenees, but made him alſo their Lord; that is, (as I conceiue it; for I doe not thinke he gaue the Principalitie of their Countrie vnto Hanno and his Heires,) He made him not only Lieutenant generall ouer them, in matters of warre, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage; but tooke from them all inferiour Officers of their owne, leauing them to be gouerned by Hanno at his diſcretion. Theſe therefore had good cauſe to reioyce at the comming of Scipio: with whom, others alſo (no doubt) found reaſons to ioyne; it being the cuſtome of al conquered Nations, in hatred of their preſent Lords, to throw themſelues indiſcreetly into the protection of others, that many times proue worſe than the former. So were the Neapolitans, and Milanois, in the age of our Grand-fathers, wearie by turnes of the Spaniards and French; as more ſenſible ſtill of the preſent euil which they felt, than regardfull of the greater miſchiefe, whereinto they ranne by ſeeking to auoide it. This bad affection of his Prouince, would not ſuffer Hanno to temporize. Ten thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe, Hannibal had left vnto him: beſides which it is like, that ſome forces he was able to raiſe out of his Prouince. Therefore he aduentured a battaile with Scipio; wherein he was ouerthrowne and taken. Following this victorie, Scipio beſieged Stiſſum, a Towne hard by, and wanne it. But Aſdrubal hauing paſſed Iberus, and comming too late to the reliefe of Hanno, with eight thouſand foot and a thouſand horſe, fel vpon the Roman Sea-forces, that lay not farre about Tarracon, whom he found careleſſe, as after a victorie, rouing abroad in the Countrie; and with great ſlaughrer draue them aboord their ſhips. This done, he ranne vp into the Counrrie, where he with-drew the Illergetes from the Roman partie, though they had giuen hoſtages to Scipio. Scipio in the meane ſeaſon was gone to viſit and aide his fleet: where hauing ſet things in order, he returned backe, and made toward Aſdrubal; who durſt not abide his comming, but with-drew himſelfe againe ouer Iberus. So the Illergetes were compelled by force, hauing loſt Athanagia their chiefe Citie, to pay a fine to the Romans, and increaſe the number of their hoſtages. The Auſetani likewiſe, Confederates of the Carthaginians, were beſieged in their chiefe Towne: which they defended thirtie daies;

dayes; hoping in vaine, that the ſharpe Winter, and great abundance of ſnow that fell, would haue made the Romans to diſlodge. But they were faine at length to yeeld: and for this their obſtinacie, they were amerced twentie Talents of ſiluer. During the ſiege, the Lacetani came to helpe their diſtreſſed Neighbours; and were beaten home by Scipio, leauing twelue thouſand of their Companie dead behinde them. I cannot but wonder, how theſe Lacetani, that are ſaid to be the firſt which embraced the friendſhip of Scipio, ſhould without any cauſe remembred, become Carthaginian on the ſudden, in the next newes that we heare of them. As alſo it is ſtrange, that all the Sea-coaſt Nothward of Iberus, hauing lately become voluntarily ditionis Romanæ; ſubiect vnto Rome, ſhould in continuance of the Storie, after a few lines, hold warre againſt Scipio, without any aſſiſtance of the Carthaginians. Neither can I beleeue, that Aſdrubal, as it were by a charme, ſtirred vp the Illergetes, making them lay aſide all care of their Hoſtages, and take Armes in his quarrell; whileſt himſelfe had not the daring to ſtand againſt Scipio, but ranne away, and laued himſelfe beyond Iberus. Philinus perhaps, or ſome Carthaginian Writer, would haue told it thus: That Scipio aduenturing too farre into the Countrey, was beaten by Aſdrubal back to his ſhips, whence he durſt not ſtirre, vntill Winter came on: at what time this Carthaginian returned into the heart of his Prouince, leauing ſome few Garriſons to defend thoſe places, that after Scipio wanne, by returning vpon them, vnlooked for, through a deep ſnow. As for the Lacetani, Illergetes, and the reſt, we may reaſonably thinke, that they ſought their owne benefit: helping themſelues one while by the Romans againſt the Carthaginians; and contrariwiſe, vpon ſenſe of iniuries receiued, or apprehenſion of more grieuous tyrannie, vnder which they feared to be brought by theſe new Maſters, harkning againe vnto the comfortable promiſes of thoſe, that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent to liue vnder their owne Countrey Lawes, and not vnder Gouernours ſent from Rome or Carthage, their demeanour in all Ages following may teſtifie: euen from henceforth vnto the dayes of Auguſtus Cæſar; till when they were neuer throughly conquered. Liu. lib. 21.

The yeere following this, Cn. Scipio had a victorie againſt the Carthaginians in fight at Sea; or rather came vpon them vnlooked for, while they rode at Anchor; moſt of their men being on ſhore. All their ſhips, that ranne not too far on ground, he tooke: and thereby grew Maſter of the whole coaſt; landing at pleaſure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defenced. After this victorie, aboue one hundred and twentie Nations, or pettie Eſtates, in Spaine, are ſaid to haue ſubmitted themſelues vnto the Romans, and giuen Hoſtages: whereby Aſdrubal was compelled to flie into the vtmoſt corners of the land, and hide himſelfe in Luſitania. Yet it followes; that the Illergetes did againe rebell; that Aſdrubal hereupon came ouer Iberus; and that Scipio (though hauing eaſily vanquiſhed the Illergetes) went not forth to meet him, but ſtirred vp againſt him the Celtiberians, that lately were become his ſubiects and had giuen him Hoſtages. Theſe tooke from the Carthaginian three Townes, and vanquiſhed him in two battailes; wherein they ſlue fifteen thouſand of his men, and tooke foure thouſand Priſoners. Then arriued P. Scipio, with the ſupply before mentioned: and henceforward the two brethren ioyntly adminiſtred the buſineſſe in Spaine.

The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celtiberian warre; the two Scipio's did, haud cunctanter; without feare or doubt, paſſe ouer Iberus, & beſiege Saguntum. Little cauſe of doubt had they, if Cn. had alreadie ſubdued many Nations beyond it, and, among many others, the ſame Celtiberians, that with their proper forces were able to vanquiſh Aſdrubal. Boſtar, the Gouernour of Saguntum, a ſimple man, ſuffered himſelfe to be perſwaded by one Acedux a Spaniard, that the only way to get the fauour and hearty good will of the Countrie, was by freely reſtoring vnto them their Hoſtages; as reſting, without any pledge, aſſured of their faith. But the craftie Spaniard, being truſted with this meſſage and reſtitution of the Hoſtages, carried them all all to the Roman Generalls: perſwading them, as hee had done Boſtar, to make the Liberalitie their owne. Hereby the Romans purchaſed much loue: if the tale were true; and if it were not rather true, as afterward and ere this we finde, that all the Spaniſh Hoſtages were left in new Carthage. I am wearie of rehearſing ſo many particularities, whereof I can beleeue ſo few. But ſince wee finde no better certainties, we muſt content our ſelues with theſe.

The yeere following was like vnto this: Aſdrubal muſt be beaten againe. The two Scipio's diuide their forces: Cn. makes warre by Land; P. by Sea. Aſdrubal, with much labour and entreatie, hath gotten foure thouſand foot, and fiue hundred horſe, out of Africk: He repaires his fleet; and prouides euery way to make reſiſtance. But all his chiefe Sea-men, and Maſters of his ſhips, reuolt vnto the Romans: becauſe they had beene chidden the laſt yeere for their negligence, which had betraied the Nauie. The reuolt of theſe ſhip-maſters animates to rebellion the Carpetians, or Carpetani, an In-land people about Toledo, in the very Center of Spaine. Theſe doe much miſchiefe, ſo that Aſdrubal is faine to make a iourney to them. His ſudden comming cuts off ſome of them, that were found ſcattered abroad in the fields. But they, making head, ſo valiantly aſſaile him, that they driue him, for very feare, to incampe himſelfe ſtrongly on an high piece of ground; whence he dares not come forth to giue them battaile. So they take a Towne by force, wherein he had laide vp all his prouiſions; and ſhortly make themſelues Maſters of the Countrie round about. This good ſucceſſe breeds negligence; for which they dearely pay. Aſdrubal comes vpon them, takes them vnprepared, beats them, kills the moſt of them, and diſperſeth the reſt; ſo that the whole Nation yeeldeth to him the next day. Then come directions from Carthage; that Aſdrubal ſhould leade his Armie forthwith into Italie: which we may wonder, why the Carthaginians would appoint him to doe, if they had beene informed by his letters in what hard caſe he was; and had ſo weakely ſupplyed him, as is ſhewed before. But thus we finde it reported: and that vpon the very rumour of this his iournie, almoſt all Spaine was readie to fall to the Romans. Aſdrubal therefore ſends word preſently to Carthage, That this muſt not be ſo: or, if they will needes haue it ſo, that then they muſt ſend him a Succeſſour, and well attended with a ſtrong Armie, which to imploy they ſhould finde worke more than enough; ſuch notable men were the Roman Generalls. But the Senate of Carthage is not much moued with this excuſe: Aſdrubal muſt needes be gone; and Himilco, with ſuch forces as are thought expedient for that ſeruice both by Land & Sea, is ſent to take the charge of Spaine. Wherfore Aſdrubal hath now no more to doe, than to furniſh himſelfe with ſtore of monie, that hee might haue wherewithall to winne the friendſhip of the Gaules; through whoſe Countries hee muſt paſſe, as Hannibal had done before him. The Carthaginians were greatly too blame, for not remembring to eaſe him of this care. But ſince it can bee no better, he laies great Impoſitions vpon al the Spaniards his ſubiects: & hauing gotten together as much treaſure as he could, onward he marcheth toward Iberus. The Scipio's hearing theſe newes, are carefull how to arreſt him on the way. They beſiege Ibera (ſo called of the Riuers name running by it) the richeſt towne in all thoſe quarters, that was confederate with Aſdrubal: who thereupon ſteps aſide to relieue it. The Romans meet him, and fight a battaile with him: which they winne the more eaſily, for that the Spaniards, his followers, had rather bee vanquiſhed at home; than get the victorie, and afterwards be haled into Italie. Great numbers are ſlaine: and few ſhould haue eſcaped, but that the Spaniards ranne away, ere the battailes were throughly ioyned. Their campe the Romans take, and ſpoile: whereby (queſtionleſſe) they are marualouſly enriched; all the monie that could bee raked together in Spaine, being carried along in this Italian Expedition. This dayes euent ioynes all Spaine to the Romans, if any part of the Countrie ſtood in doubt before; and puts Aſdrubal ſo farre from all thought of trauailing into Italie, that it leaues him ſmall hope of keeping himſelfe ſafe in Spaine. Of theſe exployts aduertiſement is ſent to

Rome:

Rome: and Letters to the Senate, from P. and Cn. Scipio, whereof the Contents are; That they haue neither monie, apparrell, nor bread, wherewith to ſuſtaine their Armie and Fleet; That all is wanting; ſo as vnleſſe they may bee ſupplied from Rome, they can neither hold their forces together, nor tarrie any longer in the Prouince. Theſe Letters come to Rome in an euill ſeaſon; the State being ſcarcely able, after the loſſe at Canna, to helpe it ſelfe at home. Yet reliefe is ſent: how hardly, and how much to the commendations of that loue and care, which the priuate Citizens of Rome bare vnto the Common-wealth, ſhall be inſerted elſewhere, into the Relation of things whereof the truth is leſſe queſtionable. At the comming of this ſupply, the two Scipio's purſue Aſdrubal, and hunt him out of his lurking holes. What elſe can we thinke; that remember the laſt newes of him, and how fearefully he miſtruſted his owne ſafetie? They finde him, and Mago, and Amilcar the ſonne of Bomilcar, with an Armie of threeſcore thouſand men, beſieging Illiturgi: (which the learned Ortelius, & others, probably conjecture to haue ſtood, where Carinnena is now, in the Kingdome of Aragon; for there was Illiturgis, afterward called Forum Iulij, quite another way) a Towne of the Illergetes their neereſt Neighbours, for hauing reuolted vnto the Romans. The Towne is greatly diſtreſſed; but moſt of all, for want of victuailes. The Romans therefore breake through betweene the Enemies camps, with terrible ſlaughter of all that reſiſt them: and hauing victuailed the place, encourage the townſmen to defend their walls as ſtoutly, as they ſhould anon behold them fighting manfully with the beſiegers, in their behalfe. So they iſſue forth, about ſixteen thouſand againſt threeſcore thouſand: and killing more of the enemies, than themſelues were in number, driue all the three Carthaginian Commanders, euery one, out of his quarter; and tooke that day, beſides priſoners and other bootie, fiftie and eight Enſignes. The Carthaginian Armie, being thus beaten from Illiturgi, fall vpon Incibili, that ſtood a little Southward from the mouth of Iberus. The Spaniards are blamed, as too greedy of earning monie by warre, for thus re-enforcing the broken Carthaginians. But it may be wondred, whence the Carthaginians had monie to pay them: ſince Aſdrubal was lately driuen to poll the Countrie, wanting monie of his owne; and being beaten in this journie, had loſt his wealthy carriages, when his campe was taken after the battaile by Ibera. Howſoeuer it happens, the Carthaginians (according to their cuſtome) are beaten againe at Incibili: where there were of them aboue thirteene thouſand ſlaine, & aboue three thouſand taken; beſides two and forty Enſignes, and nine Elephants. After this, (in a manner) all the people of Spaine fell from them vnto the Romans. Thus could Fabius, Valerius Antias, or ſome other Hiſtorian, to whom Liuie gaue credit, conquer all Spaine twice in one yeere, by winning famous victories; whereof theſe good Captaines, P. and Cn. Scipio, perhaps were not aware. Liu. l. 23. Liu. l. 23. Liu. l. 23.

The Romans, notwithſtanding this large acceſſe of Dominion, winter on their owne ſide of Iberus. In the beginning of the next yeere, great Armies of the Spaniards riſe againſt Aſdrubal; and are ouerthrowne by him. P. Scipio, to helpe theſe his friends, is forced to make great haſte ouer the Riuer. At Caſtrum altum, a place in the mid-way betweene new Carthage and Saguntum, famous by the death of the great Amilcar, P. Scipio incampeth: and ſtores the place with victuailes, being ſtrong and defencible; as intending to make it his ſeat for a while. But the Countrie round about is too full of Enemies: the Carthaginian horſe haue charged the Romans in their march, and are gone off cleare; falling alſo vpon ſome ſtragglers, or ſuch as lagged behinde their fellowes in march, they haue cut off two thouſand of them. Hereupon it is thought behouefull, to retire vnto ſome place more aſſured. So Pub. withdrawes himſelfe vnto Mons Victoriæ: that riſing ſomewhat Eaſtward from Incibili, ouer-lookes the Southerne Out-let of Iberus. Thither the Carthaginians purſue him: His brother Cn. repaires vnto him; and Aſdrubal the ſonne of Geſco, with a full Armie, arriues to helpe his Companions. As they lie thus neere incamped together, P. Scipio, with ſome light-armed, going cloſely to view the places therabouts, is discouered by the enemies: who are like to take him, but that he withdrawes himselfe to an high peece of ground; where they besiege him, vntill his brother Cn. fetch him off. After this (but I know not why) Castulo, a great citie of Spaine, whence Hannibal had taken him a wife, joyneth with the Romans; though being farre distant from them, and seated on the head of the Riuer Bætis. Neuertheless the Carthaginians passe ouer Iberus, to besiege Illiturgi againe, wherein lodgeth a Roman garrison; hoping to winne it by famine. Wee may justly wonder, what should moue them to neglect the rebellion of Castulo, yea and the Roman Armie lying so close by them, and to seeke aduentures further off, in that very place, wherein they had beene so grieuously beaten the yeere before. But thither they goe: and thither followes them Cn. Scipio with one Legion: who enters the Towne by force, breakes out vpon them the next day, and in two battailes kills aboue twelue thousand, and takes more than a thousand of them prisoners, with sixe and thirtie Ensignes. This victorie (doubtlesse) is remarkeable: considering that the greatest Roman Legion at this time, consisted of no more than fiue thousand men. The vanquished Carthaginians besiege Bigarra: but that siege is also raised by Cn. Scipio. Thence the Carthaginians remoue to Munda; where the Romans are soone at their heeles. There is a great battaile fought, that lasteth foure houres, wherein the Romans get a notable victorie; and a more notable would haue gotten, had not Cn. Scipio beene wounded. Thirtie nine Elephants are killed; and twelue thousand men; three thousand prisoners taken, and seuen and fiftie Ensignes. The Carthaginians flie to Auringes; and the Romans pursue them. Cn. Scipio in a Litter is carried into the field, and vanquisheth the Carthaginians againe: but kills not halfe so many of them, as before; good cause why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Notwithstanding all these ouerthrowes, the Spaniards, a people framed euen by nature to set warre on foot, quickly fill vp the broken troupes of Asdrubal: who hauing also hired some of the Gaules, aduentures once more to trie his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten againe, and looseth eight thousand of his men; besides Prisoners, Elephants, Ensignes, and other appurtenances. After so many victories, the Romans are euen ashamed, to leaue Saguntum enthralled vnto the Carthaginians; since, in behalfe of that Citie, they had at first entred into this warre. And well may wee thinke it strange, that they had not recouered it long before, since wee may remember, that long before this they had wonne all the Countrie once and againe. But it must not be forgotten, that they had ere now besieged Saguntum; and were faine (as appears) to goe their way without it: so as they neede not to blush, for hauing so long forborne to do that, which ere now they had attempted, but were vnable to performe. At the present they winne Saguntum: and restore the possession thereof vnto such of the poore dispersed Citizens, as they can finde out. They also waste and destroy the Countrie of the Turdetani, that had ministred vnto Hannibal matter of quarrell against the Saguntines. This last action (questionlesse) was much to their honour; and wherin we may be assured, that the Carthaginians would haue disturbed them, if they had beene able.

Liu. l. 24.

But ouer-looking now this long continuance of great victories, which the Romans haue gotten in Spaine, other print or token of all their braue exploits, wee can perceiue none, than this recouerie of Saguntum: excepting the stopping of Asdrubals journie; which was indeede of greatest importance, but appertaining to their owne defence. For they haue landed at Emporiæ, an Hauen-towne, built and peopled by a Colonie of the Phocæans, kinne to the Massilians, friends to the Romans; They haue easily wonne to their party, lost, recouered, and lost againe, some pettie bordering Nations of the Spaniards, that are carried one while by perswasion, other whiles by force, and sometimes by their owne vnsettled passions; and now finally they haue wonne a Towne, whereof the Carthaginians held entire possession, who had rooted out the old Inhabitants. Wherefore we may easily beleeue, that when they tooke Saguntum (if they tooke it not by surprise; which is to be suspected, since in this Action we finde no particulars remembred, as when the ſame place was taken by Hannibal) they had gotten the better of their Enemies in ſome notable fight. In like ſort alſo muſt we thinke, that all thoſe battailes lately remembred, after euery one of which Aſdrubal ſate down before ſome place, that had rebelled, or ſeemed ready to rebell, were proſperous vnto the Carthaginians. For it is not the cuſtome of Armies vanquiſhed, to carry the warre from Towne to Towne, and beleaguer Cities of their Enemies; but to fortifie themſelues within their owne places of ſtrength, and therein to attend the leuie and arriuall of new ſupplies. And ſurely, if the Romans had beene abſolute Maſters of the field, when they wanne Saguntum, they would not haue conſumed a whole yeere following, in practiſing only with the Celtiberians the next adjoyning people. Yet made they this, little leſſe than two yeeres buſineſſe. Of theſe Celtiberians we heare before, That they haue yeelded vp themſelues vnto the Romans; for ſecuritie of their faith, giuen Hoſtages to Scipio; and, at his appointment, made warre againſt the Carthaginians, with their proper forces. Wherefore it is ſtrange, that they are now thus hardly wrought; and, not without expreſſe condition of a great ſumme, hired to ſerue in the Roman Campe. How this may hold together I cannot perceiue; vnleſſe perhaps in thoſe dayes it were the Roman cuſtome, or rather the cuſtome of ſome bad Author whom Liuie followes, to call euery Meſſenger, or ſtraggler, that entred their campe, an Hoſtage of that people from whom he came.

The Celtiberians at length, hired with great rewards, ſend an Armie of thirtie thouſand to helpe the Romans: out of which, three hundred the fitteſt men are choſen, and carried into Italie, there to deale with their Countrimen that follow Hannibal in his warres. But if any of theſe three hundred returne back into Spaine, it is to be feared, that he brings with him ſuch newes of the riches and welfare of Hannibals men, that all his fellowes at home are the leſſe vnwilling to follow Aſdrubal, when he ſhall next haue a deſire to leade them into Italie. Hereof wee finde more than probability, when theſe Mercinarie Celtiberians meet the Carthaginian Army in the field. The two Scipio's, preſuming on this acceſſe of ſtrength, diuide their forces, and ſeeke out the Enemies; who lie not farre off with three Armies. Aſdrubal, the ſonne of Amilcar, is neereſt at hand; euen among the Celtiberians, at Anitorgis. With him Cn. Scipio doubts not to take good order: but the feare is, that this one part of the Carthaginian forces being deſtroied; Mago, and Aſdrubal the ſonne of Giſco, hearing the newes, will make vſe of their diſtance, which is fiue daies march, and, by running into the furtheſt parts of the Countrie, ſaue themſelues from being ouer-taken. Publius therefore muſt make the more haſtie, and take with him the better Souldiers, that is, two parts of the old Roman Armie; leauing the third part, and all the Celtiberians, to his brother. Hee that hath the longer journie to make, comes ſomewhat the ſooner to his liues end. Mago, and Aſdrubal the ſonne of Giſco, are not ſtudying how to runne away: they finde no ſuch neceſſitie. They joyne their forces together; meet with P. Scipio; and lay at him ſo hardly, that he is driuen to keepe himſelfe cloſe within his Trenches: wherin he thinkes himſelfe not well aſſured. Eſpecially he is vexed by Maſanſſa, Prince of the Maſſæſyli, Numidians bordering vpon Mauritania, in the Region called now Tremizen: to whom the chiefe honor of this ſeruice is aſcribed, for that he becomes afterward Confederate with the Romans. In this dangerous caſe P. Scipio gets intelligence, that Indibilis, a Spaniſh Prince, is comming with ſeuen thouſand and fiue hundred of the Sueſſetani, to joyne with his Enemies. Fearing therefore to be ſtreight ſhut vp, and beſieged, He iſſues forth by night, to meet with Indibilis vpon the way; leauing T. Fonteius his Lieutenant, with a ſmall companie, to defend the campe. He meets with Indibilis; but is not able, according to his hope, to defeat him at the firſt encounter. The fight continues ſo long, that the Numidian horſe appeare (whom he thought to haue bin ignorant of his departure) and fall vpon the Romans on all ſides: neither are the Carthaginians farre behinde; but come ſo faſt vpon him in Reare, that P. Scipio, vncertaine taine which way to turne, yet fighting, and animating his men, where neede moſt requireth, is ſtruck through with a lance, and ſlaine: very few of his Armie eſcaping the ſame deſtinie, through benefit of the darke night. The like end hath Cn. Scipio within nine and twentie dayes after. At his meeting with Aſdrubal, the Celtiberian Mercinaries all forſake him; pretending that they had warre in their owne Countrie. If Anitorgis, where Aſdrubal then lay, were, as Ortelius following Beuterus takes it; a Celtiberian Towne; this was no vaine pretence, but an apparent truth. But we may juſtly beleeue, that they were wonne by Aſdrubal, and eaſily perſwaded to take as much monie for not fighting, as they ſhould haue had for hazarding their liues. Cn. Scipio therefore being vnable to ſtay them; and no leſſe vnable, without their helpe, either to reſiſt the Enemie, or to joyne with his Brother, makes a very violent retrait; herein only differing from plaine flight, that hee keepes his men together. Aſdrubal preſſeth hard vpon him: and Mago, with Aſdrubal the ſonne of Geſco, hauing made an end of Publius, haſten to diſpatch his brother after him. Scipio ſteales from them all, by night; but is ouer-taken the next day by their horſe, and arreſted, in an open place of hard ſtonie ground, where growes not ſo much as a ſhrub, vnfit for defence of his Legions againſt ſuch enemies. Yet a little Hill hee findes, of eaſie aſcent on euery ſide; which he takes for want of a more commodious place, and fortifies with pack-ſaddles, and other luggage, for default of a better Palliſado. Theſe weake defences the Carthaginians ſoone teare in ſunder: and, breaking in on all hands, leaue very few of them aliue; that ſauing themſelues, I know not how, within ſome woods adjoyning, eſcape vnto T. Fonteius, whom Publius had left in his camp, as is before ſaid. It is a terrible ouerthrow, they ſay, out of which no man eſcapes. Yet, how they that were thus hemmed in on euery ſide, in ſo bare a ground as affoorded not a ſhrub to couer them, could breake out, and ſhrowd themſelues within woods adjoyning, I ſhould much wonder; did not a greater miracle following call away mine attention. T. Fonteius is in P. Scipio's campe, on the North ſide of Iberus, fearefull (as may be ſuppoſed) of his owne life; ſince his Generall, with two parts of the Romane Armie, had little hope to remaine long ſafe within it. Thither comes L. Martius, a yong Roman Gentleman of a notable ſpirit: who hauing gathered together the ſcattered Souldiers, & drawne ſome Companies out of their Garriſons, makes a pretie Armie. The Souldiers, being to chooſe a Generall by moſt voices, preferre this L. Martius before Fonteinus the Lieutenant; as well they may. For Aſdrubal, the ſonne of Geſco, comming vpon them; this L. Martius ſo encourageth his men, (fondly weeping when hee led them forth, vpon remembrance of their more honourable Generalls lately ſlaine) and admoniſheth them of their preſent neceſſitie, that he beates the Carthaginians into their Trenches. A notable victorie perhaps he might haue gotten, but that he wiſely ſounds the retrait; reſeruing the fury of his Souldiers to a greater occaſion. The Carthaginians are at firſt amazed, and wonder whence this new boldneſſe growes, in enemies lately vanquiſhed, and now againe little better than taken: but when they ſee, that the Roman dares not follow his aduantage, they returne to their former ſecuritie; and vtterly deſpiſing him, ſet neither Corps du gard, nor Sentinell, but reſt ſecure, as if no enemie were neere. Martius therefore animates his ſouldiers with liuely wordes; and tells them, That there is no aduenture more ſafe, than that which is furtheſt from ſuſpition of being vnder-taken. They are ſoone perſwaded to follow him, in any deſperate peece of ſeruice. So he leades them forth by night, and ſteales vpon the campe of Aſdrubal: where finding no guard, but the enemies faſt a-ſleepe, or very drowzie, He enters without reſiſtance, fires their Cabbins, and giues a terrible alarme; ſo that all afrighted, the Carthaginians runne head-long one vpon another, they know not which way. All paſſages out of their campe Martius hath prepoſſeſſed, ſo that there is no way to eſcape, ſaue by leaping downe the Rampart: which as many doe, as can thinke vpon it, and runne away toward the campe of Aſdrubal the ſonne of Amilcar, that lay ſixe miles off. But Martius hath way-laid them. In a Valley betweene tweene their two campes he hath beſtowed a Roman cohort, and I know not what number of Horſe; ſo that into this Ambuſh they fall euery one, and are cut in peeces. But leſt perchance any ſhould haue eſcaped, and giue the alarme before his comming; Martius haſtens to be there as ſoone as they. By which diligent ſpeede, He comes early in the morning vpon this further campe: which with no great difficultie he enters; and partly by force, partly by apprehenſion of danger which the Enemies conceiued, when they beheld the Roman ſhields, foule, and bloudied with their former execution, He driues head-long into flight, all that can ſaue themſelues from the fury of the ſword. Thirtie ſeuen thouſand of the enemies periſh in this nights worke; beſides a thouſand eight hundred and thirty, that are taken priſoners. Hereunto Valerius Antias addes, that the campe of Mago was alſo taken, and ſeuen thouſand ſlaine: and that in another battaile with Aſdrubal, there were ſlaine tenne thouſand more; beſides foure thouſand three hundred and thirtie, taken priſoners. Such is the power of ſome Hiſtorians. Liuie therefore hath elſewhere well obſerued, That there is none ſo intemperate, as Valerius Antias, in multiplying the numbers that haue fallen in battailes. That, whileſt Martius was making an Oration to his ſouldiers, a flame of fire ſhone about his head, Liuie reporteth as a common tale, not giuing thereto any credit: and temperately concludeth, That this Captaine Martius got a great name; which he might well doe, if with ſo ſmall forces, and in ſuch diſtreſſe, He could clearely get off from the Enemies, and giue them any parting blow, though it were farre leſſe than that which is here ſet downe.

Of theſe occurrents L. Martius ſent word to Rome, not forgetting his owne good ſeruice, what ſoeuer it was, but ſetting it out in ſuch wiſe, as the Senate might judge him worthy to hold the place of their Vicegerent in Spaine: which the better to intimate vnto them, He ſtiled himſelfe Propretor. The Fathers were no leſſe moued with the tidings, than the caſe required: and therefore tooke ſuch carefull order, for ſupplying their forces in Spaine, that although Hannibal came to the gates of Rome, ere the Companies, leuied to ſerue in that Prouince, could be ſent away; yet would they not ſtay a tide for defence of the Citie it ſelfe, but ſhipped them in all haſte for Spaine. As for that title of Propretor, which Martius had aſſumed, they thought it too great for him, and were offended at his preſumption in vſurping it: foreſeeing well, that it was a matter of ill conſequence, to haue the ſouldiers abroad make choice, among themſelues, of thoſe that ſhould command Armies and Prouinces. Therefore C. Claudius Nero was diſpatched away, with all conuenient haſte, into Spaine: carrying with him about ſixe thouſand of the Roman foot, and as many of the Latines, with three hundred Roman Horſe, and of the Latines eight hundred.

It happened well, that about theſe times, the affaires of Rome beganne to proſper in Italie, and affoorded meanes of ſending abroad ſuch a ſtrong ſupply: otherwiſe, the victories of Martius would ill haue ſerued, either to keepe footing in Spaine, or to ſtop the Carthaginian Armies from marching towards the Alpes. For when Claudius, landing with his new forces, tooke charge of that remainder of the Armie, which was vnder Martius & Fonteius; he found ſurer tokens of the ouerthrowes receiued, than of thoſe miraculous victories, whereof Martius had made his vaunts vnto the Senate. The Roman partie was forſaken by moſt of the Spaniſh friends: whom how to reclaime, it could not eaſily bee deuiſed. Yet Claudius aduanced boldly towards Aſdrubal the brother of Hannibal: whom he found among the Auſetani, neere enough at hand, incamped in a place called Lapides atri; out of which there was no iſſue, but only through a ſtreight, whereon the Roman ſeized at his firſt comming. What ſhould haue tempted any man of vnderſtanding to incampe in ſuch a place, I doe not finde: and as little reaſon can I find in that which followed. For it is ſaid, That Aſdrubal, ſeeing himſelfe thus lockt vp, made offer to depart forth-with out of all Spaine, and quit the Prouince to the Romans, vpon condition, that he and his Armie might be thence diſmiſſed; That he ſpent many daies, in entertayning parlee with Claudius about this buſineſſe, That night by night hee conueied his foot-men

(a few at a time) through very difficult passages, out of the danger; and that finally taking aduantage of a mistie day, Hee stole away with all his Horse and Elephants, leauing his campe emptie. If we consider, that there were at the same time, besides this Asdrubal, two other Carthaginian Generalls in Spaine; wee shall finde no lesse cause to wonder at the simplicity of Claudius, who hoped to conclude a bargaine for so great a Countrie, with one of these three Chieftaines, than at the strange nature of those passages: through which the foot-men could hardly creepe out by night; the Horse and Elephants easily following them in a darke mistie day. Wherefore in giuing beliefe to such a tale, it is needfull that we suppose, both the danger wherein the Carthaginians were, and the conditions offered for their safe departure, to haue beene of farre lesse value. Howsoeuer it was; neither this, nor ought else that the Romans could doe, serued to purchase any new friends in Spaine, or to recouer the old which they had lost. Like enough it is, that the old Souldiers, which had chosen Martius their Propretor, tooke it not well, that the Senate, regardlesse of their good deserts, had repealed their Election, and sent a Propretor whom they fancied not so well. Some such occasion may haue moued them to desire a Proconsul, and (perhaps) yong Scipio by name: as if a title of greater dignitie, were needfull to worke regard in the Barbarians; and the beloued memorie of Cn. and Publius, likely to doe good, were it reviued in one of the same Familie. Whether vpon these, or vpon other reasons; C. Claudius was recalled out of the Prouince; and Publius the sonne of P. Scipio sent Proconsul into Spaine.

This is that P. Scipio, who afterward transferred the warre into Africk: where he happily ended it, to the great honour and benefit of his Countrie. He was a man of goodly presence, and singularly well conditioned: especially he excelled in Temperance, Continencie, Bountie, and other Vertues that purchase loue; of which qualities what great vse he made, shall appeare in the tenour of his Actions following. As for those things that are reported of him, sauouring a little too much of the great Alexanders vanitie; How he vsed to walke alone in the Capitoll, as one that had some secret conference with Iupiter; How a Dragon (which must haue beene one of the gods; and, in likelihood, Iupiter himselfe) was thought to haue conuersed with his Mother, entring her chamber often, and vanishing away at the comming in of any man; and how of these matters he nourished the rumour, by doubtfull answeres; I hold them no better than meere fables, deuised by Historians, who sought thereby to adde vnto the glory of Rome: that this noble Citie might seeme, not only to haue surpassed otheir Nations in vertue of the generalitie, but also in great worth of one single man. To this end nothing is left out, that might serue to adorne this Roman Champion. For it is confidently written, as a matter of vnquestionable truth, That when a Proconsul was to be chosen for Spaine, there durst not any Captaine of the principall Citizens offer himselfe as Petitioner, for that honourable, but dangerous charge; That the People of Rome were much astonished thereat; That when the day of Election came, all the Princes of the Citie stood looking one another in the face, not one of them hauing the heart, to aduenture himselfe in such a desperate seruice; and finally, that this P. Cornelius Scipio, being then about foure and twentie yeeres of age, getting vp on an high place where hee might be seene of all the Multitude, requested, and obtained, that the Office might be conferred vpon him. If this were true, then were all the victories of L. Martius no better than dreames: and either very vnreasonable was the feare of all the Roman Captaines, who durst not follow Claudius Nero, that not long before was gone into Spaine Propretor; or very bad intelligence they had out of the Prouince, which Asdrubal the Carthaginian, as we heard euen now, was ready to abandon. But vpon these incoherences, which I finde in the too partiall Roman Historians, I doe not willingly insist.

P. Scipio was sent Proconsul into Spaine; and with him was joyned M. Iunius Syllanus, as Propretor, and his Coadjutor. They carried with them ten thousand foot, and a thouſand horſe, in thirtie Quinquereme Gallies. With theſe they landed at Emporia; and marched from thence to Tarracon alongſt the Sea-coaſt. At the fame of Scipios arriuall, it is ſaid, that Embaſſages came to him apace from all quarters of the Prouince: which he entertained with ſuch a majeſtie, as bred a wonderfull opinion of him. As for the Enemies, they were greatly afraid of him: and ſo much the greater was their feare, by how much the leſſe they could giue any reaſon of it. If wee muſt beleeue this, then muſt wee needs beleeue, that their feare was euen as great as could be: for very little cauſe there was, to be terrified with the fame of ſo yong a man, which had as yet performed nothing. All the winter following (or, as ſome thinke, all the next yeere) hee did nothing: but ſpent the time perhaps, as his foregoers had done, in treating with the Spaniards. His firſt enterpriſe was againſt new Carthage: vpon which he came vnexpected, with fiue and twentie thouſand foot, and two thouſand fiue hundred horſe; his Sea-forces coaſting him, and moderating their courſe in ſuch wiſe, that they arriued there together with him. Hee aſſailed the Towne by Land and Sea; and wanne it by aſſault the firſt day. The Carthaginians loſt it, by their too much confidence vpon the ſtrength of it: which cauſed them to man it more ſlenderly, than was requiſite. Yet it might haue been well enough defended, if ſome Fiſher-men of Tarracon had not diſcouered vnto Scipio, a ſecret paſſage vnto the walls; whereof the Townſmen themſelues were either ignorant, or thought (at leaſt) that their enemies could haue no notice. This Citie of new Carthage, reſembled the old and great Carthage in ſituation, ſtanding vpon a demi-Iland, betweene an Hauen and a great Lake. All the Weſterne ſide of the walls, and ſomewhat of the North, was fenced with this Lake: which the Fiſher-men of Tarracon had ſounded; and finding in ſome part thereof a ſhelfe, whereon at low water men might paſſe knee-deepe, or (at moſt) wading vp to the Nauill, Scipio thruſt thereinto ſome Companies of his men; who recouered the top of the wals without reſiſtance: the place being left without guard, as able to defend it ſelfe by the naturall ſtrength. Theſe falling ſuddenly vpon the backs of the Carthaginians within the Citie; eaſily forced a gate, and gaue free entrance to the Roman Armie. What bootie was found within the Towne, Liuie himſelfe cannot certainely affirme; but is faine to ſay, That ſome Roman Hiſtorians told lies without meaſure, in way of amplification. By that ſmall proportion of riches, which was afterward carried by Scipio into the Roman Treaſurie, we may eaſily perceiue, how great a vanitie it was to ſay, That all the wealth of Africke and Spaine, was heaped vp in that one Towne. But therein were beſtowed all the Spaniſh Hoſtages: (or at leaſt of the adioyning Prouinces) whom Scipio entreated with ſingular courteſie; reſtoring them vnto their kindred and friends, in ſuch gracious manner, as doubled the thankes due to ſo great a benefit. Hereupon a Prince of the Celtiberians, and two pettie Kings of the Ilergetes and Lacetani, neereſt Neighbours to Tarracon, and dwelling on the North ſide of Iberus, forſooke the Carthaginian partie; and joyned with the Romans. The ſpeech of Indibilis, King of the Ilergetes, is much commended; for that he did not vant himſelfe, as commonly fugitiues vſe, of the pleaſure which he did vnto the Romans, in reuolting from their Enemies; but rather excuſed this his changing ſide, as being thereto compelled by injuries of the Carthaginians, and inuited by the honorable dealing of Scipio. This temperate eſtimation of his new profeſſed friendſhip, was indeede no vnſure token, that it ſhould be long-laſting. But if the Ilergetes had long ere this (as we haue heard before) forſaken the Carthaginian partie, and ſtoutly held themſelues as friends to Cn. Scipio; then could nothing haue beene deuiſed more vaine, than this Oration of Indibilis their King; excuſing, as new, his taking part with the ſame, when he ſhould haue rather craued pardon for his breach of alliance, formerly contracted with the Father and the Vncle. Moſt likely therefore it is, that howſoeuer the two elder Scipios had gotten ſome few places among theſe their Neighbours, and held them by ſtrength; yet were the Romans neuer Maſters of the Countrie, till this worthy Commander, by recouering their Hoſtages from the Carthaginians, and by his great munificence in sending them home, wanne vnto himselfe the assured loue and assistance of these Princes. The Carthaginian Generalls, when they heard of this losse, were very sorrie: yet neuertheless they set a good face on the matter; saying, That a young man, hauing stolne a Towne by surprise, was too farre transported, and ouer-joyed, but that shortly they would meet with him, and put him in minde of his Father and Vncle; which would alter his moode, and bring him to a more conuenient temper.

Now if I should here interpose mine owne conjecture; I should bee bold to say, That the Carthaginians were at this time busie, in setting foorth towards Italie; and that Scipio, to diuert them, vnder-tooke new Carthage, as his Father and Vncle, vpon the like occasion, sate downe before Ibera. And in this respect I would suppose, that it had not been much amisse, if the passage ouer the Lake had beene vndiscouered, and the Towne held out some longer while. For howsoeuer that particular Action was the more fortunate, in comming to such good issue vpon the first day: yet in the generalitie of the businesse, betweene Rome and Carthage, it was more to be wished, that Asdrubal should bee staied from going into Italy, than that halfe of Spaine should be taken from him. Whereas therefore he had nothing left to do, that should hinder his journey; Mago, and Asdrubal, the sonne of Gisco, were thought sufficient to hold Scipio worke, in that lingring warre of taking and retaking Townes, whilest the maine of the Carthaginian forces, vnder Asdrubal, the sonne of Amilcar, went to a greater enterprise: euen to fight in triall of the Empire. But the Roman Historians tell this after another fashion; and say, That Asdrubal was beaten into Italy: whither he ran for feare, as thinking himselfe ill assured of the Spaniards, as long as they might but heare the name of Scipio. Scipio, say they, comming vpon Asdrubal; his Vantcourrers charged so lustily the Carthaginian horse, that they draue them into their Trenches: and made it apparent, euen by that small peece of seruice, how full of spirit the Roman Armie was, and how dejected the Enemie. Asdrubal therefore by night retired out of that euen ground, and occupied an Hill, compassed on three sides with a Riuer, very steepe of ascent, and not easie of accesse on the foreside; by which himselfe got vp, and was to be followed by the Romans. On the top of it there was a Plaine, whereon he strongly incamped himselfe: and in the mid-way, between the top and root of the Hill, was also another Plaine; into which he descended, more vpon brauery, that he might not seeme to hide himselfe within his Trenches, than for that he durst aduenture his Armie to the hazard of a battell, for which this was no equall ground. But such aduantage of place could not saue him from the Romans. They climed vp the Hill to him; they recouered euen footing with him; droue him out of this lower Plaine, vp into his Campe on the Hill-top: whither although the ascent were very difficult, and his Elephants bestowed in the smoothest places to hinder their approch; yet compassing about, and seeking passage where it was hardest to be found; but much more strongly breaking their way, where the Carthaginians had got vp before them, they draue both Men and Elephants head-long, I know not whither: for it is said, that there was no way to flie. Out of such a battell, wherein he lost eight thousand men, Asdrubal is said to haue escaped; and gathering together his dispersed troups, to haue marched towards the Pyrenees, hauing sent away his Elephants ere the fight beganne. Neuertheles, Mago, and Asdrubal, the sonne of Gisco, are reported after this, to haue consulted with him about this warre; and finally to haue concluded, that goe he needs must, were it but to carrie all the Spaniards as farre as might be, from the name of Scipio. How likely this was to haue been true, it shall appeare at his comming into Italy; whence these incoherent relations of the Spanish affaires, haue too long detained vs.

§. XII.

§. XII.

The great troubles that HANNIBAL raiſed in all quarters, to the Cittie of Rome. POSTHVMIVS the Roman Generall, with his whole Armie, is ſlaine by the Gaules. PHILIP King of Macedon, enters into a League with HANNIBAL, againſt the Romans. The Romans ioyning with the Ætolians, make warre vpon PHILIP in Greece: and afterwards conclude a peace with him; the better to intend their buſineſſe againſt the Carthaginians.

WE left Hannibal wintering at Capua: where hee and his new Confederates reioyced (as may bee thought) not a little, to heare the good newes from Carthage of ſuch mightie aide, as was decreed to be ſent thence vnto him. In former times hee had found worke enough, to carrie the Romans corne into his own barnes, and to driue away their Cattell to Geryon: his victories affoording him little other profit, then ſuſtenance for his Armie; by making him Maſter of the open field. Hee might perhaps haue forc'd ſome walled Townes, in like ſort as he did Geryon, and the Caſtle of Cannæ: but had he ſpent much time, about the getting of any one place well defended; the hunger, that his Armie muſt haue endured the Winter and Spring following, vntill corne were ripe, would haue grieuouſly puniſhed him for ſuch imploiment of the Summer. This may haue beene the reaſon, why hee forbore to aduenture vpon Rome after his victorie at Cannæ. For had he failed (as it was a matter of no certaintie) to carrie the Citie at his firſt comming; want of victuals would haue compelled him to quit the enterpriſe. Yea, many of the people that opened ſo haſtily their gates vnto him, vpon the freſh bruit of his glorious ſucceſſe, would haue taken time of deliberation, and waited perhaps the euent of another battell: if being, either for want of meanes to force the Citie, or of neceſſaries to continue a ſiege before it, repelled (as might ſeeme) from the walls of Rome, hee had preſented himſelfe vnto them with a leſſened reputation, ſomewhat later in the yeere; when time to force their obedience was wanting, vnleſſe they would freely yeeld it. But this great part of the care and trauell was paſt, when ſo many States of Italie were become his: the yeere following, the Samnites, and other old enemies of Rome, were like to receiue a notable pleaſure of their new alliance with Carthage, by helping to lay ſiege vnto that proud Citie, which ſo long had held them in ſubjection. Thus the Winter was paſſed ouer joyfully, ſauing that there came not any tidings of the preparations, to ſecond the welcom report of thoſe mightie forces, that were decreed and expected. The Spring drew on: and of the promiſed ſupply there arriued no more, than only the Elephants. How late it was ere theſe came, I finde not: onely we find, that after this he had aboue thirtie of them; whereas all, ſaue one, that hee brought ouer the Alpes, had been loſt in his iourney through the mariſhes of Hetruria. Very bad excuſe of this exceeding negligence, they that brought the Elephants could make vnto Hannibal. If they were his friends, they told him truly, what miſchiefes the perſwaſion of Hanno wrought among the too niggardly Carthaginians. Otherwiſe, they might perhaps informe him, that it was thought a ſafer, though a farther way about, to paſſe along through Spaine and Gaule, as hee himſelfe had done; and increaſe the Armie by hiring the Barbarians in the journey; than to commit the maine ſtrength of their Citie, to the hazard of the Seas: eſpecially wanting a commodious Hauen, to receiue the fleete that ſhould carrie ſuch a number of Men, Horſes, and Elephants, with all needfull prouiſions. With theſe allegations Hannibal muſt reſt content; and ſeeke, as well as he can, to ſatisfie his Italian Confederates. Therefore when time of the yeere ſerued, Hee tooke the field: and hauing finiſhed what reſted to be done at Caſilinum, ſought to make himſelf Maſter of ſome good Hauen-towne thereabout; that might ſerue to entertaine the Carthaginian fleet; or take from his Enemies at home all excuſe, which they might pretend by want thereof. To the ſame purpoſe, and to doe what elſe was needfull, He ſent Himilco vnto the Locrians, and Hanno to the Lucans: not forgetting at once to aſſay al quarters of Italie, yea, the Iles of Sicil and Sardinia; ſince the ſiege of Rome muſt needes bee deferred vnto another yeere. Hanno made an ill journey of it, being met, or ouer-taken, by T. Sempronius Longus: who ſlue aboue two thouſand of his men; with the loſſe of fewer, than three hundred Romans. But Himilco ſped farre better. By helpe of the Brutians, his good friends, hee wanne Petellia or Petilia by force; after it had held out ſome moneths. Hee wanne likewiſe Conſentia; and Croton, that was forſaken by the Inhabitants. Alſo the Citie of Locri, which was of great importance, yeelded vnto him: as did all other places thereabout; except only the Towne of Rhegium, ouer-againſt Sicil.

The great faith of the Petilians is worthie to be recorded, as a notable teſtimonie of the good gouernement, vnder which the Roman ſubjects liued. As for the Sammites, Campans, and others, whoſe earneſtneſſe in rebellion may ſeeme to proue the contrarie; we are to conſider, That they had lately contended with Rome for Soueraignetie, and were now tranſported with ambition: which Reaſon can hardly moderate, or Benefits allay. The Petilians, in the very beginning of their danger, did ſend to Rome for helpe: where their Meſſengers receiued anſwere from the Senate, That the publike misfortunes had not left meanes, to relieue their Aſſociates that were ſo farre diſtant. The Petilian Meſſengers (Embaſſadours they are termed; as were all others, publikely ſent from Cities of the Roman ſubjection, that had a priuate juriſdiction within themſelues) fell downe to the ground, and humbly beſought the Fathers, not to giue them away: promiſing to doe and ſuffer whatſoeuer was poſſible, in defence of their Towne, againſt the Carthaginians. Hereupon the Senate fell to conſultation againe: and hauing throughly conſidered all their forces remaining, plainely confeſſed, that it was not in their power to giue any reliefe. Wherefore theſe Embaſſadours were willed to returne home, and to bid their Citizens prouide hereafter for their owne ſafetie, as hauing alreadie diſcharged their faith to the vtmoſt. All this notwithſtanding, the Petilians (as was ſaid) held out ſome moneths: and hauing ſtriuen in vaine to defend themſelues, when there was no apparant poſſibilitie, gaue to the Carthaginians a bloudie victorie ouer them; being vanquiſhed as much by famine, as by any violence of the Aſſailants.

The Romans at this time were indeede in ſuch ill caſe, that Hannibal, with a little helpe from Carthage, might haue reduced them into termes of great extremitie. For whereas, in a great brauerie, before their loſſe at Cannæ; they had ſhewed their high mindes, by entertaining the care of things farre off, notwithſtanding the great warre that lay vpon them ſo neere at hand: it now fell out miſerably all at once, that their fortune abroad was no whit better then at home. L. Poſthumius Albinus their Pretor they had ſent, with an Armie of fiue and twentie thouſand, into Gaule; to the Illyrian King Pineus they had ſent for their Tribute due, whereof the pay-day was paſt, willing him, if hee deſired forbearance, to deliuer hoſtages for his performance of what was due; and to Philip King of Macedon they had ſent, to require, that he ſhould deliuer vp vnto them Demetrius Pharius, their Subject and Rebell, whom he had receiued. But now from all quarters they heare tidings, little ſuteable to their former glorious conceits. Poſthumius with all his Armie was cut in peeces by the Gaules, in ſuch ſort, that ſcarce ten men eſcaped. The manner of his ouerthrow was very ſtrange. There was a great Wood, called by the Gaules, Litana; through which he was to paſſe. Againſt his comming, the Enemies had ſawed the Trees ſo farre, that a little force would ſerue to caſt them downe. When therefore Poſthumius, with his whole Armie, was entred into this dangerous paſſage, the Gaules, that lay about the Wood, beganne to caſt downe the Trees: which falling one againſt another, bore all downe ſo faſt, that the Romans were ouer-whelmed, Men and Horſes; in ſuch wiſe, that no more eſcaped, than is ſaid before.

How

How this tedious worke, of ſawing ſo many Trees, could take deſired effect, and neither bee perceiued, nor made fruſtrate, either by ſome winde, that might haue blowne all downe before the Romans entred, or by ſome other of thoſe many accidents, whereto the deuice was ſubject; I doe not well conceiue. Yet ſome ſuch thing may haue beene done; and what failed in the ſtratagem, ſupplied with the Enemies ſword. It is not perhaps worthie to be omitted, as a monument of the ſauage condition, wherewith Lombardie, a Countrie now ſo ciuill, was infected in elder times, That of Poſthumius his skull, being cleanſed, and trimmed vp with gold, a drinking cup was made, and conſecrated in their principall Temple, as an holy veſſell, for the vſe of the Prieſt in their ſolemnities. Of this great ouerthrow, when word was brought to Rome; the amazement was no leſſe than the calamitie. But ſorrow could giue no remedie to the miſchiefe: and anger was vaine, where there wanted forces to reuenge. Tribute from the Illyrians there came none: neither doe I finde, that any was a ſecond time demanded; this we finde, That with Pleuratus, and Scerdiletus Illyrian Kings, as alſo with Gentius, who raigned within a few yeeres following, the Romans dealt vpon euen tearmes; entreating their aſſiſtance againſt Philip and Perſeus; not commanding their dutie, as Vaſſalls. The Macedonian troubled them yet a little further. For hauing aſſured his affaires in Greece, and enjoying leiſure to looke into the doings abroad, Hee ſent Embaſſadours to Hannibal: with whom he made a league, vpon theſe conditions; That the King in perſon ſhould come into Italie, and with all his forces, by Land and Sea, aſſiſt the Carthaginians in the Roman warre, vntill it were finiſhed; That Rome, and all Italie, together with all the ſpoile therein to bee gotten, ſhould bee left entire vnto the State of Carthage; And that afterwards Hannibal with his Armie ſhould paſſe into Greece, and there aſſiſt Philip, vntill hee had ſubdued all his Enemies: (which were the Ætolians, Thracians, King Antiochus, and others) leauing ſemblably vnto him the full poſſeſſion of that Countrie, and the Iles adjoyning. But ſuch prediſpoſition of Kingdomes and Prouinces, is lightly comptrolled by the diuine Prouidence, which therein ſhewes It ſelfe not (as Herodotus falſly termes it, and like an Atheiſt) enuious or malicious, but very juſt and majeſticall; in vp-holding that vnſpeakable greatneſſe of Soueraignetie, by which It rules the whole World, and all that therein is.

The firſt Embaſſadours that Philip ſent, fell into the Romans hands, in their iournie towards Hannibal: and being examined what they were, aduentured vpon a bold lie, ſaying, That they were ſent from the King of Macedon to Rome, there to make a League with the Senate and People, and offer his helpe in this time of great neceſſitie. Theſe newes were ſo welcome, that the ioy thereof tooke away all care of making better inquirie. So they were louingly feaſted; and friendly diſmiſſed, with guides that ſhould leade them the way, and ſhew them how to auoide the Carthaginians. But they being thus inſtructed concerning their iournie, fell wilfully into the Campe of Hannibal: who entertained them after a better faſhion; and concluded the buſineſſe, about which they came, vpon the points before remembred. In their returne homeward, they happened againe vnluckily to bee deſcried by the Roman fleete; which, miſtruſting them to bee of the Carthaginian partie, gaue them chace. They did their beſt to haue eſcaped: but being ouer-taken, they ſuffered the Romans to come aboord; and truſting to the lie that once had ſerued them, ſaid it againe, That hauing been ſent from King Philip, to make a League with the People of Rome, they were not able, by reaſon of the Carthaginians lying betweene, to get any farther than to M. Valerius the Pretor, vnto whom they had ſignified the good affection of the King their Maſter. The tale was now leſſe credible than before: and (which marred all) Giſco, Boſtar, and Mago, with their followers, Carthaginians that were ſent with them from Hannibal to ratifie the agreement, being preſently detected, made the matter apparant. Wherefore a little inquiſition ſerued to finde all out: ſo that at length Hannibals owne letters to King Philip were deliuered vp, and the whole buſineſſe confeſſed. The Embaſſadours and their followers were ſent close prisoners to Rome: where the chiefe of them were cast into prison; and the rest sold for bond-slaues. Yet one of their ships that escaped, carried word into Macedon of all that had happened. Whereupon a new Embassage was sent, that went and returned with better speede; concluding, as was agreed before; onely with some losse of time.

The Romans were exceedingly perplexed: thinking with what heauie weight this Macedonian warre, in an euill houre, was likely to fall vpon them; when their shoulders were ouer-burdened with the load of the Carthaginian. Yet they tooke a noble resolution; and suteable vnto that, whereby they kept off the storme, that else would haue beaten vpon them from Spaine. They judged it more easie, with small forces to detaine Philip in Greece, than with all their strength to resist him in Italie. And herein they were in the right. For that the very reputation of a King of Macedon, ioining with Hannibal in such a time, would haue sufficed to shake the allegeance not onely of the Latines, and other their most faithfull Subiects, but euen of the Roman Colonies that held all priuiledges of the Citie, it will appeare by the following successe of things. M. Valerius the Pretor, with twentie Quinquereme Gallies, was appointed to attend vpon the Macedonian, and to set on foot some commotion in Greece; or to nourish the troubles alreadie therein begunne. Philip was busie about the Sea-townes, that looked towards Italie, setting vpon Apollonia; and thence falling vpon Oricum; which he wanne, and so returned to Apollonia againe. The Epirots craued helpe of M. Valerius: or rather accepted his kinde offers; who had none other businesse to doe. The Garrison that Philip had left in Oricum, was strong enough to hold the Townesmen in good order; but not to keepe out the Romans: of whose daring to attempt any thing against him, on that side the Sea, Philip as then had no suspition. Valerius therefore easily regained the Towne; and sent thence a thousand men, vnder Næuius Crispus, an vnder-taking and expert Captaine; which got by night into Apollonia. These made a notable sallie; and brake into Philips Trenches with so great slaughter, that they forced him to forsake his camp, & raise the siege. The King purposed (as it is said) to haue departed thence by Sea: but Valerius, comming with his fleete from Oricum, stopped vp the mouth of the Riuer; so that hee was faine to burne his ships, (which belike were no better than long boates) and depart ill furnished of carriages, by Land. After this, Valerius dealt with the Ætolians, a Nation alwaies enemie to the Crowne of Macedon: and easily perswaded them (being so affected, as hath elsewhere beene shewed) to make strong warre on Philip; wherein he promised them great assistance from the Romans. That which most moued the troublesome spirits of the Ætolians, was the hope of getting Acarnania: after which they had gaped long; and whereof the Roman was as liberal in making promise, as if already it had beene his owne. So a league was made betweene them: and afterward solemnely published at Olympia, by the Ætolians; and by the Romans, in their Capitoll. The conditions were, That from Ætolia to Corcyra, in which space Acarnania was contained, all the Countrie should bee subdued, and left vpon the Ætolians, the pillage only to be giuen to the Romans. And that if the Ætolians made peace with Philip, it should be with Prouision, to hold no longer, than whileſt he abstained from doing iniurie to the Romans, or their Associates. This was indeede the only point, whereat Valerius aimed, who promised as much on the Romans behalfe, That they should not make peace with the Macedonian, vnlesse it were with like condition of including the Ætolians. Into this League was place reserued for the Lacedæmonians and Eleans, as to those that had made or fauoured the side of Cleomenes against the Macedonian, to enter at their pleasure. The like regard was had of Attalus, Pleuratus, and Scerdiletus: the first of which raigned at Pergamus, in Asia the lesse, a Prince hereafter much to bee spoken of; the other two held some part of Illyria, about which the Romans were so farre from contending with them, that gladly they sought to get their friendly acquaintance. But the names of these Associates, are thrust into the Treatie; rather to giue it countenance, than for any readinesse readineſſe which they diſcloſe to enter thereinto. The Ætolians alone, and chiefly Scopas their Pretor, with Dorymachus and others, are yet a while the onely men, of whom the Roman Generals muſt make much; as the late French King, Henrie the fourth, when he had only the title of Nauarre, was ſaid to court the Majors of Rochel. Philip was not idle, when he heard wherevnto the Ætolians tended. He repaired his Armie; made a countenance of warre vpon the Illyrians, and other his borderers, that were wont in times of danger to infeſt the Kingdome of Macedon; waſted the Countrie about Oricum and Apollonia; and ouer-running the Pelagonians, Dardanians, and others, whom he held ſuſpected, came downe into Theſſalie, whence hee made ſhew as if he would inuade Ætolia. By the fame of this Expedition, He thought to ſtirre vp all the Greekes adjoyning, againſt the Ætolians; whom they generally deteſted as a neſt of Robbers, troubleſome to all the Countrie. To which purpoſe, and to hinder the Ætolians from breaking into Greece, He left Perſeus, his ſonne & heire, with foure thouſand men, vpon their borders: with the reſt of his Armie, before greater buſineſſe ſhould ouer-take and entangle him. He made a long journie into Thrace, againſt a people called the Medes; that were wont to fall vpon Macedon, whenſoeuer the King was abſent. The Ætolians, hearing of his departure, armed as many as they could againſt the Acarnanians; in hope to ſubdue thoſe their daily enemies, and winne their little Countrie, ere hee ſhould bee able to returne. Hereto it much auailed, that the Romans had alreadie taken Oeniadæ and Naxos, Acarnanian Townes, conueniently ſituated to let in an Armie; and conſigned them vnto the Ætolians, according to the tenor of the contract lately made with them. But the ſtout reſolution of the Acarnanians, to die (as we ſay) euery Mothers ſonne of them, in defence of their Countrie; together with the great haſte of the Macedonian (who laied aſide all other buſineſſe) to ſuccour theſe his friends; cauſed the Ætolians to forſake their enterpriſe. When this Expedition was giuen ouer, the Romans and Ætolians fell vpon Anticyræ, which they tooke: the Romans aſſailing it by Sea, the Ætolians by Land. The Ætolians had the Towne, and the Romans the ſpoile.

For theſe good ſeruices M. Valerius was choſen Conſul at Rome; and P. Sulpicius ſent in his ſtead, to keepe the warre on foot in Greece. But beſides the Roman helpe, Attalus out of Aſia came ouer to aſſiſt the Ætolians. He was chiefly moued, by his owne jealouſie of Philips greatneſſe: though ſomewhat alſo tickled with the vanity, of being choſen by the Ætolians their principall Magiſtrate; which honour, though no better than titularie, he tooke in very louing part. Againſt the forces which Attalus and the Romans had ſent, being joyned with the maine power of Ætolia, Philip tried the fortune of two battailes: and was victorious in each of them. Hereupon, theſe his troubleſome Neighbours deſired peace of him, and vſed their beſt meanes to get it. But when the day, appointed for the concluſion thereof, was come: their Embaſſadours, in ſtead of making ſubmiſſion, propoſed vnto him ſuch intolerable conditions, as ill beſeemed vanquiſhed men to offer: and might therefore well teſtifie, that their mindes were altered. It was not any loue of peace, but feare of being beſieged in their owne Townes, that had made them deſirous of compoſition. This feare being taken away, by the encouragements of Attalus and the Romans, they were as fierce as euer: and thruſt a Garriſon of their owne, and ſome Roman friends, into Elis; which threatned Achaia, wherein Philip then lay. The Romans, making a cut ouer the ſtreight from Naupactus, waſted the Countrie in a terrible brauerie: wherein Philip requited them; comming vpon them in haſte from the Nemæan Games (which he was then celebrating) and ſending them faſter away, but nothing richer, than they came.

In the heat of this contention, Pruſias King of Bithynia, fearing the growth of Attalus, no leſſe than Attalus held ſuſpected the power of Philip; ſent a Nauie into Greece, to aſſiſt the Macedonian partie. The like did the Carthaginians: and vpon greater reaſon; as being more intereſſed in the ſucceſſe of his affaires. Philip was too weake by Sea: and though he could man ſome two hundred ſhips; yet the Veſſels were such, as could not hold out against the Roman Quinqueremes. Wherefore it behoued him, to vse the helpe of his good friends the Carthaginians. But their aide came somewhat too late: which might better at first haue kept those Enemies from fastning vpon any part of Greece; than afterwards it could serue to driue them out, when they had pierced into the bowels of that Countrie. Ere Philip could attempt any thing by Sea; it was needfull that he should correct the Eleans, bad Neighbours to the Achaians his principall Confederates. But in assailing their Towne, Hee was encountred by the Ætolian and Roman Garrison; which draue him back with some losse. In such cases, especially where God intends a great conuersion of Empire, Fame is very powerfull in working. The King had receiued no great detriment, in his retrait from Elis: rather he had giuen testimonie of his personall valour, in fighting well on foot, when his horse was slaine vnder him. He had also soone after taken a great multitude of the Eleans, to the number of foure thousand; with some twentie thousand head of Cattaile, which they had brought together into a place of safetie, as they thought, when their Countrie was inuaded. But it had happened, that in his pursuit of the Roman forragers about Sicyon, his horse running hastily vnder a low tree, had torne off one of the hornes, which (after the fashion of those times) the King wore in his Creast. This was gathered vp by an Ætolian; who carried it home, and shewed it as a token of Philips death. The horne was well known, and the tale beleeued. All Macedon therefore was in an vprore: and not onely the Borderers, readie to fall vpon the Countrie, but some Captaines of Philip, easily corrupted; who thinking to make themselues a fortune in that change of things, ranne into such treason, as they might better hope to make good, than to excuse. Hereupon the King returned home; leauing not three thousand men, to assist his friends the Achæans. He also tooke order, to haue Beacons erected; that might giue him notice of the Enemies doings; vpon whom hee meant shortly to returne. The affaires of Macedon, his presence quickly established. But in Greece all went ill-fauouredly: especially in the Ile of Eubœa, where one Plator betraied to Attalus, and the Romans, the Towne of Oreum, ere Philip could arriue to helpe it; where also the strong Citie of Chalcis was likely to haue beene lost, if hee had not come the sooner. He made such hastie marches, that he had almost taken Attalus in the Citie of Opus. This Citie, lying ouer against Eubœa, Attalus had wonne, more through the cowardize of the people, than any great force that he had vsed. Now because the Roman souldiers had defrauded him in the sack of Oreum, and taken all to themselues: it was agreed, that Attalus should make his best profit of the Opuntians; without admitting the Romans to be his sharers. But whileſt he was busie, in drawing as much monie as he could out of the Citizens: the sudden tidings of Philips arriuall, made him leaue all behinde him, and runne away to the Sea-side, where he got aboord his ships; finding the Romans gone before, vpon the like feare. Either the indignitie of this misaduenture; or tidings of Prusias the Bithynian his inuasion vpon the Kingdome of Pergamus; made Attalus returne home, without staying to take leaue of his friends. So Philip recouered Opus; wonne Torone, Tritonos, Drymus, and many small townes in those parts; performing likewise some Actions, of more brauerie than importance, against the Ætolians. In the meane season, Machanidas, the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, had beene busie in Peloponnesus; but hearing of Philips arriuall, was returned home.

The Lacedæmonians, hearing certaine report of Cleomenes his death in Ægypt, went about to choose two new Kings; and to conforme themselues to their old manner of Gouernement. But their estate was so farre out of tune, that their hope of redressing things within the Citie, proued no lesse vnfortunate, than had beene their attempts of recouering a large Dominion abroad. Lycurgus a Tyrant rose vp among them: vnto whom succeeded this Machanidas; and shortly after came Nabis, that was worse than both of them. They held on the Ætolian and Roman side, for feare of the Achæans; that were the chiefe Confederates of Philip, and hated extremely tremely the name both of Tyrant, and of Lacedæmonian. But of theſe wee ſhall ſpeake more hereafter.

Philip entring into Achaia, and ſeeing his preſence had brought the contentment of aſſurance to that Countrie; ſpake braue words to the Aſſembly of their States, ſaying, That he had to doe with an Enemie, that was very nimble, and made warre by running away. He told how he had followed them to Chalcis, to Oreum, to Opus, and now into Achaia: but could no where finde them; ſuch haſte they made, for feare of being ouer-taken. But flight, He ſaid, was not alwaies proſperous: He ſhould one day light vpon them; as ere this hee ſundrie times had done, and ſtill to their loſſe. The Achaians were glad to heare theſe words; and much the more glad, in regard of his good deeds accompanying them. For hee reſtored vnto their Nation ſome Townes, that were in his hand, belonging to them of old. Likewiſe to the Megalopolitans their Confederates, He rendred Aliphera. The Dymæans, that had beene taken by the Romans, and ſold for ſlaues, He ſought out, ranſomed, and put in quiet poſſeſſion of their owne Citie. Further, paſſing ouer the Corinthian Gulfe, Hee fell vpon the Ætolians: whom he draue into the mountaines and woods, or other their ſtrongeſt holds; and waſted their Countrie. This done, Hee tooke leaue of the Achæans: and returning home by Sea, viſited the people that were his ſubjects, or dependants: and animated them ſo well, that they reſted feareleſſe of any threatning danger. Then had he leiſure to make warre vpon the Dardanians, ill Neighbours to Macedon: with whom neuertheleſſe he was not ſo farre occupied, but that he could goe in hand with preparing a fleet of an hundred Gallies, whereby to make himſelfe Maſter of the Sea; the Romans (ſince the departure of Attalus) hauing not dared to meet or purſue him, when he lately ranne along the coaſt of Greece, faſt by them where they lay.

This good ſucceſſe added much reputation to the Macedonian; and emboldened him to make ſtrong warre vpon the Ætolians, at their owne doores. As for the Romans; either ſome diſpleaſure, conceiued againſt their Confederates; or ſome feare of danger at home, when Aſdrubal was ready to fall vpon Italie; cauſed them to giue ouer the care of things in Grèece, and leaue their friends there to their own fortunes. The Ætolians therfore, being driuen to great extremitie, were faine to ſue for peace vnto Philip; and accept it, vpon what euer conditions it beſt pleaſed him. The agreement was no ſooner made, than P. Sempronius with ten thouſand foot, a thouſand horſe, and thirtie fiue Gallies, came ouer in great haſte (though ſomewhat too late) to trouble it. Hearing how things went in Ætolia, hee turned aſide to Dyrrachium, and Apollonia; making a great noiſe, as if with theſe his owne forces he would work wonders. But it was not long, ere Philip came to viſit him; and found him tame enough. The King preſented him battaile: but he refuſed it: and ſuffering the Macedonians to waſte the Country round about, before his eies, kept himſelf cloſe within the walls of Apollonia; making ſome Ouertures of peace: which cauſed Philip to returne home quietly. The Romans had not ſo great cauſe to be diſpleaſed with the Ætolians, as had Philip, to take in euill part the demeanor of the Carthaginians. For notwithſtanding the Royall offer that he made them, to ſerue their turne in Italie, and aſſiſt them in getting their hearts deſire, before he would expect any requitall: they had not ſent any fleet, as in reaſon they ought, and as (conſidering his want of ſufficient abilitie by Sea) it is likely they were bound, either to ſecure the tranſportation of his Armie, or to free his coaſt from the Roman and Ætolian Pyracies. Only once they came to his helpe, which was, at his laſt journie into Achaia. But they were gone againe before his arriuall: hauing done nothing, and pretending feare of being taken by the Romans, euen at ſuch time as Philip, with his owne Nauie, durſt boldly paſſe by Sea, and found none that durſt oppoſe him. This rechleſſe dealing of the Carthaginians, may therefore ſeeme to haue beene one of Hanno his tricks; whereof Hannibal ſo bitterly complained. For it could not but grieue this malicious man exceedingly; to heare, that ſo great a King made offer to ſerue in perſon vnder

Hannibal,

Hannibal, and required the assistance of the same Hannibal, as of a man likely to make Monarchs, and alter the affaires of the World at pleasure. Therefore he had reason, such as Enuie could suggest, to perswade the Carthaginians vnto a safe and thriftie course: which was, not to admit into the fellowship of their Italian warres so mightie a Prince; whom change of affection might make dangerous to their Empire; or his much affection vnto Hannibal, more dangerous to their libertie. Rather they should doe well to saue charges: and feede the Macedonian with hopes; by making many promises of sending a fleet, and some other succours. This would cost nothing: yet would it serue to terrifie the Romans, and compell them to send part of their forces from home; that might finde this Enemie worke abroad. So should the Roman Armies be lessened in Italie; and Philip, when once he was engaged in the warre, be vrged vnto the prosecution, by his owne necessitie: putting the Carthaginians to little or no charges; yea scarce to the labour of giuing him thankes. Now if it might come to passe, as Hannibal euery day did promise, that Rome, and all Italie, should within a while bee at the deuotion of Carthage: better it were that the Citie should bee free, so as the troublesome Greekes might addresse their complaints vnto the Carthaginians, as competent Iudges betweene them and the Macedonian, than that Hannibal, with the power of Africk, should wait vpon Philip, as his Executioner, to fulfill his will and pleasure, in doing such injuries, as would both make the name of a Carthaginian hatefull in Greece, and oblige Philip to be no lesse impudent, in fulfilling all requests of Hannibal. Whether the counsaile of Hanno and his fellowes, were such as this; or whether the Carthaginians, of their owne disposition without his aduice, were too sparing, and careless, the matter (as farre as concerned Philip) came to one reckoning. For they did him no manner of good: but rather dodged with him; euen in that little courtesie which they most pretended. And this perhaps was part of the reason, why hee begunne the building of an hundred Gallies, as if hee would let them and others know, whereto his proper strength would haue reached, had he not vainely giuen credit to faithlesse promises. When therefore the Ætolians had submitted themselues alreadie: and when the Romans desired his friendship, as might be thought, for very feare of him; with reputation enough, and not as a forsaken Client of the Carthaginians, but a Prince able to haue succoured them in their necessitie, He might giue ouer the warre, and, without reprehension, leaue them to themselues. For hee had wilfully entred into trouble for their sakes: but they despised him, as if the quarrell were meerely his owne, and hee vnable to manage it. The vanitie of which their conceits would appeare vnto them: when they should see that with his proper strength he had finished the warre, and concluded it highly to his honour. So the yeere following it was agreed, by mediation of the Epirots, Acarnanians, and others, That the Romans should retaine three or foure Townes of Illyria, which they had recouered in this warre, being part of their old Illyrian Conquest: Places no way belonging to the Macedonian; and therefore perhaps inserted into the couenants, that somewhat might seeme to haue been gotten. On the other side, the Atintanes were appointed to returne vnder the obedience of Philip: who, if they were (as Ortelius probably conjectures) the people of the Countrie about Apollonia, then did the Romans abandon part of their gettings; whereby it appeares, that they did not giue peace, as they would seeme to haue done, but accepted it, vpon conditions somewhat to their losse.

The Confederates and Dependants of the Macedonian, comprehended in this Peace, were Prusias King of Bithynia, the Achæans, Bœotians, Thessalians, Acarnanians, and Epirots. On the Roman side were named, first, the People of Ilium, as an honorable remembrance of the Romans descent from Troy; then, Attalus King of Pergamus; Pleuratus, an Illyrian Prince; and Nabis, the Tyrant of Lacedæmon; together with the Eleans, Messenians, and Athenians. The Ætolians were omitted, belike, as hauing agreed for themselues before. But the Eleans and Messenians, followers of the Ætolians, (and by them, as is most likely, comprised in their League with Philip) were were alſo inſerted by the Romans; that were neuer ſlow in offering their friendſhip to ſmall and feeble Nations. As for the Athenians: they ſtood much vpon their old honour; and loued to beare a part, though they did nothing, in all great Actions. Yet the ſetting downe of their name in this Treatie, ſerued the Romans to good purpoſe: foraſmuch as they were a buſie people; and miniſtred occaſion to renew the Warre, when meanes did better ſerue to follow it.

§. XIII.

How the Romans beganne to recouer their ſtrength by degrees. The noble affection of the Romans, in releeuing the publike neceſſities of their Common-weale.

IT was a great fault in the Carthaginians, that embracing ſo many Enterpriſes at once, they followed all by the halues: and waſted more men and monie to no purpoſe, than would haue ſerued (if good order had beene taken) to finiſh the whole warre, in farre ſhorter ſpace; and make themſelues Lords of all that the Romans held. This errour had beene the leſſe harmefull, if their care of Italie had beene ſuch as it ought. But they ſuffered Hannibal, to wearie himſelfe with expectation of their promiſed ſupplies: which being ſtill deferred from yeere to yeere, cauſed as great opportunities to be loſt, as a conquerour could haue deſired. The death of Poſthumius, and deſtruction of his whole Armie in Gaule; the begunne rebellion of the Sardinians; the death of Hiero their friend in Syracuſe; with great alterations, much to their prejudice, in the whole Ile of Sicil; as alſo that Warre, of which we laſt ſpake, threatned from Macedon; happening all at one time; and that ſo neerely after their terrible ouerthrow at Canne, among ſo many reuolts of their Italian Confederates; would vtterly haue ſunke the Roman State, had the Carthaginians, if not the firſt yeere, yet at leaſt the ſecond, ſent ouer to Hannibal the forces that were decreed. It is not to be doubted, that euen this diuerſitie of great hopes, appearing from all parts, miniſtred matter vnto Hanno, or ſuch as Hanno was, whereupon to worke. For though it were in the power of Carthage, to performe all that was decreed for Italie: yet could not that proportion hold, when ſo many new occurrences brought each along with them their new care; and required their ſeuerall Armies. This had not been a very bad excuſe, if any one of the many occaſions offered had been throughly proſequuted: though it ſtood with beſt reaſon, that the foundation of all other hopes and comforts, which was the proſperitie of Hannibal in his Italian warre, ſhould haue beene ſtrengthened; whatſoeuer had become of the reſt. But the ſlender troupes, wherewith the Carthaginians fed the warre in Spaine; the lingring aide which they ſent, to vp-hold the Sardinian rebellion, when it was alreadie wel-neere beaten downe; their trifling with Philip; and (amongſt all theſe their attempts) their haſtie catching at Sicil: little deſerued to be thought good reaſons of neglecting the maine point, whereto all the reſt had reference. Rather euery one of theſe Actions, conſidered apart by it ſelfe, was no otherwiſe to be allowed as diſcreetly vndertaken, or ſubſtantially followed; than by making ſuppoſition, That the care of Italie, made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things elſe. Yet if theſe allegations would not ſerue to content Hannibal; then muſt he patiently endure to know, that his owne Citizens were jealous of his Greatneſſe, and durſt not truſt him with ſo much power, as ſhould enable him to wrong the State at home.

Whatſoeuer he heard or thought, Hannibal was glad to apply himſelfe to Neceſſitie; to feede his Italian friends with hopes; and to trifle away the time about Nola, Naples, Cuma, and other places: being loth to ſpend his Armie in an hard ſiege, that was to bee reſerued for a worke of more importance. Many offers hee made

vpon Nola; but alwaies with bad ſucceſſe. Once Marcellus fought a battaile with him there: yet vnder the very walls of the Towne; hauing the aſſiſtance of the Citizens, that were growne better affected to the Roman ſide, ſince the Heads, that inclined them to rebellion, were cut off. About a thouſand men Hannibal in that fight loſt: which was no great maruaile; his forces being then diuided, and imploied in ſundrie parts of Italie at once. Naples was, euen in thoſe daies, a ſtrong Citie; and required a yeeres worke to haue taken it by force. Wherefore the earneſt deſire of Hannibal to get it, was alwaies fruſtrate. Vpon the Towne of Cumæ they of Capua had their plot; and were in hope to take it by cunning. They ſent to the chiefe Magiſtrates of the Cumans, deſiring them (as being alſo Campans) to be preſent at a ſolemne ſacrifice of the Nation, where they would conſult about their generall good: promiſing to bring thither a ſufficient guard, to aſſure the whole Aſſembly, from any danger that might come by the Romans. This motion the Cumans made ſhew to entertaine; but priuily ſent word of all to T. Sempronius Gracchus the Roman Conſul.

Gracchus was a very good man of warre; and happily choſen Conſul in ſo dangerous a time. His Colleague ſhould haue beene Poſthumius Albinus, that was lately ſlaine by the Gaules: after whoſe death Marcellus was choſen; as being judged the fitteſt man to encounter with Hannibal. But the Roman Augures either found ſome religious impediment, that nullified the election of Marcellus; or at leaſt they fained ſo to haue done. becauſe this was the firſt time, that euer two Plebeian Conſuls were choſen together. Marcellus therefore gaue ouer the place: and Q. Fabius Maximus the late famous Dictator, was ſubſtituted in his roome. But Fabius was detained in the Citie, about matters of Religion, or Superſtition: wherewith Rome was commonly, eſpecially in times of danger, very much troubled. So Gracchus alone, with a Conſular Armie, waited vpon Hannibal among the Campans: not able to meet the Enemie in field; yet intentiue to all occaſions, that ſhould be preſented. The Volones, or Slaues, that lately had beene armed, were no ſmall part of his followers. Theſe, and the reſt of his men, Hee continually trained: and had not a greater care, to make his Armie skilfull in the exerciſes of warre; than to keepe it from quarrels, that might ariſe by vpbraiding one another with their baſe condition.

Whileſt the Conſul was thus buſied at Linternum; the Senators of Cumæ ſent him word, of all that had paſſed betweene them and the Capuans. It was a good occaſion to fleſh his men, and make them confident againſt the Enemie; of whom hitherto they had bad experience. Gracchus therefore put himſelfe into Cumæ: whence he iſſued at ſuch time, as the Magiſtrates of that Citie were expected by the Campans. The Sacrifice was to be performed by night, at a place called Hamæ, three miles from Cumæ. There lay Marius Alfius the chiefe Magiſtrate of Capua, with fourteene thouſand men; not wholly intent either to the Sacrifice, or to any danger that might interrupt it; but rather deuiſing how to ſurpriſe others, than fearing himſelfe to be aſſailed. The Conſul therefore, ſuffering none to goe forth of Cumæ, that might beare word of him to the Enemies, iſſued out of the Towne when it grew darke: his men being well refreſhed with meat and ſleepe, the day before, that they might hold out the better in this nights ſeruice. So he came vpon the Capuans vnawares: and ſlew more than two thouſand of them, together with their Commander; looſing not aboue an hundred of his owne men. Their campe hee tooke: but tarried not long to rifle it, for feare of Hannibal; who lay not farre off. By this his prouidence, He eſcaped a greater loſſe, than he had brought vpon the Enemies. For when Hannibal was enformed how things went at Hamæ, forthwith he marched thither: hoping to finde thoſe yong ſouldiers, and ſlaues, buſied in making ſpoile, and loading themſelues with the bootie. But they were all gotten ſafe within Cumæ; which partly for anger, partly for deſire of gaining it, & partly at the vrgent entreatie of the Capuans, Hannibal aſſailed the next day. Much labour, and with ill ſucceſſe, the Carthaginians and their fellowes ſpent, about this Towne. They raiſed a wooden Tower againſt it: which they brought cloſe vnto the walls; thinking thereby to force an Entrie. But the Defendants, on the inſide of the wall, raiſed againſt this an higher Tower: whence they made reſiſtance; and found meanes at length, to conſume with fire the worke of their Enemies. While the Carthaginians were buſie in quenching the fire; the Romans, ſallying out of the Towne at two gates, charged them valiantly, and draue them to their trenches, with the ſlaughter of about fourteene hundred. The Conſul wiſely ſounded the Retreat; ere his men were too farre engaged, and Hannibal in a readineſſe to requite their ſeruice. Neither would He, in the pride of this good ſucceſſe, aduenture forth againſt the Enemie; who preſented him battell the day following, neere vnto the walls. Hannibal therefore, ſeeing no likelihood to preuaile in that which he had taken in hand, brake vp the ſiege; and returned to his old Campe at Tifata. About theſe times, and ſhortly after, when Fabius the other Conſul had taken the field; ſome ſmall Townes were recouered by the Romans, and the people ſeuerely puniſhed for their reuolt.

The Carthaginian Armie was too ſmall, to fill with Garriſons all places that had yeelded; and withall to abide (as it muſt doe) ſtrong in the field. Wherefore Hannibal, attending the ſupply from home, that ſhould enable him to ſtrike at Rome it ſelfe, was driuen in the meane time to alter his courſe of warre: and, in ſtead of making (as formerly he had done) a general inuaſion vpon the whole Country, to paſſe from place to place; and wait vpon occaſions, that grew daily more commodious to the enemie, than to him. The Countrey of the Hirpines and Samnites was grieuouſly waſted by Marcellus, in the the abſence of Hannibal: as alſo was Campania, by Fabius the Conſul; when Hannibal hauing followed Marcellus to Nola, and receiued there the loſſe before mentioned, was gone to Winter in Apulia. Theſe people ſhewed not the like ſpirit in defending their lands, and fighting for the Carthaginian Empire, as in former times they had done; when they contended with the Romans, in their owne behalfe, to get the Soueraigntie. They held it reaſon, that they ſhould bee protected, by ſuch as thought to haue dominion ouer them: whereby at once they ouerburdened their new Lords; and gaue vnto their old the more eaſie meanes, to take reuenge of their defection.

The people of Rome were very intentiue, as neceſſitie conſtrained them, to the worke that they had in hand. They continued Fabius in his Conſulſhip: and ioyned with him M. Claudius Marcellus; whom they had appointed vnto that honour the yeere before. Of theſe two, Fabius was called the Shield: and Marcellus, the Roman Sword. In Fabius it was highly, and vpon iuſt reaſon, commended, That being himſelfe Conſul, and holding the Election, he did not ſtand vpon nice points of formalitie, or regard what men might thinke of his ambition, but cauſed himſelfe to be choſen with Marcellus; knowing in what need the Citie ſtood of able Commanders. The great name of theſe Conſuls, and the great preparations which the Romans made; ſerued to put the Campans in feare, that Capua it ſelfe ſhould bee beſieged. To preuent this, Hannibal at their earneſt entreatie came from Arpi: (where he lay, harkening after newes from Tarentum) and, hauing with his preſence comforted theſe his friends, fell on the ſudden vpon Puteoli, a Sea-towne of Campania; about which he ſpent three daies in vaine, hoping to haue wonne it. The Garriſon in Puteoli was ſixe thouſand ſtrong: and did their dutie ſo well, that the Carthaginian, finding no hope of good ſucceſſe, could onely ſhew his anger vpon the fields there, and about Naples; which hauing done, and once more (with as ill ſucceſſe as before) aſſaied Nola, he bent his courſe to Tarentum: wherein he had very great intelligence. Whileſt he was in his progreſſe thither; Hanno made a iournie againſt Beneuentum: and T. Gracchus the laſt yeeres Conſul, haſting from Nuceria, met him there; and fought with him a battell. Hanno had with him about ſeuenteene thouſand Foot, Brutians and Lucans for the moſt part: beſides twelue hundred Horſe; verie few of which were Italians, all the rest, Numidians and Moores. Hee held the Roman worke foure houres; ere it could bee perceiued, to which side the victorie would incline. But Gracchus his souldiers, which were all (in a manner) the late-armed slaues, had receiued from their Generall a peremptorie denunciation; That this day, or neuer, they must purchase their libertie, bringing euery man, for price thereof, an Enemies head. The sweet reward of liberty was so greatly desired, that none of them feared any danger in earning it: howbeit that vaine labour, imposed by their Generall, of cutting off the slaine Enemies heads, troubled them exceedingly; and hindered the seruice, by imployment of so many hands, in a worke so little concerning the victorie. Gracchus therefore finding his owne errour, wisely corrected it: proclayming aloud, That they should cast away the heads, and spare the trouble of cutting off any more; for that all should haue libertie immediatly after the battell, if they wanne the day. This encouragement made them run headlong vpon the Enemie; whom their desperate furie had soone ouerthrowne, if the Roman Horse could haue made their part good against the Numidian. But though Hanno did what hee could, and pressed so hard vpon the Roman battell, that foure thousand of the slaues, (for feare either of him, or of the punishment which Gracchus had threatned before the battell, vnto those that should not valiantly behaue themselues) retired vnto a ground of strength: yet was he glad at length to saue himselfe by flight, when the Grosse of his Armie was broken; being vnable to remedie the losse. Leauing the field, hee was accompanied by no more than two thousand: most of which were Horse; all the rest were either slaine or taken. The Roman Generall gaue vnto all his souldiers that reward of libertie, which hee had promised: but vnto those foure thousand, which had recoiled vnto the Hill, he added this light punishment; That as long as they serued in the warres, they should neither eate nor drink otherwise than standing, vnlesse sickneesse forced them to breake his Order. So the victorious Armie returned to Beneuentum: where the newly enfranchised souldiers were feasted in publike by the townsmen; some sitting, some standing, & all of them hauing their heads couered (as was the custome of slaues manumised) with Caps, or white wooll. The picture of this Feast (as a thing worthie of remembrance) was afterward hung vp in a Table by Gracchus, in the Temple of Libertie; which his father had built and dedicated. This was indeede the first Battell, worthie of great note, which the Carthaginians had lost since the comming of Hannibal into Italie: the victories of Marcellus at Nola, and of this Gracchus before at Hama, being things of small importance.

Thus the Romans through industrie, by little and little, repaired that great Breach in their Estate, which Hannibal had made at Cannæ. But all this while, and long after this, their Treasurie was so poore, that no industrie nor art could serue to helpe it. The fruits of their grounds did onely (and perhaps hardly) serue, to feede their Townes and Armies; without any surplusage, that might be exchanged for other needfull commodities. Few they were in Italie, that continued to pay them tribute: which also they could worse doe than before; as liuing vpon the same Trade, and subiect to the same inconueniences, which enfeebled Rome it selfe. Sicil and Sardinia, that were wont to yeeld great profit, hardly now maintained the Roman armies, that lay in those Prouinces, to hold them safe, and in good order. As for the Citizens of Rome, euery one of them suffered his part of the detriment, which the Commonwealth sustained, and could now doe least for his Countrie, when most need was: as also the number of them was much decreased; so as if money should be raised vpon them by the poll, yet must it be farre lesse, than in former times. The Senate therefore, diligently considering the greatnes of the war within the bowels of Italie, that could not be thence expelled without the exceeding charge of many good Armies; the perill, wherein Sicil and Sardinia stood, both of the Carthaginians, and of many among the Naturals declining from the friendship or subiection of Rome; the threats of the Macedonian, readie to land in the Easterne parts of Italie, if they were not at the cost to finde him worke at home; the greater threats of Asdrubal, to follow his brother ouer the Alpes, as soone as he could rid himselfe of the Scipio's in Spaine; and the pouertie of the Common-wealth, which had not money for any one of these mortall dangers; were driuen almost euen to extreme want of counsell. But being vrged by the violence of swift necessitie, signified in the letters of the two Scipio's from Spaine; they resolued vpon the onely course, without which the Citie could not haue subsisted.

They called the people to Assembly: wherein Q. Fuluius the Pretor laide open the publique wants; and plainely said, That in this Exigent, there must be no taking of monie for victuall, weapons, apparrell, or the like things needefull to the Souldiers: but that such as had stuffe, or were artificers, must trust the Common-wealth with the Loane of their commodities, and labours, vntill the Warre were ended. Hereunto hee so effectually exhorted all men, especially the Publicans or Customers, and those which in former times had liued vpon their dealing in the common Reuennues, that the charge was vnder-taken by priuate men; and the Armie in Spaine as well supplied, as if the Treasurie had beene full. Shortly after this, M. Atilius Regulus, and P. Furius Philus the Roman Censors, taking in hand the redresse of disorders within the Citie, were chiefly intentiue to the correction of those, that had mis-behaued themselues in this present warre. They beganne with L. Cæcilius Metellus: who, after the battell at Cannæ, had held discourse with some of his companions, about flying beyond the Seas; as if Rome, and all Italie, had beene no better than lost. After him they tooke in hand those, that hauing brought to Rome the message of their fellowes made prisoners at Cannæ, returned not backe to Hannibal, as they were bound by oath; but thought themselues thereof sufficiently discharged, in that they had stepped once backe into his campe; with pretence of taking better notice of the Captiues names. All these were now pronounced infamous by the Censors: as also were a great many more; euen whosoeuer had not serued in the warres, after the terme which the Lawes appointed: Neither was the note of the Censors at this time (as otherwise it had vsed to bee) hurtfull onely in reputation: but greater weight was added therevnto, by this Decree of the Senate following: That all such as were noted with infamie by these Censors, should bee transported into Sicill, there to serue vntill the end of the Warre, vnder the same hard conditions, that were imposed vpon the Remainder of the Armie beaten at Cannæ. The Office of the Censors was; to take the List and accompt of the Citizens; to choose or displace the Senatours; and to set notes of disgrace (without further punishment) vpon those, whose vnhonest or vnseemely behauiour fell not within compasse of the Law. They tooke also an accompt of the Roman Gentlemen: among whom they distributed the publike Horses of seruice, vnto such as they thought meet; or tooke them away for their misbehauiour. Generally, they had the ouer-sight of mens liues and manners: and their censure was much reuerenced and feared; though it extended no further, than to putting men out of ranke; or making them change their Tribe; or (which was the most that they could doe) causing them to pay some Duties to the Treasury, from which others were exempted. But besides the care of this generall Taxe, and matters of Moralitie, they had the charge of all publike Workes; as mending of High-waies, Bridges, and Water-courses; the reparations of Temples, Porches, and such other buildings. If any man encroched vpon the streetes, High-waies, or other places that ought to bee common; the Censors compelled him to make amends. They had also the letting out of Lands, Customes, and other publike Reuennues, to farme: so that most of the Citizens of Rome were beholding vnto this Office, as maintaining themselues by some of the Trades thereto belonging. And this was no small helpe to conserue the dignitie of the Senate: the commonaltie being obnoxious vnto the Cenſors; which were alwaies of that Order, and carefull to vp-hold the reputation thereof. But the Common-weale being now impouerished by warre, and hauing ſmall ſtore of Lands to let, or of Cuſtomes that were worth the farming; Regulus and Philus troubled not themſelues much with perusing the Temples, or other decaied Places, that needed reparations: or if they tooke a view of what was requiſite to be done in this kinde; yet forbore they to ſet any thing in hand, becauſe they had not wherewith to pay. Herein againe appeared a notable generoſitie of the Romans. They that had beene accuſtomed, in more happie times, to vndertake ſuch peeces of worke, offered now themſelues as willingly to the Cenſors, as if there had beene no ſuch want: promiſing liberally their coſt and trauell; without expectation of any paiment, before the end of the warre. In like ſort, the Maſters of thoſe ſlaues, that lately had beene enfranchiſed by Gracchus, were very well contented to forbeare the price of them, vntill the Citie were in better-caſe to pay. In this generall inclination of the Multitude, to relieue, as farre foorth as euery one was able, the common neceſſitie; all the goods of Orphans, and of Widdowes liuing vnder Patronage, were brought into the Treaſurie; and there the Quæſtor kept a booke, of all that was laied out for the ſuſtenance of theſe Widdowes and Orphans: whileſt the whole ſtocke was vſed by the Citie. This good example of thoſe which remained in the Towne, preuailed with the Souldiers abroad: ſo that (the poorer ſort excepted) they refuſed to take pay; and called thoſe Mercinaries, that did accept it, when their countrie was in ſo great want.

The twelue hundred Talents, wrongfully extorted from the Carthaginians; nor any iniuries following, done by the Romans in the height of their pride; yeelded halfe ſo much commoditie, as might bee laied in ballance againſt theſe miſeries, whereinto their Eſtate was now reduced. Neuertheleſſe, if wee conſider things aright; the calamities of this Warre did rather enable Rome to deale with thoſe Enemies, whom ſhee forth-with vnder-tooke, than abate or ſlacken the growth of that large Dominion, whereto ſhee attained, ere the youngeſt of thoſe men was dead, whoſe names wee haue alreadie mentioned. For by this hammering, the Roman mettall grew more hard and ſolide: and by paring the branches of priuate fortunes, the Roote and Heart of the Common-wealth was corroborated. So grew the Cittie of Athens; when Xerxes had burnt the Towne to aſhes, and taken from euery particular Citizen all hope of other felicitie, than that which reſted in the common happineſſe of the vniuerſalitie. Certaine it is, (as Sir Francis Bacon hath iudiciouſly obſerued) That a State, whoſe dimenſion or ſtemme is ſmall, may aptly ſerue to be foundation of a great Monarchie: which chiefly comes to paſſe, where all regard of domeſticall proſperitie is laid aſide; and euery mans care addreſſed to the benefit of his countrie. Hereof I might ſay, that our Age hath ſeene a great example, in the vnited Prouinces in the Netherlands; whoſe preſent riches and ſtrength grew chiefly from that ill aſſurance, which each of their Townes, or almoſt of their Families, perceiued it ſelfe to hold, whileſt the Generalitie was oppreſſed by the Duke of Alua; were it ſo, that the people had thereby growne as warlike, as by extreme induſtrie, and ſtraining themſelues to fill their publike Treaſurie, they are all growne wealthie, ſtrong at Sea, and able to wage great Armies for their ſeruices by Land. Wherefore if wee valew at ſuch a rate as wee ought, the patient Reſolution, conformitie to good Order, obedience to Magiſtrates, with many other Vertues, and, aboue all other, the great loue of the Common-weale, which was found in Rome in theſe dangerous times: we may truly ſay, That the Cittie was neuer in greater likelihood to proſper. Neither can it be deemed otherwiſe, than that if the ſame affections of the people had laſted, when their Empire, being growne more large and beautifull, ſhould in all reaſon haue been more deare vnto them, if the riches and delicacies of Aſia had not infected them with ſenſualitie, and carried their appetites mainly to thoſe pleaſures, wherein they thought their well-being to conſiſt; if all the Citizens, and Subiects of Rome could haue beleeued their owne intereſt to be as great, in thoſe wars which theſe latter Emperours made for their defence, as in theſe which were managed by the Conſuls: the Empire, founded vpon ſo great vertue, could not haue beene throwne downe by the hands of rude Barbarians, were they neuer ſo many. But vnto all Dominions God hath ſet their periods: Who, though hee hath giuen vnto Man the knowledge of thoſe waies, by which Kingdomes riſe and fall; yet hath left him ſubiect vnto the affections, which draw on theſe fatall changes, in their times appointed.

The Romans win ſome Townes back from HANNIBAL. HANNIBAL winnes Tarentum. The ſiege of Capua. Two victories of HANNIBAL. The iournie of HANNIBAL to the gates of Rome. Capua taken by the Romans.

AS the People of Rome ſtrained themſelues to the vtmoſt, for maintaining the warre: ſo their Generals abroad omitted no part of induſtrie, in ſeeking to recouer what had beene loſt. The Towne of Caſiline Fabius beſieged. It was well defended by the Carthaginian Garriſon; and likely to haue beene relieued by thoſe of Capua, if Marcellus from Nola had not come to the aſſiſtance of his Colleague. Neuertheleſſe the place held out ſo obſtinately, that Fabius was purpoſed to giue it ouer: ſaying, that the enterpriſe was not great; yet as difficult, as a thing of more importance. But Marcellus was of a contrarie opinion. He ſaid, That many ſuch things, as were not at firſt to haue been vnder-taken by great Commanders, ought yet, when once they were taken in hand, to bee proſequuted vnto the beſt effect. So the ſiege held on: and the Towne was preſſed ſo hard, that the Campans dwelling therein grew fearefull, and craued parlee; offering to giue it vp, ſo as all might haue leaue to depart in ſafetie, whither they pleaſed. Whileſt they were thus treating of conditions: or whileſt they were iſſuing foorth, according to the compoſition alreadie made; (for it is diuerſly reported) Marcellus, ſeizing vpon a Gate, entred with his Armie, and put all to ſword that came in their way. Fiftie of thoſe that were firſt gotten out, ranne to Fabius the Conſul: who ſaued them, and ſent them to Capua in ſafety; all the reſt were either ſlaine, or made priſoners. If Fabius deſerued commendations, by holding his word good vnto theſe fiftie; I know not how the ſlaughter of the reſt, or impriſonment afterward of ſuch, as ſcaped the heat of execution, could bee excuſed by Marcellus. It may be that he helped himſelfe, after the Roman faſhion, with ſome æquiuocation, but he ſhall pay for it hereafter. In like ſort was Mount Marſam in Gaſcoigne taken by the Marſhall Monluc, when I was a young man in France. For whileſt he entertained parlee about compoſition; the beſieged ranne all from their ſeuerall guards, vpon haſtie deſire of being acquainted with the conditions propoſed. The Marſhall therefore diſcouering a part of the walls vnguarded, entred by Scalado; and put all ſaue the Gouernour vnto the ſword. Herein that Gouernour of Mount Marſam committed two groſſe errours; the one, in that hee gaue no order for the Captaines and Companies, to hold themſelues in their places; the other, in that hee was content to parlee, without pledges for aſſurance giuen and receiued. Some ſuch ouer-ſight, the Gouernour of Caſiline ſeemeth to haue committed; yet neither the aduantage taken by Marcellus, or by Monluc, was very honourable. When this Worke was ended, many ſmall Townes of the Samnites, and ſome of the Lucans and Apulians, were recouered: wherein were taken, or slaine, about fiue and twentie thousand of the Enemies; and the Countrie grieuously wasted by Fabius, Marcellus lying sicke at Nola.

Hannibal in the meane while was about Tarentum; waiting to heare from those, that had promised to giue vp the Towne. But M.Valerius, the Roman Propretor, had thrust so many men into it, that the Traitors durst not stirre. Wherefore the Carthaginian was faine to depart; hauing wearied himselfe in vaine with expectation. Yet he wasted not the Countrie; but contented himselfe with hope, that they would please him better in time following. So he departed thence toward Salapia: which he chose for his wintring place; and beganne to victuall it, when Summer was but halfe past. It is said, that he was in loue with a yong Wench in that towne: in which regard if he beganne his Winter more timely, than otherwise neede required, He did not like the Romans; whom necessitie enforced, to make their Summer last as long, as they were able to trauell vp and downe the Countrie.

About this time beganne great troubles in Sicil; whither Marcellus the Consull was sent, to take such order for the Prouince, as neede should require. Of the doings there, which wore out more time than his Consulship, we will speake hereafter.

The new Consuls, chosen at Rome, were Q.Fabius the sonne of the present Consul, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time. The Romans found it needfull for the publike seruice, to imploy often-times their best able men: and therefore made it lawfull, during the war, to recontinue their Officers, and choose such, as had lately held their places before; without regarding any distance of time, which was otherwise required. The old Fabius became Lieutenant vnto his sonne: which was perhaps the respect, that most commended his sonne vnto the place. It is noted, That when the old man came into the campe, and his sonne rode forth to meete him: eleuen of the twelue Lictors, which carried each an axe with a bundle of rods before the Consull, suffered him, in regard of due reuerence, to passe by them on horse-backe; which was against the custome. But the sonne perceiuing this, commanded the last of his Lictors to note it: who thereupon bade the old Fabius alight, and come to the Consul on his feete. The father chearefully did so; saying, It was my minde, sonne, to make triall, whether thou diddest vnderstand thy selfe to bee Consul. Cassius Altinius a wealthie Citizen of Arpi, who, after the battell at Canna, had holpen the Carthaginian into that Towne, seeing now the fortune of the Romans to amend; came priuily to this Consul Fabius, and offered to render it back vnto him, if he might bee therefore well rewarded. The Consull purposed to follow old examples: and to make this Altinius a patterne to all Traitors; vsing him, as Camillus and Fabricius had done those, that offered their vnfaithful seruice against the Falisci, and King Pyrrhus. But Q.Fabius the father, was of another opinion: and said, it was a matter of dangerous consequence, That it should be thought more safe to reuolt from the Romans, than to turne vnto them. Wherefore it was concluded, that hee should be sent to the Towne of Cales, and there kept as prisoner; vntill they could better resolue, what to doe with him, or what vse to make of him. Hannibal, vnderstanding that Altinius was gone, and among the Romans, tooke it not sorrowfully; but thought this a good occasion, to seize vpon all the mans riches, which were great. Yet, that he might seeme rather seuere, than couetous, He sent for the wife and children of Altinius into his campe: where hauing examined them by torment, partly concerning the departure and intentions of this fugitiue, partly, and more strictly, about his riches, what they were, and where they lay, He condemned them, as partakers of the Treason, to be burnt aliue; and tooke all their goods vnto himselfe. Fabius the Consul shortly after came to Arpi: which he wanne by Scalado, in a stormie and rainie night. Fiue thousand of Hannibals Souldiers lay in the Towne; and of the Arpines themselues, there were about three thousand. These were thrust formost by the Carthaginian Garrison; when it was vnderstood, that the Romans had gotten ouer the wall, and broken open a Gate. For the souldiers held the townsmen

ſuſpected; and therefore thought it no wiſedome, to truſt them at their backs. But after ſome little reſiſtance, the Arpines gaue ouer fight, and entertained parlee with the Romans: proteſting, that they had beene betraied by their Princes; and were become ſubject to the Carthaginians, againſt their wills. In proceſſe of this diſcourſe, the Arpine Pretor went vnto the Roman Conſul: and receiuing his faith for ſecurity of the Towne, preſently made head againſt the Garriſon. This notwithſtanding; like it is, that Hannibals men continued to make good reſiſtance. For when almoſt a thouſand of them, that were Spaniards, offered to leaue their companions, and ſerue on the Roman ſide; it was yet couenanted, That the Carthaginians ſhould be ſuffered to paſſe forth quietly, and returne to Hannibal. This was performed: and ſo Arpi became Roman againe; with little other loſſe, than of him that had betraied it. About the ſame time, Cliternum was taken by Sempronius Tuditanus, one of the Pretors: and vnto Cneius Fuluius, another of the Pretors, an hundred and twelue Gentlemen of Capua offered their ſeruice; vpon no other condition, than to haue their goods reſtored vnto them, when their Citie ſhould bee recouered by the Romans. This was a thing of ſmall importance: but conſidering the generall hatred of the Campans toward Rome, it ſerued to diſcouer the inclination of the Italians in thoſe times; and how their affections recoiled from Hannibal, when there was no appearance of thoſe mighty ſuccours, that had beene promiſed from Carthage. The Conſentines alſo, and the Thurines, people of the Brutians, that had yeelded themſelues to Hannibal; returned againe to their old allegeance. Others would haue followed their example, but that one L. Pomponius, who of a Publican had made himſelf a Captaine, and gotten reputation by ſome pettie exploits in forraging the country, was ſlaine by Hanno, with a great multitude of thoſe that followed him. Hannibal in the meane while had all his care bent vpon Tarentum; which if he could take, it ſeemed that it would ſtand him in good ſtead, for drawing ouer that helpe out of Macedon, which his Carthaginians failed to ſend. Long he waited, ere he could bring his deſire to paſſe: and being loth to hazard his forces, where he hoped to preuaile by intelligence; He contented himſelfe, with taking in ſome poore Townes of the Salentines. At length, his Agents within Tarentum found meanes to accompliſh their purpoſe, and his wiſh. One Phileas, that was of their conſpiracie, who lay at Rome as Embaſſador, practiſing with the Hoſtages of the Tarentines, & ſuch as had the keeping of them, conueighed them by night out of the Citie. But hee and his companie were the next day ſo cloſely purſued, that all of them were taken, and brought back to Rome; where they ſuffered death, as Traitors. By reaſon of this crueltie, or ſeueritie, the people of Tarentum grew to hate the Romans, more generally and earneſtly than before. As for the Conſpirators, they followed their buſineſſe the more diligently; as knowing what reward they were to expect, if their intention ſhould happen to be diſcouered. Wherefore they ſent againe to Hannibal: and acquainting him with the manner of their plot, made the ſame compoſition with him for the Tarentines, which they of Capua had made before. Nico and Philomenes, two the chiefe among them, vſed much to goe forth of the Towne on hunting by night; as if they durſt not take their pleaſure by day, for feare of the Carthaginians. Seldome or neuer they miſſed of their game: for the Carthaginians prepared it readie for their hands, that they might not ſeeme to haue been abroad vpon other occaſion. From the campe of Hannibal, it was about three daies journie to Tarentum, if hee ſhould haue marched thither with his whole Armie. This cauſed his long abode in one place the leſſe to be ſuſpected: as alſo to make his Enemies the more ſecure, He cauſed it to be giuen out, that he was ſick. But when the Romans within Tarentum, were growne careleſſe of ſuch his neighbourhood, and the Conſpirators had ſet their buſineſſe in order; He tooke with him ten thouſand the moſt expedite of his horſe and foot; and long before breake of day, made all ſpeede thitherward. Foureſcore light horſe of the Numidians ranne a great way before him, beating all the waies, and killing any that they met, for feare leſt he, and his troupe following him, ſhould be diſcouered.

couered. It had beene often the manner of some few Numidian horse, to doe the like in former times. Wherefore the Roman Gouernour, when hee heard tell in the euening, that some Numidians were abroad in the fields, tooke it for a signe, that Hannibal was not as yet dislodged; and gaue order, that some companies should be sent out the next morning, to strip them of their bootie, and send them gone. But when it grew darke night; Hannibal, guided by Philomenes, came close to the towne: where, according to the tokens agreed vpon, making a light to shew his arriuall; Nico, that was within the Towne, answered him with another light, in signe that he was readie. Presently Nico beganne to set vpon one of the Gates, and to kill the watchmen. Philomenes went toward another gate: and whistling (as was his manner) called vp the Porter; bidding him make haste, for that hee had killed a great Bore, so heauie, that scarce two men could stand vnder it. So the Porter opened the wicket: and forthwith entred two yong men, loaden with the Bore; which Hannibal had prepared large enough, to bee worthie the looking on. While the Porter stood wondring at the largenesse of the beast, Philomenes ran him through with his Bore-speare: and letting in some thirtie armed men, fell vpon all the watch; whom when he had slaine, he entred the great gate. So the Armie of Hannibal, entring Tarentum at two gates, went directly toward the Market-place; where both parts met. Thence they were distributed by their Generall, and sent into all quarters of the Citie, with Tarentines to be their guides. They were commanded to kill all the Romans; and not to hurt the Citizens. For better performance hereof Hannibal willed the Conspirators, that when any of their friends appeared in sight, they should bid him be quiet, and of good cheare. All the Towne was in an vprore: but few could tell what the matter meant. A Roman trumpet was vnskilfully sounded by a Greeke in the Theater: which helped the suspition, both of the Tarentines, that the Romans were about to spoile the Towne; and of the Romans, that the Citizens were in commotion. The Gouernour fled into the Port: and taking boat, got into the Citadell, that stood in the mouth of the Hauen; whence hee might easily perceiue the next morning, how all had passed. Hannibal, assembling the Tarentines, gaue them to vnderstand, what good affection hee bore them; inueighed bitterly against the Romans, as tyrannous oppressors; and spake what else he thought fit for the present. This done: and hauing gotten such spoile as was to bee had of the Souldiers goods in the Towne, He addressed himselfe against the Citadell; hoping that if the Garrison would sallie out, he might giue them such a blow, as should make them vnable to defend the Peece. According to his expectation it partly fel out. For when hee beganne to make his approches, the Romans in a brauerie sallying forth, gaue charge vpon his men: who fell back of purpose according to direction, till they had drawne on as many as they could, and so farre from their strength, as they durst aduenture. Then gaue Hannibal a signe to his Carthaginians, who lay prepared readie for the purpose: and fiercely setting vpon the Enemie, draue him back with great slaughter, as fast as he could runne; so that afterwards he durst not issue forth. The Citadell stood vpon a Demi-Iland, that was plaine ground; and fortified only with a ditch and wall against the Towne, whereunto it vvas joyned by a cawsey. This cawsey Hannibal intended to fortifie in like sort against the Citadell; to the end that the Tarentines might bee able, without his helpe, to keepe themselues from all danger thence. His worke in few daies went so well forward, without impediment from the besieged, that he conceiued hope of winning the Peece it selfe, by taking a little more paines. Wherefore he made readie all sorts of engines, to force the place. But whilest he was busied in his works, there came by Sea a strong supply from Metapontum: which tooke away all hope of preuailing; and made him returne to his former counsaile. Now forasmuch as the Tarentine fleet lay within the Hauen, and could not passe forth, vvhilest the Romans held the Citadell: it seemed likely, that the Towne would suffer want, being debarred of accustomed trade and prouisions by Sea; whilest the Roman Garrison, by helpe of their shipping, might easily be relieued, lieued, and enabled to hold out. Against this inconuenience, it was rather wished by the Tarentines, than any way hoped, that their fleet could get out of the Hauen; to guard the mouth of it, and cut off al supply from the Enemy. Hannibal told them, that this might well be done: for that their Towne standing in plaine ground, and their streets being faire and broad, it would bee no hard matter to draw the Gallies ouer Land, and launch them into the Sea without. This he vndertooke and effected: whereby the Roman Garrison was reduced into great necessitie; though with much patience it held out, and found Hannibal often-times otherwise busied, than his affaires required.

Thus with mutuall losse on both sides, the time passed: and the Roman forces, growing daily stronger, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, with Appius Claudius, lately chosen Consuls, prepared to besiege the great Citie of Capua. Three and twenty Legions the Romans had now armed. This was a great and hastie growth from that want of men, and of all necessaries, whereinto the losse at Canne had reduced them. But to fill vp these Legions, they were faine to take vp yong Boyes, that were vnder seuenteene yeeres of age: and to send Commissioners aboue fiftie miles round, for the seeking out of such Lads as might appeare seruiceable, & pressing them to the warres; making yet a Law, That their yeares of seruice, whereinto they were bound by order of the Citie, should be reckoned, for their benefit, from this their beginning so yong, as if they had beene of lawfull age. Before the Roman Armie drew neere, the Campans felt great want of victuailes, as if they had alreadie beene besieged. This happened partly by sloth of the Nation, partly by the great waste and spoile, which the Romans had in foregoing yeeres made vpon their grounds. They sent therefore Embassadours to Hannibal; desiring him to succour them ere they were closed vp, as they feared to bee shortly. Hee gaue them comfortable words: and sent Hanno with an Armie to supply their wants. Hanno appointed them a day; against which they should be readie with all manner of carriages, to store themselues with victuailes, that he would prouide. Neither did he promise more, than he performed. For hee caused great quantitie of graine, that had beene laied vp in Cities round about, to be brought into his campe, three miles from Beneuentum. Thither at the time appointed came no more than fortie Carts or Wagons, with a few packhorses; as if this had beene enough to victuaile Capua. Such was the rechlesnesse of the Campans. Hanno was exceeding angrie hereat: and told them they were worse than very beasts; since hunger could not teach them to haue greater care. Wherefore hee gaue them a longer day; against which hee made prouision to store them throughly. Of all these doings word was sent to the Roman Consuls, from the Citizens of Beneuentum. Therefore Q. Fulvius the Consul, taking with him such strength as hee thought needfull for the seruice, came into Beneventum by night; where with diligence hee made inquirie into the behauiour of the Enemie. He learned, that Hanno with part of his Armie was gone abroad to make prouisions; that some two thousand Wagons, with a great rabble of Carters and other Varlets, lay among the Carthaginians in their campe; so that little good order was kept: all thought being set vpon a great Harueſt. Hereupon the Consul bade his men prepare themselues, to assaile the Enemies campe: and leauing all his impediments within Beneventum, He marched thitherward so early in the morning, that hee was there with the first breake of day. By comming so vnexpected, Hee had well-neere forced the campe on the sudden. But it was very strong, and very well defended: so that the longer the fight continued, the lesse desire had Fulvius to loose more of his men in the attempt; seeing many of them cast away, and yet little hope of doing good. Therefore he said, that it were better to goe more leisurely and substantially to worke; to send for his fellow-Consul with the rest of their Armie; and to lie betweene Hanno and home; that neither the Campans should depart thence, nor the Carthaginian be able to relieue them. Being thus discoursing, and about to sound the retrait; hee saw, that some of his men had gotten ouer the Enemies Rampart.

There

There was great bootie; or (which was all one to the ſouldier) an opinion of much that might be gotten in that campe. Wherefore ſome Enſigne-bearers threw their Enſignes ouer the Rampart, willing their men to fetch them out, vnleſſe they would endure the ſhame and diſhonour following ſuch a loſſe. Feare of ſuch ignominie, than which none could bee greater, made the Souldiers aduenture ſo deſperately; that Fuluius, perceiuing the heat of his men, changed purpoſe, and encouraged thoſe that were ſomewhat backward, to follow the example of them, that had alreadie gotten ouer the Trenches. Thus the campe was wonne: in which were ſlaine aboue ſixe thouſand; and taken, aboue ſeuen thouſand, beſides all the ſtore of victuailes, and carriages, with abundance of bootie, that Hanno had lately gotten from the Roman Confederates. This miſaduenture, and the neerer approch of both the Conſuls, made them of Capua ſend a pittifull Embaſſage to Hannibal: putting him in minde of all the loue, that he was wont to proteſt vnto their Citie; and how he had made ſhew, to affect it no leſſe than Carthage. But now, they ſaid, it would be loſt, as Arpi was lately, if he gaue not ſtrong and ſpeedie ſuccour. Hannibal anſwered with comfortable words: and ſent away two thouſand horſe, to keepe their grounds from ſpoile; whileſt hee himſelfe was detained about Tarentum, partly by hope of winning the citadell, partly by the diſpoſition, which he ſaw in many townes adjoyning, to yeeld vnto him. Among the Hoſtages of the Tarentines, that lately had fled out of Rome, and being ouer-taken, ſuffered death for their attempt; were ſome of the Metapontines, and other Cities of the Greekes, inhabiting that Eaſterne part of Italie, which was called of old Magna Graecia. Theſe people tooke to heart the death of their Hoſtages; and thought the puniſhment greater, than the offence. Wherefore the Metapontines, as ſoone as the Roman Garriſon was taken from them, to defend the citadell of Tarentum, made no more adoe, but opened their gates to Hannibal. The Thurines would haue done the like, vpon the like reaſon: had not ſome companies laine in their Towne; which they feared that they ſhould not bee able to maſter. Neuertheleſſe they helped themſelues by cunning: inuiting to their gates Hanno and Mago, that were neere at hand: againſt whom whileſt they proffered their ſeruice to Atinius, the Roman captaine, they drew him forth to fight; and recoyling from him, cloſed vp their gates. A little formalitie they vſed in pretending feare, leſt the Enemie ſhould breake in together with the Romans; in ſauing Atinius himſelfe, and ſending him away by Sea; as alſo in conſulting a ſmall while (becauſe perhaps many of their chiefe men were vnacquainted with the practice) whether they ſhould yeeld to the Carthaginian, or no. But this diſputation laſted not long: for they that had remoued the chiefe impediment, eaſily preuailed in the reſt; and deliuered vp the Towne to Hanno and Mago. This good ſucceſſe, and hope of the like, detained Hannibal in thoſe quarters; whileſt the Conſuls, fortifying Beneventum to ſecure their backs, addreſſed themſelues vnto the ſiege of Capua.

Many diſaſters befell the Romans, in the beginning of this great enterpriſe. T. Sempronius Gracchus, a very good man of warre, that had of late beene twice Conſul, was ſlaine either by trecherie of ſome Lucans, that drew him into ambuſh; or by ſome Carthaginian ſtragglers, among whom he fell vnawares. His bodie, or his head, was very honourably interred, either by Hannibal himſelfe, or (for the reports agree not) by the Romans; to whom Hannibal ſent it. He was appointed to lie in Beneventum, there to ſecure the back of the Armie that ſhould beſiege Capua. But his death happned in an ill time; to the great hindrance of that buſineſſe. The Volones, or Slaues lately manumiſed, forſooke their Enſignes, and went euery one whither hee thought good, as if they had been diſcharged by the deceaſe of their Leader; ſo that it asked ſome labour to ſeeke them out, and bring them back into their campe. Neuertheleſſe the Conſuls went forward with their worke: and drawing neere to Capua, did all acts of hoſtilitie which they could. Mago the Carthaginian, and the Citizens of Capua, gaue them an hard welcome; wherein aboue fifteene hundred Romans were loſt. Neither was it long, ere Hannibal came thither: who fought with the Conſuls, and had the better; inſomuch that hee cauſed them to diſlodge. They remoued by night, and went ſeuerall waies: Fuluius toward Cumæ; Claudius, into Lucania. Hannibal followed after Claudius: who hauing led him a great walke, fetcht a compaſſe about, and returned to Capua. It ſo fell out, that one M. Centenius Penula a ſtout man, and one that with good commendations had diſcharged the place of a Centurion, lay with an Armie not farre from thence, where Hannibal reſted, when hee was wearie of hunting after Claudius. This Penula had made great vants to the Roman Senate, of wonders which he would worke, if he might be truſted with the leading of fiue thouſand men. The Fathers were vnwilling in ſuch a time, to reject the vertue of any good Souldier; how meane ſo euer his condition were. Wherfore they gaue him the charge of eight thouſand: and he himſelfe, being a proper man, and talking brauely, gathered vp ſo many voluntaries, as almoſt doubled his number. But meeting thus with Hannibal, he gaue proofe of the difference, betweene a ſtout Centurion, and one able to command in chiefe. Hee and his fellowes were all (in a manner) ſlaine; ſcarce a thouſand of them eſcaping. Soone after this Hannibal had word, that Cn. Fuluius, a Roman Pretor, with eighteene thouſand men, was in Apulia, very careleſſe, and a man inſufficient for the charge which he held. Thither he therefore haſted, to viſit him: hoping to deale the better with the maine ſtrength of Rome, which pointed at Capua, when he ſhould haue cut off thoſe forces, that lay in the Prouinces about, vnder men of ſmall abilitie. Comming vpon Fuluius, He found him and his men ſo jollie, that needs they would haue fought the firſt night. Wherefore it was not to be doubted, what would happen the day following. So hee beſtowed Mago with three thouſand of his lighteſt armed, in places thereabout moſt fit for ambuſh. Then offering battaile to Fuluius, Hee ſoone had him in the trap: whence he made him glad to eſcape aliue; leauing all, ſaue two thouſand of his followers, dead behinde him.

Theſe two great blowes, receiued one preſently after the other, much aſtoniſhed the Romans. Neuertheleſſe all care was taken, to gather vp the ſmall reliques of the broken Armies: and that the Conſuls ſhould goe ſubſtantially forwards with the ſiege of Capua; which was of great conſequence, both in matter of reputation, and in many other reſpects. The two Conſuls ſate downe before the towne: and C. Claudius Nero, one of the Pretors, came with his Armie from Sueſſula to their aſſiſtance. They made Proclamation, That whoſoeuer would iſſue forth of Capua before a certaine day prefixed, ſhould haue his pardon, and bee ſuffered to enjoy all that vnto him belonged: which day being paſt, there ſhould be no grace expected. This offer was contumeliouſly rejected; the Capuans relying on their owne ſtrength, and the ſuccors attended from Hannibal. Before the Citie was cloſed vp, they ſent Meſſengers to the Carthaginian; which found him at Brunduſium. He had made a long journie, in hope of gaining the Tarentine citadell: of which expectation failing, he turned to Brunduſium; vpon aduertiſement that he ſhould be let in. There the Capuans met him; told him of their danger with earneſt words; and were with wordes as braue recomforted. He bade them conſider, how a few daies ſince he had chaſed the Conſuls out of their fields; and told them, that he would preſently come thither againe, and ſend the Romans going, as faſt as before. With this good anſwere the Meſſengers returned: and hardly could get back into the citie; which the Romans had almoſt entrenched round. As for Hannibal himſelfe; He was of opinion, that Capua, being very well manned, and heartily deuoted vnto his friendſhip, would hold out a long time: and thereby giue him leiſure, to doe what he thought requiſite among the Tarentines, and in thoſe Eaſterne parts of Italie; whilſt the Roman armie ſpent it ſelfe in a tedious ſiege. Thus he lingred: and thereby gaue the Conſuls time, both to fortifie themſelues at Capua, and to diſpatch the election of new Magiſtrates in Rome; whileſt he himſelfe purſued hopes, that neuer found ſucceſſe.

Claudius and Fuluius, when their terme of Office was expired, were appointed to continue the ſiege at Capua; retaining the ſame Armies, as Proconſuls. The townes-

men often ſallied out: rather in a brauerie, than likelihood to worke any matter of effect; the Enemie lying cloſe within his Trenches, as intending, without other violence, to ſubdue them by famine. Yet againſt the Campan horſe (for their foot was eaſily beaten) the Romans vſed to thruſt out ſome troups, that ſhould hold them skirmiſh. In theſe exerciſes the Campans vſually had the better, to the great griefe of their proud Enemie; who ſcorned to take foile at the hands of ſuch Rebels. It was therefore deuiſed, that ſome actiue and couragious yong men, ſhould learne to ride behinde the Roman men at armes; leaping vp, and againe diſmounting lightly, as occaſion ſerued. Theſe were furniſhed like the Velites, hauing each of them three or foure ſmall darts: which, alighting in time of conflict, they diſcharged thick vpon the Enemies horſe; whom vanquiſhing in this kinde of ſeruice, they much diſheartned in the maine. The time thus paſſing, and famine daily increaſing within the Citie; Hannibal came at length, not expected by the Romans: and taking a Fort of theirs, called Galatia, fell vpon their campe. At the ſame time the Capuans iſſued with their whole power, in as terrible manner as they could deuiſe: ſetting all their multitude of vnſeruiceable people on the walls; which, with a loud noiſe of Pannes and Baſons, troubled thoſe that were occupied in fight. Appius Claudius oppoſing himſelfe to the Campans, eaſily defended his Trenches againſt them; and ſo well repreſſed them, that he draue them at length back into their Citie. Neuertheleſſe, in purſuing them to their gates. He receiued a wound, that accompanied him in ſhort ſpace after to his graue. Q. Fuluius was held harder to his taske, by Hannibal and the Carthaginian Armie. The Roman campe was euen at point to haue beene loſt: and Hannibal his Elephants, of which he brought with him three and thirtie, were either gotten within the rampart, or elſe (for the report varies) being ſome of them ſlaine vpon it, fell into the ditch; and filled it vp in ſuch ſort, that their bodies ſerued as a bridge vnto the Aſſailants. It is ſaid, that Hannibal in this tumult cauſed ſome fugitiues, that could ſpeake Latine well, to proclaime aloud, as it were in the Conſuls name, That euery one of the Souldiers ſhould ſhift for himſelfe, and flie betimes vnto the next Hils, foraſmuch as the campe was alreadie loſt. But all would not ſerue. The fraud was detected: and the Armie, hauing ſitten there ſo long, had at good leiſure ſtrongly entrenched it ſelfe; ſo as little hope there was to raiſe the ſiege by force.

This did extremely perplexe the Carthaginian. The purchaſe of Capua had (as was thought) with-held him from taking Rome it ſelfe: and now his deſire of winning the Tarentine Citadell, had well-neere loſt Capua; in reſpect of which, neither the Citadell, nor Citie of Tarentum, were to haue beene much regarded. Falling therefore into a deſperate anger with himſelfe and his hard fortune, that of ſo many great victories he had made no greater vſe: on the ſudden he entertained an haughtie reſolution, euen to ſet vpon Rome; and carrie to the walles of that proud Citie, the danger of warre that threatned Capua. This hee thought would bee a meane, to draw the Roman Generals, or one of them at leaſt, vnto the defence of their owne home. If they roſe from the ſiege with their whole Armie; then had he his deſire: If they diuided their forces; then was it likely, that either he, or the Campans, ſhould well enough deale with them apart. Neither did hee deſpaire, that the terror of his comming might ſo aſtoniſh the multitude within Rome, as he might enter ſome part or other of the Citie. His onely feare was, leſt the Campans, being ignorant of his purpoſe, ſhould thinke he had forſaken them; and thereupon forthwith yeeld themſelues to the Enemie. To preuent this danger, He ſent letters to Capua by a ſubtile Numidian: who running as a fugitiue into the Roman campe, conueighed himſelfe thence ouer the innermoſt Trenches into the Citie. The journie to Rome, was to be performed with great celeritie: no ſmall hope of good ſucceſſe, reſting in the ſuddenneſſe of his arriuall there. Wherefore hee cauſed his men, to haue in a readineſſe ten daies victuailes; and prepared as many boats, as might in one night tranſport his Armie ouer the Riuer of Vulturnus. This could not be done ſo cloſely, but that

That the Roman Generalls by some fugitiues had notice of his purpose. With this danger therefore they acquainted the Senate which was there with affected, according to the diuersitie of mens opinions, in a case of such importance. Some gaue counsaile to let alone Capua, yea and al places else, rather then to put the Towne of Rome into perill of being taken by the Enemie. Others were so farre from allowing of this, as they wondered how any man could thinke, that Hannibal, being vnable to relieue Capua, should iudge himselfe strong enough to winne Rome; and therefore stoutly said, That, those Legions, which were kept at home for defence of the Citie, would serue the turne well enough, to keepe him out, and send him thence; if he were so vnwise, as to come thither. But it was finally concluded, that letters should be sent to Fuluius and Claudius, acquainting them perfectly with the forces, that at the present were in Rome: who, since they knew best, what the strength was which Hannibal could bring along with him, were best able to iudge, what was needfull to oppose him. So it was referred vnto the discretion of these Generals at Capua, to doe as they thought behouefull: and if it might conueniently be, neither to raise their siege, nor yet to put the Citie of Rome into much aduenture. According to this Decree of the Senate, Q. Fuluius tooke fifteene thousand foot, and a thousand horse, the choise of his whole Armie: with which he hasted toward Rome; leauing App. Claudius, who could not trauel by reason of his wound, to continue the siege at Capua.

Hannibal, hauing passed ouer Vulturnus, burnt vp all his boats; and left nothing that might serue to transport the Enemie, in case he should offer to pursue or coast him. Then hasted he away toward Rome; staying no longer in any one place, then he needes must. Yet found he the bridges ouer Liris broken downe, by the people of Fregellæ: which as it stopped him a little on his way; so it made him the more grieuously to spoile their lands, whiles the bridges were in mending. The neerer that he drew to Rome, the greater waste he made: his Numidians running before him; driuing the Countrie, and killing or taking multitudes of all sorts and ages, that fled out of all parts round about. The messengers of these newes came apace, one after another into the Citie; some few bringing true aduertisements; but the most of them reporting the conceits of their owne feare. All the streets, and Temples in Rome, were pestered with women, crying and praying, and rubbing the Altars with their haire, because they could doe none other good. The Senators were all in the great Market, or place of Assembly; readie to giue their aduice, if it were asked, or to take directions giuen by the Magistrates. All places of most importance were stuffed with souldiers: it being vncertaine, vpon which part Hannibal would fall. In the middest of this trepidation, there came newes that Q. Fuluius, with part of the Armie from Capua, was hasting to defence of the Citie. The Office of a Proconsul did expire, at his returne home, and entrie into the Gates of Rome. Wherefore, that Fuluius might lose nothing by comming into the Citie in time of such need, an Act was passed, That he should haue equall power with the Consuls, during his abode there. Hee and Hannibal arriued at Rome, one soone after another: Fuluius hauing beene long held occupied in passing ouer Vulturnus; and Hannibal receiuing impediment in his iourney, as much as the Countrie was able to giue. The Consuls, and Fuluius, incamped without the Gates of Rome; attending the Carthaginian. Thither they called the Senate: and as the danger grew neerer and greater; so tooke they more carefull and especiall order against all occurrences. Hannibal came to the Riuer Anio or Anien, three miles from the Towne; whence he aduanced with two thousand Horse, and rode along a great way vnder the wals; viewing the site thereof, and considering how he might best approach it. But he either went, or (as the Roman Storie saith) was driuen away; without doing, or receiuing any hurt. Many tumults rose in this while among the people; but were supprest by [illegible] and diligence of the Senators. Aboue the rest one accident was both trouble[illegible]me, and not without perill. Of Numidians that had shifted side, and fallen (vpon ſome diſpleaſures) from Hannibal to the Romans, there were ſome twelue hundred then in Rome, which were appointed by the Conſuls, to paſſe through the Towne, from the Mount Auentine to the Gate Collina, where it was thought that their ſeruice might be vſefull, among broken wayes, and Garden wals lying in the ſuburbes. The faces of theſe men, and their furniture, wherein they differed not from the followers of Hannibal, bred ſuch miſtaking, as cauſed a great vproare among the people: all crying out, that Auentine was taken, and the enemie gotten within the wals. The noiſe was ſuch, that men could not be informed of the truth: and the ſtreets were ſo full of eattaile, and huſbandmen, which were fledde thither out of the Villages adioyning, that the paſſage was ſtopt vp: and the poore Numidians pittifully beaten from the houſe-toppes, with ſtones and other weapons that came next to hand, by the deſperate multitude, that would haue run out at the gates, had it not beene certaine who lay vnder the walls. To remedie the like inconueniences, it was ordained, That all which had beene Dictators, Conſuls, or Cenſors, ſhould haue authoritie as Magiſtrates, till the Enemie departed. The day following, Hannibal paſſed ouer Anien, and preſented battaile to the Romans, who did not wiſely if they vndertooke it. It is ſaid, that a terrible ſhowre of raine, cauſed both Romans & Carthaginians to returne into their ſeuerall Camps: and that this happened two daies together, the weather breaking vp, and clearing, as ſoone as they were departed aſunder. Certaine it is, that Hannibal, who had brought along with him no more then ten daies prouiſion, could not endure to ſtay there, vntill his victuals were all ſpent. In which regard, the Romans, if they ſuffered him to waſte his time and prouiſions, knowing that hee could not abide there long, did as became well-aduiſed men: if they offered to fight with him, and either had the better, or were parted (as is ſaid) by ſome accident of weather; the commendations muſt be giuen to their fortune. The terrour of Hannibals comming to the Citie, how great ſoeuer it was at the firſt, yet after ſome leiſure, and better notice taken of his forces, which appeared leſſe than the firſt apprehenſion had formed them, was much and ſoone abated. Hereunto it helped well, that at the ſame time, the ſupplie appointed for Spaine, after the death of the two Scipio's, was ſent out of the towne, & went forth at one gate, whileſt the Carthaginian lay before another. In al Panick terrors, as they are called, wherof there is either no cauſe known or no cauſe anſwerable to the greatneſſe of the ſudden conſternation; it is a good remedie to doe ſomewhat quite contrarie to that which the danger would require, were it ſuch, as men haue faſhioned it in their amazed conceits. Thus did Alexander cauſe his ſouldiers to diſarme themſelues, when they were al on a ſudden in a great feare of they knew not what. And thus did Clearchus pacifie a fooliſh vprore in his Army, by proclaiming a reward vnto him, that could tel who had ſent the Aſſe into the Campe. But in this preſent example of the Romans, appeares withall a great magnanimitie: whereby they ſuſtained their reputation, and augmented it no leſſe, than by this bold attempt of Hannibal it might ſeeme to haue beene diminiſhed. Neither could they more finely haue checked the glorious conceipts of their Enemies, and taken away the diſgrace of that feare, which clouded their valour at his firſt comming; than by making ſuch demonſtrations, when once they had recouered ſpirit, how little they eſteemed him. To this purpoſe therefore that verie piece of ground, on which the Carthaginian lay incamped, was ſold in Rome: and ſold it was nothing vnder the value, but at as good a rate, as if it had been in time of peace. This indignity comming to his eare, incenſed Hannibal ſo much, that he made Port-ſale of the Siluer-ſmithes ſhops, which were neere about the Market or Common place in Rome; as if his owne title to the houſes within the Towne, were no whit worſe, then any Roman Citizens could be vnto that piece of ground, wheron he raiſed his Tent. But this counter-practice was nothing worth. The Romans did ſeek to manifeſt that aſſurance, which they iuſtly had conceiued; Hannibal, to make ſhew of continuing in an hope, which was alreadie paſt. His victuals were almoſt ſpe and of thoſe ends, that he had propoſed vnto himſelfe, this iourney had brou forth none other, than the fame of his much daring. Wherefore hee brake vp his campe: and doing what spoile he could in the Roman Territorie, without sparing religious places, wherein wealth was to bee gotten, He passed like a Tempest ouer the Countrie; and ranne toward the Easterne Sea so fast, that hee had almost taken the Citie of Rhegium before his arriuall was feared or suspected. As for Capua, hee gaue it lost: and is likely to haue cursed the whole faction of Hanno, which thus disabled him to relieue that faire Citie; since he had no other way to vent his griefe.

Q. Fuluius returning back to Capua, made Proclamation anew, that whoso would yeeld, before a certaine day, might safely doe it. This, and the very returne of Fuluius, without any more appearance of Hannibal, gaue the Capuans to vnderstand, that they were abandoned, and their case desperate. To truit the Roman pardon proclaimed, euery mans conscience of his owne euill deserts, told him, that it was a vanitie: and some faint hope was giuen, by Hanno and Bostar, Captaines of the Carthaginian Garrison within the Towne, that Hannibal should come againe; if meanes could onely be found, how to conuey such letters vnto him, as they would write. The carriage of the letters was vndertaken, by some Numidians: who running, as fugitiues, out of the Towne, into the Roman campe, waited fit opportunitie to make an escape thence with their packets. But it hapned, ere they could conueigh themselues away, that one of them was detected by an Harlot following him out of the Towne; and the letters of Bostar and Hanno were taken and opened; containing a vehement entreatie vnto Hannibal, that he would not thus forsake the Capuans and them. For (said they) we came not hither to make warre against Rhegium and Tarentum, but against the Romans: whose Legions whersoeuer they lie, there also should the Carthaginian Armie bee readie to attend them; and by taking of such course, haue wee gotten those victories at Trebia, Thrasymene, and Canna. In fine, they besought him, that he would not dishonour himself, and betray them to their enemies, by turning another way; as if it were his onely care, that the Citie should not be taken in his full view: promising, to make a desperate sally, if he would once more aduenture to set vpon the Roman campe. Such were the hopes of Bostar and his fellow. But Hannibal had alreadie done his best: and now began to faint vnder the burden of that warre, wherein (as afterward he protested) he was vanquished by Hanno and his Partisans in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. Liu. l. 30. It may well be, as a thing incident in like cases, that some of those which were besieged in Capua, had beene sent ouer by the Hannonians, to obserue the doings of Hannibal, and to check his proceedings. If this were so; iustly might they curse their owne malice, which had cast them into this remediless necessitie. Howsoeuer it were, the letters directed vnto Hannibal, fell (as is shewed) into the Roman Proconsuls hands; who cutting off the hands of all such counterfait fugitiues, as carried such messages, whipt them backe into the Towne. This miserable spectacle brake the hearts of the Campans: so that the Multitude crying out vpon the Senate, with menacing termes, caused them to assemble, and consult, about the yeelding vp of Capua vnto the Romans. The braueſt of the Senators, and such as a few yeeres since had beene most forward in joyning with Hannibal, vnderstood well enough whereunto the matter tended. Wherefore one of them inuited the rest home to supper: telling them, that when they had made good cheare, he would drink to them such an health, as should set them free from that cruel reuenge, which the Enemie sought vpon their bodies. About seuen and twentie of the Senators there were, that liking well of this motion, ended their liues together, by drinking poyson. All the rest, hoping for more mercie than they had deserued, yeelded simply to discretion. So one of the Towne-gates was set open: whereat a Roman Legion with some other companies, entring, disarmed the Citizens; apprehended the Carthaginian Garrison; and commanded all the Senators of Capua to goe forth into the Roman campe. At their comming thither, the Proconsuls laid yrons vpon them all: and commanding them to tell what store of gold and siluer they had at home, sent them into safe custodie; some to Cales; others to Theanum. Touching the generall Multitude; they were reserued vnto the discretion of the Senate: yet so hardly vsed by Fuluius in the meane while, that they had little cause of hope or comfort in this aduersitie. Ap. Claudius was brought euen to the point of death, by the wound which he had lately receiued: yet was he not inexorable to the Campans; as hauing loued them well in former times, and hauing giuen his daughter in marriage to that Pacuuius, of whom we spake before. But this facilitie of his Colleague, made Fuluius the more hastie in taking vengeance: for feare, lest vpon the like respects, the Roman Senate might proue more gentle, than he thought behouefull to the common safetie, and honour of their state. Wherefore he tooke the paines, to ride by night vnto Theanum, and from thence to Cales: where he caused all the Campan prisoners to suffer death; binding them to stakes, and scourging them first a good while with rods; after which he struck off their heads.

This terrible example of vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder, made al Townes of Italie the lesse apt to follow the vaine hope of the Campans: and bred a generall inclination, to returne vpon good conditions to the Roman side. The Atellans, Calatines, and Sabatines, people of the Campans, that in the former change had followed the fortune of Capua, made also now the like submissiõ, for very feare, and want of abilitie to resist. They were therefore vsed with the like rigour, by Fuluius: who dealt so extremely with them all, that he brought them into desperation. Wherefore some of their yong Gentlemen, burning with fire of reuenge, got into Rome: where they found meanes by night-time, to set on fire so many houses, that a great part of the Citie was like to haue been consumed. The beginning of the fire in diuers places at once, argued that it was no casualitie. Wherfore libertie was proclaimed vnto any slaue, and other sufficient reward vnto any free man, that should discouer who those Incendiaries were. Thus all came out: and the Campans, being detected by a slaue of their owne (to whom, aboue his libertie promised, was giuen about the summe of an hundred markes) had the punishment answerable to their deserts. Fuluius hereby being more and more incensed against this wretched people, held them in a manner as prisoners within their walls: and this extreme seueritie caused them at length to become Suppliants vnto the Roman Senate; that some period might be set vnto their miseries. That whereupon the Senators resolued in the end, was worse than all that which they had suffered before. Onely two poore women in Capua (of which one had beene an Harlot) were found not guiltie of the late rebellion. The rest were, some of them, with their wiues and children sold for slaues, and their goods confiscated; others laid in prison, and reserued to further deliberation: but the generalitie of them, commanded to depart out of Campania by a certaine day; and confined vnto seuerall places as best liked the angrie Victors. As for the Towne of Capua, it was suffered to stand, in regard of the beautie and commodious site: but no corporation or forme of politie, was allowed to bee therein; only a Roman Prouost was euery yeere sent to gouerne ouer those that should inhabit it, and to doe iustice. This was the greatest act, and most important, hitherto done by the people of Rome, after many great losses in the present warre. After this, the glorie of Hannibal beganne to shine with a more dimme light, than before: his oile being farre spent; and that, which should haue reuiued his flame, being vnfortunately shed; as shall be told in place conuenient.

§. XV.

§ XV.

How the Carthaginians, making a partie in Sardinia and Sicil, held warre againſt the Romans in thoſe Ilands; and were ouer-come.

WHileſt things paſſed thus in Italie; the commotions raiſed in Sardinia and Sicil by the Carthaginians & their friends, were brought to a quiet and happie end, by the induſtrious valour of the Romans. The Sardinian rebellion was great and ſudden: aboue thirtie thouſand being vp in armes, ere the Roman forces could arriue there to ſuppreſſe it. One Harſicoras with his ſonne Hioſtus, mightie men in that Iland, were the Ring-leaders; being incited by Hanno a Carthaginian, that promiſed the aſſiſtance of his Countrie. Neither were the Carthaginians in this enterpriſe ſo careleſſe, as in the reſt of their maine vndertakings, about the ſame time. Yet it had beene better, if their care had beene directed vnto the proſecution of that maine buſineſſe in Italie; whereon this and all other hopes depended. For it would haue ſufficed, if they could haue hindred the Romans from ſending an Armie into Sardinia. Harſicoras with his followers might well enough haue ſerued to driue out Q. Mutius the Prætor; who lay ſicke in the Prouince; and not more weake in his owne bodie, than in his traine. But whileſt they ſought reuenge of that particular iniurie, whereof the ſenſe was moſt grieuous: they neglected the opportunitie of requiting thoſe that had done them wrong, and of the ſecuring themſelues from all iniuries in the future. Their fortune alſo in this enterpriſe was ſuch; as may ſeeme to haue diſcouraged them from being at the like charge, in caſes of more importance. For whereas they ſent ouer Aſdrubal, ſurnamed the bald, with a competent fleet and armie; aſſiſted in this Expedition by Hanno the Author of the rebellion, & by Margo a Gentleman of the Barchine houſe, and neere kinſman to Hannibal: it ſo fell out, that the whole fleet by extremitie of foule weather, was caſt vpon the Baleares; ſo beaten and in ſuch euill plight, that the Sardinians had euen ſpent their hearts, and were in a manner quite vanquiſhed, ere theſe their friends could arriue to ſuccour them.

Titus Manlius was ſent from Rome with two and twentie thouſand foot, and twelue hundred horſe, to ſettle the eſtate of that Iland, which he had taken in, and annexed vnto the Roman Dominion, long before this, in his Conſulſhip. It was a laudable cuſtome of the Romans, to preſerue and vp-hold in their ſeueral Prouinces, the greatneſſe and reputation of thoſe men, and their families, by whom each Prouince had beene firſt ſubdued vnto their Empire. If any iniurie were done vnto the Prouincialls; if any grace were to be obtained from the Senate; or whatſoeuer accident required the aſſiſtance of a Patron: the firſt Conquerour, and his race after him, were the moſt readie and beſt approued meanes, to procure the benefit of the people ſubdued. Hereby the Romans held very ſure intelligence, in euery Prouince, and had alwaies in readineſſe fit men to reclaime their Subiects, if they fel into any ſuch diſorder, as would otherwiſe haue required a greater charge and trouble. The comming of Manlius, retayned in obedience all that were not already broken too farre out. Yet was Harſicoras ſo ſtrong in field, that Manlius was compelled to arme his Mariners: without whom he could not haue made vp that number of two and twentie thouſand, whereof we haue ſpoken before: He landed at Calaris or Carallis, where mooring his ſhips, he paſſed vp into the Countrie, and ſought out the Enemie. Hyoſtus, the ſonne of Harſicoras, had then the command of the Sardinian Armie left vnto him by his father, who was gone abroad into the Countrie, to draw in more friends to their ſide. This yong Gentleman would needes aduenture to get honor, by giuing battaile to the Romans at his owne diſcretion. So hee raſhly aduentured to fight with an old Souldier: by whom he receiued a terrible ouerthrow; and loſt in one day aboue thirtie thouſand of his followers. Hyoſtus himſelfe, with the reſt of his broken troupes, got into Cornus, the chiefe Towne of the Iſland: whither Manlius purſued them. Very ſoone after this defeature came Aſdrubal with his Carthaginians: too late to winne all Sardinia in ſuch haſte as he might haue done, if the tempeſt had not hindred his voiage; yet ſoone enough, and ſtrong enough to ſaue the Towne of Cornus, and to put a new ſpirit into the Rebells. Manlius hereupon with-drew himſelfe back to Calaris: where he had not ſtayed long, ere the Sardinians (ſuch of them as adhered to the Roman partie) craued his aſſiſtance; their Countrie being waſted by the Carthaginians, and the Rebells, with whom they had refuſed to ioyne. This drew Manlius forth of Calaris: where if he had ſtaied a little longer, Aſdrubal would haue ſought him out with ſome blemiſh to his reputation. But the fame of Aſdrubal and his companie, appeares to haue been greater than was their ſtrength. For after ſome triall made of them in a few skirmiſhes; Manlius aduentured all to the hazard of a battaile: wherein he ſlew twelue thouſand of the enemies; and took of the Sardinians and Carthaginians three thouſand. Foure houres the battaile laſted: and victorie at length fell to the Romans, by the flight of the Iſlanders; whoſe courages had beene broken in their vnproſperous fight, not many daies before. The death of yong Hyoſtus, and of his father Harſicoras, that ſlew himſelfe for griefe, together with the captiuity of Aſdrubal himſelfe, with Mago and Hanno the Carthaginians; made the victorie the more famous. The vanquiſhed Armie fled into Cornus: whither Manlius followed them; and in ſhort ſpace wanne the Towne. All other Cities of the Iſle that had rebelled, followed the example of Cornus, and yeelded vnto the Roman: who impoſing vpon them ſuch increaſe of tribute, or other puniſhment, as beſt ſorted with the nature of their ſeueral offences, or their ability to pay, returned backe to Calaris with a great bootie, and from thence to Rome; leauing Sardinia in quiet.

The warre in Sicil was of greater length, and euery way more burdenſome to Rome: as alſo the victorie brought more honour and profit; for that the Romans became thereby not only ſauers of their owne, as in Sardinia; but Lords of the whole Countrie; by annexing the Citie and Dominion of Syracuſe, to that which they enioyed before. Soone after the battaile of Cannæ, the old King of Syracuſe died: who had continued long a ſtedfaſt friend vnto the Romans; and greatly relieued them in this preſent warre. He left his Kingdome to Hieronymus his grand-child, that was about fifteene yeeres of age; Gelo his ſonne, that ſhould haue beene his heire, being dead before. To this yong King his ſucceſſor, Hiero appointed fifteene tutors: of which the principal were Andronodorus, Zoilus, and Themiſtius; who had married his daughters, or the daughters of Gelo. The reſt were ſuch, as he iudged moſt likely to preſerue the Kingdome, by the ſame arte, whereby himſelfe had gotten and ſo long kept it. But within a little while; Andronodorus, waxing wearie of ſo many Coadiutors, beganne to commend the ſufficiencie of the yong Prince, as extraordinary in one of his yeeres; and ſaid, that he was able to rule the Kingdome without helpe of any Protector. Thus by giuing ouer his owne charge, hee cauſed others to doe the like: hoping thereby to get the King wholly into his hands; which came to paſſe in a ſort as hee deſired. For Hieronymus, laying aſide all care of gouernement, gaue himſelfe wholly ouer to his pleaſures: or if he had any regard of his Royall dignitie, it was onely in matter of exterior ſhew, as wearing a Diademe with ornaments of purple, and being attended by an armed guard. Hereby he offended the eyes of his people; that had neuer ſeene the like in Hiero, or in Gelo his ſonne. But much more he offended them, when by his inſolent behauiour, ſutable to his outward pompe, he gaue proofe, that, in courſe of life, hee would reuiue the memorie of Tyrants dead long ſince, from whom he tooke the patterne of his habit. Hee grew proud, luſtful, cruel, and dangerous to all that were about him: ſo that ſuch of his late Tutors as could eſcape him by flight, were glad to liue in baniſhment: the reſt, being moſt of them put to death by the Tyrant; many of them dying by their owne hands, to auoid the danger of his diſpleaſure, that ſeemed worſe than death it ſelfe.

Only

Only Andronodorus, Zoilus, and one Thraſo continued in grace with him, and were his Counſailers, but not of his Cabinet. Theſe, howſoeuer they agreed in other points, were at ſome diſſenſion about that maine point, of adhering, either to the Romans, or to the Carthaginians. The two former of them, were wholly for the Kings pleaſures, which was ſet on change: but Thraſo, hauing more regard of his honour and profit, was very earneſt to continue the amitie with Rome. Whileſt as yet it remained ſomewhat doubtfull, which way the King would incline: a conſpiracie againſt his Perſon, was detected by a groome of his; to whom, one Theodorus had broken the matter. Theodorus hereupon was apprehended, and tormented; thereby to wring out of him the whole practice, and the names of the vndertakers. Long it was ere he would ſpeake any thing: but yeelding (as it ſeemed) in the end, vnto the extremitie of the torture; he confeſſed, that he had beene ſet on by Thraſo; whom he appeached of the treaſon, together with many more, that were neere in loue or place vnto Hieronymus. All theſe therefore were put to death, being innocent of the crime wherewith they were charged. But they that were indeede the Conſpirators, walked boldly in the ſtreets, and neuer ſhrunke for the matter: aſſuring themſelues, that the reſolution of Theodorus would yeelde to no extremitie. Thus they all eſcaped, and ſoone after found meanes to execute their purpoſe. The King himſelfe, when Thraſo was taken out of the way, quickly reſolued vpon ſiding with the Carthaginians; whereto he was very inclinable before. Yong men, when firſt they grow Maſters of themſelues, loue to ſeeme wiſer than their fathers, by taking different courſes. And the liberalitie of Hiero to the Romans, in their great neceſſitie, had of late beene ſuch, as might haue beene termed exceſſiue; were it not in regard of his prouidence; wherein hee tooke order for his owne eſtate, that depended vpon theirs. But the yong Nephew, taking little heede of dangers farre off; regarded only the things preſent; the weakeneſſe of Rome; the preualent fortunes of Carthage; and the much monie that his grand-father had laied out in vaine, to ſhoulder vp a falling houſe. Wherefore he dealt with Hannibal: who readily entred into good correſpondence with him; that was maintained by Hippocrates & Epicides, Carthaginians borne, but grand-children of a baniſhed Syracuſan. Theſe grew into ſuch fauour with Hieronymus, that they drew him whither they liſted. So that when Appius Claudius the Roman Pretor, hearing what was towards, made a motion of renewing the Confederacie, betweene the People of Rome and the King of Syracuſe; his Meſſengers were diſmiſſed with an open ſcoffe. For Hieronymus would needes haue them tell him the order of the fight at Cannæ; that hee might thereby learne how to accommodate himſelfe: ſaying, That he could hardly beleeue the Carthaginians; ſo wonderfull was the victorie as they reported it. Hauing thus diſmiſſed the Romans, he ſent Embaſſadors to Carthage, where hee concluded a league: with condition, at firſt, that a great part of the Iſland ſhould be annexed to his Dominion; but afterward, that he ſhould raigne ouer all Sicil; and the Carthaginians reſt ſatisfied, with what they could get in Italie. At theſe doings Ap. Claudius did not greatly ſtirre: partly for the indignities that were offered; partly for that it behoued not the Romans, to entertaine more quarrells, then were enforced vpon them by neceſſitie; and partly (as may ſeeme) for that the reputation, both of himſelfe, and of his Citie, had receiued ſuch blemiſh, by that which hapned vnto him in his iournie, as much diſcountenanced him when he came into Sicil, & forbad him to looke big. The money that Hiero had beſtowed vpon the Romans, wherewith to relieue them in their neceſſitie, this Appius was to carrie backe vnto him: it being refuſed by the Roman Senate, with greater braueric than their preſent fortune would allow. But in ſtead of returning the monie with thankes, as he had beene directed, and as it had beene noiſed abroad that hee ſhould doe: the warre againſt Philip King of Macedon (whereof we haue ſpoken before) compelled the Romans to lay aſide their vaine glory, and ſend word after him, that he ſhould conſigne that monie ouer to Marcus Valerius; of whoſe voyage into Greece, the Citie had not otherwiſe wherewith to beare the charge. This was done accordingly: and hereby Claudius (which name in the whole continuance of that Familie, is taxed with pride) his errand was changed, from a glorious ostentation of the Roman magnanimitie; into such a pittifull tune of thanksgiuing, as must needes haue bred sorrow and commiseration, in so true a friend as Hiero; or, if it were deliuered after his death, matter of pastime and scorne, in Hieronymus the new King.

But whilest Hieronymus was more desirous of warre, than well resolued how to beginne it: his owne death changed the forme of things, and bred a great innouation in the state of Syracuse; which thereby might haue prospered more than euer, had it beene wisely gouerned. Hippocrates and Epicides, of whom we spake before, were sent about the Country with two thousand men; to sollicite the Townes, and perswade them to shake off their obedience to the Romans. The King himselfe with an Armie of fifteene thousand horse and foot, went to Leontium, a Citie of his owne Dominion: hoping that the fame of his preparation, would make the whole Island fall to him in all haste, and accept him for Soueraigne. There the Conspirators tooke him on the sudden, as hee was passing through a narrow street; and rushing betweene him and his guard, strooke him dead. Forthwith liberty was proclaimed: and the sound of that word so joyfully answered by the Leontines, that the guard of Hieronymus, had little courage to reuenge their Masters death. Yet for feare of the worst, a great largesse was promised vnto the Souldiers, with rewards vnto their Captaines; which wrought so effectually; that when many wicked acts of the murdered King were reckoned vp; the Armie, as in detestation of his bad life, suffered his carkasse to lie vnburied. These newes ranne quickly to Syracuse: whither some of the Conspirators, taking the Kings horses, posted away; to signifie all that had passed; to stirre vp the people to libertie; and to preuent Andronodorus, if he, or his fellowes would make offer to vsurpe a Tyrannie. The Syracusians hereupon presently tooke Armes; and made themselues masters of their owne Citie. Andronodorus on the other side fortified the Palace, and the Island: being yet vncertaine what to doe; betweene desire of making himselfe a soueraigne Lord, and feare of suffering punishment, as a Tyrant, if his enterprise miscarried. His wife Demarata, that was the daughter of Hiero, cherished him in his hopes: putting him in minde of that well knowne Prouerbe, which Dionysius had vsed; That a Tyrant should keepe his place, till he were haled out of it by the heeles, and not ride away from it on horse-backe. But feare, and better counsaile preuailed so farre; that Andronodorus, hauing slept vpon the matter; dissembled his affections, and deferred his hope, vnto better opportunitie. The next day he came forth, and made a speech vnto the People: telling them; That hee was glad to see, how prudently they behaued themselues in so great a change; that he had stood in feare, lest they would not haue contained themselues within bounds of discretion; but rather haue sought to murder all without difference, that any way belonged to the Tyrant; and that since he beheld their orderly proceeding, and their care, not to rauish their liberty perforce, but to wed it vnto them for euer; he was willingly come to them forth of his strength, & surrendred vp the charge, committed vnto him, by one that had beene an euill Master, both to him and them. Hereupon great joy was made; and Pretors chosen (as in former times) to gouerne the Citie; of which Andronodorus was one, and the chiefe. But such was his desire of Soueraignetie: and so vehement were the instigations of his wife; that shortly he beganne to practise with Hippocrates, Epicides, and other Captaines of the Mercinaries: hoping to make himselfe strong, by their helpe, that were least pleased with the change. Hippocrates and Epicides had beene with the Syracusian Pretors, and told them, that, being sent from Hannibal to Hieronymus, they according to instructions of their Captaine, had done him, whilest he liued, what seruice they could; and that now they were desirous to returne home. They requested therefore that they might be friendly dismissed: and with a conuoy; that might keepe them from falling into the hands of the Romans, and set them safe at Locri. This was easily easily granted: both for that the Syracusian Magistrates were well cõtended to earne thankes of Hannibal, with such a little curtesie; and for that they thought it expedient, to rid their Towne quickly of this troublesome couple; which were good souldiers, and gracious with the Armie, but otherwise lewd men. It was not the desire of these two Sicilians, to be gone so hastily as they made shew: they were more mindfull of the businesse, for which Hannibal had sent them. Wherefore they insinuated themselues into the bosoms of such as were most likely to fill the army with tumult: especially of the Roman fugitiues, and those that had cause to mistrust what should become of themselues, when the Romans & Syracusians were come to agreement. Such instruments as these, Andronodorus had great neede of: as also of many other, to helpe him in his dangerous attempt. Hee found Themistius, that had married Harmonis the sister of Hieronymus, ready to take his part; as being carried with the like passions of his owne, and of his wife. But in seeking to increase the number of his adherents, he reuealed the matter to one, that reuealed all to the rest of the Pretors. Hereupon it followed, that he, and Themistius, entring into the Senate, were slaine out of hand: and afterward accused to the People, of all the euill which they had done, whilest Hieronymus liued, as by his authoritie; and now since attempted, in seeking to vsurpe the tyrannie themselues. It was also declared, that the daughters of Hiero and Gelo were accessarie to this dangerous treason: and that the vnquiet spirits of these women would neuer cease to worke, vntill they had recouered those Royall ornaments, and Soueraigne power, whereof their familie was now dispossessed. These daughters therefore of Hiero and Gelo were also condemned to die: & executioners presently sent by the enraged people, to take away their liues. Demarata, and Harmonia had perhaps deserued this heauie sentence: but Heraclea, the daughter of Hiero, and wife of Sosippus, being altogether innocent; was murdered together with her two yong daughters, in the hasty execution of this rash judgement. Her husband Sosippus was a louer of the Common-wealth; and in that respect so hated by Hieronymus, that being sent Embassador to King Ptolemie, &c. he durst not returne home; but staied in Ægypt as a banished man. This consideration, when it was too late, together with some other pittifull accidents accompanying the slaughter, so affected the multitude; that (pardoning themselues) all cryed out vpon the authors of so foule a butcherie. Being thus incensed against the Senate; and knowing not otherwise how to satisfie their anger; they called for an election of new Pretors, in the roome of Andronodorus and Themistius, that were lately slaine: meaning to substitute such in their places, as the Senators should haue little cause to like. At the election were present a great rowt, not only of the poorer Citizens, but of souldiers that pressed into the throng. One of these, named Epicides Pretor; another named Hippocrates: and the lesse that the old Pretors and Senators approued this nomination, the more eager was the multitude; and by a generall crie forced them to be accepted. These being made Pretors, did what they could to hinder the agreement that was in hand, between the Syracusians and the Romans. But hauing striuen in vaine, and seeing that the People stood in feare of Ap. Claudius, and of Marcellus, that was lately come into Sicil; they gaue way vnto the time, and suffered the old league of Hiero to be reconfirmed; which afterward they purposed to dissolue by practice. The Leontines had some neede of a Garrison: and to them was sent Hippocrates the Pretor, attended, by such fugitiues, and mercinary souldiers, as were most burdensome to Syracuse. Thither when he came, hee beganne to doe many acts of hostilitie against the Romans: first in secret, afterward more openly and boldly. Marcellus, rightly vnderstanding the purpose of these two brethren, sent word vnto the Syracusians, that they had already broken the league; and that the peace would neuer be kept sincerely, vntill this turbulent paire of brethren were expelled the Island. Epicides, fearing to sustaine the blame of his brothers proceedings, and more desirous to set forward the warre, than to excuse any breach of peace; went himselfe vnto the Leontines, whom he perswaded to rebell against the Syracusians.

sians. For he said, that since they had all of late serued one Master; there was little reason why the Leontines should not be enfranchised by his death, as well as the Syracusians; yea or much rather, all things considered; since in their streets the Tyrant was slaine, and libertie first proclaimed. Wherefore, since they of Syracuse were not contented, to enjoy the freedome purchased among the Leontines; but thought it good reason, that they should beare Dominion ouer those that had broken the chaine, wherwith both the one, and the other were bound: his aduice was, that such their arrogancie should be checked betimes, ere it could get any colour of right by prescription. Hereunto occasion was giuen by one article of the league, made of late by the Romans and Syracusians. For it was agreed, That all which had been subiect to HIERO and HIERONYMVS, should hencefoorth be Vassals vnto the state of Syracuse. Against this article, if the Leontines would take exception, and thereby challenge their owne due; Epicides told them, that in this noueltie of change, they had fit opportunity to recouer the freedome, which their fathers had lost not many ages before. Neither was it vnreasonable, which this crafty Carthaginian propounded; if the Leontines had beene subdued by the same hand, which tooke libertie from the Syracusians. But seeing they had long since yeelded vnto Syracuse, and been subiect vnto that Citie, by whatforme soeuer it was gouerned; this claime of libertie was rather seasonable than just. Neuertheless the motion of Epicides was highly approued: in so much that when messengers came soone after from Syracuse, to rebuke the Leontines, for that which they had done against the Romans; and to denounce vnto Hippocrates & Epicides, that they should get them gone, either to Locri, or whither else they listed, so that they staied not in Sicil: word was returned, That they of Leontium had not requested the Syracusians, to make any bargaines for them with the Romans, nor thought themselues bound to obserue the couenants, which others without warrant had made in their names. This peremptorie answere was forth-with reported vnto Marcellus by the Syracusians: who offered him their assistance in doing iustice vpon the Leontines their Rebells; with condition that when the Towne was taken, it might be theirs againe. Marcellus required no better satisfaction: but forth-with tooke the businesse in hand; which he dispatched in one day. At the first assault, Leontium was taken: all saue the Castle, whereinto Hippocrates and Epicides fled; and stealing thence away by night, conueied themselues into the Towne of Herbesus. The first thing that Marcellus did, when hee had wonne the Towne, was the same, which other Roman Captaines vsed after victorie; to seeke out the fugitiue Roman slaues and renegados, whom hee caused all to die: the rest both of the Townsmen and Souldiers, hee tooke to mercy; forbearing also to strip or spoile them. But the fame of his doings was bruted after a contrary sort. It was said, that he had slaine, Man, Woman, and Child, and put the Towne to sacke. These newes met the Syracusian Army vpon the way, as it was going to joyne with Marcellus, who had ended his businesse before. About eight thousand Mercinaries there were, that had beene sent forth of Syracuse, vnder Sosis and Dinomenes two of the Pretors, to serue against the Leontines and other Rebells. These Captaines were honest men, and well affected to their Countrie: but the souldiers that followed them, had those diseases, with which all mercinaries are commonly infected. They tooke the matter deeply to heart, that their fellow-souldiers (as now they termed those against whom they went) had beene so cruelly butchered: and hereupon they fell to mutinie; though what to demand, or with whom to bee angrie, they could not tell. The Pretors therefore thought it best, to turne their vnquiet thoughts another way, and set them aworke in some place else: for as much as at Leontium there was no neede of their seruice. So toward Herbesus they marched: where lay Hippocrates and Epicides, the architects of all this mischiefe, deuising what further harme they might doe; but now so weakely accompanied, that they seemed vnable to escape the punishments belonging to their offences past. Hereof the two brethren were no lesse well aware: and therfore aduentured vpon a remedy little lesse desperate than their present case. They issued forth of Herbesus vnarmed, with Olive branches in their hands, in manner of suppliants; and so presented themselues to the Armie. Sixe hundred men of Creete were in the vantguard; that had bin well vsed by Hieronymus; and some of them greatly bound vnto Hannibal; who had taken them prisoners in the Italian warre, and louingly dismissed them. These Cretans therefore welcomed the two brethren, and bade them be of good cheare; saying, that no man should doe them harme, as long as they could vse their weapons. Herewithall the Armie was at a stand; and the rumor of this accident, ranne swiftly from man to man, with generall approbation. The Pretors thought to helpe the matter by seueritie; which would not serue. For when they commanded these two Traitors to be laid in yrons: the exclamation was so violent against them, that faine they were to let all alone, and returne, vncertaine what course to take, vnto Megara; where they were lodged the night before. Thither when they came, Hippocrates deuised a tricke; whereby to helpe himselfe, and better the vncertaine case wherein he stood. He caused letters of his owne penning, to be intercepted by some of his most trustie Cretans; directed (as they made shew) from the Syracusian Pretors, to Marcellus. The contents hereof were, That Marcellus had well done, in committing all to the sword among the Leontines: but that it farther behoued him, to make the like dispatch of all the Mercinaries belonging to Syracuse; which were offensiue, all of them in generall, to the libertie of the Citie, and the peace with Rome. When this counterfeit Epistle was openly rehearsed: the vprore was such, that Sosis and his fellow Pretor, were glad to forsake the campe, and flie for their liues. All the Syracusians remaining behinde, had been cut in peeces by the enraged souldiers, if the two artificers of the sedition had not saued their liues; rather to keepe them as pledges, and by them, to winne their friends within the Towne, than for any good will. They perswaded also a mischieuous knaue that had serued among the Leontines, to justifie the bruit of Marcellus his crueltie; and to carrie home the newes to Syracuse, as an eye-witnesse. This incensed not only the multitude, but some of the Senate; and filled the whole Towne with causelesse indignation. In good time (said some) was the auarice and crueltie of the Romans detected: who, had they in like sort gotten into Syracuse, would haue dealt much worse; where their greedy appetites might haue beene tempted with a farre greater bootie. Whilest they were thus discoursing, and deuising how to keepe out the wicked Romans, Hippocrates with his Armie came to the gates; exhorting the Citizens to let him in, vnlesse for want of helpe, they would be betraied to their enemies. The Pretors with the best and wisest of the Senate, would faine haue kept him out: but the violence of the souldiers to force a gate, was no whit greater, than the head-strong furie of those within the Towne; that laboured to breake it open. So he entred, and immediately fell vpon the Pretors; whom (being forsaken by all men) hee put to the sword, and made slaughter of them and their followers vntill night. The next day he went openly to worke: and after the common example of Tyrants, gaue liberty to all slaues and prisoners; and being fortified with adherents of the worst and basest sort, made himselfe and his brother Pretors, in Title, but in effect, Lords of Syracuse.

When Marcellus was aduertised of this great alteration, hee thought it no time for him to sit still, and attend the further issue. He sent Embassadours to Syracuse; that were not admitted into the Hauen, but chased out as enemies. Then drew he neere with his Armie: and lodging within a mile and a halfe of the Towne, sent before him, some to require a parlee. These were entertained without the walls by the two new Pretors: to whom they declared, That the Romans were come thither, not with purpose to doe hurt, but in fauour of the Syracusians, which were oppressed by Tyrants; and to punish those, that had murdered and banished so many of the principall Citizens. Wherefore they required, that those worthy men, their Confederates, which were chased out of the Towne, might be suffered to returne and enjoy their owne;as also that the Authors of the great slaughter lately committed, might be deliuered vp. Hereto Epicides briefly answered, That if their errand had beene to him,he could haue told what to say to them: but since it was directed vnto others, they should doe well to returne, when those to whom they were sent, had the gouernement in their hands. As for the warre which they threatned; hee told them, they should finde by experience, that to besiege Syracuse, was an other manner of worke, than to take Leontium. Thus hee sent them gone; and returned back into the Citie. Immediately beganne the siege, which endured longer than the Romans had expected. The quicke and easie winning of Leontium did put Marcellus in hope, that so long a circuit of walls, as compassed Syracuse, being manned with no better kinde of Souldiers, than those with whom he had lately dealt, would in some part or other, be taken at the first assault. Wherefore he omitted no violence or terrour in the very beginning; but did his best, both by Land and Sea. Neuertheless all his labour was disappointed; and his hope of preuailing by open force, taken from him by the ill successe of two or three of the first assaults. Yet was it not the vertue of the Defendants, or any strength of the Citie, that bred such despaire of hastie victorie. But there liued at that time in Syracuse, Archimedes the noble Mathematician: who at the request of Hiero the late King, that was his kinsman, had framed such engines of warre, as being in this extremitie put in vse, did more mischiefe to the Romans than could haue beene wrought by the Canon, or any instruments of Gunne-powder; had they in that age beene knowne. This Archimedes discoursing once with Hiero, maintained, That it were possible to remoue the whole earth out of the place wherein it is, if there were some other earth, or place of sure footing, whereon a man might stand. For proofe of this bold assertion, he performed some strange workes; which made the King entreat him to conuert his studie vnto things of vse; that might preserue the Citie from danger of enemies. To such Mechanicall workes, Archimedes, and the Philosophers of those times, had little affection. They held it an injurie done vnto the liberall sciences, to submit learned Propositions, vnto the workemanship, and gaine, of base handicrafts men. And of this opinion Plato was an author: who greatly blamed some Geometricians; that seemed vnto him to profane their science, by making it vulgar. Neither must wee rashly taske a man so wise as Plato, with the imputation of supercilious austeritie, or affected singularitie in his reprehension. For it hath beene the vnhappy fate of great inuentions, to be vilified, as idle fancies, or dreames, before they were published: and being once made knowne, to be vnder-valued; as falling within compasse of the meanest wit; and things, that euery one, could well haue performed. Hereof (to omit that memorable example of Columbus his discouerie, with the much different sorts of neglect, which hee vnder-went before and after it) in a familiar and most homely example, we may see most apparent proofe. He that lookes vpon our English Brewers, and their Seruants, that are daily exercised in the Trade; will thinke it ridiculous to heare one say, that the making of Malt, was an inuention, proceeding from some of an extraordinary knowledge in naturall Philosophie. Yet is not the skill of the inuentors any whit the lesse, for that the labor of workmanship growes to be the Trade of ignorant men. The like may be said of many handicrafts: and particularly in the Printing of Bookes; which being deuised, and bettered, by great Scholers and wise men, grew afterward corrupted by those, to whom the practice fell; that is, by such, as could slubber things easily ouer, and feede their workemen at the cheapest rate. In this respect therefore, the Alchymists, and all others, that haue, or would seeme to haue any secret skill, whereof the publication might doe good vnto mankinde; are not without excuse of their close concealing. For it is a kinde of injustice, that the long trauels of an vnderstanding braine, beside the losse of time, and other expence, should be cast away vpon men of no worth; or yeeld lesse benefit vnto the Author of a great worke, than to meere strangers; and perhaps his enemies. And surely, if the passion of Enuie, haue in it any thing allowable and naturall, as hauing Anger, Feare, and other like Affections: it is in ſome ſuch caſe as this; and ſerueth againſt thoſe, which would vſurpe the knowledge, wherewith God hath denied to endue them. Neuertheleſſe, if we haue regard vnto common charitie, and the great affection, that euery one ought to beare vnto the generalitie of mankinde, after the example of him that ſuffereth his Sunne to ſhine vpon the iuſt and vniuſt: it will appeare more commendable in wiſe men, to enlarge themſelues, and to publiſh vnto the world, thoſe good things that lie buried in their own boſomes. This ought ſpecially to be done, when a profitable knowledge hath not annexed to it ſome dangerous cunning; that may bee peruerted by euill men to a miſchieuous vſe. For if the ſecret of any rare Antidot, contained in it the skill of giuing ſome deadly and irrecouerable poyſon: better it were, that ſuch a iewell remaine cloſe in the hands of a wiſe and honeſt man; than being made common, binde all men to vſe the remedie, by teaching the worſt men how to doe miſchiefe. But the workes which Archimedes publiſhed, were ſuch as tended to very commendable ends. They were engins, ſeruing vnto the defence of Syracuſe; not fit for the Syracuſians to carry abroad, to the hurt and oppreſſion of others. Neither did he altogether publiſh the knowledge, how to vſe them, but reſerued ſo much to his owne direction; that after his death more of the ſame kinde were not made, nor thoſe of his owne making were employed by the Romans. It ſufficed vnto this worthy man, that he had approoued, euen vnto the vulgar, the dignitie of his Science; and done eſpeciall benefit vnto his Countrey. For to enrich a Mechanicall trade, or teach the art of murdering men, it was beſides his purpoſe.

Marcellus had cauſed certaine of his Quinquereme Gallies to be faſtened together, and Towers erected on them, to beat the defendants from the wall. Againſt theſe, Archimedes had ſundrie deuices; of which any one ſort might haue repelled the aſſaylants: but all of them together ſhewed the multiplicitie of his great wit. He ſhot heauie ſtones and long peeces of timber, like vnto the yards of ſhips; which brake ſome of the Gallies by their force and weight. Theſe afflicted ſuch as lay farre off. They that were come neerer the walls, lay open to a continuall voly of ſhot, which they could not endure. Some with an yron graple were taken by the prow and hoiſted vp, ſhaking out all the men, and afterward falling downe into the water. Some by ſtrange engins were lifted vp into the ayre; where turning round a while, they were broken againſt the walls, or caſt vpon the rockes: and all of them were ſo beaten, that they durſt neuer come to any ſecond aſſault. In like ſort was the Land-armie handled. Stones and timber, falling vpon it like Haile; did not onely ouerwhelme the men, but brake downe the Roman engins of battery; and forced Marcellus to giue ouer the aſſault. For remedie hereof it was conceiued, that if the Romans could earely before day get neere vnto the walls: they ſhould be (as it were) vnder the point blanck, and receiue no hurt by theſe terrible Inſtruments; which were woond vp hard to ſhoote a great compaſſe. But this vaine hope coſt many of the aſſaylants liues. For the ſhot came downe right vpon them: and beating them from all parts of the wall, made a great ſlaughter of them, all the way as they fled, (for they were vnable to ſtay by it) euen till they were gotten very farre off. This did ſo terrifie the Romans; that if they perceiued any peece of timber, or a ropes end, vpon the walls, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes his engins were readie to diſcharge. Neither knew Marcellus how to ouercome theſe difficulties, or to take away from his men, that feare; againſt the cauſe whereof he knew no remedie. If the engins had ſtood vpon the walls, ſubiect to firing, or any ſuch annoyance from without; he might haue holpen it by ſome deuice, to make them vnſeruiceable. But all, or the moſt of them were out of ſight; being erected in the ſtreetes behinde the walls; where Archimedes gaue directions how to vſe them. Wherefore the Roman had none other way left, than to cut off from the Towne all prouiſion of victualls, both by Land and by Sea. This was a deſperate peece of worke.

For the enemies hauing so goodly an Hauen; the Sea in a manner free; and the Carthaginians that were strong by Sea, willing to supply them: were not likely, so soone to bee consumed with famine, as the besiegers to bee wearied out, by lying in Leaguer before so strong a Citie, hauing no probabilitie to carrie it. Yet, for want of better counsell to follow, this was thought the best, and most honourable course.

In the meane while, Himilco, Admirall of a Carthaginian Fleete, that had waited long about Sicil, being by Hippocrates aduertised of these passages, went home to Carthage, and there so dealt with the Senate, that fiue and twentie thousand Foote, three thousand Horse, and twelue Elephants, were committed vnto his charge, wherewith to make warre vpon the Romans in Sicil by Land. Hee tooke many Townes; and many, that had anciently belonged vnto the Carthaginians, did yeeld vnto him. To remedie this mischiefe, and to stay the inclination of men, which following the current of Fortune, beganne to turne vnto the Carthaginians; Marcellus with a great part of his Armie, rose from Syracuse, and went from place to place about the Island. Hee tooke Pelorus and Herbesus, which yeelded vnto him. He tooke also Megara by force and sackt it: either to terrifie others that were obstinate, especially the Syracusians, or else because Rome was at this time poore, and his Armie must haue somewhat to keepe it in heart. His especiall desire was to haue saued Agrigentum: whither hee came too late; for Himilco had gotten it before. Therefore he returned back toward Syracuse; carefully, and in as good order as hee could, for feare of the Carthaginian that was too strong for him. The circumspection that he vsed, in regard of Himilco; stood him in good stead, against a danger that he had not mistrusted. For Hippocrates, leauing the charge of Syracuse vnto his brother, had lately issued out of the Citie, with ten thousand foot, and fiue hundred horse, intending to ioyne his forces with Himilco. Marcellus fell vpon him, ere either was aware of the other: and the Romans, being in good order, got an easie victorie, against the dispersed and halfe vnarmed Syracusians. The reputation heereof helped a little to keepe the Sicilians from rebellion. Yet it was not long, ere Himilco, ioyning with Hippocrates, ranne ouer al the Island at his pleasure, and presented battaile to Marcellus, euen at his Trenches; but the Roman wisely refused it. Bomilcar also a Carthaginian, entred with a great fleet into the Hauen of Syracuse, and victualled the Citie. After this, the disposition of the Islanders changed so againe, that although another Legion was come from Rome, which escaped from Himilco, and safely arriued at Marcellus his campe: yet many places reuolted vnto the Carthaginians, and slue or betraied the Roman Garrisons.

In the midst of these troubles, Winter enforced both parts to take breath awhile: and Marcellus leauing some of his Armie before Syracuse, that he might not seeme to haue giuen ouer the siege, went vnto Leontium, where he lay intentiue to all occasions. In the beginning of the Spring he stood in doubt, whether it were better to continue the laborious worke of besieging Syracuse, or to turne all his forces to Agrigentum, against Himilco and Hippocrates. But it would greatly haue impaired his reputation, if he had gone from Syracuse, as vnable to preuaile: and he himselfe was of an eager disposition, euer vnwilling to giue ground, or to quit, as not faisible, an enterprise, that he had once taken in hand. Hee came therefore to Syracuse: where though he found all the difficulties remaining as before; and no likelihood to take the Citie by force or famine; yet was hee not without hope, that continuance of time would bring forth somewhat, which might fulfill his desire. Especially hee assaied to preuaile by treason; against which no place can hold out. And to this end he dealt with the Syracusian Gentlemen that were in his campe; exhorting them to practise with their friends that remained in the Citie. This was not easie for them to doe, because the towne would harken to no parlee. At length a slaue vnto one of these banished men, making shew to runne away from his Master, got into Syracuse;

where he talked in priuate with ſome few, as he had beene inſtructed. Thus began Marcellus to haue intelligence within the Citie: whence the Conſpirators vſed to ſend him aduertiſement of their proceedings; by a fiſher-boat that paſſed forth in the night: but when they were growne to the number of foureſcore, and thought themſelues able to effect ſomewhat of importance: all was diſcouered; and they, like Traitors, put to death. In the meane while, one Damaſippus a Lacedæmonian, that had beene ſent out of the Towne as an Embaſſador to Philip King of Macedon, was fallen into the hands of Marcellus. Epicides was very deſirous to ranſome him: and many meetings were appointed for that purpoſe, not farre from the walls. There, one of the Romans, looking vpon the wall, and wanting the more compendious arte of Geometrie, fell to numbring the ſtones: and, making an eſtimate of the height, iudged it leſſe than it had beene formerly deemed. Herewith hee acquainted Marcellus: who cauſing better notice to be taken of the place, and finding, that ladders of no extraordinarie length would reach it; made all things ready, and waited a conuenient time. It was the weakeſt part of the Towne, and therfore the moſt ſtrongly garded: neither was there hope to preuaile by force againſt Archimedes, if they failed to take it by ſurpriſe. But a fugitiue out of the Towne brought word, that a great feaſt was to bee held vnto Diana, which was to laſt three dayes: and that, becauſe other good cheare was not ſo plentifull within the Citie, as in former times, Epicides, to gratifie the People, had made the more large diſtribution of Wine. A better opportunitie could not be wiſhed. Wherefore Marcellus, in the dead of the Feſtiuall night, came vnto the walls, which hee tooke by Scalado. Syracuſe was diuided into foure parts (or fiue, if Epipolæ were reckoned as one) each of which were fortified as diſtinct Cities. When therefore Marcellus had gotten ſome peeces, he had the commoditie of a better and ſafe lodging, with good ſtore of bootie; and better opportunitie than before, to deale with the reſt. For there were now a great many, as well of thoſe in Acradinia and the Iſland, inner parts of the Towne, as of thoſe that were alreadie in the hands of Marcellus, that beganne to harken vnto compoſition, as being much terrified by the loſſe of thoſe parts, which the Romans had taken and ſackt. As for the weapons of Archimedes, little harme, or none they did, vnto thoſe, that were ſheltred vnder ſtrong houſes: although it may ſeeme, that the inner walls were not altogether vnfurniſhed of his helpe; ſince they held out a good while, and were not taken by force. The Roman fugitiues, and Renegados, were more carefull than euer to defend the reſt of the Citie: being ſure to be rewarded with a cruell death, if Marcellus could preuaile. Hippocrates and Himilco, were daily expected; and Bomilcar was ſent away to Carthage, to bring helpe from thence. It was not long ere Hippocrates and Himilco came: who fell vpon the old camp of the Romans, whileſt Epicides ſallied out of Acradinia vpon Marcellus. But the Romans made ſuch defence in each part, that the Aſſailants were repelled. Neuertheleſſe, they continued to beſet Marcellus: whom they held in a manner as ſtreightly beſieged, as he himſelfe did beſiege the Towne. But the peſtilence at length conſumed, together with the two Captaines, a great part of the Armie, and cauſed the reſt to diſlodge. The Romans were (though ſomewhat leſſe) afflicted with the ſame peſtilence, in ſo much that Bomilcar did put the Citie of Carthage in hope, that he might be taken where he lay, if any great forces were ſent thither. This Bomilcar wanted no deſire to doe his Countrie ſeruice: but his courage was not anſwerable to his good will. He arriued at Pachynus with a ſtrong fleet: where he ſtaied; being loth to double the Cape; for that the windes did better ſerue the enemie than him: Thither ſailed Epicides out of Syracuſe: to acquaint him with the neceſſities of the Citie; and to draw him on. With much intreatie, at length hee came forward: but meeting with the Roman fleet, that was readie for him, he ſtood off into the deepe; and ſailed away to Tarentum, bidding Sicil farewell. Then durſt not Epicides returne into Syracuſe, but went to Agrigentum: where he expected the iſſue; with a very faint hope of hearing any good newes.

The Sicilian ſouldiers, that remained aliue of Hippocrates his Armie, lay as neere as they could ſafely, vnto Marcellus; and ſome of them, in a ſtrong Towne three miles off. Theſe had done what good they could to Syracuſe, by doing what hurt they could vnto the Romans. But when they were informed, that the ſtate of Sicil was giuen as deſperate by the Carthaginians: they ſent Embaſſadours to treat of peace; and made offer to compound, both for themſelues, and for the Towne. Hereunto Marcellus willingly gaue eare: for he had ſtaied there long enough; and had cauſe to feare, that after a little while, the Carthaginians might come thither ſtrong againe. He therefore agreed, both with the Citizens, and with the Souldiers, that lay abroad; That they ſhould be Maſters of their owne, enioying their liber- 10 tie and proper lawes; yet ſuffering the Romans to poſſeſſe, whatſoeuer had belonged vnto the Kings. Hereupon they, to whom Epicides had left his charge, were put to death; new Pretors choſen; and the gates euen readie to be opened vnto Marcellus: when ſuddenly the Roman fugitiues diſturbed all. Theſe perceiuing their owne condition to be deſperate, perſwaded the other Mercinarie ſouldiers, That the Citizens had bargained onely for themſelues, and betraied the Armie to the Romans. Wherefore they preſently tooke armes, and fell vpon the new-choſen Pretors: whom they ſlue; and made election of ſixe Captaines that ſhould command ouer all. But ſhortly it was found out, that there was no danger at all to the ſouldiers; excepting only the Fugitiues. The treatie therfore was againe ſet on foot, and wan- 20 ted little of concluſion: which yet was delaied; either by ſome feare of the Citizens, that had ſeene (as they thought) proofe of the Roman auarice in the ſack of Epipolæ, Tyche, and Neapolis, the parts alreadie taken; or by ſome deſire of Marcellus to get the Towne by force, that he might vſe the libertie of a Conqueror, and make it wholly ſubiect vnto Rome. Mericus a Spaniard was one of the ſixe Captaines, that had beene choſen in the late commotion: a man of ſuch faith, as vſually is found in Mercinaries; holding his own particular benefit aboue all other reſpects. With this Captaine, Marcellus dealt ſecretly: hauing a fit inſtrument, of the ſame Nation, one Belligenes; that went in company with the Roman Embaſſadors, daily paſſing to and fro. This craftie Agent perſwaded Mericus, That the Romans had alreadie got- 30 ten all Spaine: and that if euer he purpoſed to make his owne fortune good, either at home in Spaine, or any where elſe; it was now the onely time to doe it; by conforming himſelfe to the will of the Roman Generall. By ſuch hopes the Spaniſh Captaine was eaſily wonne, and ſent forth his owne brother among the Syracuſian Embaſſadours to ratifie the couenant with Marcellus.

This vnder-hand dealing of Marcellus againſt the Syracuſians, cannot well be commended as honeſt: neither was it afterwards throughly approued at his comming to Rome. For the benefits of Hiero to the Romans had beene ſuch, as deſerued not to be requited with the ruine of his Countrie: much leſſe, that the miſeries of his people, oppreſſed (though partly through their owne follie) by an Armie of Mercina- 40 ries, ſhould miniſter vnto the people of Rome, aduantage againſt them. The poore Citizens could not make good their parts againſt the hired ſouldiers; and therefore were faine to yeeld vnto the time, and obey thoſe Miniſters of Hannibal, that ruled the Armie. But as long as they were free after the death of Hieronymus; and now of late, when they had gathered courage by the flight of Epicides: it had beene their chiefe care to maintaine amitie with the people of Rome. They had lately ſlaine many the principall of Epicides his followers; and many of themſelues had alſo bin ſlaine, both lately and in former times, becauſe of this their deſire vnto the peace. What though it were true, that the Raſcalitie, and ſome ill aduiſed Perſons ioyned with the ſouldiers in hatred of the Romans, by occaſion of the ſlaughter which they 50 heard to be done at Leontium, and afterward beheld in thoſe parts of their owne Citie which was taken? Ought therefore the Roman Generall, in a treatie of peace held with the Syracuſians, to make a bargaine vnder-hand againſt them, with a Captaine of the Mercinaries? Theſe things were obiected againſt Marcellus, at his re-

turne home. But the Senators thought it a great deale better, to comfort the Syracusians with gentle words, and promises of good vsage in time to come, than to restore the bootie, and giue ouer the Dominion of a Citie, so great, wealthie, strong, and many waies important. Neuertheleſſe if we conſider the many inconueniences and great miſchiefes, whereunto Syracuſe was obnoxious; both by euill neighbors, and by that very forme of politie, after which it was gouerned: wee may truly affirme, That it receiued no ſmall benefit, by becomming ſubiect vnto Rome. For thereby it was not only aſſured againſt all forraine enemies, domeſtical conſpiracies, and ſuch Tyrants as of old had raigned therein: but freed from the neceſſitie of baniſhing, or murdering, the moſt worthie Citizens; as alſo from all factions, inteſtine ſeditions, and a thouſand the like miſeries, that were wont to grow out of the iealouſie, wherein they held their libertie in vaine. Neither enioyed that Citie, from her firſt foundation, any ſuch long time of happineſſe, as that wherein it flouriſhed, when it reſted ſecure vnder the protection of Rome; and was no more moleſted, by the diſeaſe of ambition; whereof by Marcellus his victorie it was throughly cured. But ſuch benefit, ariſing from wrongs done, ſerues not to make iniuſtice the more excuſable: vnleſſe we ſhould approue the anſwere of that Theefe, who being found to haue ſtollen a ſiluer cup from a ſicke man, ſaid, He neuer leaues drinking.

By the treaſon of Mericus, the Roman Army was let into poſſeſſion of all Syracuſe: wherin, the booty that it found, was ſaid to haue been no leſſe, than could haue beene hoped for, if they had taken Carthage it ſelfe; that maintained warre by Land and Sea againſt them. All the goodly works and Imageries, wherewith Syracuſe was maruellouſly adorned, were carried away to Rome; and nothing left vntouched; ſaue only the houſes of thoſe baniſhed men, that had eſcaped from Hippocrates and Epicides, into the Roman campe. Among other pittifull accidents; the death of Archimedes was greatly lamented, euen by Marcellus himſelfe. He was ſo buſie about his Geometrie, in drawing figures, that he harkened not to the noiſe, and vprore in the Citie; no, nor greatly attended the rude Souldier that was about to kill him. Marcellus took heauily the death of him; and cauſed his body to bee honourably buried. Vpon his Tombe (as he had ordained in his life time) was placed a Cylinder and a Sphere, with an inſcription of the proportion betweene them; which hee firſt found out. An Inuention of ſo little vſe, as this may ſeeme, pleaſed that great Artiſt better, than the deuiſing of all thoſe engines, that made him ſo famous. Such difference is betweene the iudgement of learned men, and of the vulgar ſort. For many an one would thinke the monie loſt, that had been ſpent vpon a ſonne, whoſe ſtudies, in the Vniuerſitie had brought forth ſuch fruit, as the proportion betweene a Sphere and a Cylinder.

After the taking of Syracuſe, all the Townes in Sicil yeelded vnto the Romans; except Agrigentum and a few places thereabout. At Agrigentum lay Epicides with one Hanno a Carthaginian, and Mutines an African, that was lately ſent from Hannibal. This Mutines, by many good peeces of ſeruice, had added ſome credit to the beaten Carthaginian ſide; and withall made his owne name great. By his perſwaſions, Hanno and Epicides aduentured to meet Marcellus without the Towne, and not behaue themſelues as men expecting to be beſieged. Neither was hee more valiant in counſell, than in execution. Once and againe he ſet vpon the Romans, where they lay encamped; and droue them fearefully into their Trenches. This bred enuie in Epicides and Hanno: eſpecially in Hanno, that having beene lately ſent from Carthage, with commiſſion and authoritie from the State, thought himſelfe wronged greatly by Hannibal; in that he had ſent vnto him this Mutines, to be his Companion, and to take vpon him, like as good a man as himſelfe. The indignitie ſeemed the greater, when Mutines, being to ſtep aſide vnto Heraclea, for the pacifying of ſome troubles there among the Numidians; aduiſed (as directing Hanno and Epicides) not to meddle with the enemie, vntill his returne. So much therefore the rather would Hanno fight: and offered battell vnto Marcellus, before he ſought it. It is like, that a great part of the Roman Armie was left behinde in Syracuse, as neede required: which made the Carthaginians the better able to deale with those that came against them. But whatsoeuer disproportion was betweene the two Armies; farre greater were the oddes betweene the Captaines. For howsoeuer the people of Carthage would giue authoritie by fauour; yet could they not giue worth, and abilitie, in matter of warre. The Numidians, hauing before conceiued some displeasure against their Captaines: and being therefore some of them gone away to Heraclea; were much more offended, when they saw that the vaine-glorious enuie of Hanno carried him vnto the fight, vpon a foolish desire to get victorie, without the helpe of Mutines their Countriman. Wherefore they sent vnto the Roman Generall, and bade him be confident: for that it was not their purpose to shew themselues his enemies that day; but onely looke on, and see the proud Carthaginians well beaten, by whom they had beene misused. They made good their promise; and had their desire. For Marcellus, finding likelihood of truth in their message, did so lustily set vpon the enemies, that he brake them at the first charge; and with the slaughter of many thousands, droue them backe into Agrigentum.

If Hanno could haue beene contented, to follow the directions of one, that was a better man of warre than himselfe, and not haue hazarded a battell without neede; the Romans would shortly haue been reduced into termes of great difficulty in their Sicilian warre. For Marcellus was shortly after to leaue the Prouince; and soone vpon his departure, there landed in the Iland a supply of eight thousand foote, and three thousand Numidian horse, that were sent from Carthage. The fame of this new Armie drew many of the Sicilians into rebellion. The Roman Armie, consisting (for the most part) of the Legions of Cannæ, tooke it very hainously, that no good seruice done, could bring them into the fauour of the Senate; but that, as banished men, they were sent farre from home, and not suffered to returne back to Rome with their Generall. Mutines had pacified his Countrimen the Numidians; and, like an honest man, did the best that he could for those whom he serued, without contending against the foolish pride of Hanno; finding that there was a great alteration; and a greater might haue beene, if the Armie lately ouerthrowne had beene entire. M. Cornelius, the Roman Pretor, vsed all diligence, both to pacifie his owne men, and to hinder the Carthaginians. He recouered those inland Townes that had rebelled: and though he could not hinder Mutines from ouer-running all the Countrie; yet hee hindred the Countrie from reuolting vnto Mutines. Aboue threescore Townes, great and small, the Carthaginians held in Sicil: of which, Agrigentum was the principall, and farre bigger than any of the rest. Thence issued Mutines as often as he pleased, in despight of the Romans: not only to the succor of his owne adherents, but to the great waste of those that followed the contrarie part. But Hanno, in stead of being pleased with all these good seruices, was filled more and more with enuie, against the man that performed them. He had (belike) receiued instruction from old Hanno at Carthage, not to suffer Hannibal, or any Hannibalian, to haue share in the honor of these Sicilian warres: which were therefore perhaps the more diligently supplied; whilest Italie was neglected, that should haue been regarded more then all the rest. Wherefore, to shew his authoritie, and that it was not in the power of Hannibal, to appoint vnto him an Assistant, or Director: Hee tooke away from Mutines his charge, and gaue it to his owne sonne; thinking thereby to discountenance the man, and make him little esteemed, as one out of Office, among his Numidians. But it fell out quite contrary: and this spightfull dealing, occasioned the losse of whatsoeuer the Carthaginians held in Sicil. For the Numidians were so incensed by the indignitie offered vnto their Countriman, being such a braue Commander, that they offered him their seruice to requite the wrong; and were thenceforth absolutely at his owne disposition. M. Valerius Læuinus, the Roman Consul, was newly come into the Prouince, when this fell out: and with him did Mutines enter into intelligence. For he could no longer brooke these indignities: but being, neither a Carthaginian, nor fauoured by thoſe that bore all the ſway in Carthage; He thought it the wiſeſt way, to play the beſt of his owne game, and forſake that Citie, which was likely to periſh by the euill counſell that gouerned it. He did not therefore, as his Countrimen had lately done, content himſelfe to ſee his Aduerſaries reape the bitter fruits of their owne malicious ouer-weening: and to ſuffer that harme, in doing whereof hee would not beare a part; but conſpired againſt them to deliuer vp Agrigentum, and to helpe to expell them vtterly out of Sicil. The Conſul was glad of his friendſhip: and carefully followed his aduertiſements. Neither was there much cunning needfull, to the performance of that which Matines had vnder-taken. For hee with his Numidians did forcibly ſeize vpon a gate; whereat they let in ſome Roman Companies, that lay neere in a readineſſe for the purpoſe. Hanno, when firſt hee heard the noiſe, thought it had beene no worſe matter, than ſome ſuch tumult of the Numidians, as hee had beene well acquainted with of late. But when, making haſte to pacifie the trouble, he ſaw and heard, the Romans intermixed, among thoſe diſcontented followers of Matines, forthwith he betooke himſelfe to flight: and ſauing himſelfe, with Epicides, in a ſmall Barke, ſet ſaile for Africk; leauing all his Armie and Adherents in Sicil, to the mercie of the Romans, that henceforward continued maſters of the whole Iland.

Læuinus the Conſul hauing taken Agrigentum, did ſharpe execution of juſtice vpon all the Citizens. The principall of them hee ſcourged with rods, and afterwards beheaded, as was the manner of the Romans: all the reſt of them he ſold for ſlaues, and confiſcated their goods; ſending home to Rome the monie that was raiſed of the bootie. This was indeede a time, wherein Rome ſtood in no leſſe neceſſitie of gold, than of ſteele: which may haue beene the reaſon, why Læuinus dealt ſo cruelly with the Agrigentines. Neuertheleſſe the fame of ſuch ſeueritie bred a terrour among all the Dependants of the Carthaginians; ſo that in great haſte they ſought to make their peace. About fortie Townes yeelded themſelues quickly vnto the Romans; twentie were deliuered vp by Treaſon; and ſixe onely ſtaied to bee wonne by force. Theſe things done, Læuinus returned home to Rome: carrying with him about foure thouſand men from Agatirna; that were a companie of outlawes, bankrouts, and baniſhed men, accuſtomed to liue by ſpoile of others, in theſe troubleſome times. He beſtowed them about Rhegium in Italie, where they might exerciſe their occupation againſt the Brutians; a theeuiſh kinde of people, that were enemies vnto thoſe of Rhegium, and to the Romans. As for Matines, he was well rewarded, and made Citizen of Rome: where he liued in good accompt; accompanying the two Scipio's in their journie againſt Antiochus, and therein doing (as it is ſaid) very eſpeciall ſeruice. So by this enterpriſe of Sicil, the Carthaginians waſted much of their forces, that with greater profit might haue beene emploied in Italie: leauing yet vnto the Romans, in the end of this warre, the entire poſſeſſion of this Iland; which they wanted when it beganne.

§. XVI.

How the warre paſſed betweene the Romans and HANNIBAL in Italie, from the taking of Capua to the great victorie at Metaurus.

SHortly after the winning of Capua, Marcellus came to Rome: where for his good ſeruices done in the Iland of Sicil, he had granted vnto him the honour of the leſſer Triumph, which vvas called Ouation. The greater Triumph was denied him: becauſe hee had not finiſhed the warre, but vvas faine to leaue his Armie behinde him in the Prouince. Hee ſtaied not long in Rome, before hee vvas againe choſen Conſul together with with M. Valerius Læuinus, who ſucceeded him in the gouernement of Sicil, and was, at the time of his election, making warre againſt King Philip in Greece. Great complaint was made againſt the Conſul Marcellus, by the Syracuſians, for that which he had done vnto them: they alledging their great friendſhip to the people of Rome, in the time of their late King Hiero; and affirming, that their Citie did neuer willingly break the alliance, excepting when it was oppreſſed by ſuch Tyrants, as were not greater enemies to Rome, than to all good men that liued in Syracuſe. The Conſul, on the other ſide, reckoned vp the labours and dangers whereunto they had put him: willing them to bemoane themſelues to the Carthaginians that had holpen them in their neceſſitie; and not vnto the Romans whom they had kept out. Thus each part hauing ſome good matter to alledge, the Senate made ſuch an end of the controuerſie, as beſt agreed with the benefit of their owne Common-wealth: blaming the too much rigour of Marcellus; yet not reſtoring the bootie that hee had taken, nor making the Syracuſians free from their ſubjection, but comforting them, with gentle words, and hopefull promiſes, as hath been ſhewed before. The two new Conſuls, Marcellus and Læuinus, were appointed to make warre, as their lots ſhould fall out; the one in Italie; the other in Sicil. The Iſle of Sicil fell vnto Marcellus: which Prouince he willingly changed with his Colleague; to the end that the Syracuſians (whoſe cauſe had not as yet beene heard in the Senate) might not ſeeme hindred by feare, from vttering their grieuances freely. Afterwards, when his buſineſſe with them was diſpatcht, hee gently vndertooke the patronage of them: which remained long in his Familie; to the great benefit of their Country in times following. So Valerius, the other Conſul, was ſent into Sicil, whoſe doings there haue beene alreadie rehearſed: but Marcellus was emploied againſt Hannibal.

Before the Conſuls departed out of Rome, they were much troubled with preſſing of Souldiers to the warre; and moſt of all, with getting Mariners for their Nauie. They were all of the poorer ſort, that vſed to be emploied in Sea-ſeruices; eſpecially in rowing. Theſe could not liue without preſent wages: neither was there monie enough in the Treaſurie to giue them pay. Wherefore it was ordained, that they ſhould be ſet out at the expence of priuate men; who, in this neceſſitie of the ſtate, were driuen to ſuſtaine all publike charges. Hereat the People murmured: and were readie to fall into ſedition; had not the Conſuls deferred the matter vnto further conſideration. The Senate could ill tell, what to determine or doe, in a caſe of ſuch extremitie. For manifeſt it was, that the multitude had alreadie endured ſo much, as well it could vnder-goe; and ſomewhat more, than could with honeſtie haue been impoſed vpon it. Neuertheleſſe it was impoſſible to maintaine the warre againſt the Carthaginians, or to keepe the Macedonian out of Italie, without a ſtrong fleet. Wherefore, ſome were of opinion; That, ſince the common Treaſure was ſo emptie, the people muſt be forced, by right or wrong, to take the burden vpon them. At laſt the Conſuls beganne to ſay, That no perſwaſions would be ſo effectuall with the people, as good examples: and that if the Senators would follow the Conſuls, like it was, that the People alſo would follow the Senate. Wherefore they propounded, and it was immediately concluded, That euery one of them ſhould bring forth, and put into the Treaſurie, all the monie that hee had; and that no Senator ſhould keepe any veſſell of gold, or plate whatſoeuer; excepting one ſalt-ſeller, and a boule wherewith to make their offerings vnto the gods; as alſo a Ring for himſelfe, with ſuch other tokens of ingenuitie for his wife and children, as euery one did vſe, and thoſe of as ſmall value as might be. This aduice of the Conſuls was not more thankfully accepted by the Senate, than the ready performance thereof by the Senate was highly applauded; and haſtily followed by the Gentlemen of Rome. Neither did the Commonaltie refuſe to doe that, which their betters had openly done before them. For ſince the publike neceſſity could no otherwiſe be holpen, euery one was contented, that his priuate eſtate ſhould runne the ſame fortune with the Common-wealth; which if it ſuffered wrack, in vaine could any particular man hope to enjoy the benefit of his proper ſubſtance. This magnanimitie deſerued well that greatneſſe of Empire, whereof it was the foundation.

Conuenient order being thus taken for an Armie and Fleet: Marcellus went forth of the Citie againſt Hannibal; and Læuinus toward Sicil. The armie of Hannibal was greatly diminiſhed, by long and hard ſeruice: neither did his Carthaginians ſeeme to remember him, and thinke vpon ſending the promiſed ſupply, or any ſuch proportion as he needed. His credit alſo among his Italian friends, was much weakned, by the loſſe of Capua: which gaue them cauſe to looke vnto themſelues; as if in his helpe there were little truſt to be repoſed, when they ſhould ſtand in need. This he well perceiued; yet could not tell how to remedy. Either he muſt thruſt Garriſons into all Townes that he ſuſpected, and therby ſo diminiſh his armie, that he ſhould not bee able to keepe the field: or elſe hee muſt leaue them to their owne fidelitie; which now beganne to wauer. At length his jealouſie grew ſo outragious, that he ſacked, and waſted, thoſe places that he was vnable to defend: thinking that the beſt way to enrich himſelfe; and make vnprofitable, to his enemies, the purchaſe from which he could not hinder them. But by this example, many were quite alienated from him; and ſome of thoſe, whom before he had leaſt cauſe to doubt. The towne of Salapia yeelded vnto Marcellus: and betraied vnto him a gallant Regiment of Numidian horſe, the beſt of all that ſerued vnder Hannibal; which was a greater loſſe, then the Towne it ſelfe. Blaſius the author of this rebellion, could not bring his deſire to effect; without getting the conſent of one Daſius, that was his bitter enemie. Wherefore he brake the matter to this Daſius in priuate; and was by him accuſed vnto Hannibal. But when he was conuented, and charged of Treaſon, he ſo ſtoutly denied it, and by way of recrimination, ſo vehemently preſſed his accuſer with the ſame fault: that Hannibal thought it a matter deuiſed out of meere malice; knowing well what enemies they were; and ſeeing, that neither of them could bring any proofe of what he affirmed. This notwithſtanding, Blaſius did not ceaſe to preſſe his aduerſarie anew, and vrge him from time to time, with ſuch liuely reaſons; that he who could not be belieued by Hannibal, was contented at length to winne the fauor of Marcellus. Preſently after this, the Conſul tooke by force, Maronea and Meles, Townes of the Samnites: wherein hee ſlew about three thouſand of Hannibal his men.

Hannibal could not looke to all at once: but was faine to catch aduantages, where he might get them; the Romans now being growne ſtronger in the field than hee. The beſt was, that his Carthaginians, hauing wearied themſelues with ill ſpeede in many pettie enterpriſes, and laide aſide all this while the care of Italie, to follow buſines of farre leſſe importance; had now at length reſolued, to ſend preſently the great ſupply, that had beene ſo long promiſed and expected. This if they had done in better ſeaſon; Rome it ſelfe might haue beene ſtrucken downe, the next yeere after that great blow receiued at Cannæ. But ſince that which is paſt cannot be amended: Hannibal muſt force himſelfe to make a good countenance; and tell his followers, that this mighty ſuccour would come time enough. For Maſaniſſa was at Carthage with fiue thouſand Numidians, ready to ſet ſaile for Spaine: whither when hee came, it was appointed, that Aſdrubal ſhould forthwith take his journie into Italie; of which there had beene ſo long talke. Theſe newes did not more comfort Hannibal and his followers, than terrifie the Romans. Wherefore each did their beſt: the Romans to preuent the threatning miſchiefe, and winne as much as they could vpon Hannibal, before the comming of his brother; Hannibal, on the contrarie, to hold his owne, and weaken the Romans as much as he was able. He had intelligence, that Cn. Fuluius, a Roman Pretor, lay neere vnto Herdonea to get the Towne by practice. It was not long, ſince, neere vnto the ſame place, another Cn. Fuluius had loſt his armie. Therefore Hannibal made great marches thitherward; and came to Herdonea ere Fuluius heard newes of his approch. As ſoone as he came, he offered battaile to the Roman Pretor: who accepted it with more haſte than good ſpeede. The Roman Legions made good resistance a while, till they were compassed round with the Carthaginian horse. Then fell they to rowt; and great slaughter was made of them. Fulvius himselfe, vvith twelue Tribunes or Coronels, vvere lost: of the common souldiers that were slaine, the number is vncertaine; some reporting seuen, others thirteene thousand. The Towne of Herdonea, because it was at point to haue yeelded vnto Fulvius, Hannibal did set on fire: and putting those to death that had practised with the Enemie, carried away the multitude; whom hee bestowed among the Thurians and Metapontines. The Consul Marcellus hearing of this, wrote vnto the Senate: and exhorted them to be of a good cheare; for that he would shortly abate the enemies pride. Hee followed the Carthaginian apace; and ouer-taking him at Numistro in the countrie of the Lucans, fought with him a battaile: which beginning at nine of the clock in the morning, lasted vntill night; and ended, by reason of the darkenesse, with vncertaine victorie. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apulia, whither Marcellus followed him. At Venusia they met, and had many skirmishes; but none of importance. Hannibal remoued often; and sought to bring the enemie within danger of some ambush. But Marcellus, though he was very eager of battaile, would yet aduenture nothing, but by open day-light and vpon faire ground.

Thus passed the time away, vntill Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fulvius, he that lately had taken Capua, were chosen Consuls. Fabius, considering how much the Roman affaires were bettered by the taking of Capua, purposed that yeere to besiege Tarentum: which if he could winne; like it was, that scarce one good Citie would afterwards remaine true to Hannibal. Wherfore he vehemently exhorted his Colleague, and Marcellus, (to whom was continued the command of those Legions that serued vnder him the yeere before) to presse the Carthaginian so hard, as he might haue no leisure to helpe Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge: for hee thought no Roman fitter than himselfe, to deale with Hannibal in open field. Hee followed him therefore to Cannusium, and thence from place to place: desiring euer to come to battaile, but vpon equall termes. The Carthaginian had not minde to hazard much in fight: but thought it enough to entertaine his enemie with skirmish; as being desirous to keep his Army strong vntill the comming of Asdrubal. Yet could he not auoide the importunitie of Marcellus; nor brooke the indignitie of being daily braued. He therefore bade his men to be lustie, and to beat soundly this hot-spirited Roman Captaine, that would neuer suffer them to bee at quiet; vntill they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him bloud. Hereupon followed a battaile: wherein Hannibal had the victorie; tooke sixe Ensignes; and slue of the Romans almost three thousand, among which were some of marke. Marcellus was so impatient of this dishonour, that hee rated his men, as Pesants, and base cowards: telling them, that they were the first of the Roman Legions, which had beene beaten by Hannibal, by plaine force and manhood; without being circumuented by any stratageme. With these, and many other the like words, which they were ashamed to heare, hee did so vexe them; that thinking themselues better able to endure any violence of the enemie, than such displeasure of their Generall; they besought him to pardon them, and leade them forth once againe to fight. He did so: and placing those Companies formost, that had lost their Ensignes the day before, bade them be carefull to winne a victorie; whereof the newes might bee at Rome, before the report of their shamefull ouerthrow. Hannibal was angrie, to see that nothing could make this Enemie quiet: and therefore vvas readie to fight againe; since all other motiues continued the same, and his men had beene heartned by the late victorie. But the Romans were stirred vp with desire of reuenge, and of repairing their honor lost, which affections gaue a sharpe edge vnto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were growne dull, and wearie by seeing themselues disappointed of their hope; and the enemie, notwithstanding their late victorie, as readie to molest them as before. In this second battaile Marcellus got the victorie: which hee purchased at so deare deare a rate; that neither hee, nor Hannibal, had great cauſe to vaunt, the ſecond night. For if eight thouſand of the Carthaginians were ſlaine, and three thouſand of the Roman ſide, in this next battaile, the difference was no greater, than euen to recompence the late receiued ouerthrow: eſpecially ſince the number of the Romans that were wounded, was ſo great, as diſabled Marcellus from purſuing Hannibal; who diſlodged by night. Neuertheleſſe it ſufficed, that Fabius the Conſul hereby got leiſure, to follow his buſineſſe at Tarentum without any diſturbance. Q. Fuluius the other Conſul, about the ſame time, tooke in many of the Hirpines, Lucans, and Volſcentes, that willingly yeelded themſelues, and betraied the Garriſons of Hannibal that lay in their Townes: whom Fuluius entertained in louing ſort; gently rebuking them for their errours paſt, without puniſhing thoſe that had been authors, or buſie doers in the rebellion. That rabble of Sicilian theeues, which Læuinus had lately brought from Agaterna, was then alſo ſet on work to beſiege Caulonia, a towne of the Brutians: and nothing was omitted, that might ſerue to diuert Hannibal, from the ſuccour of Tarentum.

Q. Fabius the Conſul, hauing taken Manduria a Towne of the Salentines, ſate downe before Tarentum: making all preparation that ſeemed needfull to carrie it, either by aſſault or long ſiege. Of the Garriſons in the Towne a good part were Brutians, placed there by Hannibal, vnder a Captaine of their owne Nation. This Captaine fell in loue with a Tarentine wench; whoſe brother ſerued vnder Fabius. Hereof, ſhee gaue notice by letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman ſide; by telling him how rich, and of what great accompt her louer was. But her brother made the Conſul acquainted with theſe newes: and ſaid, that if the Brutian were farre in loue, hee might perhaps be wonne, by intreatie of his Miſtris, to doe what ſhee would haue him. The Conſul hearing this: and finding likelihood in the matter, willed his ſouldier to conuey himſelfe into the Towne as a fugitiue; and trie what good might be done. It fell out, according to his deſire. The Souldier grew acquainted with this Brutian Captaine: and partly by his owne perſwaſions, partly by the flattering entreatie of his ſiſter; wanne him to betray the Towne to the Romans. When they had agreed vpon the buſineſſe, and reſolued how to order it; the ſame ſouldier got out of the Towne by night, and acquainted the Conſul with his proceedings: telling him, in which part that Brutian kept watch, and what might conueniently be done. So in the night time, Fabius gaue an alarme to the Citie; eſpecially about thoſe parts of the wall, which were fartheſt from the place where he meant to enter. The Captaines in the Towne, prepared to make reſiſtance in thoſe places, where the noiſe did threaten them with greateſt likelihood of danger. But Fabius himſelfe, with the choice of his men, came in great ſilence to the quarter of the Brutians: who being wrought by their Captaine, helped the Romans to get vp, and breake open the next gate; whereat the Armie was let in. The Tarentines, and Carthaginian ſoldiers, made head againſt Fabius in the Market-place: but (as hapneth in like caſes, where the maine confidence is already taken away) not very obſtinately. Nico, Democrates, and Philomenes, with thoſe that before had let in Hannibal, vſed now the laſt of their courage in dying againſt the Romans. Carthalo, who commanded the Garriſon within the Towne, offered himſelfe priſoner: hoping to be well vſed, becauſe of hoſpitality that had paſſed betweene his Father and the Conſul. But he was ſlaine by the way, ere he could come at Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the ſword: in ſuch ſort, that they ſpared few of the Brutians. This ſlaughter of the Brutians, was thought to haue beene made by appointment of the Conſul, to the end that hee might ſeeme to haue wonne the Towne by force and not by treaſon: though he thereby failed of his purpoſe; and neither had the glorie which he expected, nor preſerued his reputation of faithfull dealing, and keeping his word. The bootie found in Tarentum was very great: whereof the Roman Treaſurie, whither it was carried, had great neede. As for the Imageries, and other curioſities, that were in the Citie, Fabius was contented to let them alone: and being being told of some Idols, that seemed worthie to be carried away, being very goodly pieces, in such habit and posture as if they were fighting: he said, Let vs leaue vnto the Tarentines their angrie gods.

Hannibal being gotten cleare from Marcellus, fell vpon those that besieged Caulonia. They fled at his comming: but hee was so neere, that they were faine to betake them to a Hill, which serued to no other purpose, than to beare off the first brunt. There they defended themselues a little while, and then they yeelded. When this businesse was done, hee hasted away to relieue Tarentum. But when hee came within fiue miles of the Citie, he had newes that it was lost. This grieued him: yet hee said no more than this, The Romans haue also their HANNIBAL; we haue lost Tarentum in such sort as we got it. That he might not seeme to turne back amazed, or in any feare of the victorious Consul; he incamped a few daies together, so neere as hee was vnto Tarentum: and thence departing to Metapontum, bethought himselfe how to take Fabius in a trap. He caused the chiefe of the Metapontines to write vnto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison; with condition, that he should in that respect, forgiue them all offences past. These letters were sent by two yong men of the same Citie: who did their errand so well; that the Consul wrote back by them vnto the Metapontins, and appointed the day, when they should expect him. Hereof Hannibal was exceeding glad: and at good leisure, made readie his ambushes for the warie Fabius. But whether some secret notice of the plot were giuen; or whether indeede (as it is related) some tokens in sacrificing, terrified the superstitious Roman; the journie to Metapontum was deferred. Hereupon the same two Messengers were emploied againe: but being apprehended, and threatned with torture, they discouered all.

This yeere was happie to the Romans, in all their warres: for they got euery where; saue onely at Caulonia; where they lost a companie of such lewd fellowes, that it may seeme good fortune, to haue so been rid of them. But their common pouertie, and disabilitie to maintaine their charge, continued, and grew greater than it was before. Thirtie Roman Colonies were then in Italie: of which, twelue refused to contribute any longer to the warres. For it was considered; that the Legions of Canna, and those vnhappie Companies, that had beene beaten vnder the one and the other Cn. Fuluius; were transported into Sicil; where they liued, in a sort, as banished men. This grieued their friends at home, and made them reckon vp the more diligently those other miseries which they daily felt. Ten yeeres together they had beene exhausted with leuies of men, and impositions of monie: in euery of which yeeres they had receiued some notable ouerthrow. In this case the least that they could feare; or rather the best which they could hope; was, to fall into the hands of the enemie to bee made prisoners. For Hannibal did gently send home their people that vvas taken by him: whereas the Romans did banish from their homes, those that had escaped. It was therefore likely to come to passe within a while, that they should be all consumed: since new Souldiers were daily pressed forth of their Townes; and the old ones neuer did returne. Such talke was frequent among those of the Colonies: especially where they that were transported into Sicil, had most compassionate friends. Wherefore it was concluded by the people of Ardea, Sutrium, Alba, and other good Townes, to the number of twelue, That they should boldly denie vnto the Romans, their fathers helpe. This was thought the likeliest way to obtaine peace: whereof otherwise they saw little hope, as long as Hannibal liued. When the Consuls heard the Embassadors of these townes make such declaration, and protest their disabilitie of giuing any farther help; they were much amazed. They willed the Embassadours to returne home, and bring a better answere, forasmuch as this was none other than treason: they bade them to consider, that the people were not Campans, or Tarentines, but the off-spring of the Romans; and no lesse partakers of the Empire, than they that inhabited the Mother-Citie. But all would not serue: the Embassadours continuing to protest, that they

they had already done what they could; and that they had remayning, neither men, nor money. It was well for the Romans, that the other eighteene Colonies did not imitate these twelue; but shewed themselues willing to vndergoe whatsoeuer should be layed vpon them, without shrinking vnder the burden. This their offer was so highly pleasing to the Consuls; that the Embassadors of those faithfull Colonies, were brought vnto the Senate, and produced into the Assembly of the people: where, with commemoration of all their former good seruices, this their present loue vnto the State was magnified, & thankes accordingly bestowed vpon them; with promise, that it should not be forgotten. As for the Embassadors of those twelue Colonies, that refused to contribute; it was thought best, neither to retaine them in the Citie, nor yet to dismisse them nor take any notice of them at all; but leaue them to their owne consideration of their ill deseruing.

It may greatly be doubted, what the example of these twelue people would haue wrought, in those that were so willing to helpe the State, if Asdrubal had been then comming into Italie. For then must the Romans haue betaken themselues wholly to their owne defence; whereas now, to the great comfort of their subiects, they employed their forces in the conquest of Italie, with hopefull and fortunate successe. Neuertheless, they were faine to open their most priuie treasurie; and thence take out the golde, that had beene layed vp to serue them in cases of greatest extremitie. Of the mony thus extracted, one quarter was deliuered to Fabius the Consul, to set him well out against the Tarentines; all the rest was sent into Spaine to Scipio, for the maintenance of his Armie; and to prouide, that Asdrubal might not passe from thence into Italie. It is likely that Fabius did not spend all his money; finding such easie successe at Tarentum, as was shewed before. But to stop the iourney of Asdrubal; neither the money sent into Spaine, nor any victories wonne by Scipio could suffice. Neuertheless it fell out happily for the People of Rome, that this yeare, and the next, were spent, before his comming; and they better prepared, than at lesse warning they could haue beene, to entertaine him. Here it were not amisse to note, That since the Romans, being in so great necessity of money, were driuen to furnish the Armie in Spaine, with the greatest part of all their stocke that was left: it must needes bee, that either the bootie taken in new Carthage, was farre lesse then fame had reported it; or else that Scipio had not as yet wonne it: howsoeuer Liuie rather inclines to those, who say that he got it soone after his arriuall.

M. Claudius Marcellus, and T. Quintus Crispinus, were chosen Consuls after Fabius and Fuluius. In their yeere it was, that Asdrubal tooke his iourney out of Spaine, though he came not into Italie vntill the yeere following. After the great battaile at Canne, Hannibal had lost much time about Cumæ and Naples, in seeking to make himselfe Master of a good hauen, for the landing of those succours that were promised from Carthage. The hope that he reposed in Philip, caused him to turne his principall care to the Easterne parts of Italie; where he made readie a faire entrance for the Macedonian, if hee had beene readie to come. But since his hope was vanished, and the long promised succour of Asdrubal was (though farre later then had beene expedient) readie to arriue: he began to deale with the people of Hetruria, through whose Countries his brother was to passe, that therein hee might make a partie against the Romans. The losse of Capua, Tarentum, and many other Townes, might haue terrified all other of the Italian Townes, from harkening to any sollicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the pouerty of the Roman, and the wearines of their adherents, together with the fame of a greater Armie comming, then that which Hannibal brought into Italie; did emboldē many of the Hetrurians, especially the Aretines, to take such counsel as they thought most expedient for themselues, without regard of their fidelitie to Rome. The Roman Senat, hearing the rumour of their conspiracie, sent Marcellus the new chosen Consul into Hetruria: whose comming did so terrific them, that they rested quiet for a while. All the yere following they were deuising how to breake out: as contrariwise the Roman Propretors; partly by terror of seuere iudgements and inquisitions; and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which they visited all suspected places, kept them honest against their wills; and tooke many Hostages for better assurance. The two Consuls had an earnest desire, to make strong warre vpon Hannibal without more temporising: perswading themselues, that in battaile they should be too strong for him. Crispinus had further his particular desire, to make his Consulship notable by the winning of some good Towne: as Fuluius and Fabius had gotten honour by Capua and Tarentum. Therefore he went about the siege of Locri; one of the best Cities which the Carthaginian then held in Italie: and brought thither all sorts of engines; sending for a fleet out of Sicil to helpe him. But Hannibal was not slow to relieue the Citie: the fame of whose approch, made Crispinus desist from his enterprise and retire vnto his Colleague, that lay at Venusia. Thither followed Hannibal; to whom the Consuls daily offered battaile. This great man of warre had no neede to stand vpon his reputation: which was alreadie so confirmed, that his refusing to fight, was not likely to be ascribed vnto feare; but rather deemed as part of his wisdome. He entertained the Consuls with many light skirmishes, and sought to take them at some aduantage; reseruing his owne numbers as full as he could, vnto a time of greater employment. In this lingring manner of Warre, Marcellus tooke no pleasure: but sought to compell the Enemie to battaile, whether he would or no. The Admiral of the Roman fleet about Sicil, L. Cincius, was commanded againe to assaile the Towne of Locri: which might well enough be forced, if Hannibal continued as he beganne to trifle away the time at Venusia. To the same purpose a part of the Garrison that lay in Tarentum, was appointed to goe by Land to the assistance of Cincius. But Hannibal had an eye behinde him. He laid an ambush in the way, betweene Tarentum and Locri, whereinto the Romans fell: and hauing lost aboue three thousand of their companie, were well glad, the rest of them, to quit their enterprise, and saue their owne liues within Tarentum. As for the Consuls, it was the desire of Hannibal, to waste their Armie by little and little: which to doe, hee neglected no aduantage. There lay betweene him and them an Hillock, ouer-growne with wood, that seemed fit to couer a number of men: who lying there vndiscerned, might fall vpon such, as should straggle from the Roman campe; and cut them off. Therefore he sent thither by night some companies of Numidians: whom hee willed to keepe themselues close, and attend their best aduantage. To this piece of ground, the Consuls thought it fit to remoue their Campe: Marcellus thinking that he neuer lay neere enough vnto Hannibal. Thither therefore both of them rode to view the place, accompanied with the sonne of Marcellus, a few Colonells, and other principall men; and not many more than two hundred horse, most of them Hetrurians. The Numidian Centinell gaue warning of their approach to his fellowes; who discouered not themselues, vntill they had surrounded the Consuls and their traine. The Consuls, as necessitie compelled them, defended themselues: hoping to be quickly relieued from their campe that was neere at hand. But the Hetrurians ranne away from them, at the first: and left them in that great danger, to the weake assistance of no more than fortie horse-men, that were of the Colonie of Fregellæ. These Fregellans abode by the Consulls; and did what they could to haue brought them safe off. But when Marcellus was stricken thorow with a Lance, and fell downe dead; then beganne euerie one to shift for himselfe, and escape as they might. Crispinus the other Consull, had his deaths wound, being stricken with two Darts; and yong Marcellus was likewise wounded; yet these two recouered their campe: The rest of the Colonells and Officers; together with the Lictors that carried the bundles of Rods and Axes before the Consuls, were all slaine or taken. To the dead bodie of the Consull Marcellus, Hannibal gaue honourable Funerall, according to the custome of those times: and

beſtowing his aſhes in a ſiluer pot, couered it with a crowne of gold; and ſo ſent them to yong Marcellus, to be by him interred, where he thought good.

Preſently after this, Criſpinus bethought himſelfe, how that the ſignet Ring of Marcellus was fallen into the cuſtodie of Hannibal; who might vſe it, to his owne purpoſes, ere that which had hapned were well knowne abroad. Wherefore hee ſent word vnto all the Townes about; that his Colleague was ſlaine, and that Hannibal had gotten his Ring: wiſhing them in that regard, to giue no credit vnto any letters therewithall ſigned. This prouidence of Criſpinus was not more than requiſite. For his Meſſenger was but a little before come to Salapia, when another Meſſenger arriued there ſent from Hannibal, bringing letters in the name of Marcellus, and ſealed with the captiue Ring; whereof the contents were: That it was his purpoſe to come the ſame night vnto Salapia; where he willed, that the Souldiers of the Garriſon ſhould be in a readineſſe, for ſuch employment as he ſhould thinke needfull. The deuice was plaine: and no leſſe plaine was the reuengefull minde, which he bare againſt that Citie; becauſe of his braue Numidian companies, that had therein beene betraied. The Salapians hereupon bethought themſelues, how to take their Enemie in his owne ſnare. They ſent back the Meſſenger which was a Roman fugitiue; without letting him perceiue any ſigne of diſtruſt in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readineſſe, for the entertainement of ſuch a friend. Late in the night he came thither; with a troupe of Roman fugitiues armed Roman-like, leading the way. Theſe all talking Latine together, called vnto the Watch, and bade open the gate; for the Conſul was there. The gate was opened, faire and leiſurely, and the Port-cullis drawne vp no higher than needes it muſt bee, to let them enter. But when ſixe hundred of them were gotten in, downe fell the Port-cullis againe: and they that thought to haue taken others, were taken themſelues; being laied at on all hands by the Salapians, that quickly made an ende with them.

Hannibal being thus ouer-reached with this ſtratageme, haſted away to Locri; whereunto Cincius the Admirall of the Roman fleet about Sicil, did lay hard ſiege. The firſt appearance of the Numidians, Hannibal his Vantcurrors, made the Romans in all confuſed haſte, runne to their ſhips: leauing all their engines, and whatſoeuer was in their campe, to the enemies diſpoſition.

The Roman Senate hearing of theſe accidents, ſent vnto Criſpinus the ſuruiuing Conſul, and requeſted him to name a Dictator, that might take charge of the Commonwealth, and diſpatch the election of new Magiſtrates, with other buſineſſe; whereunto himſelfe was diſabled by his hurts. Hee did ſo: and ſoone after died. Then was it thought needfull, that newe Conſuls ſhould be choſen out of hand: foraſmuch as two Roman Armies lay ſo neere vnto the Enemie, without any Generall. Eſpecially it was deſired, that Election ſhould be made of ſuch men, as were not onely valiant, but well aduiſed: ſince the beſt, and moſt fortunate of their great Darers, M. Marcellus, by looſing himſelfe ſo ſtrangely, had giuen them a faire warning, not to commit their Armie vnto raſh heads. Among thoſe that ſtood for the Conſulſhip, C. Claudius Nero, was the moſt eminent. Hee was of great Nobilitie, a good Souldier, and one, whoſe many ſeruices in this preſent warre, did forcibly commend vnto the place. Yet he ſeemed a little too violent; and one, whoſe temper needed the allay of a more ſtayed wit. The fathers therefore endeuoured to ioyne vnto him in the Conſulſhip M. Liuius: one that had borne the ſame Office, long before. This M. Liuius had been Conſul with L. Æmylius Paulus, in the yeere foregoing the beginning of this warre. After their Conſulſhip, wherein they did good ſeruice, they had both of them bin called into iudgement by the People: and this Liuius cõdemned; Æmylius hardly eſcaping. Though it hath bin once already noted; yet I cannot forbeare to remember it againe: how it pleaſed God, to vpbraid the vnthankefull Romans, with the malicious iudgement, giuen by their multitude vpon honorable men. For in the battaile of Cannæ, it was apparant, what lamentable effects,the memorie of their iniuſtice wrought: when L. Æmilius rather choſe to yeeld to the froward ignorance of his Colleague; and afterward to die in the greateſt ouerthrow, that euer fell vpon the State of Rome, than by reſiſting the pernicious courſes of Terentius Varro,to caſt himſelfe anew vpon the danger of the popular furie. As for M. Liuius, he is euen now readie, and will ſo continue, to tell the People of their faults in a diuers manner. Eight yeeres together after his condemnation had hee beene abſent out of the Citie, and liued in his Countrie Grange; vexing himſelfe with the indignitie of his condemnation. Marcellus and Læuinus, being Conſuls two or three yeeres agoe, had brought him into Rome: where he liued priuate in diſcontented ſort as might appeare, both by his careleſneſſe in apparell, and by the wearing of his long haire and beard; which in that time were the badges of men afflicted. Verie lately he was compelled by the Cenſors, to poll his haire,and come into the Senate: where hee vſed to ſit ſilent, and ſignifie his aſſent or diſlike to what was propoſed; either in ſhort formall words, or in paſſing from ſide to ſide, when the houſe was diuided. At length it hapned, that in ſome buſines weightily concerning one that was his kinſman,he ſtood vp,and made a ſet ſpeech: whereby he drew all the Fathers to attention; and bade them enquire of him,and take better notice,what he was, and what he had beene. The Senate was much altered ſince he had left it; many braue men were loſt; new ones were choſen; ſuch as rather ſerued to fill vp the number, than to anſwere to the dignitie of the place: and they that were left of ancient ſtanding,had euen ſpent their Vertues to no great effect. Wherefore, all began to ſay; that it was great pittie, ſo worthy and able a man, as this Liuius, had beene all this while forgotten; one, of whom the Common-wealth ſtood in great neede, yet had not vſed in this dangerous warre. Now ſeeing that the Conſuls ought, one of them, to be choſen a Patrician, the other, of neceſſitie a Plebeian: and ſince, neither Fabius, nor Valerius Læuinus, being both of them Patricians,could be ioyned with Claudius Nero:euery one was of opinion,that there could not be choſen and coupled together, two fitter men than C. Claudius, and this Marcus Liuius. But Liuie would not endure to heare of this. He ſaid it was vnreaſonable,that one condemned as a diſhoneſt man,ſhould afterwards be choſen Ruler of the Citie. If they had done ill to truſt him with one Conſulſhip, what meant they then to offer him another? With theſe, and the like phraſes he reſiſted their deſires: till by perſwaſions, and examples rehearſed,of ſuch as had patiently digeſted iniuries done by the People,and repaied good for euill; he was contented to accept the honour.

Here we may behold a true figure of that Embleme, with which Themiſtocles checked the ingratitude of the Athenians: reſembling himſelfe to a Plane-tree, the branches and boughes whereof men breake in faire weather; but runne vnder it for ſhelter in a ſtorme. Such vnthankefulneſſe, to well-deſeruing men, is not rarely found in the outragious multitude.Neither was the late example hereto much vnlike, of Philip the ſecond King of Spaine his dealing with the Duke of Alua. For although he had committed the Duke to priſon, vpon ſome ſmall offence conceiued, without all regard of his former deſerts: yet when his intended conqueſt of Portugal, required the ſeruice of a man, more then ordinarily ſufficient; hee ſtood no longer vpon the ſcanning of late diſpleaſures;but employed the ſame Duke,whom he had newly diſgraced. Thus is wiſdome often taught by neceſſitie.

It was a dangerous yeere toward, when C. Claudius Nero,and M. Liuius were choſen Conſuls. Aſdrubal was alreadie come into France, and waited only, to haue the waies of the Alpes thawed by warme weather,for his paſſage into Italy. The Romans vſed at this time the ſeruice of three and twentie Legions:and wanted not employment, for many more, if they had knowne how to leuie and maintaine them. Of theſe which they had, foure ſerued in Spaine, two in Sicil and two in Sardinia: the reſt were ſo diſpoſed, in ſeuerall parts of Italie, where need ſeemed to require, that only two Legions were left to each of the Conſuls. But the Conſuls were men of execution: and would not be tied to the punctuall obſeruance of what the Senate thought fit. M. Liuius would not ſtirre out of Rome, againſt ſo mightie a power as followed Aſdrubal; vntill he had firſt obtained, that hee might carry with him as many as could well be ſpared from other imploiments; and thoſe, or the moſt of them, choſen Companies. It was true, that two Legions, appointed to ſerue vnder Lucius Porcius a Pretor of that yere, among the Siſalpine Gaules, might be reckoned as an additament to the forces of Liuius; to whom the warre againſt Aſdrubal was alotted. So might alſo two other Legions, that were among the Salentines, neere vnto Tarentũ, vnder another of the Pretors, be accounted a part of Claudius his Armie; that was ſent againſt Hannibal. Neuertheleſſe the Conſuls, by the eſpeciall inſtance of Liuie, did obtaine, that all might be left to their owne diſcretion. For newes came, that Aſdrubal was alreadie paſſing the Alpes; the Ligurians, who dwelt in the Countrie about Genua, with their Neighbour people, were in readineſſe to ioyne with him; and L. Porcius ſent word, that he would aduenture no further, then hee ſafely might. When all was ordered, as themſelues thought beſt, the two Conſuls went forth of the Citie; each, his ſeuerall way. The People of Rome were now quite otherwiſe affected, than they had beene, when L. Æmylius Paulus and C. Terentius Varro, were ſent againſt Hannibal. They did no longer take vpon them, to direct their Generals; or bid them diſpatch, and winne the victorie betimes: but rather they ſtood in feare; leſt all diligence, wiſdome and valour ſhould proue too little. For ſince few yeeres had paſſed, wherein ſome one of their Generals had not beene ſlaine; and ſince it was manifeſt, that if either of theſe preſent Conſuls were defeated, or put to the worſt; the two Carthaginians would forthwith ioyne, and make ſhort worke with the other: it ſeemed a greater happineſſe than could be expected, that each of them ſhould returne home Victor; and come off with honour, from ſuch mightie oppoſition, as he was like to finde. With extreme difficultie had Rome held vp her head, euer ſince the battaile of Cannæ: though it were ſo, that Hannibal alone, with little helpe from Carthage, had continued the warre in Italie. But there was now arriued another ſonne of Amilcar; and one, that in his preſent Expedition, had ſeemed, a man of more ſufficiencie than Hannibal himſelfe. For, whereas in that long and dangerous march, through barbarous Nations, ouer great Riuers, and Mountaines, that were thought vnpaſſable, Hannibal had loſt a great part of his Armie: this Aſdrubal, in the ſame places, had multiplied his numbers; and, gathering the people that he found in the way, deſcended from the Alpes like a rowling Snow-bal, farre greater than he came ouer the Pyrenees at his firſt ſetting out of Spaine. Theſe conſiderations and the like, of which feare preſented many vnto them; cauſed the People of Rome, to wait vpon their Conſuls out of the Towne; like a penſiue traine of Mourners: thinking vpon Marcellus & Criſpinus, vpon whom in the like ſort they had giuen attendance the laſt yere; but ſaw neither of them returne aliue, from a leſſe dangerous warre. Particularly, old Q. Fabius gaue his accuſtomed aduice to M. Liuius, that he ſhould abſtaine from giuing, or taking battaile, vntill he well vnderſtood the Enemies condition. But the Conſul made him a froward anſwere, and ſaid, That he would fight the very firſt day: for that he thought it long, till he ſhould either recouer his honour by victorie; or by ſeeing the ouerthrow of his owne vniuſt Citizens, ſatisfie himſelfe with the ioy of a great, though not an honeſt, reuenge. But his meaning was better than his words.

Of the ouerthrow that Aſdrubal receiued in Spaine, by Scipio, a little before hee tooke his iournie into Italie; ſuch mention hath alreadie been made, as agreed with the report of that noble Hiſtorian Liuie. Yet I thinke it not amiſſe to adde in this place, what may be gathered out of the remaining fragments of Polybius his hiſtorie concerning that accident. Aſdrubal had wreſtled with many difficulties in Spaine; by reaſon of thoſe Captaines that were ſent from the citie of Carthage, to ioine with him in the adminiſtration of that Prouince: they being, as it may ſeeme, of the Hannonian faction; which is to ſay, thus farre forth Traitors, that they preferred the ad-

uantage of their own side, before the good of their Common-wealth. In what particulars they wronged this worthie sonne of Amilcar, and how they hindred his courses vndertaken, it cannot bee knowne: since of those bookes, wherein Polybius hath exactly handled these matters, there are to vs remaining onely a few broken pieces. But by the spightfull dealing of Hanno in Sicil with Mutines, a better man of warre than himselfe, whom Hannibal had sent into the Iland: we may conceiue, that against the brother of Hannibal it was thought needfull, by these mischieuous Partisans of Hanno, to vse the violent opposition of more earnest malice. Neuertheless Asdrubal was a good Patriot: and therefore endured patiently such indignities, as Mutines could not long digest. His iournie into Italie being resolued vpon: he lay with part of the Armie at Betula, not farre from the mines of siluer; whence he was to furnish his Expedition. Thither came Scipio: and draue him out of his Campe, though he were strongly lodged, before the other Carthaginian Captaines could, or would, come to his assistance. The ouerthrow seemes not to haue beene so great, as it must haue been supposed, if no way lay open to those that fled. Rather it appeares, that Asdrubal dealt like a prouident man, and seeing that his Campe was likely to be forced, sent away all his monie, with his Elephants before him: but staied behinde himselfe to sustaine the Romans awhile, vntill his carriages might bee out of danger. Herein he had his desire. Afterwards, he gathered his broken troups together: and retired in such sort, that Scipio thought it not good to pursue him, and so passed ouer Tagus. Then taking vnto him the forces assigned for his Expedition, he marched away toward the Pyrenees: leauing the care of Spaine vnto his brother Mago, and to Asdrubal the sonne of Gesco; that thought himselfe the fittest man for the administration thereof. Faine would Scipio haue stopped him on his iournie, by sending to defend against him the ordinarie way of the Mountaines. But whether Asdrubal tooke another way, or whether he forced the guards that Scipio had set to keepe the Pyrenees (as the defence of hard passages commonly sorts to no good effect) he was not letted in his voiage by any such impediment. Comming into Gaule, and following the steps of his brother Hannibal: he found the Nations that lay in his way, so well affected, either to him or to his monie, that no passages were defended against him, nor any sort of resistance made; but he, and his Armie, well entertained, and their numbers much increased, by accesse of such as were desirous to take his pay. Of these he had the better choice: for that he was driuen to Winter in their Countrie; whilest that the passages of the Alpes were closed vp with Ice and Snow. The Mountaines likewise, that had so greatly molested Hannibal in his iournie ouer the Alpes; were easily won to take part with Asdrubal, when he trauailed through their Countrie. For these poore men, at the first comming of Hannibal, were verily perswaded, that it was his purpose to robbe them of their cattaile; and to make spoile of that little wealth, which they had painefully scraped together out of the desolate rocks. But now in processe of time, they were better informed. Therefore vnderstanding, that there were two mightie Cities, farre disioyned asunder, which made warre vpon each other, by Land, and Sea; and that the Alpes did only lie in their way: they gladly condescended, to take their part in the fortune of the Inuaders. The like affection, vpon greater cause, was afterward found in the Cisalpine Gaules. The Ligurians also ioyned with Asdrubal: and so would the Hetrurians haue done; if he had arriued in their Countrie. There was no other Roman Armie neere, then L. Porcius with his two Legions; of whom there was no great feare. Therefore did Asdrubal set vpon Placentia a Roman Colonie: in hope to make his comming the more terrible, by the destruction of that Towne. But there hee lost a great deale of time, and finally was driuen to quit the enterprise: by vndertaking which, he gaue the Roman Consuls leisure to make readie for him; and caused his brother Hannibal (who vpon the first bruit of Asdrubal his so timely, and easily passing the Alpes, was about to leaue his wintring camps, and go forth to meet with him) to sit still awhile, as well aware, that Placentia would not be taken in haste.

C. Claudius

C. Claudius Nero the Roman Consul, made what speede hee could, to meet with Hannibal, and stop him from ioyning with his brother. He had about fortie thousand foot, and fiue hundred horse: with which he daily offered battaile to the Carthaginian; and had of him the better in many skirmishes. Hannibal was once driuen to make a tedious march from the borders of the Salentines and Apulians, into the Countrie of the Brutians, there to encrease his forces; which were otherwise too weake for the iournie intended. Afterward comming to Grumentum, a Towne of the Lucans; he there fought vnprosperously with Nero the Consul. Neuertheless he got off, and marched away to Venusia. But Nero followed him; and had there againe the better of him. Wherefore he was driuen to returne to Metapontum: where ioyning with Hanno, that had made ready a good Armie; hee assaied againe to make way by force to his brother. So he passed onward, and came againe to Venusia, hauing Nero still at his heeles. Thence went he ouer the Riuer Ausidus to Canusium, where he sate downe, not farre from the place, in which he had obtained his most memorable victorie. There also did Nero sit downe by him: and both of them rested, without making offer to fight. It seemed perhaps vnto Hannibal, who knew the Countrie very well; that his brother might, with little impediment, ouer-come the way to Canusium: where if he could once againe deale with both the Consuls, and all the Roman forces together, he had reason to hope for such another victorie, as once he had gotten in the same open Countrie. If this had so fallen out; Rome would haue beene vndone for euer. But the Carthaginians should not haue needed to wish any second victorie, in the naked Champans about Cannæ; if such an armie, as this which Asdrubal now brings, had come to second Hannibal, when hee was in his full strength; and the Romans not able to keepe the field. Wherefore this worthy Generall had good reason afterward to say, that Hanno was the man, who by delaying the supply, did beat him out of Italie; which else no power of the Romans could haue done.

Whilest Nero waited vpon the Carthaginians, and thought it enough to hinder them from meeting with the Armie that was comming to their succour: he was aduertised of Asdrubal his approch; by Letters and Messengers intercepted, as they were going to Hannibal. These gaue notice, that Asdrubal had left the siege of Placentia, and drew onwards apace: being already come within two hundred miles of his brother; notwithstanding all opposition that could bee made by Liuie the Consul. Of these newes Claudius Nero was nothing ioyfull. For if Hannibal could once be ioyned as head, vnto that great body of an Armie, which Asdrubal brought with him: it was most apparant, that howsoeuer the fortune of Rome should auoid, for the present, any great calamitie; yet the very continuance of so strong a warre at home, would enforce the Latines, and other faithfull Associates, to faint vnder the burden; as twelue of the thirtie Roman Colonies had already done. Wherefore hee resolued, that it were better to make any desperate aduenture, than to suffer the coniunction of two such malevolent Planets: whose pestilent influence, if not on the suddaine, yet within few yeres, was like to worke most lamentable effect. It seemed apparant, that his Colleague was vnable to stay the progresse of Asdrubal: neither were there any good Legions in a readines, that could doe seruice in such a needfull case; excepting those, that were already employed vnder the two Consuls. Hereupon hee concluded, that it was not expedient for him to tie himselfe to his owne charge, which was the warre against Hannibal: but rather that it behoued him, to helpe where more necessitie required; and to carry part of his forces vnto his Colleague. This could not be without much danger. Yet since the meeting of the two Carthaginian bretheren, was farre more dangerous to the Roman Common-wealth; it seemed the best way to put Fortune in trust, with that which was of the lesse importance. Sixe thousand foot, and a thousand horse he therefore tooke, that were the very choice of his Armie: and making shew, as if he would only step aside, to doe some small piece of seruice neere at hand; away he posted as fast as hee could, to assist his fellow Consul. His Messengers ranne before him, to giue warning to all Townes by which he was to passe, that they should be ready to meet him, with victualls, and all other necessaries for his Armie. Liuius the other Consul, at that time, lay incamped, neere vnto Sena Gallica; and Asdrubal within halfe a mile of him. In sixe daies Nero had finished his journie thither; and when he drew neere, sent Messengers before him, to giue notice of his comming. Liuie thought it fittest that he should stay in some place of couert vntill darke night, and then enter secretly into the campe: lest the Enemie, perceiuing this accesse of strength, should accordingly frame his counsailes. This was done: and a token giuen, that the Colonells, Captaines, and all Souldiers, aswell horse as foot, that Nero had brought with him; should bee lodged and entertained by men of their owne sort. Their Companie was somwhat increased by Voluntaries that joyned with them on the way. Neuertheless, it was not needfull, that the Quarter which receiued them, should bee enlarged; since they had brought with them nothing but their armes. The next day they held a Counsaile of warre: wherein some were of opinion, that it was best for these new-arriued Companies, to refresh themselues a few daies after their wearie iournie, before they should be drawne forth to battaile. But against this, Nero was very earnest: and besought his Colleague, to make vse of him out of hand; that he might betimes returne to his owne Campe, ere Hannibal should haue notice of his absence. The souldiers also of Nero, were full of spirit; perceiuing that the honour of the victorie was like to be theirs: forasmuch as the battaile would not haue beene vndertaken, without this their comming to helpe. Finally, it was agreed when the Counsaile brake vp, that the signe of battaile should be hung out; which was commonly a purple coate ouer the Generalls pauilion.

Asdrubal was no lesse willing than the Romans to come to battaile, hauing long desired it, and hitherto not found occasion before. But when he had put his men in order, and was riding before the head of his Armie, to behold the Enemies countenance: it seemed to him, that they were more than they had beene; and some of their armes and horses looked as though they had wanted dressing, after a long iournie. Hereupon he beganne to with-draw his Armie backe into the Campe: and gaue order, that if no prisoners could bee taken, by whom he might bee certified of the truth; yet should there good obseruation be made, whether the enemies campe were enlarged, or no; or what other alteration could be noted, that might shew their forces to be increased. The campe, as hath beene said, was not extended: but the trumpet, that sounded only once in the quarter of L. Porcius the Pretor, did now, contrary to former custome, sound twice in the quarter of Liuius the Consul. Hereat Asdrubal greatly mused: and being well acquainted with the Roman orders; held this for a sure token, that the other Consul was there arriued. How this might be, if Hannibal were aliue, and in good case, he was not able to coniecture: but thought it the best way, to goe leisurely to worke; till he might be better informed. Vpon confidence in his owne forces, he had not cared hitherto, how neere hee lay to the Romans; nor troubled himselfe perhaps with ouer-strongly fortifying his owne Campe. Yet when hee now perceiued, that somewhat was fallen out beside his expectation, hee changed his resolution; and held it no dishonour to remoue a little further off. So he dislodged secretly by night, intending to get ouer the Riuer Metaurus; whereby to keepe himselfe as long as he could, from necessitie of battaile. But whether it were so, that his guides did steale away from him in the dark, so that he could not finde the way to the Foords; or whether his carriages were too heauie, and hindred his speede: farre hee had not gone, ere the Consul Nero was at his heeles with all the Roman horse, and staied him from passing any further. Soone after came L. Porcius with the light armature: whom the other Consul followed anon with all the Legions; in good order, and ready for battaile. Asdrubal, seeing himselfe ouer-taken with necessitie to fight; omitted no care and circumspection. His Gaules, in whom he reposed least confidence, hee placed in his left wing vpon a Hill, which the Enemie ſhould not, without much difficultie, bee able to climbe: in the right wing he ſtood himſelfe, with his Africans and Spaniards; his Ligurians he placed in the midſt; and his Elephants, hee beſtowed in the front of his battailes. On the Roman ſide, Nero had the leading of the right wing; Liuius of the left; and Porcius of the battaile. Both Romans and Carthaginians well vnderſtood, how much depended vpon the fortune of this day; and how little hope of ſafetie there was vnto the vanquiſhed. Only the Romans herein ſeemed to haue had the beter in conceipt, and opinion; That they were to fight with men deſirous to haue fled from them. And, according to this preſumption, came Liuius the Conſul with a proud brauery, to giue charge on the Africans: by whom he was ſo ſharply entertained, that the victorie ſeemed very doubtfull. The Africans and Spaniards were ſtout ſoldiers; and well acquainted with the maner of the Roman fight. The Ligurians alſo were a hardy Nation, and not accuſtomed to giue ground; which they needed the leſſe, or were able now to doe, being placed in the midſt. Liuius therefore, and Porcius, found ſtrong oppoſition: and with great ſlaughter on both ſides, preuailed little or nothing. Beſides other difficulties, they were exceedingly troubled by the Elephants, that brake their firſt rankes; and put them in ſuch diſorder, as the Roman Enſignes were driuen to fall backe. All this while Claudius Nero, labouring much in vaine againſt a ſteepe Hill, was vnable to come to blowes with the Gaules; that ſtood oppoſite vnto him, but out of danger. This made Aſdrubal the more confident; who ſeeing his owne left wing ſafe, did the more boldly and fiercely make impreſſion on the other ſide, vpon the left wing of the Romans. But Nero, perceiuing that the place wherein he ſtood, was ſuch as would compell him to remaine idle till the fight were ended; tooke a part of his forces, and led them round behinde the forces of Porcius and Liuius: which hauing compaſſed, he fell vpon Aſdrubal, and charged him in the flanke. Here beganne the victorie to be manifeſt on the Roman ſide. For Nero, finding none to reſiſt him in front, ranne all along the depth of Aſdrubal his battaile: and falling vpon the skirts thereof, diſordered the Enemies, and put all to rowt. Of the Spaniards therefore and Africans, that were laid at on euery ſide, the greateſt part was ſlaine. The Ligurians and Gaules eſcaped as they could; and ſaued themſelues by timely flight. Of the Elephants, foure were taken aliue: the reſt were ſlaine; ſome by the Enemies weapons; others by their owne guides that rode them. For when any of them, being ſore wounded, beganne to waxe vnruly, and ruſh backe vpon their owne battailes following them: the guide had in readineſſe a Mallet, and a Chizzell, wherewith he gaue them a ſtroke betweene the eares, in the joynt of the necke, next vnto the head; wherewith hee killed the beaſt vpon the ſuddaine. This ſpeedy way of preuenting ſuch harme as the Elephants, being hurt, were wont to doe to the ſquadrons following them; is ſaid to haue beene the deuice of Aſdrubal himſelfe; who died in this batraile.

Great commendations are giuen to Aſdrubal, both by Polybius, and by Liuie. He is ſaid at all times to haue ſhewed himſelfe worthy of Amilcar his father, and Hannibal his brother; to haue ſtriuen with great patience, againſt many difficulties, whereinto he fell by the meanes of thoſe Captaines, that were ſent from Carthage into Spaine; to haue performed in this laſt battaile all duties of a worthy Generall; and finally when hee ſaw the loſſe irreparable, to haue ridden manfully into the thickeſt of his Enemies; where fighting brauely, hee was ſlaine. Of the number that died with him in this battaile, the report of Liuie, and of Polybius, doe very much diſagree. For Liuie ſaith, that the Carthaginians had no leſſe an ouerthrow, than was that, which they gaue to the Romans at Cannæ; that fiftie ſixe thouſand of them were ſlaine, fiue thouſand & foure hundred taken priſoners; and aboue foure thouſand Roman Citizens, whom they had captiues with them, deliuered, and ſet at libertie. He ſaith alſo, that of the Romans and their Aſſociates there were ſlaine eight thouſand: and of the bootie, that it was exceeding great; not only in other kindes; but in gold and ſiluer. Concerning the bootie; Polybius hath no mention of it.

Likely

Likely it is to haue beene as rich as Liuie reporteth it; for Asdrubal came well stored with monie. But Polybius (who had no desire to make this battaile of Metaurus, a paralel vnto that of Cannæ) reports no more than about ten thousand of the Carthaginian side, and two thousand of the Roman, to haue beene slaine. The number of the prisoners he doeth not mention: but only saith, That some of the Carthaginian Princes were taken aliue; and that all the rest died in the battaile. Whereby it may seeme, that they were all Barchines: forasmuch as they preferred the honour of themselues, and of their Countrie, aboue their liues.

The joy of this victorie was no lesse in Rome, than had beene the feare of the euent. For euer since it was knowne in what sort Nero had left his Armie; the whole Citie was troubled, as much as lately at Hannibal his cõming thither. Men thought it strange, that the Consul should make such a great aduenture, as thus to put the one halfe of all the Roman forces, vnto hazard of the Dice. For what if Hannibal should chance to haue notice of this his departure; and either pursue him, or set vpon the Armie that staied behinde, much weakned, and without a Generall? Thus did they talke: yet reseruing their censure vnto the successe; with libertie to approue or condemne, according to the issue. In the meane while the People filled the Market-place; the Women ranne to the Temples, with Vowes and Prayers; and the Senators were daily in counsaile, waitiug still ready at hand vpon the Magistrates: as if some great matter were likely to fall out, that would require euery ones helpe. In briefe, they were all so full of melancholy, that when first newes of the victorie came, there were not many that would beleeue it. Afterwards when Messengers arriued from the Consuls, with Letters contayning all that had passed: there was not only great and joyfull concourse of all sorts of men vnto the Temples, but the very face of the Citie was altered; and men from thenceforth beganne to follow their priuate businesse; making contracts one with another (which they had long forborne to doe) and attending their owne affaires in such wise, as if Hannibal were already driuen out of Italie.

Nero returning to his campe, threw forth openly the head of Asdrubal before the Carthaginians: and producing his African prisoners bound; sent two of them loose to giue Hannibal notice of what had hapned. These two prisoners might haue serued well enough to certifie Hannibal of this misaduenture, without doing wrong to the dead body of Asdrubal: especially since Hannibal, in honourable, and farre different manner, had giuen buriall to Gracchus and Marcellus; yea to all the Roman Generalls, whose carkasses fell into his hands. But it may seeme, that howsoeuer the People of Carthage wanted much of the generous disposition, which was found among the Romans, in their loue vnto the Commonweale; yet in dealing with Enemies, they were farre more ciuill, and lesse prone to the insolencie of reuenge. The best excuse of this outrage done by Nero, is, that hee hoped much more by the sudden terrour of such a spectacle, than by the simple relation of that which had passed, to make a deepe impression of feare into the Carthaginians. It may also be said, That he forgot himselfe, being ouer-joyed with the greatnesse of his prosperitie. For it was the battaile of Metaurus that weighed downe the ballance, and turned the Tide of the Roman fortune: which being then at the lowest Ebbe, ceased not afterwards to flow, till it could not be contained within any banks. Hannibal hauing lost in this vnhappy fight (besides that worthy Gentleman his Brother) all the hope that so long sustained him in Italie; with-drew himselfe into the Countrie of the Brutians: and thither hee caused all the Lucans that were of his partie to remoue; as likewise all that dwelt in Metapontum. For he wanted men to defend so many places as he held at the present, because they lay too farre asunder. Wherefore he drew them all into a lesser compasse in the vtmost corner of Italie; it being a Countrie of much fastnesse, and the people exceedingly deuoted to his seruice. In this businesse Nero gaue him no memorable impediment: either because Hannibal was too strong for him, hauing all his forces vnited; or because it is likely likely that this remoue of the Lucans and Metapontines, was not before the end of Summer, when their harueſt was gathered in; at what time the Senate called him home to Rome. M. Liuius the other Conſul tarried among the Ciſalpine Gaules vntill the end of Summer; there to ſet things in ſuch order as he thought requiſite: which done, hee wrote vnto the Senate, that there was no more neede of him and his Armie in that Prouince; but that L. Porcius, with the two Legions that were there before, might very well diſcharge the place. For this cauſe, hee deſired leaue to returne home; and that he might bring his Armie with him. The Senate well vnderſtood his meaning: which was, to haue the honour of triumph, as he well deſerued. But foraſmuch as it was well knowne, what intereſt Nero had in the late victorie: order was giuen, that not only Liuie with his Armie ſhould come home; but likewiſe Nero; though leauing his Armie behinde him, to confront Hannibal. So the honour of triumph was granted to them both: in the pompe whereof Liuie made the greater ſhew, as riding in a Chariot, and followed by his Souldiers; becauſe in his Prouince, and vpon his day of command, the victorie was gotten; his Armie alſo being preſent at the triumph. But Nero that rode on horſe-backe, and without ſuch attendance, was the more extolled both by the People and Souldiers; by whom, the victorie was in a manner wholly aſcribed vnto his great worth. Neither wanted L. Veturius Philo, and Q. Cecilius Metellus, Lieutenants to the Generalls, the due acknowledgement of their good ſeruice. For they were commended vnto the People, as men worthy to bee choſen Conſuls: and Conſuls they were choſen for the yeere following. But nothing was done by them, worthy of memorie, in their Conſulſhip. Neither indeede from this yeere, which was the thirteenth of the preſent warre, vntill the eighteenth yeere wherein it ended, was there any matter of importance wrought in Italie; ſaue only the taking of Locri from the Carthaginians by ſurpriſe. For Hannibal wanted ſtrength, wherewith to make any great offer: and the Romans had little minde to prouoke him; but thought it well that hee was quiet. Such opinion had they conceiued of him; that though all about him went to ruine; yet in him alone they thought there was force enough to hold himſelfe vpright. And ſurely very notable are the commendations giuen vnto him by Polybius; whom Liuie therein followes: That making warre vpon a People, of all other the moſt warlike, hee obtained ſo many victories by his owne good conduct: and that leading an Armie, compounded of ſo many ſundry Nations, Africans, Spaniards, Gaules, Carthaginians, Italians, and Greekes; which were, neither in Language, Lawes, Conditions, or any other thing, one like to another; hee held them all in ſuch good order, that they neuer fell to ſedition among themſelues, or againſt their Generall. But that which Liuie addes hereto, is yet perhaps of greater admiration: That he ſuſtained his Armie, without helpe from other places, from this time forward, vpon the hungry ſoile of the Brutians: which, when it was beſt manured in time of peace, could hardly ſuffice to nouriſh the Inhabitants. It is therefore apparant, that by his proper worth and vertue, he kept his Armie in ſuch order and obedience, rather than by any greatneſſe of reward and bootie: ſince, after the death of Aſdrubal, he made no inuaſion vpon the wealthier parts of Italie; but held himſelfe ſtill among the poore Brutians. Where we muſt leaue him, vntill he be drawne into Africk by Scipio; whoſe doings will henceforth entertaine, and leade vs, vnto the end of this Warre.

§. XVII.

How P. CORNELIVS SCIPIO the Roman, made entire conqueſt of Spaine.

†. I.

How the Carthaginians were driuen by SCIPIO from the Continent into the Iſle of Gades.

MAGO, & ASDRVBAL the ſonne of Geſco, tooke vpon them the charge of Spaine, when Aſdrubal the ſonne of Amilcar departed thence into Italie. Theſe agreed together, that Mago ſhould make a voiage to the Baleares; there to leuie a ſupply of men: and Aſdrubal with-draw himſelfe into Luſitania (which is now Portugal) whither the Romans had ill meanes to follow; being altogether vnacquainted in thoſe parts. Mago had ſoone ended his buſineſſe, and returned into Spaine: where hee met with one Hanno (the ſame perhaps that had lately beene emploied in Sicil) who brought new forces out of Africk, and came to ſucceede in place of Aſdrubal the Barchine. It is not vnlikely that Spaine was now the better, and more readily furniſhed with men, and all things needfull from Carthage; when that ſonne of Amilcar, whoſe authoritie had beene greateſt, was thence departed. For hereby might the factious diligence of old Hanno approue it ſelfe, againſt that noble race of Warriors; when it ſhould appeare, that things did proſper much the better by being left vnto the handling of other men. Whether it were vpon deſire to make good ſome ſuch opinion raiſed of him at home, or whether vpon confidence in the forces that he brought ouer: Hanno tooke the field, and led Mago with him; as purpoſing afreſh to ſet vpon the Romans. So he entred into the Countrie of the Celtiberians, not very farre from new Carthage: where, by monie, and other perſwaſions, he leuied aboue nine thouſand men.

P. Scipio in the meane while contained himſelfe in the Eaſterne parts of Spaine: attentiue, as it may ſeeme, to the proceedings of Aſdrubal the ſonne of Amilcar; againſt whom, he is reported by ſome Writers to haue ſent part of his forces into Italie, to the aſſiſtance of C. Claudius Nero, and M. Liuius the Conſuls. But hearing of the leuie made by Hanno and Mago, among the Celtiberians: he ſent M. Syllanus the Propretor, with ten thouſand foot and fiue hundred horſe. Syllanus got intelligence by ſome fugitiue Celtiberians, who became his guides, that their Countrimen encamped apart from the Carthaginians in great diſorder: as men fearing no danger, becauſe they were at home. Wherefore as cloſely as he was able, he drew neere to theſe Celtiberians: and falling vpon them on the ſuddaine, gaue them ſuch an ouerthrow, that Hanno and Mago comming to their ſuccour, in ſtead of heartning & reinforcing them, became partakers of the loſſe. Mago ſaued himſelfe, with all the horſe, and old Companies of foot, which were about two thouſand: and in ten daies iourney brought them ſafe to Aſdrubal. The reſt of the Africans were either ſlaine or taken: among whom, Hanno had the ill lucke to be taken priſoner; though he kept himſelfe out of the fight vntil all was loſt. As for the Celtiberians, they knew better how to make ſhift; & ſaued moſt of themſelues by running into the woods.

It could no otherwiſe bee, but that Scipio was much troubled with the danger wherein Italie ſtood, by the comming thither of Aſdrubal. Ten thouſand foot and eighteene hundred horſe he did therefore ſend out of Spaine (as it is reported by ſome Authors) to the defence of his owne Countrie: or was perhaps about to ſend them; and thereupon remained at new Carthage, intentiue to the neceſſitie & ſucceſſe of his Countrimen at home. But when he had word of the great victory at Metaurus, which fell out long before the end of this Summer, then might hee well ad-

uenture, to take in hand the entire conqueſt of Spaine; which muſt needs be much alienated from the Carthaginians, by the report of ſuch an ouerthrow. The Spaniſh Souldiers that ſerued vnder Hannibal, and thoſe that had beene ſent ouer into Africk; were as pledges heretofore, by whom their Countrie was held obnoxious to the Carthaginians. But when it was noiſed abroad, That all which had followed Aſdrubal into Italie, were fallen into the hands of the Romans; and that Hannibal with his Armie, was cloſed vp in a ſtreight, whence he could not get out: then did it greatly behoue the Spaniards to conforme themſelues vnto the will of the Victors. That it was the ſucceſſe of things in Italie, which gaue ſuch confidence vnto Scipio; it is the more probable, becauſe hee tooke not this great enterpriſe in hand, vntill the Summer was almoſt ſpent. Aſdrubal therefore vſed the benefit of the ſeaſon; and by diſpoſing his Armie into many Garriſons; hindred the Enemie, from doing any great exploit before Winter. So the very length of way, and the time of the yeere, cauſed Scipio to returne backe: without any other matter performed, than that his Brother L. Scipio tooke by aſſault the Towne of Oringis.

Againſt the next yeeres danger, Aſdrubal prepared a great Armie: and ſpared not coſt, nor trauaile, in ſtrengthning himſelfe, for the triall of his laſt fortune in Spaine. With ſeuentie thouſand foot, foure thouſand horſe, and two and thirtie Elephants, he tooke the field: which number I beleeue, that he could hardly haue raiſed, without boldly denying the truth of thoſe reports that came from Italie. Scipio thought his Roman Legions too weake to encounter with ſuch a multitude. Wherefore hee iudged it needfull to vſe the helpe of his Spaniſh friends. But the death of his Father and Vncle, that were caſt away by the treaſon of ſuch falſe Auxiliares; made him on the other ſide very doubtfull, of relying vpon thoſe, that might perhaps betray him in his greateſt neede. Yet ſince one Colchas, that was Lord of eight & twentie Townes, had promiſed him the laſt Winter, to raiſe three thouſand foot, and fiue hundred horſe for his ſeruice: hee reſolued to make vſe of thoſe, and ſome few others; that might helpe to make a ſhew; and yet not bee able to doe great harme, if they would reuolt. So with fiue and fortie thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe, he ſought out the Enemie; neere to whom hee incamped. At his firſt comming, Mago and Maſaniſſa fell vpon him; with hope to take him vnprepared, whileſt hee was making his lodgings. But hee layed certaine troups of horſe in couert: which breaking vpon them vnexpected; cauſed them to fall off. They made at firſt an orderly retrait: but being more hardly preſſed, they ſhortly betooke themſelues to plaine flight. After this encounter, which added ſome courage to the Romans, and abated the preſumption of the Carthaginians: there were daily skirmiſhes betweene the horſe and light armature, on both ſides; wherein was nothing done of importance. Aſdrubal drew forth his Armie, and arranged it before his Trenches: the like did Scipio; each of them to ſhew that he durſt fight, yet not proceeding any further. Thus they continued many daies: Aſdrubal being ſtill the firſt that iſſued forth in the morning; and the firſt that, in the euening, withdrew himſelfe into his Trenches. The Spaniſh Auxiliaries were placed on both ſides in the wings; the Carthaginians were in the midſt, with their Elephants before them; and oppoſite to theſe on the other ſide were the Roman Legions. When they had in this order confronted one another, though at farre diſtance, many daies together: it grew to be the common opinion, that they ſhould ſhortly meet in the ſame forme; and be matched on each part, with the Enemies, long before deſigned. But Scipio, when hee purpoſed indeed to fight, altered the forme of his Armie; and withall, came forth earlier then he had been wont. He cauſed his men and horſes, to be well fed betimes in the morning before day: and then ſent forth his horſe and light armature, to traine out the Carthaginians with their bellies emptie: vſing herein the ſame trick, whereby he might remember, that Hannibal had beaten his father in the battaile of Trebia. His Roman Legions he beſtowed in the wings; his Spaniards, in the battaile. Asdrubal sent forth his horse in all haste,to entertaine the Romans; whilest he himselfe arranged his men, in their wonted order,at the Hill foot, vpon which he encamped. In the skirmishes of the horse it could not be discerned which part had the better: since being ouer-pressed on either side, they had a safe retrait vnto their foot; and one troupe seconding another by course, returned to charge. This fight was protracted by Scipio to a great length: because his men, hauing well fed themselues,were like to hold out better then the Enemie. But about noone, he caused his wings to aduance a good pace; leauing their battaile of Spaniards farre behinde them, that came on leisurely, according to direction. The Spanish Mercinaries that stood in Asdrubal his wings, were no way comparable,saue only in number,to the Latine and Roman Souldiers, that came against them; for they were fresh Souldiers,leuied in haste; and fighting only in respect of their pay. Being therefore charged in front by the Legions, and in flanke, at the same time,by the Roman Velites, and by some cohorts, that were appointed to wheele about for the same purpose: they were sorely pressed; and with much difficultie made resistance. The Carthaginians would faine haue succoured them; but that they durst not stirre out of their places,because of the Spanish battaile which was cõming against them; though it were as yet farre off. Thus the best part of Asdrubal his Armie stood idle, vntill the wings were broken. For,had he aduentured to meet with the Spaniards, hee must haue cast himselfe into the open space that lay before him betweene the Roman wings: to the depth whereof when he had arriued, he should haue found himselfe incloſed in such sort,as was the Consul Paulus at the battaile of Canne. Wherefore he did onely employ his Elephants; which did, according to their manner,no greater harme to his Enemies, than to his Friends. When they were chafed with wounds, they could no longer be ruled by their guides: but ranne, as chance led them,and troubled both parts; or those perhaps the more, that were the more vnwilling to kill them. In processe of the fight: the Romans, who had well refreshed their bodies in the morning,endured lustie; when the others beganne to faint with trauell and heate of the day. Wherefore perceiuing their aduantage,they followed it the more hotly: and gaue not ouer, till they had forst the enemie to change his pace and runne from him. Asdrubal did his best to haue made an orderly retrait; and afterward againe, to haue caused his men turne head, at the Hill foot. But the Romans would not suffer the victorie to be so extorted from them: neither was it easie to put fresh courage into the vanquished; led by the obstinate passion of feare which harkens to no perswasion. The Campe of Asdrubal had that day beene taken; if a storme of raine, which fell violently on the suddaine, and bred some superstition in the Romans, had not caused them to giue ouer.

The same night, Asdrubal gaue no rest to his men: but caused them, hungrie, and ouerlaboured as they were, to take paines in fortifying the Campe; wherein hee feared to be assaulted. But little assurance could he haue in the strength of his Trenches; when he had lost the hearts of his Spanish Souldiers. One Attanes, that was Lord of the Turdetani, fled from him to the Romans, with a great Band of his subiects: many followed this example; and soone after, two strong Townes were yeelded vp to Scipio, and the Garrisons betraied. It seemes that the peruerse fortune of this late battaile, whereupon Asdrubal had set his rest, bred in the Spaniards a disposition,to beleeue the more easily those reports which they heard from Italy. For henceforward, they neuer did good office to the Carthaginians. Asdrubal, perceiuing this, withdrew himselfe, and marched away, faster than an ordinarie pace, toward the Ocean Sea. Scipio followed the next morning: & ouertaking the Carthaginians with his horse,caused them so often to make stand; that they were at length attached by the Roman Legions. Here beganne a cruell slaughter: for there was no resistance made, but all fell to rout, saue onely seuen thousand, that with Asdrubal himselfe recouered a very strong piece of ground, which they fortified in haste.

This

This place he made shift awhile to defend: but wanting there necessaries to sustaine himselfe long, he was forsaken by some of those few, that continued hitherto partakers of his fortune. Wherfore he resolued to make shift for one: and stealing from his Companie by night away to the Sea-side, that was not farre thence; he tooke shipping, and set saile for Gades. When Scipio vnderstood that Asdrubal was thus gone: he left Syllanus with ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse to besiege their Campe (which was not taken in haste, for Mago and Masanissa staied in it) whileſt he with the rest of the Armie did what was needful in the Countrie abroad. It was not long, ere Mago and Masanissa followed Asdrubal to Gades: and their Armie dispersed it selfe; some flying ouer to the Romans; other taking what way they liked. So vpon all the continent of Spaine, there were only three Townes left, Illiturgi, Castulo, and Astapa, that made countenance of warre against the Romans: of which only Castulo had in it a Carthaginian Garrison; consisting of such as had saued themselues by flight in the late ouerthrowes. Hereby it seemes, that the report of those Historians was ill grounded, who said, that Castulo yeelded long since vnto the Romans; though Hannibal tooke a wife in that Citie. For this was one of the last three Townes that held out on the Carthaginian side. Illiturgi had sometimes beene inclinable to the Romans; if not altogether at their deuotion. Yet after the death of the two elder Scipio's, following too earnestly the Carthaginian fortune; it not onely rebelled; but with great cruelties betraied, and slue, the poore men that escaped thither from the ouerthrowes. Astapa was a Towne, that had still adhered to the Carthaginians; and, which was worse, had thriuen by spoile of the Romans and their Confederates. Wherefore (though not vntill the next yeere) Scipio went against these, and tooke himselfe Illiturgi and Castulo: Illiturgi by assault, and with a generall slaughter of the Inhabitants; Castulo, by treason of one Cerdubelius. Astapa was taken by Lucius Marcius; or rather destroyed by the Inhabitants. For a great pile of wood was raised in the Market-place: whereinto was throwne all the gold, and siluer, with whatsoeuer else was precious; the women and children standing by it vnder a sure guard; that should kil and burne them if the Romans got into the Towne. This prouision being made: all the Inhabitants that could beare armes, rushed forth desperately, and fell vpon the Roman campe; where striuing beyond their power, they were euery one slaine. Then was the Towne forth-with set on fire, by those that had taken charge to doe it: and many of the Romans consumed with the flame; whileſt they rushed ouer-hastily to catch the gold, and siluer, which they saw lying on the pile readie to melt.

Asdrubal, being beaten into the Iland of Gades, found no cause of long stay there: but returned home to Carthage, with seuen Gallies; leauing Mago behinde him, to wait vpon occasion, if any should be offered. He visited in his way home, Syphax King of the Masæsili, a people of the Numidians; hoping to winne him to the friendship of the Carthaginians. But he met with Scipio, as it were with his euill Angel, in the Kings Port: who, landing at the same time, carried Syphax quite another way. For Scipio, hauing driuen the Carthaginians out of Spaine, did foorth-with bethinke himselfe, how to finish the warre; by putting them to the like distresse in Africke. Hereunto it seemed, that the helpe of Syphax would be much auailable: a king that had many times fallen out with the Carthaginians, and sustained much hurt by their procurement; of which in all likelihood he might easily be moued to seeke reuenge. He had also beene beholding to P. and Cn. Scipio, that sent him ouer a Captaine into Africke; who instructed him so well in marshalling his forces, as he therby often became victorious. Vpon these reasons the Numidian King sent Embassadors to Rome, and made league with the Citie, in a time of great extremitie. So that hereby P. Scipio conceiued hope of laying a good foundation to the warre, which he intended in Africk; vpon the friendship of this ill Neighbour to the Carthaginians. For which cause he sent ouer C. Lælius his Embassadour, to deale with Syphax: who declaring that the Carthaginians did very ill in Italie, and had nothing now at all to doe in Spaine, easily perswaded the King to take part with those that had the better, and were without question his better friends. Only Syphax requested, that the Roman Generall should visite him in person, to conclude the League; by which hee was to enter into conditions of more importance, than in any former Treatie. Herto Scipio condescended; thinking the friendship of so great a King, that was neighbour to Carthage, and not farre distant from Spaine, well worthy of the aduenture. So with two Quinquereme Gallies he tooke Sea: and arriued in the Kings Port, at the same time, with Asdrubal. This would haue beene very dangerous to him, had he beene discried by his Enemies further at Sea: but in the Hauen, they forbare to make offer one vpon the other. Syphax might well be proud; seeing at one time, two such Captaines of two most powerfull Cities, came to desire his friendship. He would haue brought them to treat of peace: but the Roman excused himselfe, by want of such commission from the Senate. He feasted them together: and shortly dismissed Scipio, with whom he readily entred into couenant; which in time of performance, he as readily brake.

†. II.

Funerall games held by SCIPIO. A Duell between two Spanish Princes. A digression, concerning Duells.

SCIPIO returning into Spaine, and resting that winter, tooke vengeance the next yeere, vpon those of Iliturgi, Castulo, and Astapa, as hath beene said before. The Conquest of the Countrie being then in a manner at an end; he performed at new Carthage, with great solemnity, some Vowes that he had made, and honoured the memorie of his Father, and Vncle, with funerall games, especially of those that fought at sharpe, according to the manner of the times. Neither was it needfull, that he should trouble himselfe with preparing slaues for that spectacle, to hazard their liues as was vsed in the Citie of Rome: for there were enow, that either offered themselues as voluntaries, or were sent from their Princes; to giue proofe in single combat, of the valour that was in their seuerall Countries. Some also there were, that being in contention, which they could not, or would not otherwise end, agreed to referre the decision of their Controuersies, to triall of the sword, in single fight. Among these, the most eminent, were, Corbis, and Orsua, Cosen-germans: that contended for the principality of a Town called Ibes. Corbis was the elder, and the elder brothers sonne: wherfore he claimed the Lordship, as eldest of the house; after the manner of our Irish Tanistrie. But the father of Orsua stood lately seized of the Principality: which though himselfe receiued by the death of his elder brother; yet this his sonne would not let it goe back; but claimed to hold it as heire vnto his father, and old enough to rule. Faine would Scipio haue compounded the matter. But they answered peremptorily, That all their friends, and kindred, had alreadie laboured in vaine, to take vp that quarrell; and that neither God, nor Man, but only Mars, their God of battaile, should be Vmpire betweene them. So they had their wills: and the elder, who was also the stronger, and more skilfull at his weapon, easily vanquished the foole-hardinesse of the yonger.

Such combats haue beene very ancient; and perhaps more ancient, than any other kinde of fight. We reade of many performed before the Warre of Troy, by Theseus, Hercules, Pollux, and others: as also of two at the Warre of Troy; the one betweene Paris and Menelaus; the other, betweene Hector and Aiax. Neither want there examples of them among the Hebrewes: whereof that betweene Dauid and Goliah; and others performed by some of Dauids Worthies, against those that challenged them; are greatly celebrated. Vnto the same kinde appertaines the fight, betweene twelue of the Tribe of Iuda, and as many of the Beniamites. The Romans had had many of them: whereof that was principall, in which they ventured their Dominion vpon the heads of three brethren the Horatij, againſt the three brethren Curiatij that were Albans. The combat of Manlius Torquatus; and ſhortly after, of Valerius Coruinus with two Champions of the Gaules, which challenged any Roman; were of leſſe importance, as hauing onely reference to braueric. In England there was a great combat fought, betweene Edmond Ironſide and Canutus the Dane, for no leſſe than the Kingdome. The vſe of them was very frequent in the Saxon-times; almoſt vpon euery occaſion, great or ſmall. In the raigne of Edward the third, who ſuſtained the party of Mountfort againſt the Earle of Bloys, contending for the Duchie of Brittaine; there was a fight, for honour of the Nations, betweene thirtie of the Britons, and thirtie Engliſh: two of which Engliſh, were Caluerlie a braue Captaine; and that Sir Robert Knolles, who afterwards became a renowned Commander in the French warres, and did highly honour his bloud, whereof the Lord Knolles is deſcended. It were infinite to reckon the examples of the like, found in Engliſh, French, and Italian Hiſtories. Moſt of them haue beene combats of braueric, and of gayeté de cure, as the French terme it; for honour of ſeuerall Nations; for loue of Miſtreſſes; or what ſoeuer elſe gaue occaſion vnto men, deſirous to ſet out themſelues. But beſides thoſe of this ſort, there are two other natures of combats; which are, either vpon accuſation for life; or vpon triall of Title and Inheritance, as in Writ of right. And of this latter kinde, was that, of which wee ſpake euen now, betweene Corbis and Orſua. Vnto theſe (me thinkes) may bee added, as of different condition from the reſt, the combat vpon Wager; ſuch as were that betweene Dauid and Goliah; or that betweene the Horatij and Curiatij: in which, without regard of Title, the Dominion of Nations, one ouer the other, is aduentured vpon the head of Champions. Vpon an accuſation for life, there was a combat appointed betweene the Lord Henrie of Boulinbrooke Duke of Hereford, and Moubray Duke of Norfolke. There was a combat performed by Sir Iohn Anſley and one Cattrington: whom Anſley charged with treaſon; and proued it vpon him, by being victorious. The like was fought betweene Robert of Mountfort and Henrie of Eſſex. The like alſo, betweene a Nauarrois, and one Welch of Grimsby, who the Nauarrois accuſed of treaſon: but, being beaten in fight, confeſſed that hee had belied him; and was therefore drawne and hanged. Whether our triall by battell doe determine, that the falſe accuſer, if hee be vanquiſhed, ſhall ſuffer the puniſhment which had beene due to the offender, if the accuſation had beene proued; I cannot affirme. But we euery where find, That if he which is accuſed of treaſon, or, according to the cuſtomes of Normandie, of Murder, Rape, or burning of Places (offences puniſhed by death) bee ouer-come; He ſhall ſuffer the paines appointed for thoſe crimes. In combats for triall of right, it is not ſo: neither is the Appellant or Defendant bound to fight in perſon, but hee may trie it by his Champion, as did Paramor and Lowe, or offered to doe, in the raigne of Queene Elizabeth. And in this caſe, he that is beaten, or yeeldeth, looſeth only his cauſe, not his life. Neither are the combats, vpon accuſation, or triall of right, fought in open field, as are thoſe of braueric; but in Campe cloſe, that is, within railes. Now this triall by combat was ſo ordinarie in France, before the time of S^t. Lewes, and Philip the faire his grand-child, as euery Lord of Fee, Eccleſiaſticall or Temporall, had power to grant it within his owne Iuriſdiction. And it ſeemeth, that the French Kings, and other Lords, made their profit hereby. For in the * Memorialls of the Chamber of Accompts, is found an Article to this effect: That if a combat were once accepted, and after, by conſent of the Lord, were taken vp, each of the parties ſhould pay two ſhillings ſixe pence; but if it were performed, then ſhould the partie vanquiſhed forfeit an hundred and twelue ſhillings. And vpon this cuſtome grew the French Prouerbe, which they vſe when any man hath had an hard or vniuſt iudgement; ſaying, That hee was tried by the Law of Loray, or Berne; ou le battu paye l'amende, where he that is beaten giues the recompence. Of theſe frequent trials by battaile, that great learned man Yuo, Biſhop of Chartres, did often complaine, and speciallỹ against the French Church-men: as appeares by * his letters to the Bishop of Orleans, to the Arch-deacon of Paris, to Rembert Arch-bishop of Sens, and to others; wherein he rebukes the iudgement of their Churches, that had ratified such challenges of combat. But this libertie, and kinde of triall, was retrencht by Saint Lewes, and Philip the faire; so that no man should decree, or grant it, saue the King himselfe. It hath since beene granted, though more sparingly, by the French Kings; as to the Lord of Carouges against Iaques le Gris; and to Iulian Romero the Spaniard, against Moro, his Countriman: wherein Sir Henrie Kneuet, Father of the Lord Kneuet now liuing, was Patron to Romero that had the victorie, and lastly to the Lord of Chast. Now in those Challenges, vpon accusation of Treason, Murder, or other offence deseruing death, (and in those only) the rule held, That le defendeur estoit tenu de proposer ces deffenses per vne dementir; The Defendant was bound to pleade not guiltie, by giuing the accuser the Lie: otherwise it was concluded, that the Defendant did taisiblement confesser le crime; silently confesse the crime. But after such time as Francis the French King, vpon some dispute about breach of Faith, had sent the Lie vnto the Emperour Charles the fist, thereby to draw him to a personall combat: euery pettie Companion in France, in imitation of their Master, made the giuing of the Lie mortalitie it selfe; holding it a matter of no small glorie, to haue it said, That the meanest Gentleman in France, would not put vp, what the great Emperour Charles the fift had paciently endured.

From this beginning is deriued a challenge of combat, grounded vpon none of those occasions that were knowne to the Ancient. For, the Honour of Nations, the Triall of Right, the Wager vpon Champions, or the Obiection and Refutation of capitall offences, are none of them, nor all of them together, the argument of halfe so many Duells, as are founded vpon meere priuate Anger, yea or vpon matter seeming worthie of anger in the opinion of the Duellists. So that in these daies, wherein euery man takes vnto himselfe a Kingly liberty, to offer, accept, and appoint personall combats; the giuing of the Lie, which ought to be the Negation only in accusations for life, is become the most fruitfull root of deadly quarrels. This is held a word so terrible, and a wrong so vnpardonable, as will admit no other recõpence, than the bloud of him that giues it. Thus the fashion, taken vp in haste by the French Gentlemen, after the patterne of their King, is grown to be a custome: whence we haue deriued a kinde of Arte and Philosophie of quarrel; with certaine grounds and rules, from whence the points of honour, and the dependencies thereof, are deduced. Yea there are (among many other no lesse ridiculous) some so mysticall curiosities herein, as that it is held a farre greater dishonour, to receiue from an enemy a slight touch with a Cane, than a sound blow with a Sword: the one, hauing relation to a slaue; the other to a souldier. I confesse that the difference is pretie: though, for my owne part, if I had had any such Italionated enemie in former times, I should willingly haue made with him such an exchange; and haue giuen him the point of honour to boot.

But let vs examine indifferently the offence of this terrible word, the Lie; with their conditions who are commonly of all other the most tender in receiuing it. I say, that the most of these, who present death on the points of their swords to all that giue it them; vse nothing so much in their conuersation and course of life, as to speake and sweare falsly. Yea it is thereby, that they shift and shuffle in the World, and abuse it. For how few are there among them, which, hauing assumed & sworne to pay the monies and other things they borrow, doe not breake their word and promise, as often as they ingage it? Nay, how few are there among them, that are not Lyers by Record, by being sued in some Court or other of Instice, vpon breach of word, or bond? For he which hath promised, that he will pay monie by a day; or promised any thing else, wherein he faileth; hath directly lied to him, to whom the promise hath beene made. Nay, what is the profession of loue that men make now-a-daies? What is the vowing of their seruice, and of all they haue, vsed in their ordinarie dinarie complements, and (in effect) to euery man whom they bid but good-morrow, or ſalute, other than a courteous and courtlike kinde of lying? It is (ſaith a wiſe French-men, deriding therein the Apiſh cuſtome of his Countrie) vne marché & complot fait enſemble the ſe mocquer, mentir, & piper les vns les autres; A kinde of merchandize, and complot made among them, to mock, belie, and deride each other: and ſo farre now-a daies in faſhion, and in vſe; as he that vſeth it not, is accounted either dull, or Cynicall. True it is notwithſtanding (omitting the old diſtinctions) that there is great difference betweene theſe mannerly & complementall lies, with thoſe which are ſomtime perſwaded by neceſſity vpon breach of promiſe; and thoſe which men vſe out of cowardize and feare: the latter confeſſing themſelues to be in greater awe of men, than of God; a vice of all other ſtiled the moſt villainous. But now for the Lie it ſelfe, as it is made the ſubject of all our deadly quarrells in effect: to it I ſay, That whoſo giues another man the Lie, when it is manifeſt that he hath lied, doth him no wrong at all; neither ought it to be more hainouſly taken, than to tell him, that he hath broken any promiſe which he hath otherwiſe made. For he that promiſeth any thing, tells him, to whom he hath promiſed, that hee will performe it; and, in not performing it, he hath made himſelfe a Lier. On the other ſide, He that giues any man the Lie, when himſelfe knowes that he, to whom it is giuen, hath not lied; doth therein giue the Lie directly to himſelfe. And what cauſe haue I, if I ſay that the Sunne ſhines when it doth ſhine, and that another fellow tells me I lie, for it's mid-night; to proſecute ſuch an one to death, for making himſelfe a fooliſh Ruffian, and a Lier in his owne knowledge? For he that giues the Lie in any other diſpute, than in defence of his Loyaltie, or Life; giues it impertinently, and Ruffian-like. I will not denie but it is an extreme rudeneſſe to taxe any man in publike with an vntruth: (if it be not pernicious, and to his prejudice againſt whom the vntruth is vttered) but all that is rude, ought not to bee ciuilized with death. That were, more to admire and imitate a French cuſtome, and a wicked one, than to admire and to follow the counſaile of God. But you will ſay, That theſe diſcourſes ſauour of cowardize. It is true; if you call it cowardize, to feare God or Hell: whereas he that is truly wiſe, and truly valiant, knowes that there is nothing elſe to be feared. For againſt an Enemies ſword wee ſhall finde ten thouſand ſeuen-penie-men (waged at that price in the warres) that feare it as little, and perchance leſſe, than any profeſt Sword-man in the World. Diligentiſsima in tutela ſui Fortitudo; Fortitude is a diligent preſeruer of it ſelfe. It is (ſaith Ariſtotle) a mediocritie between doubting and daring. Sicut non Martyrem pœna: ſic nec fortem pugna; ſed cauſa; As it is not the puniſhment that makes the Martyr: ſo it is not fighting that declares a valiant man; but fighting in a good cauſe. In which whoſoeuer ſhall reſoluedly end his life, reſoluedly in reſpect of the cauſe, to wit, in defence of his Prince, Religion, or Countrie: as hee may juſtly bee numbred among the Martyrs of God; ſo may thoſe that die with malicious hearts, in priuate combats, be called the Martyrs of the Deuill. Neither doe we indeede take our owne reuenge, or puniſh the injuries offered vs, by the death of the injurious. For the true conqueſt of reuenge is, to giue him, of whom we would bee reuenged, cauſe to repent him: and not to lay the repentance of another mans death on our owne conſciences; Animaſq; in vulnere ponere; And to drowne our ſoules in the wounds and blood of our enemies. Hereupon you will againe aske me, if I condemne in generous and noble ſpirits the defence of their honours, being preſt with injuries? I ſay that I doe not; if the injuries bee violent. For the Law of Nature, which is a branch of the eternall Law: and the Lawes of all Chriſtian Kings and States; doe fauour him that is aſſailed, in the ſlaughter of the Aſſailant. You will ſecondly aske me, Whether a Noble-man, or a Gentle-man, being challenged by Cartel by one of like qualitie, bee not bound in point of honour to ſatisfie the challenger in priuate combat? I anſwere that he is not: becauſe (omitting the greateſt, which is the point of Religion) the point of the Law is directly contrarie and oppoſite to that, which they call the point of honour; the Law which hath dominion ouer it, which can

judge it, which can destroy it; except you will stile those Actes honourable, where the Hang-man giues the Garland. For, seeing the Lawes of this Land haue appointed the Hang-man to second the Conqueror; and the Lawes of God appointed the Deuill to second the conquered dying in malice: I say that he is both base, and a foole, that accepts of any Cartel so accompanied. To this perchance it will bee answered, That the Kings of England, and other Christian Kings, haue seldome taken any such aduantage ouer men of qualitie; who vpon euen termes haue slaine their priuate enemies. It is true, that as in times of trouble and combustion they haue not often done it; so did our Noble-men and Gentle-men in former ages, in all important injuries, sue vnto the King, to approue themselues by battaile and publique combat. For as they dared not to braue the Law: so did they disdaine to submit themselues to the shamefull reuenge therof; the same reuenge (because it detesteth murder) that it hath declared against a common Cut-purse or other Theeues. Nay let it be granted that a pardon be procured for such offenders; Yet is not the Man-slaier freed by his pardon. For these two remedies hath the partie grieued notwithstanding; that is, to require justice by Grand Assize, or by battaile, vpon his appeale, which (saith S^r. Thomas Smith) is not denied; and he further saith (for I vse his owne wordes) That if the Defendant (to wit, the Man-slaier) be conuinced either by Great Assize or by Battaile, vpon that appeale; the Man-slaier shall die, notwithstanding the Princes pardon. So fauourable (saith the same learned Gentleman) are our Princes, and the law of our Realme, to justice, and to the punishment of blood violently shed. It may further be demanded, how our Noble-men & Gentlemen shall be repaired in honour, where an enemie, taking the start either in wordes or blowes, shall lay on them an infamie vnsufferable? I say that a Marshalls Court will easily giue satisfaction in both. And if wee hold it no disgrace to submit our selues for the recouerie of our Debts, Goods, and Lands, and for all things else, by which the liues of our selues, our wiues, and children, are sustained, to the Iudges of the Law; because it may bee fellonie, to take by violence euen that which is our owne: why should we not submit our selues to the Iudges of honour in cases of honour; because to recouer our reputation by strong hand, may be murder? But yet againe it may be obiected, That the losse of honour ought to be more fearefull vnto vs, than either the losse of our goods, of our lands, or of our liues; and I say so too. But what is this honour, I meane honour indeede, and that which ought to bee so deare vnto vs, other than a kinde of historie, or fame following actions of vertue, actions accompanied with difficultie or danger, and vnder-taken for the publike good? In these he that is imploied and trusted, if he faile in the performance, either through cowardize, or any other base affection; it is true that he looseth his honor. But the acting of a priuate combate, for a priuate respect, and most commonly a friuolous one, is not an action of vertue; because it is contrarie to the law of God, and of all Christian Kings: neither is it difficult; because euen and equall in persons and armes: Neither for a publike good, but tending to the contrarie; because the losse or mutilation of an able man, is also a losse to the Common-weale.

Now that a Marshall of England hath power to saue euery mans fame and reputation, as farre as reputation may sustaine iniurie by wordes, I thinke no man doubteth. For to repent vs of any ill words that we haue giuen, and to confesse that we haue done him wrong to whom we haue giuen them, is a sufficient satisfaction; and as it may fall out, more than sufficient. For hee that giues ill words in choller, and suddenly denies them, or repents himselfe of them vpon aduisement; hath the disaduantage in point of reputation. Concerning blowes, which are indeede not to be giuen but to those that are seruile, whether sufficient recompence will bee made for them, it shall appeare by a notable example of a most worthy Gentleman Mounsieur de Plessis, that was stricken in France not long since by a Baron of the same Nation. The satisfaction which was giuen him by a iudgement of the Constable and Marshalls of France, was this. In the open Court, wherein the Constable gaue iudgement, ment, M. de Pleſsis was ſet in a chaire vnder the degrees where the Conſtable and Marſhalls ſate: the Baron, who had giuen him the blow, did kneele before him on both his knees, holding in his right hand a ſword with the point towards himſelfe; and in his left hand the like cudgell or baſtinado, wherewith he had ſtricken M. de Pleſsis; both which weapons he deliuered into Pleſsis hands, ſubmitting himſelfe to ſuch reuenge, as it ſhould pleaſe him to take with either of thoſe weapons; the Conſtable and Marſhalls hauing formerly left it to the will of Pleſsis, to vſe his owne diſcretion in the reuenge of his owne wrongs. Now whether the Baron had reaſon to pleaſe himſelfe, as one beforehand in point of honour, who ſtrucke M. de Pleſsis, like a Ruffian comming behinde him, and (hauing aduantage of companie, and his horſes ready) ſhifted himſelfe away on the ſuddaine, but being afterward taken, was taught to repent himſelfe in this ſhamefull manner; Or whether Monſieur de Pleſsis (of whoſe valour no man doubted) had not farre juſter cauſe to reſt ſatisfied, ſince he might at his pleaſure haue beaten or wounded his enemie, but forgaue him; let any wiſe man iudge. To this if it be ſaid, That the Baron was conſtrained to make his ſubmiſſion; that his repentance was enforced and not voluntarie; and therefore no diſgrace vnto him: I anſwere, that one may ſay as well, that it is no diſgrace to a Theefe, when he is brought to the Gallows, to repent him of the Robberies by him committed, becauſe his repentance alſo is conſtrained. And it is true, that enforced repentance is no diſgrace in reſpect of the force, but in reſpect of the fact: which (but for our ſinnes to God) makes all repentance ſhamefull; becauſe all forced repentance is inflicted vpon vs for ſomewhat vnworthy of a Gentleman and of an honeſt man. Nay voluntarie repentance it ſelfe, as it hath relation to men, ariſeth either out of the feare of the ill that may befall vs, or out of the acknowledgement of our owne weakeneſſe. Certainely, as wiſe men, and valiant men, doe rather deride pettie iniuries or ſuddaine iniuries, that are not offered from malice forethought, then reuenge them: ſo men, apt to quarrell, doe commonly ſuſpect their owne valour; and rather deſire, that thereby the world ſhould beleeue them to be of great daring, than know any ſuch reſolution in themſelues. For he that knowes himſelfe indeede to be a valiant man, ſcornes to hunt after the opinion.

Now the ſame power which the Conſtable and Marſhalls of France haue, hath alſo a Marſhall of England, or his Deputies; by whoſe iudgement, in all diſputes of honour, euery mans reputation may be preſerued; wee may therefore as well ſubmit our ſelues to the Iudge of honour in all diſputes of honour, as wee doe ſubmit our ſelues in all controuerſies of liuelihood and life, to the Iudges of the Law. And; out of doubt, the inſtitution of this Court of Cheualrie in England, in France, and elſewhere; was no leſſe charitable than politike. For the bloud of man, violently ſpilt, doth not bring forth honie-bees, as that of Bulls doth, which ſting but the fingers or the face: but it produceth that monſtrous Beaſt, Reuenge, which hath ſtung to death, and eaten vp of ſeuerall Nations, ſo many nøble perſonages; as there is nothing more lamentable, nor more threatning the wrath of God vpon ſupreme Gouernours, than the permiſſion.

His Majeſtie therefore (which Henrie the fourth of France alſo endeuoured) hath done a moſt Kingly and Chriſtian-like deede in Scotland, which the moſt renowned of all his Predeceſſours could neuer doe: in beating downe, and extinguiſhing, that hereditarie proſecution of malice, called the deadly feud; a conqueſt, which ſhall giue him the honour of Prudence and Kingly power, for euer-more. And we haue cauſe to hope, that his royall care ſhall be no leſſe happy in preuenting the like miſchiefe, which threatens England, by the audacious, common, and braue, yet outragious vanitie of Duelliſts.

Vnto this that I haue ſpoken of lying, and of man-ſlaughter, it muſt bee added, That each of theſe are of great Latitude, and worthy of reproofe and vengeance proportionably, more or leſſe, in their ſeuerall degrees. There is much difference betweene Lies of neceſſitie vpon breach of promiſe, or complementall lies; and

such pernicious lies, as proceed from feare and cowardize, or are vttered by false witnesses: the former sort, being excusable by weakenesse or leuitie; the latter, being altogether detestable. No lesse, if not more, difference there is, betweene killing of a man in open field, with euen weapons; and that killing, which the Scriptures call killing by guile, dolo or per insidias; though our Lawes doe not much distinguish them in punishment. For in the latter, God, forsaking his owne priuiledge, commandeth, that the guilefull murderer bee drawne by force, from the protection of his Altar. Exod 21. Neither is euery guilefull murder performed by the sword, nor by ouert violence: but there is a guilefull murder also, by poisoning; and by the pen, or by practice. For such distinction is found, betweene comming presumptuously vpon a man, to slay him with guile; and lying in wait for blood, priuily, for the innocent, without a cause, vpon hope of spoile, after such manner as the net is spred before the eyes of the birds. Exod.21.v.14. Pro.1.v.11. Francis the first, Queene Marie of England, and the Kings Majestie now raigning, haue giuen notable testimonie of their justice, vpon three Noble men, who committed guilefull murder. Of the first kinde, King Francis vpon the Lord of Talard: who being (saith the French Historian) de haute & ancienne lignee, & supporte de plusieurs grandes alliances; who being of high and ancient linage, and supported by diuers great alliances, of which the Cardinall of Bellay (in especiall fauor with the King) was one, was notwithstanding deliuered ouer into the hands of the Hang-man. Queene Marie, vpon a noble man of her owne Religion, and in many other respects very deare vnto her. His Maiestie, vpon a Baron of Scotland; whose house was no lesse ancient and faithfull, than himselfe valiant, and greatly friended both at home and abroad. Of killing guilefully by poison, and of punishment following such wicked Artisans; euery Age hath had too many examples. Of guilefull killing by the pen (that I may not speake of any English Iudge) the Authour of the French Recherches giues vs two notable instances: the one of des Essars, who (saith Pasquire) fit mourir Montaigu grand Maistre de France, pour contenter l'opinion de celuy dont il estoit lors idolastre; & Dieu permit que depuis il fut pendu & estrangle; Who caused Montaigu great Master of France to die, to content his minde (to wit, the Duke of Burgoyne) whom at that time Essars worshipped as his Idol: but God permitted, that he himselfe was soone after hanged and strangled. Lib.4.cap.12. & cap.11. The other was of the Great Francis the first, vpon his Chancellor Poyet: who, to satisfie the Kings passion, practised the destruction of the Admirall Chabot, a man most nobly descended, and of great seruice. For as in other men, so in Kings, the passion of loue growes old, and weares out by time. So the Kings affection being changed towards the Admirall, hee charged him with some offences which hee had formerly committed. The Admirall, presuming vpon the great good seruice which hee had done the King in Piemont, and in the defence of Marseilles against the Emperour; gaue the King other language than became him; and desired nothing so much, as a publike triall. Hereupon the King (it being easie to prouoke an ill disposition) gaue commission to the Chancellor, as President, and other Iudges, vpon an information of the Kings Aduocate, to question the Admiralls life. The Chancellor, an ambitious man, and of a large conscience, (which is rare in men towards the Law) hoping highly to content the King; wrought with some of the Iudges with so great cunning; with others, with so sharpe threats; and with the rest, with so faire promises; as, albeit nothing could be proued against the Admirall, worthy of the Kings displeasure; yet the Chancellor subscribed, and got others to subscribe, to the forfeiture of his Estate, Offices, and Libertie; though not able to preuaile against his life. But what was the Chancellors reward (the King hating falshood in so great a Magistrate) other than his owne degradation, arraignement, and condemnation? Belle lecon certes (saith Pasquire) a tout Iudge pour demourer touiours en soy, & ne laisser fluctuer sa conscience dedans les vagues d'vne imaginarie faueur, qui pour fin de ieu le submerge; A faire lesson to all Iudges, to dwell alwaies in themselues, and not to suffer their consciences to float vpon the waues of imaginarie fauour, which in the end ouerwhelmes them. And as for the Admirall: though it might haue beene

anſwered vnto his friends, if any bewailed his calamitie as vndeſerued, That hee was tried, according to his owne deſire, by the Lawes of his Countrie, and by the Iudges of Parliament; yet the Kings juſtice, ſurmounting all other his paſſions, gaue backe vnto him his Honour, his Offices, his Libertie, and his Eſtate.

The laſt Acts of SCIPIO in Spaine. His returne to Rome where he is choſen Conſul.

THe laſt buſines that troubled Scipio in Spaine, grew by the rebellion of the People, and mutinie of his Souldiers. He fell dangerouſly ſicke, in ſuch ſort, that the rumor of his death ranne currant throughout Spaine. This encouraged Mandonius and Indibilis, pettie Kings, that had forſaken the Carthaginians, and followed Scipio awhile before, to take armes againſt the Romans. They were vainely perſwaded, that after the Carthaginians were driuen out, they themſelues ſhould become the mightieſt in all Spaine. But ſeeing now, that things were no way anſwerable to the greatneſſe of their hopes; they thought it beſt, to take the preſent aduantage, and hammer out their owne fortunes. So they raſhly fell vpon the Sueſſetani and Sedetani, Confederates of the Romans; and waſted their Countrie. Part of the Roman Armie lying at Sucro, in ſtead of making head againſt theſe Rebells, grew to be affected with the like diſtemper. They had not reaped ſuch profit of their Roman conqueſts, as might ſatisfie their deſires; or as they thought eaſie to bee gotten, if they might be their owne Caruers. Wherefore, when the death of Scipio was reported, they thought, that the time ſerued very well, to enrich themſelues with ſpoile of the Countrie. Many outrages they committed: and, which was greateſt of all, driuing away their Colonells, that ſhould haue bridled their furie; they choſe out of their owne number two baſe fellowes, Albius Calenus, and Atrius Vmber, to be their Commanders. Theſe tooke vpon them all the Enſignes of Proconſuls, or Propretors; as if this their election had beene like to that, wherein Lucius Martius was choſen by the Souldiers, after the death of the two Scipio's. But whileſt they were deuiſing, what exploits they might do, for the enriching of themſelues, in a time of ſuch combuſtion, as was expected; there arriued more certaine newes, that Scipio was both aliue, and in good health. There came alſo new Colonells, ſent vnto them from their Generall: who mildly rebuking their want of conſideration, and ſeeming to bee glad that they had no further ouer-ſhot themſelues; led them to Carthagena, there to receiue their pay. Before their comming, Scipio had reſolued to doe exemplarie juſtice on the principall offenders; and to put the whole multitude of them in feare, of what they had deſerued. Therefore hee cauſed Syllanus to make readie the Companies which lay before in the Towne, as it were to make an Expedition againe Mandonius, and Indibilis; He cauſed Albius and Atrius with ſome thirtie other of their Complices, to be ſecretly apprehended in their lodgings; He called the Mutiners to aſſembly; and hauing them vnarmed as they were, encircled round by Syllanus and his Companies, prepared for the purpoſe; hee bitterly inueighed againſt them all, as Traitors. This done; Albius, and Atrius, with the other priſoners, were haled to the ſtake; where they were whipt, and beheaded, as was the Roman cuſtome toward ſuch offenders. The reſt of the Souldiers, to the number of eight thouſand, were cauſed to take their oath of obedience anew; and receiued euery man his pay when he was ſworne.

Mandonius and Indibilis continued in armes; notwithſtanding that they had certaine word of Scipio his life and health. Well they could haue beene contented to be quiet: but by the ſeueritie vſed to the Roman Souldiers; they ſtood in feare, as being being Spaniards, and greater offenders, of harder measure. Scipio went against them; and found them in a Valley, that was scarce large enough to hold all their Armie. In the entrance thereof hee fought with them: and sending Lælius with all his horse to fetch a compasse about the Hills, and charge them in reare; he ouerthrew them. Indibilis and Mandonius had after this no hope remaining, to preserue themselues and their estates, otherwise than by making submission. Mandonius therefore came to Scipio: and humbly crauing pardon, both for himselfe, and for his brother Indibilis, obtained his request; yet so, that they were taught to acknowledge themselues lesse free Princes, then they formerly had beene.

Afterward Scipio went toward Gades: and was met on the way by Masanissa; who secretly promised to doe him all seruice, if the People of Rome would send him to make Warre in Africk. Vnto Mago that lay in Gades, came directions from Carthage; that letting all care of Spaine alone, he should thence depart with his fleet into Italie; and there wage an Armie of Gaules, and Ligurians, to joyne with Hannibal. For this purpose, was monie sent vnto him from Carthage; and he himselfe laid hold vpon all that he could finde in the Towne of Gades; without sparing either priuate men, the common treasurie, or the Temples. In his voyage thence, hee landed at Carthagena; hoping to haue taken it by surprise. But hee failed in the attempt; and was so beaten to his ships, that he returned back to repose himselfe awhile at Gades. The Gaditanes, offended with the robberies and spoile that hee had made at his taking leaue of them, would not suffer him to enter againe into their Citie. By this hee foresaw, that it would not bee long ere they became Roman. Wherefore sending Messengers into the Towne, to complaine of this vncourteous dealing, hee allured their Magistrates forth vnto him; whom, notwithstanding all the excuse that they could make, he whipt, and crucified. This done, he followed his former intended voyage; bidding Spaine farewell for euer.

The Isle and Citie of Gades, was yeelded to the Romans, presently after the departure of Mago. Then did Scipio deliuer vp the Prouince, to those that were sent from Rome to succeede him therein: and himselfe with ten ships returned home. At his comming to Rome he made suite for the honour of a triumph. But it was denied him: for that it had as yet beene granted vnto no Proconsul; excepting to such, as receiued that dignitie after a Consulship, as it were by prorogation. But to make amends for this repulse: the election of new Consuls being then in hand, by generall voice of the Citie P. Cornelius Scipio was chosen Consul; and P. Licinius Crassus joyned with him. This Crassus, being high Priest, or Bishop of the Romans; might not, by the custome of those times, goe farre from the Citie; as being to intend the matters of their superstition: though Cæsar, and others, who in ages following held the same Office; were staied by no such religious impediment, from being farre, and long absent. Hereby it came to passe, that Scipio desiring to haue the Warre transferred into Africk, was in no danger to loose that honourable charge, by any mischance of lot, in the diuision of Prouinces; for that his Colleague was not capable of emploiment so farre off.

§. XVIII.

SCIPIO obtaines leaue to make warre in Africk. His preparations. Of MASANISSA who ioyned with SCIPIO. The victories againſt ASDRVBAL and SYPHAX.

PVB. CORNELIVS SCIPIO, and P. LICINIVS CRASSVS, entring into their Conſulſhip, held a meeting of the Senate in the Capitol: wherein it was decreed, that Scipio ſhould bee allowed, to beſtow part of the money which he had brought out of Spaine into the treaſurie; vpon the ſetting forth of ſolemne plaies, that he had vowed to make, whileſt he was buſied in his Spaniſh warres. This helped well to reuiue the memorie of his victories already gotten; and to giue hope vnto the People of greater victories in the warre, which he intended to make in Africk. To the ſame purpoſe, did the Spaniſh embaſſages auaile much in the Senate, eſpecially that of the Saguntines: who magnified his actions, highly and deſeruedly; ſaying, That they were the moſt happie of all their Countrimen, ſince they being preſent, had ſeene him choſen Conſul, and ſhould carry home ſuch joyfull newes. The Saguntine Embaſſadours were louingly entertained by the Senate; as their faith to Rome, though coſtly it were both to them, and to the Romanes, had well deſerued. Neuertheleſſe, when Scipio propoſed, that Africk might be decreed vnto him for his Prouince: there wanted not many, euen of the principall men, that vehemently gainſaid him. Of theſe was Q. Fabius Maximus, the chiefe: who ſeemes to haue been troubled with that diſeaſe; which too often cauſeth men renowned for long approued vertue, to looke aſquint vpon the actions of thoſe, that follow them in the ſame kinde. Hee alleaged many reaſons againſt the purpoſe of the Conſul: whereof the chiefe were, That the treaſurie was vnable to ſuſtaine the charges of a warre in Africk; and that it was extremely perillous to hazard ſo great forces, where they could not at pleaſure bee recalled vnto the defence of Rome it ſelfe, if need required. Hereunto he added many words concerning the danger wherein Italie ſtood, not only of Hannibal, but of Mago his brother, that was arming the Ligurians: as alſo concerning the honour of the Conſul; which would (he ſaid) be greater in ſetting Italie free from enemies, than it could be in doing any harme to Africk. Neither did he forget, both to eleuate the Spaniſh warres, as of leſſe moment than the intended voiage againſt Carthage; nor withall to lay great blame vpon Scipio, for hauing ſuffered Aſdrubal to paſſe into Italie: ſhewing, that it was greatly to be feared, leſt the like might happen againe; and that a new Armie, notwithſtanding the good ſucceſſe of Scipio (if it hapned to bee good) might be ſent from Carthage, to the vtter endangering of Rome, whilſt the Roman forces were employed abroad. But the maine point which he vrged, was, That neither the Senate had ordained, nor the People commanded, Africk to be that yere a Prouince: which the Conſul neuertheleſſe propounded in ſuch wiſe, as if it were a matter already concluded, and no longer to be argued. Scipio on the other ſide, inſiſted vpon this one point; That it was better to make an offenſiue, than a defenſiue warre: eſpecially againſt ſuch as the Carthaginians; who being ill prouided of able men at home, did furniſh themſelues by helpe of money, with leuies made abroad. As for the care of Italie, he doubted not, but P. Licinius his Colleague would bee as well able to diſcharge it now, as others had done in times of greater danger. So promiſing to draw Hannibal into Africk, for defence of his owne home: and taxing as ciuilly as he could, the enuy of Fabius, which withſtood ſuch a gallant enterpriſe; he propoſed the matter againe vnto the Senate. Much altercation there was about the manner of his proceeding: foraſmuch as it was noyſed abroad, that if he could not bring the Senate to his minde, he would carry it by the People. This offended many of the Ancients: who reſented in this honourable man a little ſpice of that arrogancie, which in following ages, grew to be much hotter in thoſe that had commanded long abroad. But in concluſion, Scipio referred himſelfe wholly vnto the Senates good will and pleasure; whereby hee obtained thus much, That the Isle of Sicil might be appointed vnto him for his Prouince; with leaue to passe ouer into Africk, if he found it expedient.

Want of money, and no great liking to his voiage, made the Roman Senate haue little care to furnish out Scipio to the warre, by him intended vpon Africke. Herewithall it fell out, that Mago, comming on the suddaine from the Baleares to Genua, and winning the Towne, bred a feare of no lesse terrible inuasion vpon Italie, than that which Asdrubal had lately made. He could not indeed raise any great Armie of the Ligurians; for that he found them distracted with ciuill warres. Therefore he was driuen to make choice of his partie; and to helpe those whom hee thought fittest for his turne, against the others. This troublesome businesse, though it occupied more of his time than he could willingly haue spared; yet it got him reputation by his victories; and made the vnsteadie Gaules readie to enter into his pay. Hereupon the dispersed Legions of the Romans, that vnder Proconsuls, and Pretors, lay readie to be employed where need should require; were directed vnto the borders of Lombardie and Liguria, there to make head against Mago. But all his menaces passed away in vapour. For a fleet, either comming to his aide from Carthage, or by him sent thither (the report is vncertaine) loaden with the bootie that he had taken; fell into the hands of the Roman Pretor, that gouerned in Sardinia. This did much disable him: and though after a while, there came letters from Carthage, together with store of money, heartning him in his proceedings: yet some impediments which he found, and that fatall voiage of Scipio into Africke, disturbed all; and made him be recalled home.

Against Hannibal, was nothing done this yeere. Neither was any thing done by him, of which the Roman Historians haue beene pleased to take notice. Onely it is said, that he spent the Summer by the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, where hee raised an Altar, with a huge Title of all that he had performed, grauen in Punike, and Greeke letters. Such accompt of winnings past, is commonly in Gamesters that are at the height of their fortune, a cause of remission, and carelesnesse; in those that are vpon the losing hand, a cause both of the same for the present, and shortly after of dejection, when they finde a notable change. A great pestilence, infesting both the Carthaginian and the Roman Campe, is said to haue beene the occasion of this yeeres idlenesse, which fell not out much amisse for the Citie of Rome, that was maruailously empouerished by this warre; and had alreadie tryed the vtmost way to defray the charges, which grew insupportable. To relieue the present necessitie, it was well thought vpon, that a great part of Campania (not many yeeres since confiscated) should bee sold, or let out: in which bargaine, that the Citie might receiue no losse; the tenth part of the fine was ordained as a reward, vnto the detectors of lands concealed.

Of this, or other money, none was giuen to Scipio. Neither was hee allowed to make presse of Souldiers for his African voiage; neither did hee ouer-much labour to obtaine it. That which the Senate refused, the People did for him: or rather they did it for themselues; that were therein wiser than the Senate. It is vsually found in Councells of estate, that the busie, or obstinate heads of a few, doe carrie all the rest. And many times men make a surrender of their owne judgements, to the wisedome that hath gotten it selfe a name, by giuing happie direction in troubles forepast. Therefore, hee that reposeth himselfe vpon the aduice of many, shall often finde himselfe deceiued: the counsaile of those many being wholly directed by the empire of a few, that ouer-sway the rest. Q. Fabius was accounted the Oracle of his time: for his warie nature sorted well with the businesse, that fell out in the chiefe of his employment. Vnto him therefore Q. Fuluius adhered, with other of the Senators, that were growne olde in following one course; from which they could not shift, as the change of times required. But the People (who though they could not well aduise, and deliberate, yet could well apprehend apprehend) embraced the needfull reſolution of Scipio: in ſuch ſort, that beſides his Roman forces, he had from diuers parts of Italie about ſeuen thouſand Voluntaries. Hee had alſo prouiſion from the ſeuerall Townes; Corne, Iron, Canuas for ſailes, Axes, Beede-hookes, Hand-mills, and the like implements, Firre for building of ſhips, many thouſands of Targets, Helmets, and Speares of all kindes: euery place furniſhing him with that commoditie, which it beſt could affoord. Vnto this willingneſſe of the People, the diligence of Scipio was correſpondent. In the compaſſe of fiue and fortie daies, hee had both feld his Timber, built, and lanched twentie Trireme, and ten Quinquereme Gallies; wherewith hee tranſported his Armie into Sicil. In Sicil he found, beſides other forces, two Legions, that had ſerued at Canne: which were olde Souldiers, and (as hee himſelfe well knew) not guiltie of the ouerthrow; for which they had long vnder-gone a heauie cenſure. They had ſerued vnder Marcellus and Læuinus, at the taking of many Cities, and ſtrong peeces: in which regard, they were like to be of good vſe to him in Africk, where would bee ſtore of ſuch emploiment. For increaſing the number of his horſe, hee preſſed three hundred Sicilians, all wealthie young men, and ſuch as loued well their eaſe. Theſe he afterwards diſcharged from the Warre, highly to their contentment: but with condition, that they ſhould deliuer their Horſe and Armes, to as many Roman Gentlemen, which he brought ouer with him for the purpoſe. Whileſt hee was prouiding, to haue things in a readineſſe for Africk, the baniſhed Locrians that followed the Roman ſide, made him acquainted with an intelligence, whereby they hoped to recouer their Citie. Some handicrafts men, that wrought for the Carthaginians in one of the Citadells of Locri (for there were two in the Towne) being taken priſoners by the Romans, promiſed to betray the place, if they might be ranſomed, and rewarded. Scipio being aduertiſed of this, gaue order to haue the attempt made by night: which happily ſucceeded; and that Citadell was ſurpriſed. The other Citadell was ſtrongly defended by the Carthaginian Garriſon, which ſent to Hannibal for aide. The Romans in like ſort, fearing leſt their owne paucitie ſhould make them too weake for Hannibal, craued helpe of the Conſul Scipio. The Townesmen were doubtfully affected: but the beſt, and moſt of them inclining to the Romans, kept Hannibal out; whom the comming of Scipio cauſed thence to depart; and cauſed likewiſe the Carthaginian Garriſon to abandon the other Citadell. Many outrages were committed by the Roman Souldiers, that were left by Scipio in cuſtodie of the Towne. Wherefore a vehement complaint was made by the Locrians vnto the Roman Senate; not onely againſt thoſe of the Garriſon: but much more againſt Pleminius the Captaine, who gaue bad example, and was worſe than all the reſt. Beſides many Murders, Robberies, Rapes, and other Villanies: the Temple of Proſerpina, that had a great fame of ſanctitie, was ſpoiled by theſe barbarous Theeues. The Locrians therefore aduiſed the Senate to make preſent amends to the Goddeſſe for this ſacrilege: ſaying, that the like had neuer been committed, without notorious vengeance by her taken vpon the Authors. The Senate gaue good eare to this complaint, comforted the Locrians, and redreſſed the injuries done vnto them, ſent for Pleminius, with other principall the offenders, whom they caſt into priſon, & vſed according to their deſerts: as alſo they reſtored vnto Proſerpina her money twice told. But old Q. Fabius was not herewithall contented. He laid much of the blame vpon Scipio, that had placed ſuch a man in Locri; and had not carefully harkened to the complaints made againſt him, but ſuffered him to runne on in theſe his wicked courſes. By the ſharp inuectiue that Fabius made, others tooke courage to ſpeak what they pleaſed, as well againſt the demeanor of Scipio, as againſt the diſſoluteneſſe of his Armie; which lay, as they ſaid, idle in Sicil, neither mindfull of any ſeruice toward, nor fit for it if neede ſhould require. Finally, things were ſo farre vrged, that ten Legates were ſent ouer into Sicil, together with the Pretor appointed for that Iland; two of the Tribunes, and one of the Ædiles; who ſhould examine theſe matters; and either cauſe the Generall to returne into Italie, or continue him in his charge, as they thought fit. The end of all was: they found him so well prepared against Carthage, as that they hastned him on his journie, and gaue him high commendations at their returne.

Scipio had alreadie emploied Lalius in Africk; rather to make discouerie, than to worke any other great effect of warre. He tooke a great bootie: and struck no little terrour into the Carthaginians; who saw their affaires to bee vpon termes of change. But the greatest fruit of his journie was, That speaking with Masanissa, he will informed himselfe of the state of Affrick; and knew what was to bee expected of those two Kings, that had promised to joyne with the Romans at their landing.

Concerning Masanissa his reuolt from the Carthaginians, and his compact made vnder-hand with the Romans: Liuie doth professe, That there was no such euident cause thereof at the present; but that the long continuance of his faith and constancie, in following times, must helpe to proue, that this his change was not without some good cause. But Appianus (an Historian farre inferiour to Liuie, both in Worth and Time) giues one reason so probable of this, and many accidents thereto belonging, as that it carries with it a great appearance of necessary trueth. Only the doubt is, How it could any way come to passe; that the knowledge of such a matter should haue escaped the diligence of Liuie, if it had beene true: vnlesse we should beleeue, that he wilfully forbare to rehearse a Tragedie; the sorrow whereof would cause men to thinke amisse of Scipio. How soeuer it was, thus * Appian tells it: and many circumstances of things done confirme it. Asdrubal, the sonne of Gisco, had a faire daughter, whom both King Syphax and Masanissa loued. Masanissa, being brought vp at Carthage, and being withall a goodly gentleman of person, and excellent in qualities, was chosen by Asdrubal to be his sonne-in-law. When the virgin was betrothed vnto him, he went into Spaine, and there did great seruice. But afterwards, the Carthaginian Senate thought the mariage of Asdrubals daughter to be a matter of State: and bestowed her vpon Syphax; without standing to acquaint her father or Masanissa therewithall. This they did, for that Syphax was the more mightie Prince; and for that the indignitie of the repulse, had made him become their enemie. Hereof Masanissa was aduertised: and forthwith entred into intelligence with Scipio, secretly as he thought; yet not so secretly, but that some notice was taken of it: which would haue cost him his life, had he not with great circumspection conueighed himselfe home into his fathers Kingdome. Thus farre forth we may beleeue Appianus: all the narration well cohering with things past, and following. Only it seemes, that howsoeuer Sophonisba the daughter of Asdrubal, was promised by the Carthaginians vnto Syphax: yet since this their courtesie proceeded from feare, He thought it wisdome to continue and increase the same their feare, by making faire promises to the Romans; vntill ASDRVBAL had sent for his daughter from Carthage, and the marriage was consummated. In other matters concerning the warre it selfe, wherein Appian differs much from Liuie, and from Polybius, whom (as appeares by the broken pieces of his works remaining) Liuie did follow; it will be no offence, to take little heed vnto his reports.

Liu. lib. 29.

Masanissa was the sonne of Gala, a King of the Numidians: whose father dying, the Crown descended by order of the Country, vnto Desalces the brother, not vnto Masanissa the sonne. But this Vncle of Masanissa shortly died: and his elder sonne, who tooke possession of the Kingdome, was vanquished, and slaine in battaile by a Rebel, that made himselfe Protector ouer the yonger which was a child. The Traitor fortified himselfe against Masanissa, whose returne hee feared; by Alliances with the Carthaginians and Syphax. But all would not serue: He, and his Pupill, were dispossessed of their Estates by Masanissa; that was a skilfull Warriour, and well beloued for the memorie of his father Gala. The Carthaginians in reason should haue beene glad, that Masanissa, who had done them notable seruice, was thus confirmed in his Estate: had they not beene guiltie of the injurie by them done vnto him; whilst his Vncle or Cousin raigned, and hee seemed vnlikely to stand them in any stead. But Syphax, by their procurement, and perhaps by his owne malice towards his Corriual,

warred vpon him; and ouer-charging him with numbers, draue him out of his Kingdome. Neuertheleſſe Maſaniſſa ſtill retayned the hearts of his people: and thereby remained ſtrong enough, to infeſt both Syphax and the Carthaginians; though he was often put in diſtreſſe, by great forces that were ſent againſt him. He therefore keeping much about the leſſer Syrtis, betweene the borders of the Carthaginians and the Nation of the Garamants, expected the comming of the Romans: yet ſo, as he made long roades ouer all the Countrie, euen as farre as to Hippo; and when Lælius arriued thereabouts, exhorted and encouraged him to haſten on Scipio to the inuaſion of Africk.

But Syphax, in whoſe great aide and ſuccour was repoſed more hope of good ſucceſſe, than could be expected from the good will of poore Maſaniſſa; ſent an Embaſſage into Sicil about the ſame time, which was little pleaſing vnto Scipio. He excuſed himſelfe of his promiſe lately made: and ſignified his alliance with the Carthaginians; adding, That hee could not chooſe but fight for the defence of Africke, wherein he was borne and raigned; and for defence of his beloued wiues Countrie, if it were inuaded. Neuertheleſſe hee promiſed to remaine a Neuter; ſo long as the Romans and Carthaginians held warre abroad, farre enough from Africk, as hitherto they had done. This meſſage haſtened Scipio in his Expedition, much more than any perſwaſion could haue done. For the promiſed aſſiſtance of Syphax had not a little aduanced his enterpriſe; in procuring both the aſſent of the Senate, and the forwardneſſe of many Aduenturers. Leſt therefore the fayling of this hope, ſhould worke too great a change in common opinion; He thought it the beſt way to preuent all diſcourſe, and ſet the warre vndertaken immediatly on foot. The Embaſſadours he diſmiſſed in all haſte, with letters to their King: wherein hee willed him to conſider, that what hee had promiſed hee had alſo ſworne; and therefore ſhould doe well to make it good. Hauing ſent them away, Hee called his Souldiers together, and bade them make ready for the voyage; which he intended no longer to deferre. For, ſaid he, Maſaniſſa hath beene with Lælius: and Syphax hath newly ſent to me; greatly wondring vpon what I ſhould thus ſtay; and ſaying, that they will prouide for themſelues, if I faile their expectation by tarrying any longer. This fine tale preuented all further inquiſition, that might elſe haue beene made concerning the meſſage of theſe Embaſſadours; whoſe followers had beene ſeene walking vp and downe Syracuſe. And leſt any thing ſhould afterwards breake out, that might hinder the buſineſſe, Scipio immediatly ſent about his fleet vnto Lilybæum: and requeſting by letters M. Pomponius, that was Pretor in Sicil, to meete him there; haſted thither with his Armie. At Lilybæum he agreed with the Pretor, about the diuiſion of the Legions betweene them; which to leaue behinde for defence of the Iland; and which to carrie with him into Africk. What numbers hee tranſported, it is not certaine: ſome Hiſtorians reckoning only ten thouſand foot, and two and twentie hundred horſe; others increaſing them to fiue and thirtie thouſand, horſe and foot. Concerning his directions for embarking, and other matters belonging to their courſe, I holde it needleſſe to ſet them downe: ſince they were points of ordinarie care, and which it is like that neither he, when he tooke his voyage into Spaine, nor others vpon like occaſions, haue omitted; they being alſo word for word ſet downe by an Hiſtorian, who borrowed them from Liuie, and fitted them to a Prince of later age.

This Roman Armie landed in Africk, neare vnto a Fore-land then called the faire Promontorie: which how farre it was from Carthage, or toward what point of the Compaſſe, I cannot preciſely affirme; becauſe it is vncertaine, whether it were that Cape or Head-land which bore the name of Mercurie, and lay to the Noth-eaſt of Carthage; or whether that of Apollo, which lay Northerly from Carthage, and by Weſt. The comming of Maſaniſſa vnto Scipio at his firſt arriuall, helpes to confirme the opinion of Xylander: who thinkes the faire Promontorie to haue beene the ſame, that was alſo called Mercuries Cape, ſince with little difficultie Maſaniſſa might come thither from the leſſer Syrtis, whereabout was his common abiding. But foraſmuch as without any memorable impediment, ſoone after his arriuall, Scipio encamped before Vtica, that ſtood Weſtward from Carthage beyond the Riuer Bagradas: it may rather ſeeme, that hee landed within the Promontorie of Apollo; whence the way to Vtica was not long. This is alſo ſtrongly proued; for that out of Carthage were ſent, the next day, fiue hundred horſe to trouble him in his diſembarking. Neither was it ſo hard for Maſaniſſa, that roued about the Countrie with a troupe of horſe, to finde out the Romans, though they landed farre from the place to the which hee vſually reſorted, like as before he had met with Lælius at Hippo that was farther off: as it would haue beene for Scipio, with his Armie and Carriages, to ouer-come the trouble of a long journie, and fetch a great compaſſe to Vtica, by Land; when he might haue diſembarqued nearer vnto it. Neuertheleſſe it may paſſe as a conjecture, That Scipio came firſt of all to Emporia, a plentifull Region about the leſſer Syrtis; ſince he gaue charge to the Maſters of his ſhips, at the ſetting forth from Lilybæum, to ſhape their courſe for that coaſt. The Countrie thereabout was very rich, and fit for ſuſtenance of an Armie: neither were the Inhabitants warlike, or well prouided to make reſiſtance. Thus much perhaps Maſaniſſa had ſignified vnto Lælius, when he ſpake with him at Hippo: thinking that the Romans, howſoeuer they made braue promiſes, would not come ſtrong enough to fight at head. But when hee ſaw their fleet and Armie to be ſuch, as not only ſerued to inuade the Lands of Carthage, but threatned a conqueſt of the Citie, and whole Eſtate: then might hee better aduiſe them to ſet ſaile for Vtica, and make warre vpon the Enemies at their owne doores.

The Carthaginians had at that time neither any Captaine of great worth at home, nor better Armie than of raw Souldiers; that were leuied, or to be leuied in haſte. Aſdrubal the ſonne of Giſco, the ſame that had lately beene chaſed out of Spaine by Scipio, was their beſt man of warre. And good enough perhaps he was thought by Hanno and his fellowes, of whoſe faction he was: or if ought were wanting in him, yet his Riches and Nobilitie, together with the affinity of King Syphax, made him paſſeable. He was at that preſent with the King his ſonne-in-law, working him (no doubt) againſt the Romans: when letters were brought from Carthage, both to Syphax and to him, informing them of the Inuaſion: entreating the one of them to giue aſſiſtance; and commanding the other to make his repaire vnto the Citie, where he was choſen Generall. But ere theſe could be readie, Scipio had beaten the troupe of Carthaginian horſe, that were ſent out of the Citie to diſturbe his landing; and ſlaine Hanno a yong Gentleman, that was their Leader. He had alſo taken and ſacked a Towne of the Carthaginians: wherein, beſides other bootie, hee tooke eight thouſand priſoners; all which he conueighed aboord his Hulks or ſhips of burden, and ſent them backe loaden into Sicil. Hee tooke likewiſe a Towne called Salera; which he held and fortified. In Salera lay another Hanno, with foure thouſand Numidian horſe: whoſe ſeruice being fitter for the field, than for defence of walled places; made Scipio to perceiue the vnskilfulneſſe of their Leader, that had thus houſed them. Wherefore he ſent Maſaniſſa before him: who rode vp to the gates; and, by making a Brauado, trained out the improuident Hanno ſo farre, that hee drew him vnto a place, where the Romans lay in wait for him. The victorie was eaſily gotten; and Hanno either taken, or ſlaine. With thoſe that fled, the Romans entred pell-mell into the Towne; which preſently they made their owne. Thence went Scipio to Vtica, a Citie of great importance, * of which mention hath beene formerly made; and ſate downe before it. Fortie dayes hee ſpent about it: aſſailing it both by Land and Sea, and vſing all his engines of batterie whereof he had plentie; yet was in no likelihood of preuailing. And now the Summer was quite ſpent: ſo that it was time for him to chooſe a place, and fortifie his Winter-campe; which muſt bee well ſtored againſt the yeere following. Whileſt thus neceſſitie vrged him to leaue Vtica: and ſhame of taking the repulſe in his firſt great enterpriſe, rather than any hope of better ſucceſſe, cauſed him to ſtay there: Aſdrubal and Syphax gaue him the honour of a faire pretence to leaue the siege. Asdrubal had made a Leuie of thirtie thousand foot, and three thousand horse; yet aduentured not with this ill-trained Armie to draw neere vnto the Romans, before the comming of Syphax. Syphax brought with him vnto Carthage fiftie thousand foot, and tenne thousand horse: which joyning vnto the forces of Asdrubal, they marched brauely toward Scipio; who thereby tooke occasion to dislodge. He chose for his Winter-campe the bankes of an Inlet, that had good harbour for his Nauie. His foot-men he lodged on a Promontorie, joyning to the Continent by an arme of Land: his horse-men he bestowed vpon lower ground, on the other shore: in the bottome of the Creeke he mored his ships; and there hee quartered the Mariners, with all that belonged vnto the fleet. The whole Campe he strongly fortified; and so attended the season of the yeere, when it should serue him againe to fight. Of cattaile and other bootie Masanissa had brought in great store; by driuing the Countrie, before the comming of Asdrubal and Syphax. Corne also he had gotten some: and great store was sent him from Sicil and Sardinia. Likewise apparrell for his Souldiers, was sent from home, or from Sardinia: though scarce enough to serue turne; for that it was a matter of more cost. The ships that brought these things, he freighted homewards with such part of his bootie, as hee could best spare; especially with Captiues to be sold for slaues. Asdrubal and Syphax encamped neere vnto Scipio: not so strongly fortifying themselues, as did the Romans; either for that they wanted the seuere institution, which the Romans vsed in discipline of Warre; or for that they presumed vpon their multitude, against which they found in Scipio no disposition to issue foorth of his strength, and fight. So the Winter passed without action.

When Spring drew neere; Scipio thought it good to assay his old friend the Numidian King, if perhaps he might bee wonne by perswasions to forsake the Carthaginians. It was considered, that those Barbarians were naturally vnconstant; and particularly, that Syphax had giuen proofe of before this of his much leuitie. It might therefore be hoped, That hauing wearied himselfe, by lodging a whole Winter in the Campe: and being peraduenture no lesse wearie with satietie of his wife, who had caused him to enter into this warre: Hee might bee mooued with a little entreatie to with-draw himselfe home into his Kingdome, and rest a Neuter. But it is not vnlikely, that such a friend as this King, had beene highly entertained and honored in the Citie of Carthage, which was neere at hand, as often as during this Winter it had pleased him, or as he had beene inuited, to make a step thither and repose himselfe a while: his wife Queene Sophonisba lying also there at the same time, to cherish him in his resolution. Howsoeuer it were, Syphax did only make an ouerture of peace: propounding it as reasonable, That Hannibal should bee recalled out of Italie by the Carthaginians: and that the Romans in like sort should quietly depart out of Africk; and so make an end of the Warre, wherewith now both Africk and Europe were disquieted. Vnto this would not Scipio at the first giue eare: yet being pressed earnestly by many messages from Syphax, and desiring to continue the inter-course of Embassadours: He beganne to make shew, as if he would consider of the motion. He was giuen to vnderstand by those whom he had sent vnto the King, That the Enemies had their Campes without any great defence of earth, full of woodden Cabbins, and couered with boughes: and that the Numidians, such of them as came first with Syphax, vsed couerings of Mats and Reedes; others, that came later, had thatched their lodgings with drie boughes and leaues: vnder which they lay carelesly without their Trenches. Vpon this aduertisement he bethought himselfe, That it would not be hard for him to set their camps on fire; and thereby giue them a notable ouerthrow. Without helpe of some such stratageme, Hee foresaw that it would be a worke of great difficultie for him, to proceede in his warres when time should serue. It was a plaine open Countrie wherein hee lay: and the Enemies had great aduantage of him in number, especially in horse; which, vpon such ground, could not be resisted by the Roman Legions. The longer therefore that he thought

vpon the matter; the more needfull he found it for himselfe, to make some sudden attempt vpon their Campe. To this end he sent many Embassadours, vnder pretence of treating about the Peace; but indeede of purpose to discouer all that might concerne the intended surprise. With these Embassadous he sent, as Attendants, many old Souldiers disguised like slaues; that wandring (as it were) idlely vp and downe the Campe, might obserue the waies and entrances, with whatsoeuer else was needfull. When hee had learned as much as hee desired: vpon the sudden hee sent word to Syphax, that it was vaine to hold any longer Treatie, forasmuch as he could not get the consent of his Councell of warre; without whose approbation, all that himselfe could doe was no more, than the good will of one man. This he did, to the end that, without any breach of faith, hee might put his designe in execution. The Truce being thus cut off: Asdrubal and Syphax were very pensiue; as hauing lately perswaded themselues, that their trouble was almost at an end. But since it could be no better, they beganne to deuise, by what arte they might draw Scipio out of his campe; and prouoke him to battaile in those Plaines. This if they could doe; they hoped to make his Councell of warre repent as greatly the refusall of peace, as did M. Atilius after the like presumption. But if he should refuse to come foorth of his Trenches: what else remained than to besiege him? which they themselues were well able to doe by Land; and the Carthaginian fleet should doe by Sea, that was making readie for the purpose. By such discourses these two comforted themselues; recompencing in conceipt the losse of their hopes past, with that of victorie to come. But herein they were extremely and worthily disappointed: for that, consulting about the furure, they prouided not against present danger; but continued in the same negligence, which was growne vpon them by the long discourse of peace. As for Scipio, Hee was not idle: but made preparation out of hand, as it were to doe somewhat against Vtica. Two thousand Souldiers he had made readie; and appointed to take the same peece of ground, whereon hee lay against Vtica before. This he did, partly to keepe secret that which he had in hand, lest being suspected by his owne Souldiers, the Enemie might happen to haue notice of it; partly to hinder those of Vtica from setting vpon the few, that hee purposed to leaue behinde him in his campe. He caused his men that night to suppe well and betimes; that they might be readie for the journie. After supper, he appointed such Companies as he thought fit, vnto the defence of his Campe; all the rest of his Armie he led forth, about nine of the clocke at night. The Carthaginians lay from him seuen miles and an halfe: whom he purposed to vndertake himselfe with the one halfe of his armie; the other halfe he committed vnto Lælius and Masanissa, whom hee sent before him to set vpon the Campe of Syphax, that was farther off. It was his meaning, that the campe of Syphax should be on a light fire, ere he would meddle with the Carthaginians. For the fire might seeme to haue taken hold by casualtie vpon the Numidians, that lay farther off: whereas if it first appeared in the Campe of Asdrubal, it would bee suspected as the doing of enemies; and giue Syphax warning to looke vnto himselfe. To this end therefore Scipio marched faire and softly; that Lælius and Masanissa, who had a longer journie, and were to fetch a compasse about for feare of being discouered, might haue time to get before him, and doe their feat. It was about two or three of the clock in the morning, when the campe of Syphax beganne to blaze: which not only the Numidians, but their King himselfe, imputed vnto casualtie; as thinking themselues safe enough from Enemies, for that the Carthaginians lay interposed betweene them and the danger. Wherefore as if there were no more to doe, some, starting halfe asleepe; and others, that had sitten vp late at drinking; ranne out of their Cabbins to quench the fire. But such was the tumult, that they neither could rightly vnderstand in what case they were; nor giue remedie to the mischance, as it was supposed. Many were smothered, and burnt in the flame, which grew greater and greater: many, leaping into the Trenches for feare of the sudden mischiefe, were trampled to death by the multitude that followed them. They that escaped

the fire, fell vpon the Enemies sword, which was readie to receiue them. Especially Masanissa, that best knew the Countrie, did great execution vpon them; hauing laid all the wayes, by which he foresaw that they would seeke to escape. The Carthaginians perceiuing this fire, thought none other than that it was a pittifull mischance: so that some ranne out to helpe the poore Numidians; carrying only what would serue to quench the fire. Others ranne vp to the Rampart: where, fearelesse of any danger towards themselues, they stood beholding the greatnesse of the flame, and lamenting the misfortune. This fell out right as Scipio would haue it. Hee therefore lost no time: but setting vpon those that were running towards the Numidians, he killed some, and pursued the rest back into their campe; which in a little while he made to burne as bright, as did that of Syphax. Asdrubal seeing this, and knowing that the Romans were there, did not stand to make resistance, but shifted onely for himselfe, and escaped with a few of his horse about him. If Hannibal, or any of the Barchine faction, had beene taken in such a manner: it is more than probable, that old Hanno would haue judged him worthy to be crucified. It would then haue been said, that with lesse than one halfe of thirtie thousand men, hee might at least haue giuen some bad recompence, to them that were taking paines in kindling these fires, had he not beene only carefull how to saue his owne fearefull head. Neuertheless Polybius acknowledgeth, and it is most likely to haue beene true, That if Asdrubal, or any of those about him, would haue striuen to shew valour, when the campe was once on fire: He should not thereby haue done any manner of good, because of the tumult and consternation. I shall not neede to tell what a fearefull thing it was, to heare the cries of so many thousands that perished by fire and sword, or to behold the cruell flame that consumed them; which (as Polybius affirms) none that hath being is able to describe. It is enough to say, That of those many thousands very few did escape; which accompanied Asdrubal and Syphax in their seuerall waies of flight. Besides these also there were some scatterers, especially of the Numidians, that saued themselues in the darke: but they were not many; as after shall appeare. Surely it must needes haue beene very hard to tell, how many were burnt or otherwise made away; and what numbers escaped in the darke of night. Wherefore Liuie, who in the rest of this Relation, as often elsewhere, doth follow Polybius; may seeme to haue followed some lesse worthy Author, and him no good Arithmetician, in casting vp the summe. For hee reckons onely two thousand foot, and fiue hundred horse, to haue escaped; fortie thousand to haue perished by sword or fire; and aboue sixe thousand to haue beene taken prisoners: the whole number of all which together, is farre short of fourescore and thirteene thousand, which were in these two Campes. Excerpt. è Pol. lib. 14.

Asdrubal, putting himselfe into the next Towne that was very strongly fortified; thought there to finde the Romans worke, vntill the Carthaginians at good leisure might repaire their Armie. He had with him no more than two thousand foot, and fiue hundred horse: which he thought sufficient to defend the Towne; if the Townsmen would not be wanting to themselues. But he found the Inhabitants of the place very earnest in contention, whether it were better to fight, or to yeeld. Vnto this disputation, hee well foresaw that the arriuall of Scipio would soone giue an end. Wherefore, lest they should lay hold vpon him, and seeke the Victors fauour by deliuering him vp; He shrunke away betimes, and made all haste to Carthage. As for the Towne, which hee left; it opened the gates to Scipio, at his first comming: and thereby preserued it selfe from all manner of losse. The two next Townes adjoyning would needes bee valiant, and make countenance of warre: but their strength not being answerable, they were soone taken by Scipio; who abandoned them to the pleasure of his Souldiers. This done, hee returned to the siege of Vtica.

The Carthaginians were sore troubled, as they had good reason; when, in stead of either Peace or Victorie, which they lately hoped for, they heard newes of such a lamentable lamentable ouerthrow. Neceſſitie enforced them to make haſtie prouiſion for the future: but how to doe it, few of them ſaw any meanes. Some gaue aduice to craue peace of Scipio: others, to ſend for Hannibal out of Italie; but the moſt, and they which finally preuailed, were of opinion, That notwithſtanding the loſſe of this Armie, they might well defend themſelues againſt the Romans, by rayſing new forces: eſpecially, if Syphax would not leaue them. It was therefore concluded. That they ſhould bend all their care this way, leuying in all haſte another Armie; and ſending Embaſſadours to deale with Syphax, who lay then at a Towne called Abba, not paſſing eight miles from Carthage. Immediately the ſame their infortunate Commander, Aſdrubal the ſonne of Giſco, was imployed to make new leuies of men: and Queene Sophonisba went forth with Embaſſadors to her huſband Syphax; who hauing gathered together as many as he could of his ſubjects that had eſcaped from the late ſlaughter, was thinking to returne into his owne Kingdome. Sophonisba laboured ſo with her huſband, that at length ſhe wonne him to her owne deſire. And it fell out at the ſame time, that foure thouſand Spaniards, waged by the Carthaginians, were brought ouer to ſerue in Africk. Of theſe were made ſuch braue reports; as if their courage, and the armes which they vſed, were not to be reſiſted. Euen the multitude within Carthage beleeued theſe tales, and were more glad than they had cauſe to be; which is great wonder, ſince in one Age, the whole Countrie of Spaine had beene twice conquered; firſt, by the Carthaginians themſelues, and after by the Romans. But with Syphax theſe tales preuailed much: which the Carthaginian Embaſſadours helped with a lie; ſaying, that there were come ten thouſand of theſe terrible Spaniards. Vpon this confidence, the people of Carthage and their friends gathered ſuch ſpirit, that in thirtie daies they made vp an Armie, conſiſting well-neare of thirtie thouſand men; reckoning the Spaniards, and Syphax with his Numidians, in the number. So they encamped in a Region called the great fields, about fiue daies journie from Vtica. Scipio hearing of this, came from Vtica thither, to viſit them: leauing behinde him his impediments, with ſome part of his Armie; to make a ſhew of continuing the ſiege. Two or three daies after the meeting of both Armies, paſſed away in skirmiſh; without any great thing done. It had now beene time for Aſdrubal to follow the example of the Roman, Fabius, and ſeeke to wearie out the Enemie by delaies. But either (which is likely) he was a farre worſe Commander, or elſe it was not in his power to giue ſuch directions as beſt pleaſed himſelfe. The fourth day the Armies met in battaile: whercin the Romans were marſhalled by Scipio after their wonted manner; hauing their Italian horſe in the right wing; and Maſaniſſa with his Numidians in the left. On the contrarie ſide, Aſdrubal and his Carthaginians had the right wing; Syphax, the left; and the Spaniards, the Battaile. The victorie was gotten without many blowes: for the vntrained followers of Syphax and Aſdrubal, could not ſuſtaine the firſt charge of the Italians, or of Maſaniſſa. Onely the Spaniards fought a long time, euen till they were all in a manner ſlaine: rather as men deſperate, and not hoping for mercie, ſince they were thus come ouer to fight againſt Scipio, who had otherwiſe deſerued of them; than vpon any likelihood or conceit of victory. This their obſtinacy was beneficiall vnto thoſe that fled; for that it hindered the Romans from making any great purſuit. Hereby Aſdrubal, and Syphax eſcaped: Aſdrubal, to Carthage; and Syphax home, to his owne Kingdome: whither his wife was either gone before, or immediatly followed him.

Scipio, hauing thus gotten the maſterie of the field, tooke counſaile about the proſecution of the Warre. It was reſolued vpon as the beſt courſe, That hee himſelfe, with part of the Armie, ſhould attempt the Cities round about him: and that Maſaniſſa, with his Numidians, and Lælius, with ſome of the Roman Legions, ſhould follow after Syphax; not permitting him to take reſt within his owne Kingdome, where eaſily elſe hee might repaire his forces, and put them to new trouble. This aduice it ſeemes that Maſaniſſa gaue: who knew beſt the qualitie of the Numidians;

and what good might bee done among them, by the reputation of a victorie. The leaſt that could be expected, was his reſtitution into his owne Kingdom, vſurped by Syphax: which to accompliſh, it no leſſe concerned the Romans at the preſent, than it did himſelfe. According to this order concluded, Lælius was ſent away with Maſaniſſa: and Scipio ſtayed behinde, carrying the warre from Towne to Towne. Many places yeelded for feare: many were taken by force: and all the ſubjects of Carthage wauered in their fidelitie; as if the time were now come, wherein they might take notice of thoſe vnreaſonable burdens, which their proud Maſters had laid vpon them for maintenance of the warre in Spaine and Italie. What to doe in this caſe the Carthaginians could hardly reſolue. Fortune was their Enemie: they had loſt their Armies, and many of their Townes: neither durſt they make bold to trouble their owne ſubjects with any violent exaction of men or money; who neuertheleſſe of their owne free will were likely to giue little helpe. Very much it grieued them, to ſend for Hannibal out of Italie: yet ſince there was no other hope remaining, than in him and his good Armie; it was decreed, that Embaſſadours ſhould bee forthwith ſent to call him home. Some there were that gaue aduice, to ſet out a fleet againſt that of Scipio, that rode before Vtica, weakely manned, and eaſie to be taken, whilſt Scipio himſelfe was buſied in the Inland Countries. Some were of opinion, That it ſhould be their principall care, to fortifie by all meanes the Citie of Carthage: vpon the ſafetie whereof they ſaid that all depended; adding, that whileſt they were true, and at vnitie among themſelues, they might well enough ſubſiſt, and expect thoſe opportunities, with which Fortune (doubtleſſe) would preſent them. Theſe counſailes were not rejected: but order was forthwith taken, both for all things concerning defence of the Citie, and for the attempt vpon the Roman fleet at Vtica. Neuertheleſſe it was conſidered, that hereby they ſhould onely protract the warre: without any way aduancing their owne affaires towards likelihood of victorie; no, though it ſhould fall out, that all the ſhippes at Vtica might bee taken or deſtroyed. Wherfore the determination held concerning Hannibal, That he ſhould immediately come ouer into Africk, as the laſt refuge of Carthage. The Councell was no ſooner broken vp, than all the Senators betooke themſelues to the execution of that which was decreed: ſome, to fortification of the Towne: ſome, to make readie the Fleet; and ſome, appointed thereunto, forthwith to embarque themſelues for Italie. In this their trepidation Scipio comes to Tunes, a Citie in thoſe daies very ſtrong, and ſtanding in proſpect almoſt of euery part of Carthage. This place, or rather ſome defencible piece adjoyning, he eaſily tooke; the Garriſon forſaking it, and running away as ſoone as he drew neere. But whileſt hee was about there to incampe, and fortifie himſelfe againſt the Citie, He might perceiue the Carthaginian fleet ſetting forth, and making towards Vtica: What this meant, he readily conceiued: and ſtood in great feare, leſt his owne ſhips, that were very ill prepared for Sea-fight (as being heauily loden with engines of batterie, and wholly diſpoſed in ſuch order, as was moſt conuenient for aſſaulting the Towne) ſhould make bad reſiſtance, againſt a fleet appointed for that ſpeciall ſeruice. Wherefore he haſted away towards Vtica, to aſſiſt with his preſence in this needfull caſe. It fell out well, that hee had ſent his carriages, and all the great bootie which he drew along with him, thither before, at his going to Tunes. For had not he now made great expedition, he ſhould haue come too late. Neither could he indeede haue beene there in due time, if the Carthaginians had vſed ſuch diligence as was conuenient. But they reſted one night in harbour by the way: and at their comming to Vtica, they tarried awhile to make a brauado; preſenting themſelues in order of battaile, as if the Romans would haue put forth to Sea againſt them. But Scipio had no ſuch intent: He thought it would bee ſufficient, if hee could preſerue his Gallies. As for the pleaſure of their brauerie at Sea: it ſhould little auaile the Carthaginians, if they got nothing by it, and loſt their whole Eſtate by Land. Wherfore he tooke his ſhips of burden, and faſtning them together with cables, in foure ranks, one behind another, made a four-fold bridge ouer

the Channell of the Hauen; whereon he placed a thousand of his choice men, with store of Darts and other casting weapons, to make defence. Some open spaces hee left, whereat his Frigots, and other small Vessells, might runne out and back againe vpon any aduantage or neede: but these he couered with plancks; vsing the masts and yards of his ships in stead of rafters, to joyne all together, that his men might help one another, and the bridge it selfe not be torne asunder. Scarce was this worke finished; when the Carthaginians, seeing none issue forth against them, came into the Hauen. The fight betweene them and the Romans, that were in the Hulkes, was rather like to the assaulting of a wall, than to any Sea-fight. For they that stood vpon the bridge, had sure footing, and threw their weapons downwards with their whole strength and violence; which the Carthaginians out of their Gallies, that were lower and vnsteadie, could not doe. But the Roman Frigots and long Boats, aduenturing foorth from behinde the Bridge, were greatly ouer-borne by the force of the Gallies; and were one occasion of that small losse which followed. They that stood vpon the Bridge were neither able to relieue them: nor yet could freely bestow their weapons among the Carthaginians, as before; for feare of hurting these their friends, that were entangled and mixed among the enemies. The Carthaginians had brought with them grapling hookes, hanging at Iron chaines. These they threw vpon the masts and yards which serued as Arches to joyne the bridge together: then rowing backwards, they tore all asunder; in such sort that one ship followed another, and all the first ranke was broken, or defaced. The Defendants had no other way, than to saue themselues as hastily as they could, by shifting into the next ranke of ships, that lay behinde them vntouched. Neither did the Carthaginians trouble themselues any further in this laborious worke: but hauing haled away sixe ships of burden, and towed them out of the Hauen, returned home to Carthage. Their wel-come was greater then their victorie: because among so many grieuous losses, onely this exploit had succeeded well; though it were of small importance.

Whilest things thus passed about Carthage; Lælius and Masanissa, in their journie against Syphax, found as good successe as could be desired. The fame of the victories alreadie gotten, restored Masanissa to his Kingdome, without further contention: the Masæsyli, his subjects, joyfully receiuing him; and forsaking the Vsurper. But here they stayed not: neither indeede would Syphax permit them to be quiet. Hee had such abundance of men and horses, that he felt not greatly the losses past: and, therefore being sollicited by Asdrubal and Sophonisba, hee prepared againe for warre. But beside the instigation of his beloued wife; the losse of the Masæsyli would let him take no rest: neither was it the purpose of Lælius and Masanissa, to giue him any breathing time. It is common in men, to depart no lesse vnwillingly from that which they haue gotten by extortion, than from their proper inheritance: but to thinke all alike their owne, whereof they are in possession; be the title vnto some part neuer so vnjust. Hereunto alludes the fable of the yong Kite; which thought that shee had vomited vp her owne guts, when it was onely the garbage of some other fowle, that she had hastily swallowed, and was not able to digest. But whether or no, Syphax, like the young Kite, beleeued the Kingdome of the Masæsyli to be part of his entrailes: Lælius and Masanissa will shortly giue him somwhat, that shall make him cast his gorge. For to this purpose chiefly are they come so farre. It concerned the Romans to dispossesse (if it might be) that King: whose false and hollow friendship towards them, had beene conuerted into strong enmitie; as also to set in his place another, who might doe them such good offices, as Syphax had lately done vnto the Carthaginians. How easily this might be effected, Masanissa knew best: as being well acquainted with the nature of those Countries; wherein, euen to this day, though there be many strong Townes, yet the fortune of a battell is enough, to translate the Kingdome from one Competitor to another. So they met with Syphax, who came against them with no lesse an Armie, than his former, and marshalled in the Roman order; according to the skill, which he had learned of the Roman Centurion, Centurion, long agoe ſent vnto him out of Spaine fron Cn. Scipio. But though hee could teach his men how to march in order; yet could hee not teach them to fight couragiouſly. They were a rabble of all ſorts, gathered vp in haſte: and few of them had ſeene warre before. Encamping neare vnto the Romans, it fell out, as commonly, that ſome ſmall Troupes of Horſe on both ſides, encountred one another in the mid-way: and they that had the worſt, were ſeconded by other of their fellowes. By continuance of the skirmiſh, more and more were drawne out from either Campe: ſo that at length Syphax, vnwilling to diſhearten his men by taking any foile at their firſt meeting with the Enemie, came vp with all his Horſe, which were the beſt part of his forces, and therewith ouercharged Maſaniſſa, whoſe numbers were farre leſſe. But whileſt he was proſecuting his hope of victorie: ſome Roman Squadrons of Foot came againſt him through their owne Troupes of Horſe; which fell to the ſides, and made a lane for them. So their Battaile ſtanding now more firme, than a little before; Syphax was vnable, though hee laboured much in vaine, to make them giue ground. Maſaniſſa likewiſe, and his Troupes, grew confident vpon this aſſiſtancé: and charging afreſh the Enemie, that could not make way forward, cauſed him to giue backe. Herewithall the Legions came in ſight: which terrified ſo the Numidian Horſe, that they beganne preſently to disband. Faine would Syphax haue ſtayed them from flight: and to that end made head in perſon againſt the Romans; with hope, that his men would be aſhamed to leaue him. But it fell out vnhappily, that he was caſt from his Horſe, which receiued a wound; and ſo taken priſoner. Of others that were ſlaine or taken, the multitude was not great. It ſufficed, that they forſooke the place, and fled: and that their King, vpon whom all depended, was in the Romans hand. Maſaniſſa told Lælius, That this victorie ſhould make an end of the Numidian warre, if preſently they haſted away to Cirta the chiefe Citie of the Kingdome; whither hee himſelfe deſired to bee ſent before with the Horſe, carrying Syphax along with him. Hereunto Lælius agreed. Maſaniſſa comming to Cirta, before any newes of the Kings miſchance was there arriued, called out the chiefe of the Citie to parlee: wherein by many faire promiſes and threats, but eſpecially by ſhewing vnto them Syphax bound, he preuailed ſo far, that the gates were forthwith opened vnto him; and euery one ſtroue to get his fauour, that was like to be their King hereafter. Among the reſt, Queene Sophonisba yeelded her ſelfe into his hands: and vehemently beſought him, that ſhee might not be deliuered vp vnto the Romans. Her youth, and excellent beautie, ſo commended her ſuit, that Maſaniſſa forthwith granted it; and to make good his promiſe, married her himſelfe that very day: thereby to preuent Lælius and Scipio from determining otherwiſe of her, ſince ſhe was his wife. But Lælius, when he came thither, tooke the matter hainouſly; ſo that at firſt he would haue haled her away, together with Syphax and other priſoners, and haue ſent her vnto Scipio. But being ouer-entreated by Maſaniſſa, he ſuffered the matter to reſt a while as he found it, and referred all to Scipio's diſcretion: to whom hee ſent away Syphax and other Captiues immediatly; following ſhortly after himſelfe with Maſaniſſa, when they had done what was needefull in the Kingdome.

At the comming of Syphax there was great ioy in the Roman Campe: the mightie Armies which he had lately brought into the field: and his entertainment of Scipio and Aſdrubal, both at one time, when Rome and Carthage together ſought his friendſhip: with ſuch other commemoration of his paſt and preſent fortune; miniſtring to euery one a large argument of diſcourſe. Scipio demanded of him, what had moued him, not only to forſake the Roman friendſhip, but to make warre vpon them, vnprouoked. He briefely anſwered, That his wife had moued him ſo to doe: calling her a Furie, and a peſtilent creature: and ſaying, That Maſaniſſa was no wiſer than himſelfe; ſince hee had now taken the ſame woman to his wife, who would ſhortly draw him to the ſame courſes. Hereat Scipio was greatly troubled: and ſtood in great doubt, leſt this perilous woman ſhould depriue him of Maſaniſſa, as ſhee had done of Syphax. It was not long, ere Maſaniſſa and Lælius came vnto him: both of whom together hee louingly welcommed; and highly commended in publique, for their notable ſeruice in this Expedition. Then taking Maſaniſſa apart, he brake with him, as touching Sophonisba: letting him vnderſtand, that the Romans had title to her head; and that ſhe was a miſchieuous enemie of theirs. Wherefore hee entreated him to moderate his affections: and not to deface the memorie of his great ſeruices alreadie done; (for which he ſhould be highly rewarded to his owne contentment) by committing a great offence vpon little reaſon. Maſaniſſa bluſht, and wept: and finally promiſed to be gouerned by Scipio; whom hee neuertheleſſe entreated, to thinke vpon his faith giuen to Sophonisba, that ſhe ſhould not be deliuered into the Romans power. So he departed to his owne Tent, where, after ſome time ſpent in agonie, he called vnto him a ſeruant of his that had the cuſtodie of his poyſon (which Princes then vſed to haue in readines, againſt all miſchances that might make them vnwilling to liue:) and tempering a potion for Sophonisba, ſent it vnto her with this meſſage; That gladly he would haue had her to liue with him as his wife: but ſince they who had power to hinder him of his deſire, would not yeeld thereto, he ſent her a cup, that ſhould preſerue her from falling aliue into the handes of the Romans; willing her to remember her birth and eſtate, and accordingly to take order for her ſelfe.

At the receit of this Meſſage and Preſent, ſhee onely ſaid, That if her Huſband had no better token to ſend vnto his new wife, ſhe muſt accept of this; adding, That ſheemight haue died more honourably, if ſhee had not wedded ſo lately before her Funerall. And herewithall ſhee boldly dranke off the poiſon. Thus Liuie reports. But Appian varies from this: and ſets it downe agreeably to that which hath beene ſpoken before, concerning the præcontract betweene Maſaniſſa and Sophonisba. Hee ſaith, That after the taking of Syphax, Embaſſadors from Cirta met with Lælius and Maſaniſſa vpon their way thither, yeelding vp their Citie, and the Kings Palace: and that Sophonisba, for her owne priuate, ſent meſſengers to excuſe her marriage with Syphax, as made againſt her will, by compulſion of thoſe in whoſe power ſhe was. Maſaniſſa readily admitted this excuſe; and accepted her to wife. But when Scipio had receiued information from Syphax, how cunning in perſwaſion Sophonisba was; and that all her thoughts laboured for the good of Carthage: he fell out about her with Maſaniſſa at his returne; and challenged her, as a part of the bootie belonging to the Romans. Maſaniſſa ſaid, ſhe was his owne wife, and vnto him betrothed many yeares before. But Scipio would not heare of this: or if it were true; yet he ſaid it was no reaſon, that Maſaniſſa ſhould keepe her in poſſeſsion, as long as it was diſputable, vnto whom ſhe might appertaine. Wherefore he willed him firſt of all to produce her, and then afterwards to make his claime vnto her; wherein he ſhould haue no wrong. Herewithall hee ſent to fetch her away: and Maſaniſſa accompanied the meſſengers, as it were to deliuer her; but making her acquainted with the neceſſitie, gaue vnto her a cup of poiſon, wherewith ſhee ended her life, before they came that ſhould haue apprehended her. So hee ſhewed vnto the Romans her dead bodie; which he royally enterred. The ſudden violence of Maſaniſſa his loue, and the readie conſent of Sophonisba to marrie with him: adde not ſo much credit vnto this relation of Appian, as doth the want of all other euident cauſe (which [a] Liuie notes) of the ſudden falling out betweene him and the Carthaginians; vnder whom he had bin trained vp, & done them great ſeruice. Howſoeuer it were: Scipio, hearing of this tragicall accident, ſent for Maſaniſſa, and comforted him as well as he could; leſt his melancholie ſhould lead him to ſome inconuenience. Hauing therefore gently rebuked him for his raſhneſſe, he brought him foorth in preſence of the Armie: where extolling his noble acts, and ſhewing how highly he had deſerued of the Citie of Rome, he proclaimed him King; and gaue vnto

to him a Crowne of gold, with other royall ornaments. This was indeed the readie way to diuert his thoughts from the ſadde remembrance of that which was paſt, vnto the more cheerefull contemplation of good fortune, that beganne to ſmile vpon him.

This was the firſt time that the Romans tooke vpon them to create or proclaime a King. Which honour though Maſaniſſa well deſerued: yet would not the Title haue redounded vnto his great benefit; neither ſhould he haue beene much beholding to them for it, if he had not by their meanes recouered poſſeſſion of his Countrie, together with the greateſt part of Syphax his Dominions. It ſeemes not vnlikelie, that had he remained a Neuter in theſe warres, and ſuſtained himſelfe with his Troupe of Horſe, in ſuch ſort as hee did before the comming of the Romans; hee might neuertheleſſe haue recouered his proper inheritance, by the loue of his owne ſubiects, without other helpe, when Syphax had once or twice beene vanquiſhed. As for the enlargement of his Kingdome, it was not more than hee deſerued: neither were the Romans then in caſe, to make a conqueſt of Numidia for themſelues; neither could they haue wiſhed a fitter opportunitie, than of ſuch a man, vpon whom to beſtow it that was their aſſured friend, and paſſable withall among the Numidians, as being (for the Maſeſyli were a Numidian Tribe) a great Prince of the ſame Nation. Yet this liberalitie of the Romans, was noyſed abroad as very glorious: and the Romans themſelues, in a politicke ſort of grauitie, tooke highly vpon them; as if euen their ſaluting him by the name of King, had beene a matter of great conſequence. Hee thriued indeed well after it: and by their maintenance waxed mighty in times following, encroaching vpon his neighbours on all ſides; but moſt of all vpon the State of Carthage, whereat they were little diſpleaſed. Hence it grew that Vermina the ſonne of Syphax (of whom wee ſhall ſhortly ſpeake more) which held ſome piece of his Fathers Kingdome, deſiring friendſhip of the Romans, and promiſing by all meanes to deſerue their loue, requeſted therewithall, that they would call him King. But though it were ſo, that neuer any before him had made this a matter of ſuit: yet the Roman Senate was puntilious herein; and anſwered very grauely, That it was not their cuſtome to giue the honour of that appellation, ſaue onely vnto ſuch Kings, as had greatly deſerued of their Citie. Thus they made it a matter of State: and in proceſſe of time grew ſo proud of this their imaginarie prærogatiue, that they imputed as a ſingular benefit vnto Kings, that no way depended vpon them, the ſalutation by b that name; though it were not accompanied with any other fauour or profit thence redounding.

§. XIX.

The Carthaginians deſire Truce: and breake it.

THe Carthaginians were extremely diſmaied, when they heard of the great calamitie, that was befalne their good friend Syphax; and vnderſtood that Maſaniſſa, their mortall enemie, had got poſſeſſion of his Kingdome. To increaſe their feare, Scipio returned againe to Tunes in view of their Citie: where hee made an ende of that Fortification, which hee had begunne at his laſt being there. The Carthaginians had neither forces, nor courage, to withſtand him: but their hearts ſo failed them, that they ſent forth vnto them thirtie Embaſſadors, Princes of the Citie, which were their Priuie Councell, to make ſuit for peace. Theſe being admitted into the preſence of Scipio, did not only proſtrate themſelues on the ground; but kiſſed the c feet of him, and of thoſe that ſate in Councell with him.

c Excerpt. è Polyb. lib. 15. Liu. lib. 30.

Anſwerable to this baſe adoration was their ſpeech that followed. They confeſſed

feſſed themſelues to haue vniuſtly broken the Peace betweene them and Rome; and to haue deſerued whatſoeuer puniſhment it ſhould pleaſe the Romans to inflict vpon them. Yet they humbly beſought Scipio and the reſt, that in common regard of thoſe misfortunes, whereto all men are ſubiect, they would ſhew mercie vnto the Citie of Carthage, and let it remaine, as a Monument of their clemencie; which, by the follie of her Citizens, had now twice deſerued to be ouerthrowne. Herewithall they did not forget, to lay the blame vpon Hannibal: who without their appointment had begunne the warre; and was maintained in his doings by a Faction, without the good liking of the whole Citie. By this it appeares, that theſe Embaſſadors were no Barchines: but rather, that they were Hanno and the choice of his companie; who had now their long deſired worke in hand, of ſuing vnto the Romans for peace. Whatſoeuer they were, it muſt needes be that they were moſt inſolent men ouer thoſe that were ſubiect vnto their power: for they would not haue made ſuch adoration vnto the Romans, in their owne neceſſitie; vnleſſe they themſelues had expected the like, where they had the aduantage.

It was not vnknowne to Scipio, or to his aſſiſtants, in what poore caſe the Citie of Rome then was; and how vnable to defraie the charges of continuing the warre. Neither were the Carthaginians, notwithſtanding the loſſe of ſo many Armies, in ſuch ill caſe, as the Romans themſelues had very lately beene. For they had monie enough, wherewith to wage more men: they had a Citie farre ſtronger than Rome; and they had the Sea free. But they wanted the Roman reſolution: and therefore diſtruſted the walls of Carthage; though Vtica, a weaker Citie, had all this while held out againſt Scipio, and could not yet be forced by him and his Armie, though ſo often victorious in the field. Scipio therefore accepted their ſubmiſſion, and told them, That though he came into Africk, to make a Conqueſt, and not a Peace: yet hauing the Conqueſt as it were in his hand, hee would not denie to grant them the Peace, which they deſired; for thereby ſhould all Nations vnderſtand, that the people of Rome did follow the rule of juſtice, both in making warre, and in concluding it. The conditions which he impoſed vpon them, were theſe: That they ſhould render vp vnto him all priſoners that they had taken, together with all Renegado's and fugitiue ſlaues: That they ſhould withdraw their Armies out of Italie and Gaule: That they ſhould not meddle in Spaine, nor yet in any Iland between Italie & Africk: That they ſhould deliuer vp all their ſhips of warre, ſaue twentie; and That they ſhould pay a great ſumme of monie, with certaine hundred thouſand buſhels of Wheat and Barlie. To conſider of theſe Articles, hee gaue them three dayes: and when they had approued them, he granted a Truce; that they might ſend Embaſſadours vnto the Roman Senate.

This done, Maſaniſſa was diſmiſſed, and went home into his Kingdome, as if the warre had beene alreadie at an end. Syphax was a little before ſent with Lelius vnto Rome: where the fame of theſe victories filled men with ioy; and gaue hope, that the long endured miſeries would be ſhortly at an end. Wherefore all the Temples were ſet open, and an holy day appointed for thankſgiuing and ſupplication to their Gods. Lelius was accompanied with Embaſſadors from King Maſaniſſa: who gratulating the happie ſucceſſe of the Romans in their African Warre, and giuing thanks vnto the Senate for the benefits done by Scipio vnto their Maſter, made requeſt for the Numidians, ſuch as were now his ſubiects and priſoners in Rome, that they might be beſtowed vpon him; who by rendring them to libertie, ſhould doe an act very plauſible, that would make him gracious among his people in the beginning of his reigne. The Roman Senate were not behinde with Maſaniſſa in complement: but ſhewing themſelues to be highly pleaſed with all that Scipio had done, and ſhould doe for him; they called him King againe; releaſed his Numidians that were captiues; and ſent him two purple Caſſocks, that had each of them one gold button; with ſuch other Preſents, as in time of their pouerty might ſerue to teſtifie their good will.

will. Scarcely were theſe and Lælius gone from Rome; when the newes came, that Embaſſadours from Carthage were arriued to deſire peace. Theſe Embaſſadours were not admitted into the Citie, but were lodged without: vntill Lælius being ſent for, came backe from Oſtia, to bee preſent when their demands were to bee heard. Then was audience giuen them in the Temple of Bellona; that ſtood in the ſuburbs. The errand of theſe Embaſſadours, was Peace: but the meaning of them and of their Citie, was onely to winne time, and get reſpite from warre; vntill Hannibal and Mago ſhould come out of Italie, either to chace the Romans out of Africk, or to obtain peace for Carthage, by terror of their great names and Armies, vpon more eaſie conditions. Wherefore they made an idle diſcourſe of the League, that was concluded betweene them and Luctatius Catulus, at the end of the former warre. This League they ſaid, all things well conſidered, did ſtill remaine in force: neither had there ſince beene any warre at all betweene the people of Rome and the Carthaginians. For it was onely Hannibal, that, without any leaue from Carthage, had of his owne head beſieged and razed the Towne of Saguntum: and after that aduentured in like ſort, without Commiſsion, to paſſe the Alpes, and trouble (as he had done) the quiet of Italie. This being ſo: their Meſſage was none other, than to deſire, that the League before ſpoken of, made in the time of Catulus, might hereafter ſtand in force; as indeed it hitherto did, and ought to doe. The Senators had cauſe to wonder at this tale; hearing theſe Embaſſadours make (as it were) a jeſt of a warre, that had beene ſo terrible. Wherefore they asked them a great many queſtions, concerning that Peace made by Luctatius, and other paſſages following betweene the two Cities. But they excuſed themſelues by their age: (for they were all yong men) and ſaid, That thoſe things were beyond their knowledge and remembrance. Forthwith it appeared, That all was but colluſion, and that they ſought no other than to gaine time; vntill they might repaire the warre. Wherefore they were ſent home in companie of Lælius; without any concluſion at all of peace; and, in effect, without anſwere. This notwithſtanding, we find in Polybius, That the Senate receiuing aduertiſment from Scipio, of that which had paſſed betweene him and the Carthaginians in this Treatie of peace, approued the conditions by him propounded; and gaue him licence thereupon, to proceede vnto concluſion. This may with good reaſon bee beleeued: ſince it was not vnknowne, that if the warre continued, all theſe goodly hopes muſt reſt vpon the moſt vncertaine iſſue of one battaile betweene Hannibal and Scipio: wherein if fortune ſhould be auerſe to them, their forces in Africk were no better than quite loſt. Excerpt. è Polyb. l. 15.

Matters thus hanging in ſuſpence, before the Carthaginian Embaſſadours came backe from Rome: a Fleet out of Sicil, wherein were two hundred ſhips of burden, and thirtie Gallies, being bound for Africk to victuaile the Roman Campe, was ouertaken by foule weather at Sea; and hardly eſcaping wracke, was diſperſed, and driuen aground in diuers parts of the Bay of Carthage, euen in view, and vnder command of the Citie. There was at that time, as we finde in Appian, and may gather out of Polybius, a great dearth of victuails in Carthage: which cauſed the people to crie out vpon their Magiſtrates, that they ſhould not let ſuch a bootie eſcape them; ſaying, that the danger of famine was greater and worſe, than of breaking Truce. Whether it were ſo that hunger vrged them, or that they yeelded to their owne greedie deſires: the multitude in Carthage vnderſtood (as it ſeemes) that all this diſcourſe of peace in hand, was no better than meere mockerie; and therefore cared not for obſeruation of particular points, when they meant deceit in the whole. It was the manner in Carthage, as likewiſe in Alexandria, for all the Raſcalitie, together with women and boyes, to be medling in vprores: the clamours of the boyes being in ſuch tumults no leſſe violent, than of the men. Wherefore it is no maruaile, if little regard were had of reaſon, or of honour, in any ſuch commotion. A Fleet was ſent out vnder Aſdrubal, to gather vp the diſperſed Roman ſhips of burden (for the Gallies, by force of Oares, recouered the ſtation whereto their Campe adioyned) and App. de bello Punico. Excerpt. è Polyb. l. 15.

bring them into Carthage: which was done. Scipio was hereat much offended: not only for the losse, and for that the Towne was thereby releeued; but for that by this breach of truce, he foresaw the intention of the Carthaginians to renew the war, and put him to more trouble. Wherefore he sent Embassadours vnto them: both to require satisfaction for the iniurie done; and to deterre them from entertaining any other hope, than in the peace which they had so much desired. These gaue the Carthaginians to vnderstand, That Letters were come from Rome vnto Scipio, with allowance to conclude the peace; vpon those conditions which hee had propounded. But (said they) we hold it strange, That yee, who so lately haue cast your selues to the ground before vs, and kissed our feet, after an vnusuall manner of humilitie, confessing your selues to haue perfidiously broken the league that was betweene vs, and thereby to haue deserued such punishment as is due vnto Rebels; should so soone forget what yee then vttered, and runne headlong againe into the same crimes, for which yee acknowledged your selues worthie to be destroyed, hauing only recourse vnto our mercie. We are not ignorant, that it is the confidence which ye repose in HANNIBAL that thus emboldens you. Yet were it not amisse, that yee should consider, how long hee hath beene pent vp in a corner of Italie, among the Brutians; where he is in a manner besieged, and vnable to stirre: so that yee are like to finde his helpe wanting in your greatest need. Or let it bee supposed, that he were now in Africke, and readie to giue vs battaile: yet should it well agree with your wisdome, to doubt what might befall; remembring that he is a man, and not inuincible. Now if it should happen that he were ouercome; what refuge haue yee left vnto your selues against hereafter? What gods will yee either sweare by, to bee beleeued, or call vpon in your miserie? What wordes, and lamentable gesture will yee hencefoorth vse, to moue compassion? Surely yee haue alreadie wasted all your forces of perswasion, and shall not againe deceiue vs, if ye refuse the grace, whereof at the present ye are capable. It is no maruell though the Carthaginians were angrie, when they heard themselues vpbraided with the base demeanour of their Embassadours. For it was not the generall opinion of the Citie, that the Truce was broken by themselues: though it had pleased Hanno, or such as were of his faction, to gratifie the Romans with all manner of submission; and to renounce not onely their hope of the future, but all iustification of matters past. And indeed it seemes, that the Roman Embassadours were very much delighted, in the rehearsall of that point which was yeelded vnto them; as knowing that thereon depended the justice of the quarrell. But the Carthaginians tooke this in so ill part, that hardly they could refraine from doing violence vnto the men, who had vsed vnto them such insolent speeches. Yet the furie of the multitude was in some sort appeased; either by Hanno, whom Appian (I know not why) calls Hanno the great; or by the very reuerence, due vnto the place of those that had vttered such liberall words. So they were dismissed in friendly sort; though it were without answere to their Proposition. There were also two Gallies appointed for their safe Conuoy home; though with little intent of good vnto their persons. Asdrubal was then in the mid-way, as men sailed from Carthage towards Vtica. Hee, whether onely desirous to please the Multitude, of whose dispositon he was informed; or whether directed by publike order, to cut off these Embassadours in their way homeward: lay waiting for them behinde a Cape, that was a little beyond the mouth of the Riuer Bagrada. Their Conuoy hauing brought them on the way, as farre as to the mouth of Bagradas, wished them a good Voyage; and so tooke leaue of them, as if they had beene then in safety; since the Roman Campe was euen in sight. The Embassadours tooke this in ill part: not as fearing any danger toward; but thinking themselues too much neglected, forasmuch as their attendants did so abruptly leaue them. But no sooner had they doubled the Cape, than Asdrubal fell vpon them in such manner, as they might well discerne his purpose; which was to haue stemmed them. They rowed hard therefore: and being in a Quinquereme, that had more bankes of Oares, than had any Gallie of Asdrubal; they slipt away, and made him ouer-shoot himselfe. Yet he gaue them chace; and had well-neare surprised them. But they discouered some Roman Companies on the ſhore ouer againſt them, and therefore aduentured to run their veſſell aground: whereby they ſaued their owne liues; though a great part of their companie were ſlaine, or hurt. This practiſe of the Carthaginians was inexcuſable: and for the ſame cauſe perhaps were the Citizens heartned in ſuch a diſhonourable attempt, by thoſe that were deſirous to continue the warre; that thereby they might be driuen to ſtudie nothing elſe, than how to get the victorie, as hauing none other hope remaining. Yet likely it is, that the ſame feare, which had cauſed them to make ſuch earneſt ſuit for peace, would alſo haue cauſed them to be better aduiſed, than thus to abandon all hope of Treatie: had they not beene giuen to vnderſtand, that Hannibal was alreadie landed in Africk, in whom they repoſed no ſmall confidence; but verily perſwaded themſelues, that he would change their fortune, and teach the Romans to hold themſelues contented with more eaſie conditions, than were thoſe that Scipio, in the pride of his fortune, had of late propounded.

§. XX.

In what ſort HANNIBAL ſpent the time after the battaile of Metaurus. The doings of MAGO in Italie. HANNIBAL and MAGO called out of Italie. How the Romans were diuerſly affected by HANNIBALS departure.

EVer ſince the loſſe of that battaile at Metaurus, Hannibal remained in the Countrey of the Brutians; waiting for another ſupplie from Carthage. The Roman Conſuls that ſucceeded vnto Claudius and Liuius, by whom Aſdrubal was ouercome and ſlaine, were contented to bee quiet all their yeare. Neither did Licinius the Colleague of Scipio ought worthie of remembrance againſt Hannibal: being hindred by the peſtilence that was in his Armie. Sempronius the Conſul who followed Licinius, and Cn. Seruilius Capio, who followed Sempronius, were earneſtly bent to haue done ſomewhat: but their diligence was in a manner fruitleſſe. In ſome skirmiſhes with Hannibal, they had the better; in ſome, the worſe: and a few poore Townes they got from him, as it were by ſtealth; his care being more to preſerue his Armie, than to keepe thoſe places that were weake.

The Romans had at this time ſo many great pieces of worke in hand, that their chiefe enemie was become, not the chiefe part of their care. Their thoughts were mainly bent vpon Africk, wherin they were at no ſmal charges to maintaine the Armie, which (as was hoped) ſhould bring the warre to a ſhort and happie concluſion. They ſtood neuertheleſſe in much feare of Mago, the brother of Hannibal: who tooke exceeding paine among the Ligurians and Gaules to raiſe an Armie, wherewith to kindle anew the warre in Italie, that beganne to waxe colde. Mago ſollicited alſo the Hetrurians; and found them ſo readie to ſtirre in his behalfe, that if he could haue entred their Country ſtrong, it might haue proued no leſſe needfull for Scipio to returne home out of Africk, than ſhortly it was for Hannibal, to make ſpeed vnto the defence of Carthage. Theſe dangers cauſed the Romans to employ one of their Conſuls or Proconſuls, with an Armie, among the Hetrurians; another among the Gaules; and a third among the Ligurians: foraſmuch as it was vncertaine, vpon which ſide Mago would breake out. Being thus buſied, it is no wonder though they forbore to ouercharge Hannibal with any great power.

As for Mago; when things were in ſome readines for his ſetting forwards, he met in the Countrie of the Inſubrians, which is about Milan, with M. Cornelius the Roman Proconſul, and P. Quintilius Varus one of the Prætors. With theſe hee fought a battaile, wherein though his vertue ſhewed it ſelfe worthie of his father and brethren; yet his fortune was Carthaginian. The fight continued a long while doubtfull; full; in such sort that the Roman Commanders began to distrust the issue. Wherefore Quintilius the Prætor, taking vnto him all the Roman Horse, thought to haue shaken the Enemies to peeces. The Legions at the same time gaue a loud shout: and strained themselues hard; as if at that brunt the victorie should haue beene carried before them. But Mago opposed his Elephants to the Horse: the seruice of those beasts being fitter for such vse, than against the Squadrons of Foot. The figure, sent, and braying of these Elephants, did so affright the Horse, that they started aside, and were scattered ouer the field; their Riders being vnable to mannage them. Hereby the Numidians got aduantage vpon them: whose manner of fight was more auaileable against those that were loose, than against the Troups that were close and thick. Then fel the Elephants vpon the Legions: which entertained them after the accustomed manner, with a showre of darts, and killed foure of them; causing all the rest to giue backe. This notwithstanding, the same Legions were so vehemently pressed by the Enemie; that more for shame of running away, than by any great force to make resistance, they held their ground. The Proconsul therefore brought vp those forces, which he had kept vnto the last, to succour where need should most require. Against these Mago employed some of his Gaules, whom hee had in readinesse for the like occasion. But these Gaules discharged their parts very ill. They were soone beaten off; and recoiled so hastily, that they brought feare vpon all the rest. When Mago saw that his men beganne to shrinke, Hee put himselfe in the head of his Armie; and held them so well to it, that keeping their order, they made a faire Retrait, with their faces toward the Enemie. But at length he receiued a grieuous wound in his thigh; whereof shortly after hee dyed. He was taken vp, and carried out of danger by some of his owne men: the rest of them, after little further resistance, prouided euery one for himselfe: So the Romans obtained victorie, not without great cost; as purchasing the death of about fiue thousand enemies, with the losse of two thousand and three hundred of the Prætors Armie, besides those that dyed of the Proconsuls Legions; also besides diuers Colonells, Captaines, and Gentlemen of marke, that fell in this hote peece of seruice. Neither were there any prisoners taken; whereby it may seeme that the Enemies did not fall to rout, before they had recouered some ground that might assure them from pursuit. Howeuer it were, this victorie would haue much imported for the assurance of Italie, if the State of Carthage could longer haue permitted these valiant sonnes of Amilcar to abide therein. But Mago with-drawing himselfe (by easie iournies, because of his wound) into Liguria, found there Embassadours from Carthage attending him: who gaue him to vnderstand the pleasure of their Citie, which was, That both he and Hannibal should presently repaire home with all their forces; not staying any longer to thinke vpon the conquest of Italie, since Carthage it selfe was readie to bee lost. He obeyed this Commandement, and embarqued shortly his Armie; but dyed of his wound about Sardinia, in the way homewards.

About the same time Hannibal receiued the like command from Carthage to returne into Africk. He heard it with great impatience; gnashing his teeth, and groning, and hardly keeping in the teares, that were readie to burst out, whilest the Embassadours were deliuering their errand. When their message was done; Hee told them, That this was yet plaine dealing. For, said He, They that now directly bid mee come home, haue long agoe done their best to hale mee out of Italie; though more closely and crookedly they went to worke, by stopping the supply, that should haue enabled mee to mannage the Warre here. SCIPIO therefore shall not neede to bragge, that hee hath drawne me home by the heeles: it is HANNO, that hath wrought this noble feat; and ouerwhelmed the House of the Barchines, for lacke of other meanes to doe it, with the ruine of Carthage. He had before prepared a Fleet in readinesse, doubting that which after came to passe: wherein he embarqued, besides his owne men, as many of the Italians, as were content to be partakers of his fortune. Many there were that shrunke backe from him, and refused to doe seruice in this Expedition: of whom such as hee could take take he slew; not sparing those that fled into the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, which had been held an inuiolable Sanctuarie vnto that day. He was indeed then wholly transported with rage; and departed out of Italie no lesse passionate, than men are wont to bee, when they leaue their owne Countries to goe into exile. Hee looked backe vnto the shore: accusing both gods and men; and cursing his owne dulnesse, in that he had not led his Armie from Cannæ, hotte and bloudied as it was, directly vnto the wals of Rome. With such vexation of spirit Hee quitted the possession of Italie; wherein he had liued almost halfe his time.

If it could haue beene foretold vnto the Romans, in the first beginning of this war, with what exceeding joy in times following they should entertaine the newes of Hannibal his departure out of Italie: they would (I thinke) lesse earnestly haue pressed the Carthaginians to send him ouer thither. When sure aduertisement was brought vnto the Citie, that Hannibal was gone with all his Armie: an Holiday was appointed for thanksgiuing vnto their gods; and extraordinarie great sacrifices publikely made, for joy of such happie tidings. Yet old Q. Fabius was of opinion, That the danger did still remaine the same, though the place were changed: for that Hannibal, at his comming into Africk, would finde P. Scipio other manner of worke, than he had beene troubled with at any time before; and would doe greater matters in his owne Countrie, than euer he was able to performe abroad in a land of strangers. The remoue of the warre from their owne dores, and the conceit of that victorie for which they hoped; was enough to make them presume further, than at other times they would haue done. When therefore the Saguntine Embassadors brought vnto them a great masse of Golde and Siluer, together with some Agents of the Carthaginians taken by them in Spaine: onely the Carthaginian prisoners were accepted; the treasure was rendred backe vnto the Saguntines that had surprised it. Vpon like confidence of the future, a little before this, order was taken for the repayment of those monies, that had beene borrowed in time of more necessitie from priuate men. Hence also proceeded the seuere chastisement, laid vpon those twelue Colonies, that for want eyther of meanes, or of good will, had refused to giue aid to the Romans. They were commanded, and enforced, to giue double the number of Foot to that which they had beene wont to set out for the warres, with a proportion of Horse answerable to the verie most of their abilitie. So confident were the Romans growne (though their wealth were not as yet suteable to the greatnesse of their spirit) vpon the good successe of the Battaile at Metaurus; and the hopes which they reposed in Scipio. All this notwithstanding, when they considered more neerely of that which might happen; and were informed, that the terrible Armie, whereof Italie had beene few dayes since discharged, was landed safe in Africk: they began to reuolue a thousand fearefull matters in their heads, and to stand in doubt, lest Q. Fabius (who died about the same time) would bee found a true Propher. For bethinking themselues of that which might comfort them in their hopes: they found in the victories against Syphax and Asdrubal no specialitie of such great worth, as might promise the like successe against another manner of Generall, followed by other manner of men, than were either of those two. The Numidian King had beene wont to bring into the field a rascall multitude of halfe-scullions, that were good for nothing; being himselfe a fit Captaine for such souldiors. Likewise Asdrubal, the sonne of Gisco, was a Commander well thought of by the Carthaginian Senate; but otherwise one, that in the field was onely good at sauing himselfe by a swift retrait. But now there came an Armie of men, hardened from their child-hood with incredible patience, fleshed many hundred times in Roman bloud, and wearing the spoiles not onely of good souldiors, but of braue Captaines, by them slaine. Such talke vsed the people of Rome, saying, That Scipio was like to meet in battaile, with many that had slaine Roman Prætors, yea and Consuls, with their owne hands; with many, that had beene first in getting ouer the Trenches of seuerall Roman Campes, or in winning the tops of wals at the siege of Townes; briefly, that he should now bee opposed by an Armie, as good as had euer serued in warre, and following the dreadfull Name of Hannibal.

that

§. XXI.

HANNIBAL in Africk prepares to fight with SCIPIO; treates with him about peace in vaine; looseth a battaile at Nadagara, and perswades the Carthaginians to sue for peace. Of the peace granted from Rome to Carthage.

HANNIBAL disembarqued his Armie at Leptis, almost an hundred miles from Carthage, Eastward from the Headland of Mercurie, and somewhat more than one degree to the South. He was ill prouided of Horse; which it was not easie for him to transport out of Italie. Therefore it behoued him to land, as he did, somewhat farre from the Enemie; that hee might furnish himselfe with this and the like needfull helpes, against the day of battaile. From Leptis he passed on to Adrumetum, and so along through the In-land Countrie; gathering friends vnto him by the way. Tychæus a Numidian Prince, and familiar friend of Syphax, was said to haue in those dayes the best Horses of seruice, that were to be found in Africk. Him therefore did Hannibal allure vnto his partie: making him vnderstand, that if the Romans got the victorie, it should bee easie for Masanissa, by their countenance and helpe to oppresse both him, and as many other of the neighbour Princes as hindred his prospect. This Argument, and the fame of him that vsed it, preuailed with Tychæus; who shortly after brought vnto the Carthaginian two thousand Horse. Appian further addes, That Mezetullus, (the same who had made himselfe Protectour ouer Masanissa his Cousins; and was Head of a Family, and aduerse to the Numidian Kings of that race) brought vnto Hannibal another thousand Horse: as likewise that Vermina the sonne of Syphax, holding a great part of his Fathers Kingdome, began at the same time to assaile the places that yeelded obedience to Masanissa. This Vermina, as we finde in Liuie, came with more than sixteene thousand men (for he lost more than so manie) to succour Hannibal when it was too late.

The Carthaginians were at this time in such hard estate, or (at least) so impatient of the state wherein they were; that they could not attend the leisure of those preparations, which would haue made the victorie assured. When they considered the worth of Hannibal, and the greatnesse of his Acts: it offended them to thinke, that they had beene so base, as to make humble suit vnto the Romans for Peace; whilest they had such a braue Champion aliue, to maintaine their cause by warre. But when they bethought themselues of their owne sufferings, which, for want of Roman magnanimitie to endure them, appeared greater than indeede they were: then cried they out earnestly, that it was no time to linger, but presently to fight; that so they might see an end of these troubles, either good or bad. And to this purpose, they sent their Mandates to Hannibal: requiring him, without any further protraction, to doe what he could doe out of hand. Hannibal made answere, That they were his good Lords, and had power to dispose of him and his Armie: but since he was Generall of their forces, He thought it reasonable, that they should suffer him to doe as a Generall ought to doe; and to choose his owne times. Neuertheless, to giue them satisfaction, Hee made great marches to Zama; and there encamped.

The breach of Truce, made by the Carthaginians: The violence, done to his Embassadours: and the newes of Hannibal his being landed in Africk; made Scipio to vnderstand the resolution of the Carthaginians, which was, not to yeeld vnto any conditions vnprofitable for themselues, as long as they were able to make resistance. Wherefore hee sent vnto Masanissa: and informed him of all that was fallen out; praying praying him to come away with ſpeed, and lay all other buſineſſe a-part. Ten Roman Companies, of Horſe and Foot together, Maſaniſſa had with him; that were lent vnto him by Scipio, to doe him ſeruice in the eſtabliſhing and enlarging of his Kingdome. But he well vnderſtood, that thoſe and many more beſides all his owne forces would little auaile him; if Hannibal ſhould driue the Romans out of Africk. Wherefore taking ſuch order as hee could vpon the ſudden, for the ſafetie of his owne Kingdome; with foure thouſand Horſe, and ſixe thouſand Foot, hee made all haſte vnto Scipio.

Soone after the beginning of theſe new troubles, the Carthaginian Embaſſadours that had beene at Rome, returned backe vnder the conduct of Lælius and Fulvius: who brought them ſafe into the Roman Campe. There when they arriued, and vnderſtood what had lately paſſed, eſpecially how their Citizens had behaued themſelues towards the Roman Embaſſadours: they made little doubt, how their owne heads ſhould anſwere for ſuch notorious outrage. To confirme them in this opinion.

M. Babius one of the late Embaſſadours that had beene in Carthage, being left by Scipio to take charge of the Campe, laid hands vpon them, and detained them; ſending word vnto his Generall, who was gone abroad to make warre in the Countrie, that he had them in his power, and that now the Carthaginians might bee repaid in their owne Coyne, for the injurie by them lately done. Scipio was very glad to heare of this; and commanded Babius to vſe them with all poſſible courteſie, and ſend them ſafe home. By thus doing He brake the hearts of his Enemies; and cauſed them to acknowledge themſelues, (which was a great victorie) farre leſſe honourable than the Romans. This notwithſtanding, He made more cruell warre vpon them than before: taking their Townes by force; and putting them to ſacke, without hearkning to any Compoſition. It was the manner of the Romans, as often as they tooke a Towne by aſſault, to put all that came in their way to the ſword, whatſoeuer they were, without regard. This they did, to make themſelues terrible: and the better to worke ſuch impreſſion in the mindes of thoſe, with whom they had to doe, they vſed oftentimes to kill the very Dogges and other Beaſts, that ranne athwart them in the ſtreets; hewing their bodies aſunder, as men delighted in ſhedding of bloud. This being their practiſe at other times: it is likely, that now they omitted no peece of crueltie; when they meant to giue proofe of their vehement indignation, and reuengefull mindes, for the injuries receiued. Hence it partly grew, that the Carthaginians were ſo earneſt in preſſing Hannibal to fight. Excerpt. è Polyb. lib. 10.

Hannibal being encamped at Zama, ſent foorth his Scowts and Spies, to diſcouer where the Romans lay; what they were doing; and as much as might be of their demeanour. Some of theſe were taken, and brought vnto Scipio: who inſtead of truſſing them vp, gaue them free leaue to view his Campe at pleaſure; appointing one to conduct them vp and downe, and ſhew them whatſoeuer they deſired. This done, He gaue them libertie to depart; and ſent them away ſafe vnto their Generall. Hannibal vnderſtanding this, admired the brauerie and courage of his Enemie: with whom on the ſudden he grew deſirous to haue an Enter-view, and perſonall conference; and ſignified ſo much vnto him, by a meſſenger ſent of purpoſe. Of this motion the Roman liked well: and returned anſwere, that Hee would meet him ſhortly in place conuenient. The next day Maſaniſſa came with his Armie: whom Scipio taking with him, remoued vnto a Towne called Nadagara; neare vnto which hee ſat downe, in a place otherwiſe commodious, and cloſe by a water that might opportunely ſerue his Campe. Thence he ſent word vnto the Carthaginian, That the time and place did fitly ſerue, if He had ought to ſay to him. Hannibal thereupon remoued from Zama, and came within foure miles of the Enemie: where hee encamped well to his owne good liking in all things elſe; excepting that his men were driuen to take much paines, in fetching their water ſomewhat farre off. Then was order taken for their meeting: and the two Generals, each of them with a troupe of Horſe, Horſe, rode foorth of their Campes, till they came vnto a peece of ground; which was before well ſearched, for feare of ambuſh. There they will their followers to ſtand off: and themſelues, with each of them one Interpreter, encountred each other in the mid-way betweene their Companies. They remained a while ſilent, viewing one the other with mutuall admiration. Then beganne the Carthaginian, ſaluting the Roman, to deliuer his minde to this effect: That it had beene better both for Carthage and for Rome, if they could haue limited and contained their ambition within the ſhores of Africke and of Italie; for that the Countries of Sicil and of Spaine, about which their fathers and themſelues had ſtriuen, were no ſufficient recompence for ſo many Fleets as had beene loſt, and of ſo much bloud as had beene ſhed, in making thoſe coſtly purchaſes. But ſince things paſt could not bee recalled: He ſaid, That it was meet for them to conſider, vnto what extreme dangers their owne Cities had beene expoſed, by the greedie deſire of extending their Empires abroad; and that it was euen time for them now at length, to make an end of their obſtinate contention, and pray the gods to endue them with greater wiſedome hereafter. And to ſuch peaceable diſpoſition He affirmed that his owne yeares, and long triall of Fortune both good and euill, had made him inclinable. But much he feared, that Scipio, by want of the like experience might rather fixe his minde vpon vncertaine hopes, than vpon the contemplation of that mutabilitie, whereto all humane affaires are ſubiect. Yet (ſaid He) mine owne example may peraduenture ſuffice to teach thee moderation. For I am that ſame HANNIBAL, who after my victorie at Cannæ wanne the greateſt part of Italie: and deuiſed with my ſelfe, what I ſhould doe with your Citie of Rome; which I hoped verily to haue taken. Once I brought mine Armie to your walles, as thou haſt ſince brought thine to ours of Carthage: but now, ſee the change! I ſtand here entreating thee to grant vs peace. This may ſerue as a document of Fortunes inſtabilitie. I fought with thy Father, SCIPIO: Hee was the firſt of the Roman Generals, that euer met mee in the field. I did then little thinke; that the time would come, that I ſhould haue ſuch buſineſſe, as now at the preſent, with his ſonne. But this is euen one of Fortunes Pageants, whereof ſhee hath many. And thou maiſt haue experience of the like in thy ſelfe, who knowes how ſoone? Thinke vpon M. ATILIVS. If hee would haue hearkened vnto ſuch perſwaſions, as I now vſe to thee; hee might haue returned home to Rome an happy man. And ſo maiſt thou doe now, if any reaſonable offer will giue thee ſatisfaction. How ſaiſt thou? Canſt thou be contented, that all Spaine, Sicil, Sardinia, and whatſoeuer Ilands elſe are ſituate betweene Italie and Aſrick, be abandoned by the Carthaginians for euer; and left vnto the Romans, to beare Dominion therein? Thou ſhalt haue glorie enough by effecting thus much: and the Romans may well be glad of ſuch a bargaine. As for vs: our owne quiet ſhall henceforth giue vs contentment. And the ſame contentment of ours, ſhall make vs faithfully obſerue the Peace with you. But if thou thinkeſt all too little, I muſt deſire thee to ponder well how great an hazzard thou muſt vndergoe, for the obtaining of a very little more, than that which thou maiſt haue without contention. It is now in thine owne power, to lay holde vpon good Fortune, if it pleaſe thee: ſtay but till to morrow night; and thou muſt take ſuch fortune, as it ſhall pleaſe the gods. The iſſue of battaile is vncertaine, and many times beguileth expectation. Men and ſteele we ſhall each of vs bring into the field: but of the victory, neither of vs hath aſſurance. Let vs therefore without more adoe, make peace. And doe not tell me, that ſome falſe-hearted Citizens of ours dealt fraudulently of late in the like Treatie: It is I HANNIBAL that now deſire peace with thee; which I would neuer doe, if I thought it not expedient for my Countrie. And thinking it expedient, I will alwayes maintaine it: like as I haue maintained vnto my power, as long as the gods did not enuie mee, the Warre by me begunne. Hereunto Scipio made anſwere, That it was no ambitious deſire of ruling in Sicil and in Spaine, which had mooued the Romans to enter into this or the former Warre: but that the defence of the Mamertines, and afterwards of the Saguntines, their confederates, had cauſed them to put on thoſe armes; which the gods by the finall iſſue of the Warres had approued, and would approue to bee moſt iuſt. As for the mutabilitie of Fortune: he ſaid, that he was not thereof ignorant; and that without

out any note of insolence, or ouer-weening, he might well refuse the conditions offered. For was it not plaine, that all these Countries, with which the Carthaginians now so willingly departed, were alreadie wonne from them by the Romans? If, said He, these Conditions had beene propounded whileſt as yet yee detained some part of Italie, they might peraduenture not haue beene reiected. But as the case now stands, I see no reason, why I should remit vnto you any one peece of those my former demands; to which the Carthaginians haue yeelded alreadie, and thought mee to deale graciously in being so moderate. Rather I say, that the iniuries which they haue done me since, haue made them vnworthie of obtaining peace vpon so friendly termes. But I cannot blame thee, HANNIBAL, though thou wouldest be glad to make thy Citizens vnderstand, from how much of their burden they are by thy meanes eased. Onely thou must thinke, that in like sort it concernes me in honour, not to let them be gainers or sauers by the wrongs which they haue done of late. Thou knowest well, that, besides those offers which thou here hast made, they were well content to restore vnto vs ransome-free all prisoners that they haue of ours; to pay vs fiue thousand Talents; to deliuer vp their Gallies; and to deliuer hostages for assurance of faire dealing. And must they now be discharged of all this, by their breach of Truce; their spoiling of our Fleet; and their violating our Embassadours? Not so. But if they can be contented, besides all this, to make such amends as I shall require, for these iniuries newly done: then will I take aduice with my Councell what answere to giue you; otherwise, you may euen prepare for warre, and blame your owne selues, for that I haue denied you peace.

Hereupon they brake off: and returned each to his owne Campe, with no other newes than warre; bidding their Souldiers prepare for a battaile, wherein should be decided the quarrell betweene Rome and Carthage. The next morning at breake of day they issued into the field: a notable Match, and such as hath very seldome beene found; whether we regard the Generals; their Armies; the two Cities that contended; or the great importance of the battaile at hand. Scipio ordered his men after the Roman manner: placing first the Hastaty, diuided into their Maniples, or small Battalions, with a reasonable distance betweene them: Not farre behind these followed the Principes, likewise diuided; and so after them the Triarij. But herein Scipio altered a little the ordinarie custome of the Romans: He placed not the Maniples of his Principes opposite vnto the void spaces betweene the Hastaty, that so the Hastaty, as was vsuall, might fall backe betweene the Principes; but hee placed them directly one behind another, as it were, in File. This Hee did because of the Elephants; whereof Hannibal had many. For of those beasts the danger was lesse, whileſt there was open way to let them through. Therefore hee tooke such order; that when they had passed through the spaces betweene the first Battalions, they should not come vpon the Principes in Front. Vnto his Velites or those of the light armature, that were to beginne the fight, Hee gaue direction, that when they found themselues ouer-charged, eyther by the Enemies; or (which was most to bee feared) by the Elephants, they should runne backe through those lanes that were betweene the Maniples; and that those which were swiftest, or otherwise best able, should continue on their flight, vntill they were got behind all their owne Armie; thereby leauing roome enough vnto those that were wounded, or cast behinde, to saue themselues on the void ground, that was betwixt the first and second, or the second and third Battailes; without cloying vp the way betweene the Maniples, which he desired to keepe open. His Italian Horse hee placed in the left wing vnder C. Lelius. In the right wing was Massanissa with his Numidians. He himselfe riding vp and downe, exhorted his men to doe valiantly; vsing words not many, but verie forcible. He bade them remember what they had atchieued, since their comming into Africke. He told them, That if this day were theirs, the warre was at an end: and that their victorie in this warre, should make them Lords of all the World; for that afterwards, none would be found able to resist them. On the contrary; if they were beaten, he asked them whither they would fly. They were farre from home, yea and farre from their owne standing Campe: neyther was there any place in Africk, that would giue them shelter; if they fell into the Carthaginians hands, they knew what to expect. And therefore there was none other way, but Death or Victory: vnlesse they would liue like wretched slaues vnder most mercilesse Enemies. In such necessitie, he said, that they which consider themselues to be, and take resolution answerable thereunto, haue neuer beene knowne to faile of getting victory.

Hannibal on the other side placed his Elephants, that were more than fourescore, in Front of his Battaile. Next behind these, he made his Vantguard all of Mercinaries; Ligurians, Gaules, Baleares, and Moores. Then followed his Battaile: which was of Carthaginians and Africans, more interessed in the quarrell than were those Mercinaries; though not so good souldiers: but to helpe (if it might be) their want of courage, they had with them foure thousand Macedonians, lately sent from King Philip. More than the space of a furlong behind these came his Rereward, consisting of those braue Souldiers which had serued him in his Italian warres; and were the onely men, in whom he reposed any confidence. Opposite to Lælius, in his owne right wing he bestowed the Carthaginian Horse. Tycheus and the Numidians he placed in his left wing against Masanissa. He was indeede farre too weake for the Enemie in Horse, both in number and in goodnesse. For Tycheus and Mezetullus had no more than three thousand; and those not so well exercised, as were the foure thousand of Masanissa. The Carthaginians also were no more, nor none other than such as could be leuied in the haste of a few dayes; and the remainder of those, that had of late beene often vanquished, and accustomed to fly. But it was no time for Hannibal, neyther had hee perhaps authoritie, to make these his companions alight and serue on foote, setting better men in their saddles. All that he could haue done, was to stay a little longer, and expect more helpe. Had Vermina the sonne of Syphax come thither, as he did in few dayes after, with sixteene thousand and vpwards, the most of them Horse: the aduantage of number might haue serued well to supply all other defect. Yet since the Lords of Carthage would brooke no delay: Hannibal must be faine to comfort himselfe, with the hope that hee reposed in his old Italian Souldiers; whose vertue had wrought greater wonders, when it was more strongly opposed. He encouraged therefore his men, with words agreeable to their seuerall conditions: promising vnto the Mercinaries bountifull rewards: threatning the Carthaginians with inevitable seruitude, if they lost that day; but especially animating his old fellow-souldiers, by the many victories which they had obtained against farre greater numbers. He bade them to looke vpon the Enemies; and make an estimate, whether they were any thing like so many, as that huge Armie which they had slaughtered at Cannæ. He willed them to remember, That it was one P. Scipio, euen the father of this man, whom they had first of all compelled to runne away. He told them, that these Legions which they yonder beheld, were, for the most part of them, the very worst of the Romane Souldiers; euen such, as for their dastardly flight out of sundry battailes, could no longer be trusted to beare Armes in their owne Countrie. As for the rest: they were yong men, the sonnes of Cowards, and bred vp in the continuall feare of those weapons, by which their fathers were daily slaine or chaced. Wherefore he entreated these his old companions, vpon whose vertue he meant wholly to repose himselfe, that they would this day striue to make good their honour; and to purchase the fame of meninvincible.

Such exhortations vsed the two Generalls before the fight. When they drew neare together: the Numidian Horsemen on both sides beganne to skirmish. The Trumpets, and other instruments of warre, sounded to battaile: and Hannibal commanded his Elephants to breake vpon the Romanes. Of these Elephants (as they were alwayes an vncertaine kinde of helpe) those that stood neere vnto the point of the left wing, turned backe for feare: and ranne vpon their owne Numidian Horse; which they affrighted and disordered. Masanissa espying this, gaue charge vpon the same Numidians; and not suffering them to rally themselues, draue them quite out of the field. The rest of those beasts made a great spoile of the Romane Velites, whom they

they followed into the ſpaces betweene the Maniples: but without any harme to the Battalions themſelues; which gaue them open way, accordingly as Scipio had well prouided. Diuers of them receiuing many wounds, and growing therewith furious, could no longer be gouerned: but ranne backe vpon the right point of their owne battaile, and beyond that into the open field. Herewithall they diſordered the Carthaginian Horſe which were in that wing: againſt whom they gaue to Lelius the ſame aduantage, that Maſaniſſa had againſt the Numidians; which hee vſed in like ſort. In the meane while, the Battels of foote aduanced, and drew neere together with a ſlow and ſtately pace, till they were almoſt within a weapons caſt: at what time they gaue a ſhout, and ranne one at the other. The Mercinaries for a time ſeemed both in audacitie, and in quickneſſe, to haue the better of the Romanes; wounding many, and doing more harme, than they tooke. But the Romane diſcipline after a while, preuailed againſt the boiſterous violence of theſe vntrained Barbarians. Whereunto it helped not a little, that the battell of the Principes, following ſomewhat neere after the Haſtaty, encouraged their fellowes; and ſhewed themſelues readie, if neede were, to relieue them. Contrariwiſe, the Mercinaries receiued no manner of helpe or comfort, from thoſe that ſhould haue ſeconded them. For the newleuied Carthaginians and Africans, when they ſaw their hired ſouldiers giue backe, did alſo themſelues retire. This cauſed the Ligurians, Gaules, and the reſt, to thinke themſelues betrayed: whereupon they inclined vnto flight. The Carthaginian Battaile was herewith more terrified than before, ſo as it refuſed to giue way vnto the Mercinaries for their ſafe retrait; and yet withall forbore to make head againſt the Enemies, that purſued them. It was no time to aske them what they meant by this: Feare and Indignation cauſed thoſe that were at once chaced by the Romanes, and betrayed, as they thought, by their owne fellowes, to turne their Armes with an heedleſſe furie againſt both the one and the other. Thus were many of the Carthaginians beaten downe and ſlaine, through their owne indiſcretion, by their owne Mercinaries. The Romane Haſtaty in like ſort, fighting with deſperate men in a throng, had their hands ſo full of worke; that the Principes were faine to come vp vnto them, and helpe to ouer-beare this great medley of enemies, that were together by the eares among themſelues. In this place was made a great ſlaughter, both of the Mercinaries and of the Carthaginians: which hindering one another, could neither fight, nor eaſily flie. Such of them as eſcaped, ranne towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not ſtirre one foote, to helpe or ſaue theſe Runne-awaies. He cauſed his men to bend their Pikes at thoſe of his owne ſide, that would haue ruſhed vpon him: whom hee thereby compelled to turne aſide beyond his Battaile, and ſaue themſelues in the open field. The ground, ouer which the Romanes were now to march, ere they could meete with Hannibal, was couered with ſuch thicke heapes of dead bodies and weapons, and ſo ſlippery with bloud: that Scipio began to ſtand in great doubt, leſt the orders of his Battalions ſhould be diſſolued in paſſing that way. In ſuch caſe, if he ſhould fight with that warlike Armie, which he ſaw before him, remayning yet entire, and without feare expecting him; He might be well aſſured to receiue a notable ouerthrow. Hee cauſed therefore the Haſtaty to make a ſtand there where they were, oppoſite vnto the maine battaile of the Hannibalians. Then drawing vp his Principes and Triarij: Hee placed them, when they had ouercome the bad way, all in one Front with the Haſtaty, and made of them his two Cornets. This done, he aduanced towards Hannibal: who entertained him after another manner, than euer he had beene receiued in his life before. All the dayes worke till now, ſeemed to haue beene onely a matter of paſtime; in regard of the ſharpe Conflict, that was maintained betweene theſe notable Souldiers. The Romanes were encouraged, by their hauing preuailed all the day before: They were alſo farre the more in number. But theſe old Souldiers of Hannibal were freſh; and (perhaps) the better men. They fought with ſuch obſtinate reſolution, that no man gaue backe one foote; but rather choſe to die vpon the ground, whereon he ſtood. So that, after a long time, it was vncertaine which part had the worse: vnlesse it may seeme, that the Romanes were beginning to shrinke; for as much as the returne of Masanissa and Lælius from pursuit of the Enemies Horse, is said to haue beene most happie and in a needfull time. These vpon the sudden charged the Hannibalians in Rere; and ouerbearing them by meere violence, compelled them to fall to Rout.

Excerpt. è Polyb. lib. 15.

In this Battaile there dyed of the Romanes fifteene hundred and vpwards: on the Carthaginian side, aboue twentie thousand, besides as many that were taken; of whom, Sopater Captaine of the Macedonians was one. The singular skill that Hannibal shewed in this his last fight, is highly commended by Polybius; and was acknowledged, as Liuie reports, by Scipio himselfe. But the Enemies were too strong for him in Horse: and being enioyned, as hee was, by the State of Carthage to take battaile with such disaduantage, he could worke no maruels. He saued himselfe with a few Horse; and stayed not in his journey, till he came to Adrumetum. Thence was he sent for to Carthage; from which he had beene absent sixe and thirtie yeares. At his comming into the Senate He said plainly, That there was none other way left, than to take such peace as could be gotten. Wherefore the Carthaginians, not knowing what other course to take, resolued to send Embassadours againe; and trie the fauour of Scipio, whose Armes they could not now resist.

Scipio hauing spoiled the Enemies Campe, returned backe to Vtica: where hee found P. Lentulus newly arriued, with fiftie Gallies and an hundred Shippes of burden. With this Fleet, and that which hee had before, Hee thought it best to make towards Carthage: rather of purpose to terrifie the Citie, than with any hope to take it. His Legions he committed vnto Cn. Octauius; whom he willed to meet him there by land. Then sending Lælius away to Rome with newes of the victorie, He set saile from Vtica towards Carthage. He was encountred on the way by ten Embassadours from the Citie: who bearing vp with the Admirall Gallie, beganne to vse the pittifull gesture of suppliants. But they receiued none other answere, than that they should meet him at Tunes, where He would giue them audience. So rowing along before the Citie: and viewing it more in brauerie, than with meaning to attempt it; He returned backe to Vtica, and called backe Octauius thither, with whom in person Hee set forwards to Tunes. As they were in their journie thither, they heard the newes, that Vermina the sonne of Syphax, was comming with an Armie of more Horse than Foot, to the succour of those that were alreadie vanquished. This Vermina seemes to haue beene both careless of getting intelligence how things passed, and very defectiue in all other duties requisite in the Commander of an Armie. Part of the Roman Foot, with all their power of Horse, was sent against him: which did not onely beat him, but so compasse him in, that hee hardly escaped himselfe with a few; leauing fifteene thousand of his followers dead behinde him, and twelue hundred taken prisoners. If this good companie had beene with Hannibal at Nadagara, they should haue beene farre better conducted, and might well haue changed the Fortune of the day; which the Carthaginian lost, by default of Horse. But God had otherwise determined. It is not to bee doubted, that this victorie, though it were no great accesse vnto the former; yet serued well to daunt the Carthaginians, and imprint in them the greater feare of Scipio. When he came to Tunes, there met him thirtie Embassadours from Carthage: whose behauiour though it was more pitifull than it had beene before; yet procured it lesse commiseration, by reason of their late false dealing, after they had in like sort humbled themselues. Neuertheless it was considered, what a long and laborious worke it would proue, to besiege the mightie Citie of Carthage. And particularly Scipio stood in great doubt, lest the honor of this warre, if it were protracted, should bee taken out of his handes; and giuen to one of the Consuls. Cn. Seruilius Cæpio, that Consul who had charge of the warre against Hannibal, at such time as he departed out of Italie: was bold to passe ouer into the Ile of Sicil (as it were in chace of Hannibal by him terrified and driuen away) with a purpose thence to haue proceeded into Africk, and taken from Scipio the Command

mand of the Armie there. But a Dictator was choſen of purpoſe, to reſtraine the ambition of this Conſul Seruilius. After him followed Tiberius Claudius, who made ſuite for the ſame Prouince of Africk: and was therein ſo earneſt, that though neyther the Senate, nor People, would grant him his deſire; yet hee needes would be going, procuring onely leaue of the Senate, that hee being Conſul might ioyne with Scipio, were it with no more than equall authoritie. But ere Hee could haue his Fleete and all things in a readineſſe for the journey, wherein no man cared to further him: Winter came on, and hee was onely toſt at Sea with foule weather, firſt vpon the Coaſt of Hetruria, and afterwards by Sardinia; where his Conſulſhip expired, and ſo he returned home a priuate man. Then came the joyfull newes to Rome, of the victorie obtained againſt Hannibal, and that the warre was now euen at an end. Yet was Lentulus the new Conſul ſo paſſionate, in deſiring Africk for his Prouince, That hee ſaid hee would ſuffer nothing to paſſe in the Senate, vntill hee had firſt his will. Much adoe there was about this: and after many contentions, both in the Senate, and before the People, at laſt it was ordered, That if Peace were granted, it ſhould be granted by Scipio; if the warre continued, Scipio ſhould haue command therein by Land, and the Conſul at Sea. The ambition of theſe men, cauſed Scipio to giue the more fauourable anſwere vnto the Carthaginian Embaſſadours. Hee willed them to conſider what they had deſerued: and in regard thereof to thinke themſelues well dealt withall, in that hee was contented to leaue vnto them their libertie and their owne Lawes, without appointing any Gouernour ouer them, or Garriſon to hold them in ſubiection; leauing alſo vnto them their poſſeſſions in Africk, ſuch as they were at the beginning of this warre. As touching the reſt hee was at a point, That, before hee eyther granted them Peace or truce, they ſhould make ſatisfaction for wrongs which they had done, whileſt the late Treatie was in dependance. Hereunto if they would yeeld; then required Hee That immediatly they ſhould deliuer vp vnto the Romanes all Priſoners, Fugitiues, and Renegados, that they had of theirs: likewiſe all their Gallies, excepting ten: and all their Elephants: That they ſhould make no warre at all thence-forth out of Africk, neither yet within Africk, without licence of the Romanes: That the Countries, Townes, goods whatſoeuer, belonging any wiſe vnto MASANISSA, or to any of his Anceſtors, which were in their poſſeſſion, ſhould be all by them reſtored vnto him: That they ſhould finde corne for the Romane Armie, and wages for their Auxiliaries, during the time of Truce, vntill the Peace were fully concluded: That they ſhould pay ten thouſand Talents of Siluer, in the terme of fifty yeares, by two hundred Talents a yeare; and that for obſeruance of Conditions, they ſhould giue an hundred hoſtages, ſuch as SCIPIO would chooſe, being none of them vnder foureteene yeares of age, nor aboue thirtie.

With theſe conditions the Embaſſadors returned home; and reported them vnto the Citie. They were verie vnpleaſing; and therefore one Giſco ſtood vp to ſpeake againſt them: and exhorted the People, who gaue good attention, that they ſhould not condeſcend vnto ſuch intolerable demands. But Hannibal perceiuing this and noting withall what fauourable audience was giuen to this vaine Oratour, by the vnquiet yet vnwarlike Multitude; was bold to pull him downe from his ſtanding, by plaine force. Hereat all the People murmured; as if their common libertie were too much wronged, by ſuch inſolence of this preſumptuous Captaine. Which Hannibal perceiuing, roſe vp and ſpake vnto them: ſaying, That they ought to pardon him, if he had done otherwiſe than the cuſtomes of the Citie would allow; forasmuch as he had beene thence abſent euer ſince he was a Boy of nine yeares old, vntill he was now a man of fiue and forty. Hauing thus excuſed himſelfe of the diſorder, He diſcourſed vnto them concerning the Peace: and perſwaded them to accept it, as wanting abilitie to defend themſelues; had the demands of the Enemie beene yet more rigorous. Finally vpon good aduice, they reſolued to yeeld vnto the Conditions propounded by Scipio: to whom they payed out of hand fiue and twentie thouſand pound weight of Siluer, in recompence of damages, and injuries by them done done to his Fleet and Embassadours. Scipio granted them Truce for three moneths; in which time they might negotiate with the State of Rome, about confirmation of the League. But herewithall Hee gaue injunction, that they should neyther in the meane while send Embassadours any whither else, nor yet dismisse any Embassadours to them sent; without first making him acquainted what they were, and what their errand was.

At this time Hanno, and they of his Faction, were become wise and honorable men, by the miseries whereinto Carthage was fallen through their malicious Counsailes. Asdrubal, surnamed the Kid, a venerable man, and great friend of Hanno, was chiefe of the Embassages which they sent to Rome for obtaining peace. They went thither in company of Scipio his Embassadours; who related vnto the Senate and People these joyfull newes. About the same time arriued at Rome Embassadours from Philip King of Macedon: who, together with the Carthaginians, were faine to wait awhile for audience, till the election of new Consuls then in hand was finished; and order taken, for the Prouinces of them, and the new Prætors. Then were the Macedonian Embassadors called into the Senate: who first answering vnto some points, wherein the Romanes had lately signified vnto their King that they found themselues grieued; returned the blame vpon those Greekes themselues, that had made their complaint at Rome. Then accused they M. Aurelius: who being one of the three Embassadours, that had lately beene sent from Rome vnto King Philip, tarried in Greece behinde his fellowes; and there leuying men, made warre vpon the King, without any regard at all of the League, that was betweene him and the Romans. Further they desired of the Senate, That one Sopater, a Macedonian Gentleman, with other of their Countrimen, that had lately serued Hannibal for Pay, and being taken Prisoners in Africk, were kept in bonds by Scipio; might be released, and deliuered vnto them. Vnto all this M. Furius, whom Aurelius had sent to Rome for that purpose, made a sharpe answere. Hee said, that the Greekes which were confederate with Rome, endured so many iniuries at the hands of Philip, that M. Aurelius was faine to stay behinde, to helpe them as he might; which else were like to be brought vnder the Kings subiection. As for Sopater: He affirmed him to be one of the Kings Counsaile, and verie inward with him; one that serued not for money, but carried money with him, and foure thousand men, sent from the King to the ayde of Hannibal. About these points when the Macedonian Embassadours could make vnto the Senate no good answere: they were willed to returne, and tell their Master, That warre hee sought, and warre hee should finde, if hee proceeded as hee had begunne. For in two maine pointes Hee had broken the League, that was betweene him and the Romanes: first, in that hee had wronged their Confederates; and secondly, in that hee had ayded their Enemies against them with men and money.

These quarrels with Philip, that promised to open a way into Greece and the Easterne Countries, helped well the Carthaginian Embassadours in their sollicitation of Peace. They appeared a very reuerend company, when they entred into the Senate: and Asdrubal aboue the rest was much respected, as one, whose good offices had kept the Romanes from necessitie of sending Embassadours to Carthage, vpon the like errand. He liberally granted, that the iustice of the quarrell had beene wholly on the Romanes side; saying that it was the fault of some violent men, through which the Peace was broken. Yet could he not altogether excuse the Citie; that had beene too vehement in the prosecution of bad counsaile. But if Hanno and himselfe might haue had their wills: the Carthaginians, euen at the best of their Fortune, should haue granted the peace which they now desired. Herewithall hee commended the moderation of the Romanes, as no small argument of their valour; by which alwaies they had beene victorious. To the same effect spake the rest of the Embassadours: all of them entreating to haue the Peace ratified; though some with more lamentable words than others, according to the diuersitie of their stile. They had patience enough enough to endure ſuch reproofe of Perjurie, as they themſelues might haue laid vpon the Romanes; if their diligence and fortune had beene ſuch as the Romanes was. Among the reſt, when one of the Senators demanded, by what gods they would ſweare to keepe the peace hereafter: Aſdrubal made anſwere; Euen by the ſame gods, that are ſo ſeuere vnto thoſe that violate their Leagues.

Lentulus the Conſul interpoſing the authoritie of his Office, would haue hindred the Senate from proceeding vnto concluſion of peace; for that hereby Hee was like to loſe the honour, which he purpoſed to get by making warre in Africk. But the matter was propounded vnto the people, in whom reſted the Soueraigne Command of Rome; and by them referred wholly vnto the pleaſure of the Senate. So it was decreed, That Scipio with ten Delegates ſent vnto him from Rome of purpoſe, ſhould make a League with the Carthaginians, vpon ſuch Conditions as ſeemed beſt: which were none other, than the ſame which he had alreadie propounded. For this fauour, the Carthaginian Embaſſadours humbly thanked the Senate; and craued licence, that they might viſite their Countrimen, which were priſoners in Rome: afterwards, that they might ranſome and carrie home with them ſome, that were their eſpeciall friends; of whom they gaue in writing almoſt two hundred names. Whereupon the Senate ordained, that two hundred of thoſe Priſoners, which the Embaſſadours would chooſe, ſhould be ſent ouer into Africk, and be freely reſtored to libertie by Scipio, when the peace was fully concluded. So they tooke leaue, and returned home, in company of the ten Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to joyne with Scipio in Commiſſion.

At their comming into Africk, the Peace was giuen, and accepted, without any controuerſie or diſputation. The Priſoners, Fugitiues, and Renegados, were deliuered vp to Scipio: likewiſe the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio tooke more vengeance vpon the Renegados, than vpon the Fugitiues; and vpon thoſe of the Romanes, than vpon the Latines or other Italians. The Latines hee beheaded: the Romanes hee crucified. About the firſt payment of their money; the Carthaginians were ſomewhat troubled. For though perhaps their common Treaſurie could haue ſpared two hundred Talents for the preſent: yet ſince the penſion was annuall, and to continue fiftie yeares; it was thought meete to lay the burden vpon the Citizens. At the collecting of the ſumme there was piteous lamentation, as if now the Romane yoke had begunne to pinch them; ſo as many, euen of the Senatours, could not forbeare weeping. Contrariwiſe Hannibal could not refraine from laughter. For which when hee was checked by Aſdrubal Hædus and tolde, That it worſt of all beſeemed him to laugh, ſince hee had beene the cauſe why all others did weepe; Hee anſwered, That laughter did not alwayes proceed from ioy; but ſometime from extremitie of indignation. Yet ſaid Hee, My laughter is more ſeaſonable, and leſſe abſurd, than your teares. For yee ſhould haue wept, when yee gaue vp your Shippes and Elephants, and when yee bound your owne hands from the vſe of Armes; without the good leaue of the Romanes firſt obtained. This miſerable condition keepes vs vnder; and holds vs in aſſured ſeruitude. But of theſe matters yee had no feeling. Now, when a little money is wrung out of your priuate purſes, yee haue thereof ſome ſenſe. God grant that the time come not hereafter, wherein yee ſhall acknowledge, That it was the very leaſt part of your miſerie, for which yee haue ſhed theſe teares. Thus diſcourſed Hannibal vnto thoſe, who taſting the bitter fruits of their owne malicious counſaile, repented when it was too late; and in ſtead of curſing their owne diſorders, which had bred this grieuous diſeaſe, accuſed that Phyſicion, whoſe noble endeauours had beene employed in procuring the remedie.

Scipio being to take leaue of Africk, produced Maſaniſſa, and magnified him in preſence of the Armie, with high commendations not vndeſeruedly. To him alſo hee conſigned ouer thoſe Townes of King Syphax, which the Romanes at that preſent held: wherein, to ſay truth, he gaue him but his due; and that which otherwiſe hee knew not well how to beſtow. But the loue of the Romanes, and friendſhip of

Scipio,

Scipio, was fully answerable, now and hereafter, to all the deseruings of this Numidian King. About Carthage there rested no more to be done. Wherefore the Romanes embarqued themselues for Sicil: where when they arriued at Lilybæum, Scipio with some part of his Armie tooke his way home to Rome by land; and sent the rest before him thither by Sea. His journey through Italie was no lesse glorious than any Triumph: all the people thronging out of the Townes and Villages, to doe him honour as he passed along. He entered the Citie in Triumph: neither was there euer before, or after, any Triumph celebrated with so great ioy of the people, as was this of Scipio; though, in brauery of the pompe, there were others in time shortly following, that exceeded this. Whether Syphax were carried through the Citie in this Triumph; and died soone after in prison: or whether he were dead awhile before; it cannot be affirmed. Thus much may be auowed, That it was a barbarous custome of the Romanes, to insult ouer the calamities of mightie Princes, by leading them contumeliously in Triumph; yea though they were such, as had alwaies made faire and courteous warre. But hereof we shall haue better example, ere the same Age passe. It was neyther the person of Syphax, nor any other glory of the spectacle, that so much beautified the Triumph of Scipio; as did the contemplation of that grieuous warre past, whereof the Romanes had beene in a manner without hope, that euer they should set Italie free. This made them looke cheerefully vpon the Author of so great a conuersion; and filled them with more ioy, than they well could moderate. Wherefore they gaue to Scipio the Title of the African: stiling him by the name of that Prouince which he had subdued. This honorable kind of surname, taken from a conquered Prouince, grew afterwards more common, and was vsurped by men of lesse desert: especially by many of the Cæsars, who sometimes arrogated vnto themselues the title of Countries, wherein they had performed little or nothing; as if such glorious Attributes could haue made them like in vertue vnto Scipio the African.

OF the great similitude found in worldly euents, the limitation of matter hath beene assigned as a probable cause. For since Nature is confined vnto a subiect that is not vnbounded; the workes of Nature must needes be finite, and many of them resemble one the other. Now in those actions, that seeme to haue their whole dependance vpon the will of man, we are lesse to wonder, if we find lesse varietie: since it is no great portion of things which is obnoxious vnto humane power; and since they are the same affections, by which the wills of sundrie men are ouer

uer-ruled, in mannaging the affaires of our daily life. It may bee obſerued in the change of Empires, before thoſe times whereof we now write, how the Aſſyrians or Chaldæans inuaded the kingdome of the Medes, with two hundred thouſand foote and threeſcore thouſand horſe: but fayling in their intended conqueſt, they became ſubiect within a while themſelues vnto the Medes and Perſians. In like manner Darius, and after him Xerxes, fell vpon the Greekes with ſuch numbers of men, as might haue ſeemed reſiſtleſſe. But after that the Perſians were beaten home, their Empire was neuer ſecure of the Greekes: who at all times of leaſure from inteſtine warre deuiſed vpon that conqueſt thereof, which finally they made vnder the great Alexander. If Nabuchodonoſor with his rough old ſouldiours, had vndertaken the Medes: or Cyrus with his well trayned Armie, had made the attempt vpon Greece; the iſſue might, in humane reaſon, haue beene farre different. Yet would it then haue beene expedient for them, to employ the trauell and vertue of their men, rather than the greatneſſe of their names, againſt thoſe people; that were no leſſe valiant, though leſſe renowned, than their owne. For the menacing wordes vſed by Cyrus, and ſome ſmall diſpleaſures done to the Greekes (in which kind it may bee, that Nabuchodonoſor likewiſe offended the Medes and Perſians) were not ſo auaileable to victory, as to draw on reuenge in the future. Great Kingdomes, when they decay in ſtrength, ſuffer as did the old Lyon, for the oppreſſion done in his youth; being pinched by the Wolfe, gored by the Bull, yea and kickt by the Aſſe. But Princes are often carried away from reaſon, by miſſe-vnderſtanding the language of Fame: and deſpiſing the vertue that makes little noiſe, aduenture to prouoke it againſt them ſelues; as if it were not poſſible that their owne glory ſhould be foyled by any of leſſe-noted excellence. Againſt the ſame ſtone, whereat Xerxes, and before him (as I take it) Euilmerodach, had ſtumbled; Pyrrhus the Epirot hath daſh his foot. Hee was not indeed the King of all Greece; though moſt of marke, and a better ſouldiour than any other Greekiſh King, when he entred into war againſt the Romans. This war he vndertooke as it were for his mindes ſake: hauing receiued no iniurie; but hoping by the glory of his name, and of the Greekes that ſerued vnder him, to preuaile ſo eaſily againſt the barbarous Romans, that they ſhould onely ſerue as a ſtep to his further intended conqueſts, of Sicil and Africk. But when the Romans, by their victory againſt Pyrrhus, had found their owne vertue to bee of richer mettall, than was the more ſhining valour of the Greekes: then did all the brauery of the Epirot (his Elephants and whatſoeuer elſe had ſerued to make him terrible) ſerue onely to make the Romans, in time following, ſo thinke more highly of themſelues. *For ſince they had ouercome the beſt Warriour in Greece, euen Him; that, being thus beaten by them, could in a yeere after make himſelfe Lord of Greece and Macedon: what ſhould hinder them from the conqueſt of all thoſe vnwarlike Prouinces, which in compaſſe of twelue yeeres a Macedonian King of late memory had won? Certainly there was hereunto requiſite no more, than to bring to their owne deuotion by ſome good meanes, the whole Country of Greece: all the reſt, this done, would follow of it ſelfe. How to deale with the Greekes; Philip and Alexander had ſhewed a way: which, or perhaps a better, they might learne, by getting more acquaintance with the Nation.

When therefore the firſt Punick war was ended, which followed ſoone after the wars of Pyrrhus and of the Tarentines: then were the Romans at good leiſure to hearken after newes in Greece; and to entertaine any good occaſion, that ſhould bee on that ſide preſented. They had alſo then a ſtrong Fleet: and were become, though not otherwiſe very skilfull Mariners, yet good fighters at Sea. So it fell out as happily as could be wiſhed, that the Illyrian Queene Teuta made at the ſame time cruell warre vpon the Greekes: waſting their Country, and ſacking their Townes, only becauſe they were vnable to reſiſt, though they had done her none offence. Into this quarrell if the Romans were deſirous to enter; the Queene was not ſlow to giue them [e] cauſe. And their happy accompliſhing of that war which they made with

*The King of Spaines pretended inuincible Nauie, being beaten out of the Britiſh ſeas, inuited vs to thoſe of Spaine: and hauing broken the greateſt Fleet that euer the Spaniards gathered together; wee neuer made account of any of his preparations after that time.

Her,

Her, was, in their owne opinion, a matter not vnworthy to make their Patronage to be desired by the Greekes. But no such thing happened: though they sent Embassadours, as it were to offer themselues; by signifying, that for the loue of Greece they had vndertaken this Illyrian warre. Thus began the first acquaintance betwixt the Greekes and Romanes: which afterwards encreased very hastily, through the indiscretion of King Philip the Macedonian; whose businesse with them being now the subiect of our storie, it is meet that we should relate (though somewhat briefely) the beginning of his reigne, and his first Actions.

It was like to proue a busie time in the world, when, within the space of foure yeares, new Kings began to reigne in the most of all Countries knowne; and three of them yong boyes, in three of the greatest Kingdomes. This happened from the third yeare of the hundred thirty ninth Olympiad, vnto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died Seleucus Ceraunus King of Asia and Syria, in whose roome succeeded his brother Antiochus, afterwards called the great. Ptolemie Philopator succeeded in the Kingdome of Ægypt vnto his father Euergetes. And Philip the sonne of Demetrius, being sixteene or seuenteene yeares old, receiued the Kingdome of Macedon, together with the Patronage of the Achæans and most of the Greekes; by the decease of his Vncle Antigonus Doson, that was called the Tutor or Protector. About the same time also was the like change in Cappadocia, Lacedæmon, and the Countries about Mount Taurus. For Ariarathes then beganne his reigne in Cappadocia. Lycurgus found meanes to make himselfe King ouer the Lacedæmonians, whose Common-weale, since the flight of Cleomenes, had continued in a manner headlesse; and Achæus, a kinsman of Antiochus, but a Rebell vnto him, occupied the Regions neare vnto Mount Taurus, and kept a while the State of a mighty King. Lastly, in the second and third yeares of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad it was, that open war brake out betweene Rome and Carthage; and that Hannibal began his great Inuasion vpon Italie. Those troubles of the Westerne world, which were indeed the greatest, we haue alreadie followed vnto an end: Of Antiochus, Ptolemie, and the rest, we shall speake hereafter, when the Romanes finde them out.

Philip, soone after the beginning of his reigne, came into Peloponnesus; greatly desired of the Achæans, and many others his dependants. That Country, hauing freed it selfe by the helpe of Antigonus from the danger (accounted great) of an easie subiection vnto Cleomenes: was now become no lesse obnoxious to the Macedonian, than it should haue beene to the Spartan; and therewithall it lay open vnto the violence of the Ætolians, who despised euen the Macedonian Kings, that were Patrons thereof. These Ætolians were no men to be idle; nor were much addicted to any other Art, than warre. Therefore wanting employment, they fell vpon the Messenians that were their owne Clients, and excepting the Eleans, that were anciently of their consanguinitie) the onely good friends which they had at the present in Peloponnesus. Their inuasion was no lesse vnexpected, then it was vniust: whereby with greater ease they made spoile of the Countrey; finding none prepared to make resistance. The Achæans, were called by the Messenians to helpe: which they did the more willingly; because the Ætolians passing without leaue through their Territorie, had (as was their manner) done what harme they listed. Olde Aratus could ill abide these Ætolians; as both knowing well their nature, and remembring the iniuries, wherewith most vngratefully they had requited no small benefits done to them by the Achæans. He was therefore so hasty to fall vpon this their Armie, that hee could hardly endure to stay a few dayes vntill the time of his owne Office came; being chosen Prætor of the Achæans for the yeare following. But his anger was greater than his courage: and he shewed himselfe a man fitter (as hath beene alreadie noted of him) for any other seruice, than leading of an Armie. He suffered them to passe quietly along with their bootie, through a great part of the Countrie, wherein he might easily haue distressed them; and afterwards pressed them so neare, when they had recouered ground of aduantage, that they easily defeated all his Armie.

Lib. 5. chap. 2. §. 6. Ibd.

So

So they departed home rich, and well animated to returne againe. As for the Achæans; they got hereby onely the friendship of the Messenians: with whom, by licence of King Philip, they made confederacie. Shortly after, the Ætolians inuaded Peloponnesus againe; hauing no more to doe, than to passe ouer the narrow Streights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulfe of Lepanto, where they might land in the Country of the Eleans. There ioyned with them in this their second Inuasion a great number of the Illyrians: who neglecting that condition imposed vpon them by the Romans, of setting out no ships of warre vnto the Coast of Greece; made bold to seeke aduentures againe, and did great mischiefe. Demetrius Pharius, a creature of the Romans, commanded a part of these Illyrians: who shortly repented him of this his voyage; which caused him to lose his Kingdome, as is shewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, and fell vpon the Ilands of the Cyclades in the Ægean Sea: whence returning, he did some good offices for King Philip or his friends. The rest of the Illyrians vnder Scerdilaidas, or Scerdiletus, hauing gotten what they could else-where by rouing at Sea, accompanied the Ætolians into Peloponnesus: who made greater hauocke in the Countrie now, than in their former Expedition; and returned home, without finding any resistance. chap. 3. §. 1.

Of these things great complaint was made vnto Philip, when he came to Corinth. And because men were desirous to satisfie themselues with some speedie reuenge: there were that vrged to haue some grieuous punishment laid vpon the Lacedæmonians: who were thought vnder-hand to haue fauoured the Ætolians, in meere despight of the Achæans and Macedonians, by whom themselues had lately beene subdued. It is true, that the Lacedæmonians had beene so affected: and (which was worse) at the arriuall of Philip, they slue such friends of his, as hauing checked their inclination, seemed likely to appeach them of the intended rebellion. Neither durst they well commit themselues to iudgement: but entreated the King, that he would abstaine from comming to them with an Armie: since their Towne was lately much disquieted with ciuill discord, which they hoped soone to appease, and meant alwayes to remaine at his deuotion. Philip was easily satisfied with this: not for that he (or rather old Aratus, who then wholly gouerned him) did misse-vnderstand the Lacedæmonians: but for that a greater worke was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth, in presence of the King, the Embassadours of the Achæans, Bœotians, Phocians, Epirots, and Acarnanians: all complaining vpon the Ætolians: and desiring to haue warre decreed against them, by common assent. Philip sent his letters vnto the Ætolians: requiring them to make ready their answer in some conuenient time; if they could alleadge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should be holden at Rhium for that purpose: whither if it pleased him to come or send, hee should be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to haue beene there at the day. But when the Ætolians vnderstood this for certaintie, they adiourned the Councell vnto a further time: saying, That such weightie matters ought not to be handled, saue in the great Parliament of all Ætolia. This tricke of Law notwithstanding, open warre was proclaimed against them. And they, as it were to shew how well they had deserued it, made election of Scopas to be their Prætor, that was Author of these Inuasions made on Peloponnesus; and the onely man, in a sort, vpon whom they must haue laid the blame of these actions, if they would haue shifted it from the publike.

After this, Philip went into Macedon; where he prepared busily for the warre against the yeere following. He also assayed the Illyrian, Scerdilaidas, with faire words and promises: whom he easily won from the Ætolian side, forasmuch as the Ætolians had cousened him of his share, when he was partner with them in their late robberies. In like sort the Achæans, who had first of all others proclaimed the warre in their owne Country, sent vnto the Acarnanians, Epirots, Messenians, and Lacedæmonians: requesting them forthwith to declare themselues, and to denounce warre vnto the Ætolians; without staying (as it were) to await the euent. Hereunto they receiued

diuerſe anſweres, according to the qualities of thoſe with whom they dealt. The Acarnanians, a free-hearted and valiant, though a ſmall Nation, and bordering vpon the Ætolians, of whom they ſtood in continuall danger; ſaid, that they could not honeſtly refuſe to ſhew their faithfull meaning in that warre, which was concluded by generall aſſent. The Epirots that were more mightie, were neuertheleſſe more cunning and reſerued: ſo that they ſtood vpon a needleſſe point; and deſired to bee held excuſed, vntill Philip (of whoſe meaning they needed not to haue made any doubt) ſhould firſt proclaime the warre. The Meſſenians, for whoſe cauſe the warre was vndertaken, excuſed themſelues, by reaſon of a Towne which the Ætolians held vpon their borders; and ſaid, that they durſt not be ouer-bold, vntill that bridle were taken out of their mouthes. As for the Lacedæmonians; the chiefe of them ſtudied onely how to mannage that treaſon, for which their Citie had beene ſo lately pardoned: and therefore diſmiſſed the Embaſſadours of the Confederates, without any anſwere at all. They had three yeares together continued ſubiect againſt their wils to the Macedonians, expecting ſtill when Cleomenes ſhould returne out of Ægypt to raigne ouer them againe; and maintaine, as he was wont, the honour of their Citie. In this regard they choſe not any Kings; but were contented with the rule of Ephori. Of theſe there were ſome, that thought the publike ſafetie to conſiſt, in holding their faith with the Macedonian that had preſerued them: And hereto they referred all their counſailes; being perhaps not a little moued with reſpect of the benefit, which might redound vnto themſelues, by adhering firmely to thoſe which at the preſent bore rule ouer them. Others, and thoſe the greater part, were ſtill deuiſing, how to make all readie for Cleomenes againſt his returne; and therefore ſought to ioyne with the Ætolians, which were the moſt likely to giue him ſtrong aſſiſtance. The Macedonian faction had the more authoritie, and durſt more freely ſpeake their mindes: but the contrary ſide was the more paſſionate; and ſpared not by murders, or any other violent courſes, to ſet forward their deſire. Neyther did it ſuffice, that about theſe times there came certaine report of Cleomenes his death. For it was the liberty and honour of Sparta, which theſe intended: fancying vnto themſelues the glory of their Anceſtors in ſuch Ages paſt, as were not like to come againe. Cleomenes was, they knew, the moſt able man to reſtore them vnto their greatneſſe and luſtre; which once he had in a manner performed: But ſince he was dead, and that, without iniury to his well-deſeruing vertue, they might proceed to the election of new Kings: Kings they would haue, and thoſe of the race of Hercules, as in former times; for that without ſuch helpes, they muſt continue little better than ſubiects vnto the Macedonian, and farre leſſe by him reſpected, than were the Achæans. Thus were they tranſported, by contemplation of their old Nobility and fame. Some of the moſt working ſpirits among them, procured the Ætolians to ſend an Embaſſie to Sparta: which propounded the matter openly vnto the people; whereof no one of the Citizens durſt haue made himſelfe the Author. Much diſputation and hot there was, betweene thoſe of the Macedonian partie and theſe their oppoſites; in ſuch wiſe that nothing could be concluded; vntill by maſſacre or baniſhment of all, or the chiefe, that ſpake againſt the Ætolians, the diuerſitie of opinion was taken quite away. Then forthwith a League was concluded betweene the Lacedæmonians and Ætolians: without all regard of the Macedonians or Achæans; who had ſpared the Citie, when they might haue deſtroyed it. Then alſo they went in hand with the election of new Kings: wherein their diligence was ſo nice, and ſo regardfull of their ancient Lawes, as touching the chooſing of the one King; that we may iuſtly wonder, how they grew ſo careleſſe in making choyce of the other. In the one of their Royall Families they found Ageſipolis, the ſonne of Ageſipolis the ſon of King Cleombrotus: and him they admitted to raigne ouer them, as heire apparant to his Grandfather. This Ageſipolis was a yong boy, ſtanding in neede of a Guardian; and had an Vncle, his fathers brother, that was fit for the Gouernment. Yet becauſe the Law required, that the ſonne, how yong ſoeuer, ſhould haue his fathers whole right and title: the Lacedæmonians, though standing in neede of a man, were so punctuall in obseruation of the Law; that they made this childe their King, and appointed his Vncle Cleomenes to bee his Protector. But in the other branch of the Royall family, though there was no want of heires: yet would not the people trouble themselues about any of them, to examine the goodnesse of his Claime; but made election of one Lycurgus, who hauing no manner of title to the kingdome, bestowed vpon each of the Ephori a Talent, and thereby made himselfe be saluted King of Sparta, and a Gentleman of the race of Hercules. This Lycurgus, to gratifie his Partisans, and to approue his worth by Action; inuaded the Countrie of the Argiues: which lay open and vngarded, as in a time of peace. There hee did great spoile, and wanne diuers Townes; whereof two hee retained, and annexed vnto the State of Lacedæmon. After such open hostilitie, the Lacedæmonians declared themselues on the Ætolian side; and proclaimed warre against the Achæans.

Thus the beginnings of the warre fell out much otherwise, than the Achæans and their Confederates had expected, when they first made preparation. Philip was not readie: the Epirots gaue vncertaine answere: the Messenians would not stirre: all the burden must lie vpon themselues and the poore Acarnanians, whom the Ætolians, by fauour of the Eleans, could inuade at pleasure, as they were like to doe; and by helpe of the Lacedæmonians, could assaile on all parts at once. It was not long ere the Ætolians, passing ouer the Bay of Corinth, surprised the Towne of Ægira: which if they could haue held, they should thereby grieuously haue molested the Achæans; for that it stood in the mid-way betweene Ægium and Sicyon two of their principall Cities, and gaue open way into the heart of all their Countrie. But as Ægira was taken by surprise: so was it presently lost againe, through greedinesse of spoile; whilest they that should haue made it their first care to assure the place vnto themselues, by occupying the Cittadell and other peeces of strength, fell heedlessely to ransack priuate houses, and thereby gaue the Citizens leaue to make head, by whom they were driuen with great slaughter backe vnto their Fleet. About the same time, another Ætolian Armie landing among the Eleans, fell vpon the Westerne Coast of Achaia; wasting all the Territorie of the Dymæans and other people, that were first beginners of the Achæan Confederacie. The Dymæans and their neighbours made head against these Inuaders; but were so well beaten, that the enemie grew bolder with them than before. They sent for helpe vnto their Prætor, and to all the Townes of their Societie. In vaine. For the Achæans hauing lately beene much weakened by Cleomenes, were now able to doe little of themselues: neither could they get any strength of Mercinaries; forasmuch as at the end of Cleomenes his war, they had couetously with-held part of their due from those that serued them therein. So through this disabilitie of the Achæans, and insufficiencie of their Prætor; the Dymæans, with others, were driuen to with-hold their contribution heretofore made for the publike seruice, and to conuert the monie to their owne defence. Lycurgus also with his Lacedæmonians, began to winne vpon the Arcadians; that were confederate with Philip and the Achæans.

Philip came to the borders of the Ætolians, whilst their Armie was thus employed a farre off in Peloponnesus. The Epirots ioyned all their forces with him: and by such their willing readines, drew him to the siege of a Frontier peece, which they desired to get into their owne hands; for that, by commoditie thereof, they hoped shortly to make themselues Masters of Ambracia. There he spent fortie dayes, ere he could end the busines; which tended onely to the benefit of the Epirots. Had he entred into the heart of Ætolia at his first comming; it was thought that he might haue made an end of the war. But it happens oft, that the violence of great Armies is broken vpon small Townes or Forts: and not seldome, that the importunitie of Associates, to haue their own desires fulfilled, conuerts the preparations of great Kings to those vses for which they neuer were intended; thereby hindering the prosecution of their maine deſſignes. Thus was our King Henrie the eight led aſide, and quite out of his way, by Maximilian the Emperour to the ſiege of Tournay: at ſuch time as the French King Lewes the twelfth, hearing that the ſtrong Citie of Terwin was loſt, and that of his Cauellerie, wherein reſted his chiefe confidence, two thouſand were beaten by the Earle of Eſſex with ſeuen hundred Engliſh; was thinking to withdraw himſelfe into Brittaine, in feare that Henrie would haue come to Paris.

The ſtay that Philip made at Ambracus, did wondrouſly embolden the Ætolians: in ſuch ſort, as their Prætor Scopas aduentured to lead all their forces out of the Countrie; and therewith not onely to ouer-runne Theſſalie, but to make impreſſion into Macedon. He ranne as farre as to Dium, a Citie of Macedon vpon the Ægean Sea: which, being forſaken by the Inhabitants at his comming, Hee tooke, and razed to the ground. Hee ſpared neither Temple, nor any other of the goodly buildings therein, but ouerturned all: and among the reſt, he threw downe the Statua's that were there erected, of the Macedonian Kings. For this he was highly honoured by his Countrimen at his returne; foraſmuch as hereby they thought their Nation to be growne terrible, not onely (as before) vnto Peloponneſus, but euen to Macedon it ſelfe. But this their pride was ſoone abated; and they rewarded ſhortly at home in their owne Countrie, for their paines taken at Dium. Philip hauing diſpatched his worke at Ambracus, made a ſtrong inuaſion vpon Ætolia. Hee tooke Phoetiæ, Metropolis, Oeniade, Paanium, Elaus, and diuers other Townes and Caſtles of theirs: of which hee burnt ſome, and fortified others. Hee alſo beat the Ætolians in ſundrie skirmiſhes; and waſted all the Countrie ouer, without receiuing any harme. This done, while he was about to make a cut ouer the Streights into Peloponneſus, and to doe the like ſpoile in the Countrie of the Eleans, whereto he was vehemently ſollicited by the Achæan Embaſſadours: newes came out of Macedon, that the Dardanians were readie with a great Armie to fall vpon the Countrie. Theſe Dardanians were a barbarous people, diuided by Mount Hæmus from the Northerne part of Macedon; and were accuſtomed to ſeeke bootie in that wealthie Kingdome, when they found their owne times. Hauing therefore intelligence, that Philip was about to make a journie into Peloponneſus: they purpoſed in his abſence, which they thought would bee long, to get what they could for themſelues in his Countrie; as had beene their manner vpon the like aduantages. This made the King to diſmiſſe the Achæan Embaſſadours, (whom hee ſhould haue accompanied home with his Armie) and to bid them haue patience vntill another yeare. So Hee tooke his way home: and as he was paſſing out of Acarnania into Epirus, there came to him Demetrius Pharius with no more than one Ship; that was newly chaced out of his Kingdome by the Romans. This Demetrius had lately ſhewed himſelfe a friend to Antigonus Doſon, in the warres of Cleomenes: and returning in his laſt Voyage from the Cyclades, was readie, at their firſt requeſt, to take part with Philips Captaines. Theſe, or the like conſiderations, made him welcome vnto the Macedonian King: whoſe Counſailor he was euer after. The Dardanians hearing of the Kings returne, brake vp their Armie; and gaue ouer for the preſent their inuaſion of Macedon, towardes which they were alreadie on their way.

All that Summer following the King reſted at Lariſſa in Theſſalie, whileſt his people gathered in their Harueſt. But the Ætolians reſted not. They auenged themſelues vpon the Epirots: whom for the harmes by them and Philip done in Ætolia, they requited with all extremities of warre, among which, the moſt notable was the ruine of the famous Temple of Dodona. When Winter grew on, and all thought of warre vntill another yeare was laid aſide: Philip ſtole a journie into Peloponneſus, with fiue thouſand Foot, and about foure hundred Horſe. As ſoone as hee was within Corinth; He comanded the Gates to be ſhut, that no word might bee carried foorth of his arriuall. He ſent priuily for old Aratus to come thither vnto him: with whom he tooke order, when, and in what places, hee would haue the Achæan Souldiors readie to meet him. The Enemies were then abroad in the Countrie, with

somewhat more than two thousand Foot and an hundred Horse; little thinking to meete with such opposition. Indeed they had little cause to feare: since the Achæans themselues were not aware that the King was in their Land with his Macedonians; vntill they heard, that those two thousand Eleans, Ætolians, and their fellowes, were by him surprised and all made prisoners, or slaine. By this exploit which hee did at his first comming, Philip got very much reputation: as likewise hee purchased both reputation and loue, by diuers actions immediatly following. He wanne Psophis, an exceeding strong Towne, in the borders of Arcadia; which the Eleans and Aetolians then held. Hee wanne it by assault at his first comming: wherein it much auailed him, that the Enemie, not beleeuing that he would vndertake such a peece of worke at such an vnseasonable time of the yeere, was careless of prouiding euen such store of weapons, as might haue serued to defend it. The Towne was preserued by the King from sacke; and giuen to the Achæans, of his owne meere motion, before they requested it. Thence went he to Lasion, which yeelded for very feare; hearing how easily he had taken Psophis. This Towne also he gaue to the Achæans. The like liberality he vsed towards others; that had ancient title vnto places by him recouered. Then fell he vpon the Countrie of Elis, where was much wealth to bee gotten: for that the people were addicted to husbandrie, and liued abroad in Villages; euen such as were of the wealthier sort among them. So he came to the Citie of Olympia: where hauing done sacrifice to Iupiter, feasted his Captaines, and refreshed his Armie three dayes; Hee proceeded on to the spoile of those, that had taken pleasure to share with the Aetolians, in the spoiles of their other-wise-deserning neighbours. Great abundance of Cattaile hee tooke, with great numbers of slaues, and much wealth of all sorts; such as could bee found in rich villages. Then fell he in hand with the Townes whereinto a great multitude of the Countrie-people were fled. Some of these were taken at the first assault. Some yeelded for feare. Some preuented the labour of his journie, by sending Embassadours to yeeld before hee came. And some that were held with Garrisons against their wils, tooke courage to set themselues at libertie, by seeing the King so neare; to whose Patronage thenceforth they betooke themselues. And many places were spoiled by the Ætolian Captaines; because they distrusted their ability to hold them. So the King wanne more Townes in the Countrie, than the sharpenesse of Winter would suffer him to stay there dayes. Faine he would haue fought with the Ætolians: but they made such hast from him, that he could not ouertake them, vntill they had couered themselues within the Towne of Samicum; where they thought to haue beene safe. But Philip assaulted them therein so forcibly, that hee made them glad to yeeld the place; obtaining licence to depart, with their liues and armes. Hauing performed so much in this Expedition, the King reposed himselfe a while in Megalopolis; and then remoued to Argos, where he spent all the rest of the Winter.

Before the Kings arriuall in Peloponnesus, the Lacedæmonians with Lycurgus their new King, had gotten somewhat in Arcadia; and threatned to doe great matters. But when they were admonished, by the calamitie that fell vpon the Eleans, of the danger hanging ouer their owne heads; they quitted their winnings, and withdrew themselues home. This Lycurgus, as hee had no other right to the Kingdome of Sparta, than that which he could buy with monie: so was hee neither free from danger of conspiracies made against him; nor from those jealousies, with which Vsurpers are commonly perplexed. There was one Chilon, of the Royall bloud, that thinking himselfe to haue best right vnto the Kingdome, purposed to make way thereunto, by massacre of his opposites; and afterwards to confirme himselfe, by propounding vnto the Multitude such reformation of the State as was most popular: namely, by making an equall distribution of all the Lands among the whole number of the Citizens, according to the ancient institution of that Commonwealth. He wanne to his partie some two hundred men; with whom hee fell vpon the Ephori as they were together at supper, and slew them all. Then went he to Ly- curgus his house: wo perceiuing the danger, stole away and fled. It remained that he should giue account of these doings to the people, and procure them to take part with him. But their mindes being not hereto prædisposed; they so little regarded his goodly offers, as euen whilst he was vsing his best perswasions, they were consulting how to apprehend him. Chilon perceiued whereabout they went, and shifted presently away. So hee liued afterwards among the Achæans a banished man, and hated of his own people. As for Lycurgus, he returned home: and suspecting thenceforth all those of Hercules his race, found meanes to driue out his fellow-King yong Agesipolis; whereby he made himselfe Lord alone. His doings grew to be suspected, in such sort as once he should haue beene apprehended by the Ephori. But though his actions hitherto might haue beene defended; yet rather than to aduenture himselfe into iudgement, hee chose to flie for a time, and sojourne among his friendes the Ætolians. His wel-knowne vehemencie in opposition to the Macedonians, had procured vnto him such good liking among the people, that in his absence they beganne to consider the weaknesse of their owne surmises against him; and pronouncing him innocent, recalled him home to his Estate. But in time following, Hee tooke better heed vnto himselfe: not by amending his condition (for he grew a Tyrant, and was so acknowledged) but by taking order, that it should not bee in the power of the Citizens to expell him when they listed. By what actions hee got the name of a Tyrant: or at what time it was, that he chaced Agesipolis out of the Citie; I doe not certainly finde. Like enough it is, That his being the first of three vsurpers, which followed in order one after another, made him to bee placed in the ranke of Tyrants; which the last of the three very iustly deserued. Whatsoeuer he was towards some priuate Citizens: in the war against Philip, He behaued himselfe as a prouident man, and carefull of his Countries good.

§. II.

How PHILIP was misseaduised by ill Counsailors: Who afterwards wrought treason against him, and were iustly punished. Hee inuadeth the Ætolians a second time: And forceth them to sue for peace: Which is granted vnto them.

WHileſt the King lay at Argos, deuising vpon his businesse for the yeare following; some ambitious men that were about him, studied so diligently their owne greatnesse, as they were like to haue spoiled all that he tooke in hand. Antigonus Doson had left vnto Philip such Counsailors, as to him did seeme the fittest men for gouerning of his youth. The chiefe of these was Apelles; that had the charge of his person, and ordering of his Treasures. This man, seeming to himselfe a great Politician, thought that he should do a notable peece of seruice to his Prince; if he could reduce the Achæans vnto the same degree of subjection, wherein the Macedonians liued. To bring this to passe; during the late Expedition hee had caused some of the Macedonians to thrust the Achæans out of their lodgings, and to strip them of the bootie that they had gotten. Proceeding further, as occasion fell out, He was bold to chastice some of that Nation; causing his Ministers to take and whippe them. If any of them offered (as there were some of them that could not refraine) to helpe their fellowes; them hee laid by the heeles, and punished as Mutiners. Hereby hee thought to bring it to passe by little and little, that they should bee qualified with an habite of blind obedience; and thinke nothing vniust that pleased the King. But these Achæans were tenderly sensible in matter of libertie: whereof if they could haue been contented to suffer any little diminution, they needed not haue troubled the Macedonians to helpe them them in the warre against Cleomenes: They bemoned themselues vnto old Aratus; and besought him to thinke vpon some good order, that they might not bee oppressed by degrees. Aratus foorthwith dealt earnestly with the King; as in a matter more weightie, than at first it might seeme. The King bestowed gracious words vpon those that had bene wronged; and forbad Apelles to follow the course begunne. Hereat Apelles was inwardly vexed, though he dissembled his choller for a time. He thought so well of his owne Proiect, that he could not endure to lay it aside; being perhaps vnable to doe the King any valuable seruice, in businesse of other nature. Hee purposed therefore hereafter to beginne at the head; since, in biting at the taile, the fish had shot away from his mouth. It could not otherwise bee than that among the Achæans there were some, who bore no heartie affection to Aratus. These he enquired out: and sending for them, entertained them with wordes of Court; promising to become their especiall friend, and commend them vnto the King. Then brake he his purpose with the King himselfe: letting him know, that as long as he continued to make much of Aratus, He must be faine to deale precisely with the Achæans, and, as it were by Indenture, according to the letter of the Contract: whereas if he would be pleased, to giue countenance vnto those others whom he himselfe commended, then should the Achæans, and all other Peloponnesians, bee quickly brought to conforme themselues vnto the dutie of obedient Subiects. By such perswasions, He drew the King to be present at Ægium, where the Achæans were to hold election of a new Prætor. There with much more labour, than would haue beene needfull in a businesse of more importance, the King, by faire words and threatnings together, obtained so much, That Eperatus, a very insufficient man, but one of Apelles his new Fauorites, was chosen Prætor, instead of one more worthie, for whom Aratus had laboured. This was thought a good introduction vnto greater matters that should follow. The King from thence passed along by Patræ and Dyma, to a very strong Castle held by the Eleans, which was called Tichos. The Garrison yeelded it vp for feare, at his first comming: whereof hee was glad; for that hee had an earnest desire to bestow it vpon the Dymæans, as hee presently did.

The King thought it strange, that all this while he heard of no messengers from the Eleans, to sue for peace. For at his departure out of their Countrie the last Winter, hee had let loose one Amphidamus a Captaine of theirs, that was his Prisoner; because hee found him an intelligent man, and one that vndertooke to make them forsake their alliance with the Ætolians, and joyne with him vpon reasonable termes. This if they could be cõtented to do, He willed Amphidamus to let them vnderstand, That he would render vnto them freely all prisoners which hee had of theirs; That he would defend them from all forrein inuasion; and that they should hold their libertie entire, liuing after their owne Lawes, without paying any manner of Tribute, or being kept vnder by any Garrison. These Conditions were not to be despised, if they had found credit as they might haue done. But when Philip came to the Castle of Tichos, and made a new inuasion vpon their Countrie: then beganne the Eleans, (that were not before ouer-hastie to beleeue such faire promises) to suspect Amphidamus as a Traitour, and one that was set on worke for no other ende, than to breed a mutuall diffidence betweene them and the Ætolians. Wherefore they purposed to lay hands vpon him, and send him Prisoner into Ætolia. But hee perceiued their intent, and got away to Dyma: in good time for himselfe; in better for Aratus. For the King (as was said) maruailing what should be the cause, that he heard no news from the Eleans, concerning the offers which he had made vnto them by Amphidamus: Apelles, his Counsailor, thereby tooke occasion to supplant Aratus. He said that old Aratus, and his sonne together, had such deuices in their heads, as tended little to the Kings good; And long of them he said it was, that the Eleans did thus hold out; For when Amphidamus was dismissed home, the two Arati (the father and the sonne) had taken him aside and giuen him to vnderstand, that it would be very præjudiciall to all Peloponnesus, if the Eleans once became at the deuotion of the Macedonian; And this was the true cause, why neither Amphidamus was very carefull in doing this message, nor the Eleans in hearkning to the Kings offers. All this was a false lie; deuised by Apelles himselfe, vpon no other ground than his owne malice. Philip had no sooner heard his tale, but in a great rage hee sent for the two Arati; and bad Apelles rehearse it ouer againe to their faces. Apelles did so, and with a bold countenance, talking to them as to men already conuicted. And when he had said all the rest, ere either Philip or they spake any word; Hee added this clause as it were in the Kings name: Since the King hath found you such vngratefull wretches; it is his meaning to hold a Parliament of the Achæans; and therein hauing made it knowne what yee are, to depart into Macedon, and leaue you to your selues. Olde Aratus grauely admonished the King; That whensoeuer hee heard any accusation, especially against a friend of his owne or a man of worth; He should forbeare a while to giue credit, vntill he had diligently examined the businesse. For such deliberation was Kingly, and hee should neuer thereof repent him. At the present hee said there needed no more, than to call in those that had heard his talke with Amphidamus; and especially him that had brought this goodly tale to Apelles. For it would be a very absurd thing, That the King should make himselfe Authour of a report in the open Parliament of Achaia, whereof there was none other euidence, than one mans yea, and anothers no. Hereof the King liked well; and said that he would make sufficient inquirie. So passed a few dayes: wherein whilest Apelles delaied to bring in the proofe, which indeed he wanted; Amphidamus came from Elis, and told what had befalne him there. The King was not forgetfull, to examine him about the conspiracie of the Arati: which when hee found no better than a meere deuice against his honourable friends; Hee entertained them in louing manner as before. As for his loue to Apelles, though it was hereby somewhat cooled; yet by meanes of long acquaintance and daily employment, no remission therein could be discerned.

The vnrestfull temper of Apelles, hauing with much vehemencie brought nothing to passe; began (as commonly Ambition vseth) to swell and grow venomous for want of his free motion. Hee betakes himselfe to his cunning againe: and as before, being checkt in his doings with those of the vulgar, hee had prepared a snare for the Arati; so fayling of them, he thinkes it wisedome to lay for the King himselfe, and for all at once which were about him. In such manner sometime, the Spider thought to haue taken the Swallow which draue away Flies out of the chimnie; but was carried (net and all) into the Ayre by the bird, that was too strong to be caught and held by the subtile workemanship of a Cob-web. Of the foure that next vnto Apelles were left by Antigonus in chiefe place about Philip; Taurion, his Lieutenant in Peloponnesus, and Alexander Captaine of the Guard, were faithful men, and such as would not bee corrupted. The other two, Leontius Captaine of the Targuetiers, and Megaleas chiefe of the Secretaries, were easily wonne to bee at Apelles his disposition. This Politician therefore studied how to remooue the other two from their places, and put some Creatures of his owne into their roomes. Against Alexander He went to worke the ordinarie way, by calumniation and priuie detraction. But for the supplanting of Taurion hee vsed more fineneſſe; loading him with daily commendations, as a notable man of warre, and one, whom for his many vertues, the King might ill spare from being alwayes in his presence. By such Art he thought to haue remoued him, as wee say, Out of Gods blessing into a warme Sunne. In the meane season Aratus retired himselfe; and sought to auoid the dangerous friendship of the King, by forbearing to meddle in affaires of State. As for the new Prætor of Achaia, lately chosen by such vehement instance of the King; He was a man of no dispatch, and one that had no grace with the People. Wherefore a great deale of time was lost, whilest Philip wanted both the money and the Corne, wherewith he should haue beene furnished by the Achæans. This made the King vnvnderstand his owne errour; which he wisely sought to reforme betimes. He perswaded the Achæans to rejourne their Parliament from Ægium, to Sicyon the Towne of Aratus. There he dealt with the old man and his sonne: perswading them to forget what was past; & laying all the blame vpon Apelles, on whom thenceforth he intended to keepe a more diligent eye. So by the trauell of these worthy men, Hee easily obtained what hee would of the Achæans. Fifty talents they gaue him out of hand; with great store of Corne: and further decreed, That so long as he himselfe in person followed the warres in Peloponnesus, he should receiue ten talents a moneth. Being thus enabled, he began to prouide shipping, that so hee might inuade the Ætolians, Eleans, and Lacedæmonians, that were maritime people, at his pleasure, and hinder their excursions by Sea.

It vexed Apelles beyond measure, to see things goe forward so well without his helpe; euen by the ministery of those whom hee most hated. Wherefore hee entred into conspiracie with Leontius and Megaleas: binding himselfe and them by oath, to crosse and bring to nought, as well as they were able, all that the King should take in hand. By so doing, they thought to bring it to passe, that very want of abilitie to doe any thing without them, should make him speake them faire; and be glad to submit himselfe to their directions. The King it is like had stood in some awe of them whilest he was a childe; and therefore these wise men perswaded themselues, that, by looking bigge vpon him, and imputing vnto him all that fell out ill through their owne misgouernement of his affaires, they might rule him as a child still. Apelles would needes goe to Chalcis, there to take order for the prouisions, which were to come that way out of Macedon: The other two staid behind with the King, to play their parts; all more mindfull of their wicked oath, than of their dutie.

His fleet and Armie being in a readines: Philip made countenance, as if he would haue bent all his forces against the Eleans; to whose aid therefore the Ætolians sent men, little fearing that the mischiefe would haue fallen as soone after it did, vpon themselues. But against the Eleans and those that came to help them, Philip thought it enough to leaue the Achæans, with some part of his and their Mercinaries. He himselfe with the body of his Armie putting to Sea, landed in the Isle of Cephallenia: whence the Ætolians, dwelling ouer against it, vsed to furnish themselues of shipping, when they went to roue abroad. There he besieged the Towne of Palæa, that had been very seruiceable to the Enemie against him and his Confederates; and might bee very vse-full to him, if hee could get it. Whilest hee lay before this Towne, there came vnto him fifteene ships of warre from Scerdilaidas; and many good Souldiers, from the Epirots, Acarnanians, and Messenians. But the Towne was obstinate; and would not be terrified with numbers. It was naturally fenced on all parts saue one, on which side Philip carried a Mine to the wall, wherewith he ouerthrew two hundred foote thereof. Leontius Captaine of the Targettiers, was appointed by the King to make the assault. But hee, remembring his couenant with Apelles, did both wilfully forbeare to doe his best; and caused others to doe the like. So the Macedonians were put to foile, and many slaine; not of the worst souldiers, but such as had gotten ouer the breach, and would haue carried the Towne, if the Treason of their Captaine, and some by him corrupted, had not hindered the victory. The King was angry with this; but there was no remedie; and therefore he thought vpon breaking vp the siege. For it was easier vnto the Towne-men to make vp the gap in their wall, than for him to make it wider. Whilest he stood thus perplexed, and vncertaine what course to take: the Messenians and Acarnanians lay hard vpon him, each of them desirous to draw him into their owne Countrey. The Messenians alleadged, that Lycurgus was busie in wasting their Countrey: vpon whom the King might come vnawares in one day; the Etesian windes which then blew, seruing fitly for his Nauigation. Hereto also Leontius perswaded; who considered that those windes, as they would easily carrie him thither, so would they detaine him there perforce (blowing all the Dog-dayes) and make him spend the Summer to small purpose. But Aratus gaue better counsaile, and preuailed. Hee shewed how vnfitting it were, to let the Ætolians ouer-run all Thessalie againe, and some part of Macedon, whilest the King withdrew his Armie farre off to seeke small aduentures. Rather, he said, that the time now serued well to carry the warre into Aetolia; since the Prætor was gone thence abroad on rouing, with the one halfe of their strength. As for Lycurgus; hee was not strong enough to doe much harme in Peloponnesus: and it might suffice, if the Achæans were appointed to make head against him. According to this aduice, the King sets saile for Aetolia; and enters the Bay of Ambracia, which diuided the Aetolians from Acarnania. The Acarnanians were glad to see him on their borders; and ioyned with him as many of them as could beare armes, to helpe in taking vengeance vpon their bad neighbours. Hee marched vp into the in-land Countrie: and taking some places by the way, which he filled with Garrisons to assure his Retrait; Hee passed on to Thermum; which was the Receptacle of the Aetolians, and surest place of defence in all extremities. The Country round about was a great Fastnesse, enuironed with rockie Mountaines of very narrow, steepe, and difficult ascent. There did the Aetolians vse to hold all their chiefe meetings, their Faires, their election of Magistrates, and their solemne games. There also they vsed to bestow the most precious of their goods, as in a place of greatest securitie. This opinion of the naturall strength, had made them carelesse in looking vnto it. When Philip therefore had ouercome the bad way, there was nothing else to doe than to take spoile: whereof hee found such plentie, that hee thought the paines of his iournie well recompenced. So hee loaded his Armie: and consuming all that could not be carried away, forgot not to raze a goodly Temple, the chiefe of all belonging vnto the Aetolians; in remembrance of the like their courtesie, shewed vpon the Temples of Dium and Dodona. This burning of the Temple, might (questionlesse) more for the Kings honour haue beene forborne. But perhaps he thought, as Monsieur du Gourgues the French Captaine told the Spaniards in Florida, That they which had no faith, needed no Church. At his returne from Thermum, the Ætolians laid for him: which that they would doe, hee beleeued before; and therefore was not taken vnawares. Three thousand of them there were that lying in ambush fell vpon his skirts: but hee had laide a Counter-ambush for them of his Illyrians; who staying behind the rest, did set vpon the backes of the Ætolians, whilest they were busily charging in Rere the Armie that went before. So with slaughter of the enemie, he returned the same way that he came: and burning downe those places that he had taken before, as also wasting the Country round about him, Hee safely carried all that hee had gotten aboord his Fleet. Once the Aetolians made countenance of fight, issuing out of Stratus in great brauerie. But they were beaten home faster than they came, and followed to their very gates.

Summer

The ioy of this victorious Expedition being euery way complete, and not deformed (as commonly happens) by any sinister accident; it pleased the King to make a great feast vnto all his friends and Captaines. Thither were inuited among the rest Leontius, with his fellow Megaleas. They came, because they could not choose: but their heauie lookes argued, what little pleasure they tooke in the Kings prosperitie. It grieued them to thinke, that they should bee able to giue no better account vnto Apelles, of their hindering the Kings businesse; since Apelles himselfe, as will be shewed anon, had plaied his owne part with a most mischieuous dexteritie. The sorrow and indignation, which they could ill dissemble in their faces, brake out after supper, when they had warmed themselues with drinke, into open riot. Finding Aratus on the way home to his Tent: they fell to reuiling him, throwing stones at him, so that they caused a great vprore; many running in (as happens in such cases) to take part with the one or the other. The King sending to inquire of the matter, was truly informed of all that had passed. Which made him send for Leontius and his fellowes. But Leontius was gotten out of the way: Megaleas, and another with him, came. The King began to rate them for their disorder; order; and they, to giue him froward anſweres: inſomuch as they ſaid at length, That they would neuer giue ouer, till they had rewarded Aratus with a miſchiefe as hee deſerued. Hereupon the King committed them to ward. Leontius hearing of this, comes boldly to the King, with his Targettiers at his heeles: and with a proud grace demanded, who it was that had dared to lay hands vpon Megaleas, yea and to caſt him into priſon? Why, ſaid the King, It was euen I. This reſolute anſwere, which Leontius had not expected, made him depart both ſad and angrie; ſeeing himſelfe out-frowned, and not knowing how to remedie the matter. Shortly after, Megaleas was called forth to his anſwere, and was charged by Aratus with many great crimes. Among which were, The hinderance of the Kings victorie at Palea, and the Compact made with Apelles: matters no leſſe touching Leontius, that ſtood by as a looker on, than Megaleas that was accuſed. In concluſion, the preſumptions againſt him were ſo ſtrong, and his anſweres thereto ſo weake; that he, and Crinon one of his fellowes, were condemned in twentie Talents: Crinon being remanded backe to priſon; and Leontius becomming Bayle for Megaleas. This was done vpon the way home-ward, as the King was returning to Corinth.

Philip diſpatched well a great deale of buſineſſe this yeere. For as ſoone as he was at Corinth, he tooke in hand an Expedition againſt the Lacademonians. Theſe and the Eleans had done what harme they could in Peloponneſus, whileſt the King was abſent. The Achæans had oppoſed them as well as they could; with ill ſucceſſe: yet ſo, as they hindered them from doing ſuch harme as elſe they would haue done. But when Philip came, hee ouer-ran the Countrie about Lacedæmon: and was in a manner at the gates of Sparta, ere men could well beleeue that he was returned out of Ætolia. He tooke not in this Expedition any Cities, but made great waſte in the fields: and hauing beaten the enemie in ſome skirmiſhes, carried backe with him to Corinth a rich bootie of Cattell, ſlaues, and other Countrie-ſpoile. At Corinth hee found attending him, Embaſſadors from the Rhodians & Chians: that requeſted him to ſet Greece at quiet, by granting peace vnto the Ætolians. They had gracious audience: and he willed them to deale firſt with the Ætolians; who, if they would make the ſame requeſt, ſhould not finde him vnreaſonable. The Ætolians had ſped ill that yeere: neither ſaw they any likely hopes for the yeeres following. The Armie that they had ſent forth to waſt Theſſalie and Macedon, found ſuch oppoſition on the way; that not daring to proceed, it returned home without bringing any thing to effect. In the meane ſeaſon they had beene grieuouſly afflicted, as before is ſhewed, by Philip in the center of their owne Countrie. All Greece and Macedon was vp in armes againſt them, and their weake Allies the Eleans and Lacedæmonians. Neither was it certaine, how long the one or other of theſe their Peloponneſian friends ſhould bee able to hold out; ſince they were not ſtrong enough to keepe the feild, but had alreadie ſuffered thoſe miſeries of war, which by a little continuance would make them glad, each, to ſeeke their owne peace, without regard of their Confederates. Wherefore the Ætolians readily entertained this Negotiation of peace: and taking truce for thirtie dayes with the King, dealt with him by interceſſion of the ſame Embaſſadours, to entreat his preſence at a Diet of their Nation, that ſhould bee held at Rhium; whither if he would vouchſafe to come, they promiſed that hee ſhould finde them conformable to any good reaſon.

Whileſt theſe things were in hand; Leontius and Megaleas thought to haue terrified the King, by raiſing ſedition againſt him in the Armie. But this deuice ſorted to no good effect. The ſouldiours were eaſily and quickly incenſed againſt many of the Kings friends; who were ſaid to be the cauſe, why they were not rewarded with ſo much of the bootie, as they thought to belong of right vnto them. But their anger ſpent it ſelfe in a noiſe, and breaking open of dores; without further harme done. This was enough to informe the king (who eaſily pacified his men with gentle words) that ſome about him were very falſe. Yea the ſouldiours themſelues, repenting of their inſolence, deſired to haue the Authors of the tumult

ſought out, and puniſhed according to their deſerts. The King made ſhew as if he had not cared to make ſuch inquiſition. But Leontius and Megaleas were ſore afraid, leſt the matter would ſoone come out of it ſelfe to their extreme danger. Wherefore they ſent vnto Apelles, the Head and Archetect of their treaſon; requeſting him ſpeedily to repaire to Corinth, where hee might ſtand betweene them and the kings diſpleaſure. Apelles had not all this while beene wanting to the buſineſſe, vndertaken by him and his treacherous companions. He had taken vpon him, as a man that had the Kings heart in his owne hand: and thereby was hee growne into ſuch credit, that all the Kings officers in Macedon and Theſſalie addreſſed themſelues vnto him; and receiued from him their diſpatch in euery buſineſſe. Likewiſe the Greekes in all their flattering Decrees, tooke occaſion to magnifie the vertue of Apelles; making ſlight mention (onely for faſhion ſake) of the king: who ſeemed no better than the Miniſter and Executioner of Apelles his will and pleaſure. Such was the arrogancie of this great man, in ſetting himſelfe out vnto the people: but in mannaging the kings affaires, he made it his ſpeciall care, that monie, and all things needfull for the publicke ſeruice, ſhould be wanting. Yea he enforced the king, for very neede, to ſell his owne Plate and houſhold veſſels: thinking to reſolue theſe and all other difficulties, by onely ſaying, Sir, be ruled wholly by mee, and all ſhall be as you would wiſh. Hereto if the king would giue aſſent; then had this Politician obtained his hearts deſire. Now taking his iournie from Chalcis in the Iſle of Eubœa, to the Citie of Corinth where Philip then lay: hee was fetcht in with great pompe and royaltie, by a great number of the Captaines and ſouldiours; which Leontius and Megaleas drew forth to meete him on the way. So entering the Citie with a goodly traine; he went directly to the Court, and towards the Kings Chamber. But Philip was well aware of his pride; and had vehement ſuſpition of his falſhood. Wherfore one was ſent to tell him, that he ſhould waite a while, or come another time; for the king was not now at leiſure to be ſpoken with. It was a pretie thing, that ſuch a check as this made all his attendants forſake him, as a man in diſgrace; in ſuch ſort that going thence to his lodging, he had none to follow him ſaue his owne Pages. After this, the King vouchſafed him now and then ſome ſlender graces: but in conſultations, or other matters of priuacie, he vſed him not at all. This taught Megaleas to looke vnto himſelfe, and runne away betimes. Hereupon the King ſent forth Taurion his Lieutenant of Peloponneſus, with all the Targettiers, as it were to doe ſome peece of ſeruice, but indeed of purpoſe to apprehend Leontius in the abſence of his followers. Leontius being taken, diſpatched away a meſſenger preſently to his Targettiers, to ſignifie what was befallen him: and they foorthwith ſent vnto the King in his behalfe. They made requeſt, That if any other thing were obiected againſt him, hee might not be called forth to triall before their returne: as for the debt of Megaleas, if that were all the matter, they ſaid that they were readie to make a purſe for his diſcharge. This affection of the ſouldiours, made Philip more haſtie than elſe he would haue beene, to take away the Traitors life. Neither was it long, ere letters of Megaleas were intercepted, which he wrote vnto the Ætolians; vilifying the king with opprobrious wordes; and bidding them not to hearken after peace, but to hold out a while, for that Philip was euen readie to ſinke vnder the burden of his owne pouertie. By this the king vnderſtood more perfectly the falſhood, not onely of Megaleas, but of Apelles; whoſe cunning head had laboured all this while to keepe him ſo poore. Wherefore hee ſent one to purſue Megaleas, that was fled to Thebes. As for Apelles, he committed both him, his ſonne, and another that was inward with him, to priſon; wherein all of them ſhortly ended their liues. Megaleas alſo, neither daring to ſtand to triall, nor knowing whither to flie, was wearie of his owne life; and ſlew himſelfe about the ſame time.

The Ætolians, as they had begun this warre vpon hope of accompliſhing what they liſted in the Nonage of Philip: ſo finding that the vigour of this yong Prince, tempered with the cold aduice of Aratus, wrought very effectually toward their o-

ouerthrow; they grew very deſirous to make an end of it. Neuertheleſſe being a turbulent Nation, and readie to lay hold vpon all aduantages: when they heard what was happened in the Court, the death of Apelles, Leontius, and Magaleus, together with ſome indignation thereupon conceiued by the Kings Targettiers; they began to hope anew, that theſe troubles would be long laſting, and therevpon brake the day appointed for the meeting at Rhium. Of this was Philip nothing ſorie. For being in good hope throughly to tame this vnquiet Nation; He thought it much to concerne his owne honour, that all the blame of the beginning and continuing the warre ſhould reſt vpon themſelues. Wherfore he willed his Confederates, to lay aſide all thought of peace, and to prepare for war againſt the yeere following; wherein hee hoped to bring it to an end. Then gratified he his Macedonian ſouldiors, by yeelding to let them winter in their owne Countrie. In his returne homeward, he called into iudgement one Ptolemie, a companion with Apelles and Leontius in their Treaſons: who was therefore condemned by the Macedonians; and ſuffered death. Theſe were the ſame Macedonians, that lately could not endure to heare of Leontius his impriſonment: yet now they thinke the man worthie to die, that was but his adherent. So vaine is the confidence, on which Rebels vſe to build, in their fauour with the Multitude.

During his abode in Macedon, Philip wan ſome bordering Townes; from which the Dardanians, Ætolians, and other his ill neighbours, were accuſtomed to make rodes into his kingdome: when hee had thus prouided for ſafetie of his owne; the Ætolians might well know what they were to expect. But there came againe Embaſſadours from the Rhodians and Chians, with others from Ptolemie King of Ægypt, and from the Citie of Byzantium, recontinuing the former ſollicitation about the Peace. This faſhion had beene taken vp in matters of Greece, euer ſince the Kings that raigned after Alexander, had taken vpon them to ſet the whole Countrie at libertie: No ſooner was any Prouince or Citie in danger to be oppreſſed, and ſubdued by force of war, but preſently there were found interceſſours, who pitying the effuſion of Greekiſh bloud, would importune the ſtronger to relinquiſh his aduantage. By doing ſuch friendly offices in time of neede, the Princes and States abroad ſought to binde vnto them thoſe people, that were howſoeuer weake in numbers, yet very good ſouldiours. But hereby it came to paſſe, that the more froward ſort, eſpecially the Ætolians, whoſe whole Nation was addicted to falſhood and robberie, durſt enter boldly into quarrels with all their neighbours: being well aſſured, that if they had the worſt, The loue of Greece would be ſufficient to redeeme their quiet. They had, ſince the late Treatie of peace, done what harme they could in Peloponneſus: but being beaten by the Achæans, and ſtanding in feare to bee more ſoundly beaten at home, they deſired now, more earneſtly than before, to make an end of the warre as ſoone as they might. Philip made ſuch anſwere to the Embaſſadours, as he had done the former yeere; That he gaue not occaſion to the beginning of this warre, nor was at the preſent either afraid to continue it, or vnwilling to end it: but that the Ætolians, if they had a deſire to liue in reſt, muſt firſt be dealt withall, to ſignifie plainly their determination, whereto himſelfe would returne ſuch anſwere as he ſhould thinke fit.

Philip had at this time no great liking vnto the Peace, being a yong Prince, and in hope to increaſe the honour which he daily got by the warre. But it happened in the middeſt of this Negotiation, that he was aduertiſed by letters out of Macedon, what a notable victorie Hannibal had obtained againſt the Romans in the batttaile at Thraſymene. Theſe letters he communicated vnto Demetrius Pharius: who greatly encouraged him to take part with Hannibal: and not to ſit ſtill, as an idle beholder of the Italian warre. Hereby he grew more inclinable than before vnto Peace with the Ætolians: which was concluded ſhortly in a meeting at Naupactus. There did Agelaus an Ætolian make a great Oration: telling, how happie it was for the Greekes, that they might at their owne pleaſure diſpute about finiſhing war betweene themſelues, selues, without being molested by the Barbarians. For which once either the Romans, or the Carthaginians, had subdued one the other; it was not to bee doubted, that they would forthwith looke Eastward, and seeke by all meanes to set footing in Greece. For this cause he said it were good, that their Countrie should be at peace within it selfe: and that Philip, if he were desirous of war, should lay hold on the opportunitie; now fitly seruing, to enlarge his dominion, by winning somewhat in Italie. Such aduice could the Ætolians then giue, when they stood in feare of danger threatning them at hand: but being soone after wearie of rest, as accustomed to enrich themselues by pillage, they were so farre from obseruing and following their owne good counsel, that they inuited the Romans into Greece, whereby they brought themselues and the whole Countrie, (but themselues before any other part of the Countrie) vnder seruitude of strangers. The Condition of this Peace was simple, That euery one should keepe what they held at the present, without making restitution, or any amends for damages past.

§. III.

PHILIP, at the perswasion of DEMETRIVS PHARIVS, enters into League with HANNIBAL, against the Romans. The Tenour of the League betweene HANNIBAL and PHILIP.

THis being agreed vpon: the Greekes betooke themselues to quiet courses of life; and Philip, to prepare for the businesse of Italie, about which hee consulted with Demetrius Pharius. And thus passed the time away, till the great battaile of Canna: after which hee ioyned in League with Hannibal, as hath beene shewed before. Demetrius Pharius bore great malice vnto the Romans; and knew no other way to bee auenged vpon them, or to recouer his owne lost Kingdome, than by procuring the Macedonian, that was in a manner wholly guided by his counsaile, to take part with their enemies. It had otherwise beene farre more expedient for Philip, to haue supported the weaker of these two great Cities against the more mightie. For by so doing, hee should perhaps haue brought them to peace vpon some equall termes; and thereby, as did Hiero a farre weaker Prince, haue both secured his owne Estate, and caused each of them to be desirous of chiefe place in his friendship. The issue of the counsaile which he followed, will appeare soone after this. His first quarrell with the Romans; the trouble which they and the Ætolians did put him to in Greece; and the Peace which they made with him for a time, vpon Conditions that might easily be broken: haue beene related in another place as belonging vnto the second Punick warre. Wherefore I will onely here set downe the tenour of the League betweene Him and Carthage: which may seeme not vnworthie to be read, if onely in regard of the forme it selfe then vsed; though it had beene ouer-long to haue beene inserted into a more busie peece.

THE OATH AND COVENANTS BETWEENE HANNIBAL, GENERALL OF THE CARTHAGINIANS; and XENOPHANES, Embassador of PHILIP King of Macedon.

THIS is the League ratified by oath, which HANNIBAL the Generall, and with him MAGO, MYRCAL, and BARMOCAL, as also the Senatours of Carthage that are present, and all the Carthaginians that are in his Armie, haue made with XENOPHANES the sonne of CLEOMACHVS Athenian, whom King PHILIP the sonne of DEMETRIVS hath sent vnto vs, for himselfe and the Macedonians, and his Associates: Before Iupiter, and Iuno, and Apollo: before † The god of the Carthaginians, Hercules, and Iolaus, † Dæmon. before Mars, Triton, Neptune: before The Gods accompanying Armes, the Sun, the Moone, and the Earth; before Riuers, and Meddowes, and Waters; before all the Gods that haue power ouer Carthage; before all the Gods, that rule ouer Macedon, and the rest of Greece; before all the Gods, that are Presidents of War, and present at the making of this League. HANNIBAL the Generall hath said, and all the Senatours that are with him, and all the Carthaginians in his Armie: Be it agreed betweene You and Vs, that this Oath stand for friendship and louing affection, that Wee become friends, familiar, and brethren, Vpon Couenant, that the safetie of the Lords the Carthaginians, and of HANNIBAL the Generall and those that are with him, and of the Rulers of Prouinces of the Carthaginians vsing the same Lawes, and of the Vticans, and as many Cities and Nations as obey the Carthaginians, and of the Souldiors and Associates, and of all Townes and Nations with which We hold friendship in Italie, Gaule, and Liguria, and with whom We shall hold friend- ſhip or make Alliance hereafter in this Region; be preſerued by King PHILIP and the Macedonians, and ſuch of the Greekes as are their Aſſociates. In like manner ſhall King PHILIP and the Macedonians, and other the Greekes his Aſſociates, bee ſaued and preſerued by the Carthaginian Armies, and by the Uticans, and by all Cities and Nations that obey the Carthaginians, and by their Aſſociates and Souldiers, and by all Nations and Cities in Italie, Gaule and Liguria, that are of our Alliance, or ſhall hereafter ioyne with Vs in Italie. VVee ſhall not take counſaile one againſt the other, nor deale fraudulently one with the other. Withall readineſſe and good will, without deceit or ſubtiltie, We ſhall be enemies vnto the enemies of the Carthaginians, excepting thoſe Kings, Townes, and Hauens, with which We haue alreadie league and friendſhip. Wee alſo ſhall be enemies to the enemies of King PHILIP, excepting thoſe Kings, Cities, and Nations, with which VVee haue alreadie league and friendſhip. The war that VVe haue with the Romans, haue Ye alſo with them, vntill the Gods ſhall giue vs a new and happie end. Ye ſhall aide Vs with thoſe things whereof VVee haue neede, and ſhall doe according to the Couenants betweene Vs. But if the Gods ſhall not giue vnto You and Vs their helpe in this warre againſt the Romans and their Aſſociates; then if the Romans offer friendſhip, VVe ſhall make friendſhip in ſuch wiſe that Ye ſhall be partakers of the ſame friendſhip, With Condition, That they ſhall not haue power to make war vpon you: Neither ſhall the Romans bee Lords ouer the Corcyræans, nor ouer thoſe of Apollonia, nor Dyrrachium, nor ouer Pharus, nor Dimalle, nor the Parthini, nor Atintania. They ſhall alſo render vnto DEMETRIVS PHARIVS all thoſe that belong vnto him, as many as are within the Romans Dominions. But if the Romans (after ſuch peace made) ſhall make war vpon Ye or Vs; We will ſuccour one another in that warre, as either ſhall haue neede. The ſame ſhall be obſerued in warre made by any other, excepting thoſe Kings, Kings, Cities, and States, with whom Wee hold alreadie league and friendſhip. To this League if VVe or Ye ſhall thinke fit to adde or detract, ſuch addition or detraction ſhall be made by our common conſent.

§. IIII.

How PHILIP yeelded to his naturall vices being therein ſoothed by DEMETRIVS PHARIVS. His deſire to tyrannize vpon the free States his Aſſociates: With the troubles, into which hee thereby fell, whileſt he bore a part in the ſecond Puniske warre. He poiſoneth ARATVS: and growes hatefull to the Achæans.

HItherto Philip had carried himſelfe as a vertuous Prince. And though with more commendation of his wiſdome, he might haue offered his friendſhip to the Romans, that were like to be oppreſſed, than to the Carthaginians who had the better hand: yet this his meddling in the Punicke warre, proceeded from a royall greatneſſe of minde, with a deſire to ſecure and increaſe his owne eſtate, adding therewithall reputation to his Countrie. But in this buſineſſe he was guided (as hath beene ſaid) by Demetrius Pharius: who, looking throughly into his nature, did accommodate himſelfe to his deſires: and thereby ſhortly gouerned him, euen as he lifted. For the vertues of Philip were not indeed ſuch as they ſeemed. He was luſtfull, bloudie, and tyrannicall: deſirous of power to doe what hee lifted, and not otherwiſe lifting to doe what hee ought, than ſo farre foorth, as by making a faire ſhew he might breede in men ſuch a good opinion of him, as ſhould helpe to ſerue his turne in all that hee tooke in hand. Before he ſhould buſie himſelfe in Italie, hee thought it requiſite in good policie, to bring the Greekes that were his Aſſociates vnder a more abſolute forme of ſubiection. Hereunto Apelles had aduiſed him before: and hee had liked reaſonably well of the courſe. But Apelles was a boiſterous Counſellor, and one that referring all to his owne glory, thought himſelfe deepely wronged if he might not wholy haue his owne way, but were driuen to await the Kings opportunitie at better times. Demetrius Pharius could well be contented to obſerue the Kings humours: and guided, like a Coach-man with the reines in his hand, thoſe affections which himſelfe did onely ſeeme to follow. Therefore hee grew daily more and more in credit: ſo as, without any manner of contention, hee ſupplanted Aratus: which the violence of Apelles could neuer doe.

There aroſe about theſe times a very hote Faction among the Meſſenians, betweene the Nobilitie and Commons: their vehement thoughts being rather diuerted (as happens often after a forrein warre) vnto domeſticall obiects: than allayed and reduced vnto a more quiet temper. In proceſſe of no long time, the contention among them grew ſo violent, that Philip was entreated to compound the differences. Hee was glad of this: reſoluing ſo to end the matter, that they ſhould not hencefoorth ſtriue any more about their Gouernment: for that he would aſſume it wholly to himſelfe. At his comming thither, hee found Aratus buſie among them to make all friends, after a better manner than agreed with his owne ſecret purpoſe. Wherfore he conſulted not with this reuerend old man: but talked in priuate with ſuch of the Meſſenians as repaired vnto him. He asked the Gouernours, what they meant to ſtand thus diſputing: and whether they had not Lawes, to bridle the inſolence of the vnruly Rabble: Contrariwiſe, in talking with the heades of the popular pular Faction, He said it was strange, that they being so many, would suffer themselues to be oppress'd by a few; as if they had not hands to defend themselues from Tyrants. Thus whilest each of them presumed on the Kings assistance; they thought it best to goe roundly to worke, ere he were gone that should countenance their doings. The Gouernours therefore would haue apprehended some seditious Oratours, that were, they said, the stirrers vp of the multitude vnto sedition. Vpon this occasion the People tooke Armes: and running vpon the Nobilitie and Magistrates, killed of them in a rage almost two hundred. Philip thought, it seemes, that it would be easie to worrie the sheepe, when the Dogges their guardians were slaine. But his falshood and double dealing was immediatly found out. Neyther did the yonger Aratus forbeare, to tell him of it in publike, with very bitter and disgracefull words. The King was angrie at this. But hauing alreadie done more than was commendable, or excusable: and yet further intending to take other things in hand wherein hee should neede the helpe and countenance of his best friends; Hee was content to smother his displeasure, and make as faire weather as he could. Hee led old Aratus aside by the hand; and went vp into the Castle of Ithome, that was ouer Messene. There he pretended to doe sacrifice: and sacrifice he did. But it was his purpose to keepe the place to his owne vse; for that it was of notable strength, and would serue to command the further parts of Peloponnesus, as the Citadell of Corinth, which hee had alreadie, commaunded the entrance into that Countrie. Whilest hee was therefore sacrificing, and had the entrailes of the beast deliuered into his hands, as was the manner; He shewed them to Aratus, and gently asked him, whether the tokens that he saw therein did signifie, That being now in possession of this place, hee should quietly goe out of it, or rather keepe it to himselfe. He thought perhaps, that the old man would haue soothed him a little; were it onely for desire to make amends, for the angrie words newly spoken by his sonne. But as Aratus stood doubtfull what to answere, Demetrius Pharius gaue this verdict: If thou bee a Southsayer, thou maist goe thy wayes, and let slippe this good aduantage; If thou be a King, thou must not neglect the oportunitie, but hold the Oxe by both his hornes. Thus he spake, resembling Ithome and Acrocorinthus vnto the two hornes of Peloponnesus. Yet would Philip needes heare the opinion of Aratus: who told him plainly, That it were well done to keepe the place, if it might be kept without breach of his faith vnto the Messenians: But if, by seizing vpon Ithome, Hee must lose all the other Castles that hee held, and especially the strongest Castle of all that was left vnto him by Antigonus, which was his credit; then were it farre better to depart with his souldiers, and keepe men in dutie, as hee had done hitherto, by their owne good wils, than by fortifying any strong places against them, to make them of his friends become his Enemies.

To this good aduice Philip yeelded at the present: but not without some dislike, thencefoorth growing betweene Him and the Arati; whom he thought more froward than beseemed them, in contradicting his will. Neyther was the old man desirous at all, to deale any longer in the Kings affaires, or be inward with him. For as he plainly discouered his Tyrannous purposes: so likewise he perceiued, that in resorting to his house, He had beene dishoneſt with his sonnes wife. Hee therefore staid at home: where at good leisure he might repent, that in despight of Cleomenes, his owne Countriman, and a temperate Prince, he had brought the Macedonians into Peloponnesus.

Philip made a Voyage out of Peloponnesus into Epirus, wherein Aratus refused to beare him companie. In this journie He found by experience what Aratus had lately told him; That vnhoneſt counsailes are not so profitable in deed, as in appearance. The Epirots were his followers and dependants; and so they purposed to continue. But He would needes haue them so to remaine, whether they purposed it or not. Wherefore to make them the more obnoxious vnto his will, Hee seized vpon their Towne of Oricum, and laid siege to Apollonia; hauing no good colour of

theſe doings: but thinking himſelfe ſtrong enough to doe what hee liſted, and not ſeeing whence they ſhould procure friends to helpe them. Thus in ſtead of ſettling the country, as his intended Voyage into Italie required: He kindled a fire in it which he could neuer quench; vntill it had laid hold on his owne Palace. Whileſt he was thus labouring to bind the hands that ſhould haue fought for him in Italie: M. Valerius the Roman came into thoſe parts; who not onely maintained the Epirots againſt him, but procured the Ætolians to breake the Peace, which they had lately made with him.

Thus began that warre; the occurrents whereof wee haue related before, in place whereto it belonged. In mannaging whereof though Philip did the offices of a good Captaine: yet when leiſure ſerued, He made it apparant that he was a vicious King. He had not quite left his former deſire, of oppreſſing the libertie of the Meſſenians; but made another journie into their Countrie, with hope to deceiue them, as before. They vnderſtood him better now than before; and therefore were not haſtie to truſt him too farre. When he ſaw that his cunning would not ſerue, Hee went to worke by force; and calling them his Enemies, inuaded them with open warre. But in that warre hee could doe little good; perhaps, becauſe none of his Confederates were deſirous to helpe him in ſuch an enterpriſe. In this attempt vpon Meſſene he loſt Demetrius Pharius; that was his Counſailor, and Flatterer, not his peruerter; as appeares by his growing daily more naught in following times. The worſe that he ſped, the more angrie he waxed againſt thoſe, that ſeemed not to fauour his iniurious doings. Wherefore by the Miniſterie of Taurion, his Lieutenant, he poyſoned old Aratus; and ſhortly after that, hee poyſoned alſo the yonger Aratus: hoping that theſe things would neuer haue beene knowne, becauſe they were done ſecretly, and the poyſons themſelues were more ſure, than manifeſt in operation. The Sicyonians, and all the people of Achaia, decreed vnto Aratus more than humane honours, as Sacrifices, Hymnes, and Proceſſions, to bee celebrated euery yeere twice, with a Prieſt ordained vnto him for that purpoſe; as was accuſtomed vnto the Heroes, or men, whom they thought to bee tranſlated into the number of the gods. Hereunto they are ſaid to haue beene encouraged by an Oracle of Apollo: which is like enough to haue beene true; ſince the helpe of the Deuill is neuer failing to the increaſe of Idolatrie. chap. 3. §. 12.

The louing memorie of Aratus their Patron, and ſingular Benefactor, could not but worke in the Achæans a marueilous diſlike, of that wicked King which had made him thus away. He ſhall therefore heare of this hereafter, when they better dare to take counſaile for themſelues. At the preſent, the murder was not generally knowne or beleeued: neither were they in caſe to ſubſiſt, without his help that had cõmitted it. The Ætolians were a moſt outragious people, great darers, and ſhameleſſe robbers. With theſe the Romans had made a League: whereof the Conditions were ſoone diuulged, eſpecially that maine point, concerning the diuiſion of the purchaſe which they ſhould make; namely, That the Ætolians ſhould haue the country and townes; but the Romans the ſpoile, and carrie away the people to ſell for ſlaues. The Achæans, who in times of greater quiet could not endure to make ſtreight alliance with the Ætolians, as knowing their vnciuill diſpoſition; were much the more auerſe from them, when they perceiued how they had called in the Barbarians (for ſuch did the Grèekes account all other Nations except their owne) to make hauocke of the Country. The ſame conſideration moued alſo the Lacedæmonians, to ſtand off awhile, before they would declare themſelues for the Ætolians; whoſe friendſhip they had embraced in the late warre. The induſtrie therefore of Philip, and the great care which he ſeemed to take of the Achæans his Confederates, ſufficed to retaine them: eſpecially at ſuch time, as their owne neceſſitie was thereto concurrent. More particularly he obliged vnto himſelfe the Dymæans, by an ineſtimable benefit: recouering their Towne, after it had beene taken by the Romans and Ætolians; and redeeming their people whereſoeuer they might bee found, that had beene carried away

Captiue, and ſold abroad for ſlaues. Thus might he haue blotted out the memorie of offences paſt; if the malignitie of his naturall condition had not otherwhiles broken out, and giuen men to vnderſtand; that it was the Time, and not his Vertue, which cauſed him to make ſuch a ſhew of goodneſſe. Among other foule acts, whereof he was not aſhamed; He tooke Polycratia the wife of the yonger Aratus, and carried her into Macedon: little regarding how this might ſerue to confirme in the people their opinion, that he was guiltie of the old mans death. But of ſuch faults he ſhall be told, when the Romans make warre vpon him the ſecond time: for of that which happened in this their firſt Inuaſion, I holde it ſuperfluous to make repetition.

§. V.

Of PHILOPŒMEN Generall of the Achæans: and MACHANIDAS, Tyrant of Lacedæmon. A battaile betweene them, wherein MACHANIDAS is ſlaine.

IT happens often, that the deceaſe of one eminent man diſcouers the vertue of another. In the place of Aratus there ſtood vp Philopœmen: whoſe notable valour, and great skill in Armes, made the Nation of the Achæans redoubtable among all the Greekes, and careleſſe of ſuch protection, as in former times they had needed againſt the violence of their neighbours. This is that Philopœmen: who being then a yong man, and hauing no command; did eſpeciall ſeruice to Antigonus at the battaile of Sellaſia againſt Cleomenes. Thence-forward vntill now he had ſpent the moſt part of his time in the Ile of Crete: the Inhabitants whereof being a valiant people, and ſeldome or neuer at peace betweene themſelues; He bettered among them his knowledge, and practice in the Art of warre. At his returne home, Hee had charge of the Horſe: wherein he carried himſelfe ſo ſtrictly, trauailing with all the Cities of the Confederacie to haue his followers well mounted, and armed at all pieces: as alſo he ſo diligently trained them vp in all exerciſe of ſeruice, that hee made the Achæans very ſtrong in that part of their forces. Being after choſen Prætor or Generall of the Nation, Hee had no leſſe care to reforme their militarie diſcipline throughout, whereby his Countrie might be ſtrong enough to defend it ſelfe, and not any longer (as in former times) need to depend vpon the helpe of others. Hee perſwaded the Achæans to cut off their vaine expence of brauerie, in apparrell, houſholdſtuffe, and curious fare, and to beſtow that coſt vpon their Armes: wherein by how much they were the more gallant, by ſo much were they like to proue the better Souldiours; and ſuteable in behauiour, vnto the pride of their furniture. They had ſerued hitherto with little light Bucklers, and ſlender Darts, to caſt afarre off: that were vſefull in skirmiſhing at ſome diſtance, or for Surpriſes, or ſudden and haſtie Expeditions; whereto Aratus had beene moſt accuſtomed. But when they came to handie ſtrokes, they were good for nothing: ſo as they were wholly driuen to relie vpon the courage of their Mercinaries. Philopœmen altered this: cauſing them to arme themſelues more weightily, to vſe a larger kind of ſhield, with good ſwords, and ſtrong pikes, fit for ſeruice at hand. He taught them alſo to fight in cloſe order; and altered the forme of their embattailing: not making the Files ſo deepe as had beene accuſtomed, but extending the Front, that he might vſe the ſeruice of many hands.

Eight Moneths were ſpent of that yeere, in which hee firſt was Prætor of the Achæans; when Machanidas the Tyrant of Lacedæmon cauſed him to make triall, how his Souldiers had profited by his diſcipline. This Machanidas was the ſucceſſor vnto Lycurgus; a man more violent than his fore-goer. He kept in pay a ſtrong Armie of Mercinaries: and he kept them not onely to fight for Sparta; but to hold the the Citie in obedience to himſelfe perforce. Wherefore it behoued him not to take part with the Achæans, that were fauourers of libertie; but to ſtrengthen himſelfe by friendſhip of the Ætolians: who, in making Alliances, tooke no further notice of Vice or Vertue, than as it had reference to their owne profit. The people alſo of Lacedæmon, through their inueterate hatred vnto the Argiues, Achæans, and Macedonians; were in like ſort (all or moſt of them) inclinable to the Ætolian Faction. Very vnwiſely. For in ſeeking to take reuenge vpon thoſe, that had lately hindered them from getting the Lordſhip of Peloponneſus; they hindred themſelues thereby from recouering the Maſtrie of their owne Citie. This affection of the Spartans, together with the regard of his owne ſecuritie, and no ſmall hope of good that would follow, ſuffered not Machanidas to be idle; but made him alwayes ready to fall vpon his neighbours backes, and take of theirs what he could, whileſt they were enforced, by greater neceſſitie, to turne face another way. Thus had hee often done, eſpecially in the abſence of Philip: whoſe ſudden comming into thoſe parts, or ſome other oppoſition made againſt him, had vſually made him faile of his attempts. At the preſent He was ſtronger in men, than were the Achæans; and thought his owne men better Souldiours than were theirs.

Whileſt Philip therefore was buſied elſe-where, hee entred the Countrie of the Mantinæans: being not without hope to doe as Cleomenes had done before him; yea and perhaps to get the * Lordſhip of Peloponneſus, as hauing ſtronger friendes, and weaker oppoſition, than Cleomenes had found. But Philopœmen was readie to entertaine him at Mantinæa; where was fought betweene them a great battaile. The Tyrant had brought into the fielde vpon Cartes a great many of Engines; wherewith to beate vpon the Squadrons of his Enemies, and put them in diſorder. To preuent this danger, Philopœmen ſent foorth his light armature a good way before him; ſo as Machanidas was faine to doe the like. To ſecond theſe, from the one and the other ſide came in continuall ſupplie; till at length all the Mercinaries, both of the Achæans and of Machanidas, were drawne vp to the fight: being ſo far aduanced, each before their owne Phalanx, that it could no otherwiſe be diſcerned which preſſed forward, or which recoyled, than by riſing of the duſt. Thus were Machanidas his Engines made vnſeruiceable, by the interpoſition of his owne men; in ſuch manner as the Canon is hindered from doing execution, in moſt of the battailes fought in theſe our times. The Mercinaries of the Tyrant preuailed at length: not onely by their aduantage of number, but (as Polybius well obſerueth) by ſurmounting their oppoſites in degree of courage; wherein vſually the hired ſouldiers of Tyrants exceed thoſe that are waged by free States. For as it is true, that a free people are much more valiant, than they which liue oppreſſed by Tyrannie, ſince the one, by doing their beſt in fight, haue hope to acquire ſomewhat beneficiall to themſelues, whereas the other doe fight (as it were) to aſſure their owne ſeruitude: ſo the Mercinaries of a Tyrant, being made partakers with him in the fruites of his proſperitie, haue good cauſe to maintaine his quarrell as their owne; whereas they that ſerue vnder a free State, haue no other motiue to doe manfully, than their bare ſtipend. Further than this, When a free State hath gotten the Victorie: many Companies (if not all) of forrein Auxiliaries are preſently caſt; and therefore ſuch good fellowes will not take much paines to bring the warre to an end. But the victorie of a Tyrant, makes him ſtand in neede of more ſuch helpers: becauſe that after it he doth wrong to more, as hauing more ſubjects; and therefore ſtands in feare of more, that ſhould ſeeke to take reuenge vpon him. The ſtipendaries therefore of the Achæans, being forced to giue ground, were vrged ſo violently in their retrait by thoſe of Machanidas, that ſhortly they betooke themſelues to flight; and could not bee ſtaid by any perſwaſions of Philopœmen, but ranne away quite beyond the battaile of the Achæans. This diſaſter had beene ſufficient to take from Philopœmen the honour of the day; had hee not wiſely obſerued the demeanour of Machanidas, and found in him that errour which might reſtore restore the victorie. The Tyrant with his Mercinaries gaue chace vnto those that fled: leauing behind him in good order of battaile his Lacedæmonians; whom hee thought sufficient to deale with the Achæans, that were alreadie disheartned by the flight of their companions. But when this his rashnesse had carried him out of sight; Philopœmen aduanced towards the Lacedæmonians that stood before him. There lay betweene them athwart the Country a long ditch, without water at that time; and therefore passable (as it seemed) without much difficultie, especially for Foot. The Lacedæmonians aduentured ouer it, as thinking themselues better souldiers than the Achæans; who had in a manner alreadie lost the day. But hereby they greatly disordered their owne Battaile; and had no sooner the foremost of them recouered the further banke, than they were stoutly charged by the Achæans, who draue them headlong into the ditch againe. Their first rankes being broken, all the rest began to shrinke: so as Philopœmen getting ouer the ditch, easily chaced them out of the Field. Philopœmen knew better how to vse his aduantage, than Machanidas had done. Hee suffered not all his Armie to disband and follow the chace: but retained with him a sufficient strength, for the custodie of a bridge that was ouer the ditch, by which he knew that the Tyrant must come backe. The Tyrant with his Mercinaries returning from the chace, looked very heauily when he saw what was fallen out. Yet with a lustie Troupe of Horse about him Hee made towards the bridge: hoping to find the Achæans in disorder; and to set vpon their backes, as they were carelessely pursuing their Victorie. But when he and his Companie saw Philopœmen ready to make good the bridge against them; then beganne euerie one to looke, which way he might shift for himselfe. The Tyrant, with no more than two in his companie, rode along the ditch side; and searched for an easie passage ouer. He was easily discouered by his purple Cassocke, and the costly trappings of his Horse. Philopœmen therefore leauing the charge of the bridge vnto another, coasted him all the way as he rode; and falling vpon him at length in the ditch it selfe, as he was getting ouer it, slew him there with his owne hand. There died in this Battaile on the Lacedæmonians side about foure thousand: and more than foure thousand were taken Prisoners. Of the Achæan Mercinaries, probable it is that the losse was not greatly cared for; since that War was at an end, and for their monie they might hire more when they should haue need.

§. VI.

PHILIP hauing peace with Rome, and with all Greece, prepares against Asia. Of the Kings of Pergamus, Cappadocia, Pontus, Paphlagona, Bithynia; and their Linages. Of the Galatians.

BY this victorie the Achæans learned to thinke well of themselues. Neither needed they indeed after awhile (such was their discipline, and continuall exercise) to account themselues in matter of war inferiour to any, that should haue brought against them no great oddes of number. As for the Macedonian, He made no great vse of them: But when he had once concluded peace with the Romans and Ætolians, He studied how to enlarge his Dominion Eastward; since the fortune of his friends the Carthaginians declined in the West. He tooke in hand many matters together, or very neerely together, and some of them not honest: wherein if the Achæans would haue done him seruice; they must, by helping him to oppresse others that neuer had wronged him, haue taught him the way how to deale with themselues. He greatly hated Attalus King of Pergamus, who had joyned with the Romans and Ætolians in warre against him.

This

This Attalus, though a King, was ſcarce yet a Noble-man, otherwiſe than as he was ennobled by his owne, and by his Fathers vertue. His fortune beganne in Philetærus his Vncle: who being guelded, by reaſon of a miſhap which hee had when he was a child, grew afterwards thereby to bee the more eſteemed: as great men in thoſe times repoſed much confidence in Eunuches, whoſe affections could not be obliged vnto wiues or children. He was entertained into the familie of Docimus, a Captaine following Antigonus the firſt; and after the death of Antigonus, he accompanied his Maſter, that betooke himſelfe to Lyſimachus King of Thrace. Lyſimachus had good opinion of him; and put him in truſt with his monie and accompts. But when at length hee ſtood in feare of this King, that grew a bloudie Tyrant: Hee fled into Aſia, where he ſeized vpon the Towne of Pergamus, and nine thouſand talents belonging to Lyſimachus. The towne and monie, together with his owne ſeruice, He offered vnto Seleucus the firſt, that then was readie to giue Lyſimachus battel. His offer was kindly accepted, but neuer performed; for that Seleucus hauing ſlaine Lyſimachus, died ſhortly after himſelfe, before he made vſe of Philetærus or his monie. So this Eunuch ſtill retained Pergamus with the Countrie about it; and reigned therein twentie yeeres as an abſolute King. Hee had two brethren: of which the elder is ſaid to haue been a poore Carter; and the yonger perhaps was not much better; before ſuch time as they were raiſed by the fortune of this Eunuch. Philetærus left his Kingdome to the elder of theſe, or to the ſonne of the elder called Eumenes. This Eumenes enlarged his kingdome; making his aduantage of the diſſenſion, betweene Seleucus Calinicus and Antiochus Hierax, the ſonnes of the ſecond Antiochus. He fought a battaile with Hierax, neere vnto Sardes; and wan the victorie. At which time, to animate his men againſt the Gaules that ſerued vnder his Enemie, he vſed a pretie deuice. He wrote the word * VICTORIE vpon the hand of his Soothſayer, in ſuch colours as would eaſily come off: and when the hote liuer of the beaſt that was ſacrificed, had cleanly taken the print of the letters, He publiſhed this vnto his Armie as a Miracle, plainely fore-ſhewing that the gods would bee aſſiſtant in that Battaile.

* Iul. Front. Strat. L. 1. C. 11.

After this victorie, he grew a dreadfull enemie to Seleucus: who neuer durſt attempt to recouer from him, by warre, the Territorie that hee had gotten and held. Finally, when hee had reigned two and twentie yeeres, hee died by a ſurfet of ouermuch drinke; and left his Kingdome to Attalus, of whom wee now entreat, that was ſonne vnto Attalus the yongeſt brother of Philetærus. Attalus was an vndertaking Prince, very bountifull, and no leſſe valiant. By his owne proper forces He reſtored his friend Ariarathes the Cappadocian into his Kingdome, whence he had been expelled. He was grieuouſly moleſted by Achæus: who ſetting vp himſelfe as King againſt Antiochus the great, reigned in the leſſer Aſia. He was beſieged in his owne Citie of Pergamus: but by helpe of the Tectoſagæ, a Nation of the Gaules, whom hee called ouer out of Thrace, He recouered all that he had loſt. When theſe Gaules had once gotten footing in Aſia, they neuer wanted employment: but were either entertained by ſome of the Princes reigning in thoſe quarters; or interpoſed themſelues, without inuitation, and found themſelues worke in quarrels of their owne making. They cauſed Pruſias King of Bithynia to ceaſe from his warre againſt Byzantium. Whereunto when hee had condeſcended; they neuertheleſſe within a while after inuaded his Kingdome. Hee obtained againſt them a great victorie; and vſed it with great crueltie, ſparing neither age nor ſexe. But the ſwarme of them increaſing; they occupied the Region about Helleſpont: where, in ſeating themſelues, they were much beholding vnto Attalus. Neuertheleſſe, preſuming afterwards vpon their ſtrength; they forced their neighbour Princes and Cities to pay them tribute. In the ſharpe exaction whereof, they had no more reſpect vnto Attalus than to any that had worſe deſerued of them. By this they compelled him to fight againſt them: and Hee being victorious, compelled them to containe themſelues within the bounds of that Prouince, which tooke name from them in time following, ing, and was called Galatia. Yet continued they still to oppresse the weakest of their neighbours; and to fill vp the Armies of those, that could best hire them.

The Kings reigning in those parts, were the posteritie of such, as had saued themselues and their Prouinces, in the slothful reigne of the Persians; or in the busie times of Alexander, and his Macedonian followers. The Cappadocians were verie ancient. For the first of their line had married with Atossa, sister vnto the great King Cyrus. Their Countrie was taken from them by Perdiccas, as is shewed before. But the son of that King, whom Perdiccas crucified, espying his time while the Macedonians were at ciuill warres among themselues; recouered his dominion, and passed it ouer to his off-spring. The Kings of Pontus had also their beginning from the Persian Empire; and are said to haue issued from the royall house of Achæmenes. The Paphlagonians deriued themselues from Pylæmenes, a King that assisted Priamus at the warre of Troy. These, applying themselues vnto the times, were alwayes conformable vnto the strongest. The Ancestors of Prusias had begun to reigne in Bithynia, some few generations before that of the great Alexander. They lay somewhat out of the Macedonians way: by whom therfore, hauing other employment, they were the lesse molested. Calantus, one of Alexanders Captaines, made an Expedition into their Countrie; where hee was vanquished. They had afterwards to doe with a Lieutenant of Antigonus, that made them somewhat more humble. And thus they shuffled, as did the rest, vntill the reigne of Prusias, whom wee haue alreadie sometimes mentioned.

§. VII.

The Towne of Cios taken by PHILIP, at the instance of PRVSIAS King of Bithynia, and cruelly destroyed. By this and like actions, PHILIP growes hatefull to many of the Greekes: and is warred vpon by ATTALVS King of Pergamus, and by the Rhodians.

PRVSIAS as a neighbour King, had many quarrels with Attalus; whose greatnesse he suspected. He therefore strengthned himselfe, by taking to wife the daughter of Philip; as Attalus, on the contrarie side, entred into a strict Confederacie with the Ætolians, Rhodians, and other of the Greekes. But when Philip had ended his Ætolian warre, and was deuising with Antiochus about sharing betweene them two the Kingdome of Egypt, wherein Ptolomie Philopater a friend vnto them both was newly dead, and had left his sonne Ptol. Epiphanes a yong child his heire; the Bithynian entreated this his Father-in-law to come ouer into Asia, there to winne the Towne of the Ciani, and bestow it vpon him. Prusias had no right vnto the Towne, nor iust matter of quarrell against it: but it was fitly seated for him; and therewithall rich. Philip came; as one that could not well denie to helpe his Sonne-in-law. But hereby hee mightily offended no small part of Greece. Embassadours came to him whilest hee lay at the siege, from the Rhodians, and diuers other States: entreating him to forsake the Enterprise. He gaue dilatorie, but otherwise gentle answeres: making shew as if he would condiscend to their request; when he intended nothing lesse. At length hee got the Towne: where, euen in presence of the Embassadours, of whose sollicitation he had seemed so regardfull, Hee omitted no part of crueltie. Hereby hee rendred himselfe odious to his neighbours, as a perfidious and cruell Prince. Especially his Fact was detested of the Rhodians: who had made vehement intercession for the poore Ciani; and were aduertised by Embassadours of purpose sent vnto them from Philip, That, howsoeuer it were in his power to winne the Towne as soone as he listed: yet in regard of his loue to the Rhodians, Hee was contented to giue giue it ouer. And by this his clemencie the Embaſſadours ſaid, that he would manifeſt vnto the World, what ſlanderous tongues they were; which noyſed abroad ſuch reports, as went of his falſhood and oppreſſions. Whileſt the Embaſſadours were declaming at Rhodes in the Theater to this effect; there came ſome that made a true relation of what had hapned: ſhewing that Philip had ſacked and deſtroyed the Towne of Cios, and, after a cruell ſlaughter of the Inhabitants, had made ſlaues of all that eſcaped the ſword. If the Rhodians tooke this in great deſpight, no leſſe were the Ætolians inflamed againſt him: ſince they had ſent a Captaine to take charge of the Towne; being warned before by his doings at Lyſimachia and Chalcedon (which he had withdrawne from their Confederacie to his owne) what little truſt was to be repoſed in the faith of this King. But moſt of all others was Attalus moued, with conſideration of the Macedonians violent ambition, and of his owne eſtate. He had much to loſe; and was not without hope of getting much, if he could make a ſtrong Partie in Greece. He had alreadie, as a new King, followed the example of Alexanders Captaines, in purchaſing with much liberalitie the loue of the Athenians; which were notable Trumpetters of other mens vertue, hauing loſt their owne. On the friendſhip of the Ætolians he had cauſe to preſume; hauing bound them vnto him by good offices, many and great, in their late warre with Philip. The Rhodians that were mightie at Sea, and held very good intelligence with the Ægyptians, Syrians, and many other Princes and States, Hee eaſily drew into a ſtreight Alliance with him; by their hatred newly conceiued againſt Philip.

Vpon confidence in theſe his friends, but moſt of all in the readie aſſiſtance of the Rhodians, Attalus prepared to deale with the Macedonian by open warre. It had been vnſeaſonable to procraſtinate, and expect whereto the doings of the Enemie tended; ſince his deſire to faſten vpon Aſia was manifeſt, and his falſhood no leſſe manifeſt, than was ſuch his deſire. They met with him ſhortly not farre from Chios, and fought with him a battaile at Sea: wherin though Attalus was driuen to runne his owne ſhip on ground, hardly eſcaping to land: though the Admiral of the Rhodians tooke his deaths wound: and though Philip after the battaile tooke harbour vnder a Promontorie, by which they had fought, ſo that he had the gathering of the Wracks vpon the ſhore: Yet foraſmuch as He had ſuffered farre greater loſſe of ſhips and men, than had the Enemie: and ſince He durſt not in few dayes after put forth to Sea, when Attalus and the Rhodians came to braue him in his Port; the honour of the victorie was adjudged to his Enemies. This notwithſtanding, Philip afterwards beſieged and wanne ſome Townes in Caria: whether onely in a brauerie, and to deſpight his oppoſites; or whether vpon any hopefull deſire of conqueſt; it is vncertaine. The ſtratageme, by which he wonne Prinaſſus, is worthie of noting. He attempted it by a Myne: and finding the Earth ſo ſtonie, that it reſiſted his worke, He neuertheleſſe commanded the Pyoners to make a noyſe vnder ground; and ſecretly in the night-time Hee rayſed great Mounts about the entrance of the Myne, to breed an opinion in the beſieged, that the worke went marueilouſly forward. At length he ſent word to the Townesmen, that by his vnder-myning, two acres of their wall ſtood onely vpon woodden props: to which if he gaue fire, and entred by a breach, they ſhould expect no mercie. The Prinaſſians little thought, that he had fetcht all his earth and rubbiſh by night a great way off, to raiſe vp thoſe heapes which they ſaw; but rather that all had beene extracted out of the Myne. Wherfore they ſuffered themſelues to be outfaced; and gaue vp the Towne as loſt, which the Enemie had no hope to winne by force. But Philip could not ſtay to ſettle himſelfe in thoſe parts. Attalus and the Rhodians were too ſtrong for him at Sea, and compelled him to make haſte backe into Macedon; whither they followed him all the way in manner of purſuit.

§. VIII.

§. VIII.

The Romans, after their Carthaginian warre, seeke matter of quarrell against PHILIP. The Athenians, vpon slight cause, proclaime warre against PHILIP; moued thereto by ATTALVS; whom they flatter. PHILIP winnes diuers Townes: and makes peremptorie answere to the Roman Embassadour. The furious resolution of the Abydeni.

THese Asiatique matters, which no way concerned the Romans, yet serued well to make a noyse in Rome; and fill the peoples heads, if not with a desire of making warre in Macedon, at least with a conceit that it were expedient so to doe. The Roman Senate was perfectly informed of the state of those Easterne Countries; and knew, that there was none other Nation than the Greekes, which lay betweene them and the Lordship of Asia. These Greekes were factious, and seldome or neuer at peace. As for the Macedonian, though length of time, and continuall dealings in Greece euer since the Reignes of Philip and Alexander, had left no difference betweene him and the Naturals: yet most of them abhorred his Dominion, because He was originally forsooth a Barbarian: many of them hated him vpon ancient quarrels: and they that had been most beholding vnto him, were neuertheleſſe wearie of him, by reason of his personall faults. All this gaue hope, that the affaires of Greece would not long detaine the Roman Armies: especially since the diuisions of the Country were such, that euerie pettie Estate was apt to take counsaile apart for it selfe; without much regarding the generalitie. But the poore Commonaltie of Rome had no great affection to such a chargeable enterprise. They were alreadie quite exhausted, by that grieuous war with Hannibal: wherein they had giuen by Loane to the Republike all their monie: neither had they as yet receiued, neither did they receiue vntill fifteene or sixteene yeeres after this, their whole summe backe againe. That part of paiment also which was alreadie made, being not in present monie, but much of it in Land: it behoued them to rest awhile; and bestow the more diligence in tilling their grounds, by how much they were the lesse able to bestow cost. Wherefore they took no pleasure to heare, that Attalus and the Rhodians had sent Embassadors to sollicite them against Philip, with report of his bold attempts in Asia: or that M. Aurelius, their Agent in Greece, had sent letters of the same tenour to the Senate, and magnified his intelligence, by setting out the preparations of this dangerous enemie, that sollicited not onely the Townes vpon the Continent, but all the Ilands in those Seas, visiting them in person, or sending Embassadours, as one that meant shortly to hold warre with the Romans vpon their owne ground. Philip had indeed no such intent: neither was he much too strong either of himselfe, or by his alliance in Greece, to be resisted by Attalus and the Rhodians, especially with the helpe of the Ætolians their good friends, and (in a manner) his owne professed enemies. But such things must be published abroad, if onely to prediſpose men vnto the warre, and giue it the more honest colour.

Philip was a man of ill condition; and therfore could not thriue by intermeddling in the affaires of those, that were more mightie than himselfe. He was too vnskilfull, or otherwise too vnapt, to retaine his old friends: yet would he needes be seeking new enemies. And he found them such, as he deserued to haue them: for he offered his helpe to their destruction, when they were in miserie, and had done him no harme. It behoued him therefore, either to haue strained his forces to the vtmost in making warre vpon them; or, in desisting from that injurious course, to haue made amends for the wrongs past, by doing friendly offices of his owne accord. But He, hauing broken that League of peace which is of all other the most naturall, naturall, binding all men to offer no violence willingly, vnleſſe they think themſelues iuſtly prouoked; was afterwards too fondly perſwaded, that he might wel be ſecure of the Romans, becauſe of the written Couenants of peace betweene him and them. There is not any forme of oath, whereby ſuch articles of peace can be held inuiolable, ſaue onely by the water of Styx*, that is, by Neceſſitie: which whileſt it bindes one partie, or both vnto performance, making it apparent that he ſhall bee a loſer who ſtarts from the Conditions; it may ſo long (and ſo long onely) bee preſumed, that there ſhall be no breach. Till Hannibal was vanquiſhed, the Romans neuer hearkened after Philip: for neceſſitie made them let him alone. But when once they had peace with Carthage, then was this Riuer of Styx dried vp: and then could they ſweare as * Mercurie did in the Comedie, by their owne ſelues, euen by their good ſwords, that they had good reaſon to make warre vpon him. The Voyage of Sopater into Africke, and the preſent warre againſt Attalus; were matter of quarrell as much as needed: or if this were not enough, the Athenians helped to furniſh them with more.

* Sir Fr. Bacon de Sap. veterum.

* Plaut. Amphitr.

The Athenians, being at this time Lords of no more than their owne barren Territorie, tooke ſtate vpon them neuertheleſſe, as in their ancient fortune. Two yong Gentlemen of Acarnania entring into the Temple of Ceres, in the dayes of Initiation, (wherein were deliuered the myſteries of Religion, or rather of Idolatrous ſuperſtition, vainly ſaide to bee auaileable vnto felicitie after this life) diſcouered themſelues by ſome impertinent queſtions, to be none of thoſe that were initiated. Herevpon they were brought before the Officers: and though it was apparent, that they came into the place by meere errour, not thinking to haue therein done amiſſe; yet, as it had beene for ſome hainous crime, they were put to death. All their Countrymen at home tooke this in ill part; and ſought to reuenge it as a publike injurie, by warre vpon the Athenians. Procuring therefore of Philip ſome Macedonians to helpe them, they entred into Attica: who waſted it with fire and ſword; and carried thence away with them a great bootie. This indignitie ſtirred vp the high-minded Athenians; and made them thinke vpon doing more, than they had abilitie to performe. All which at the preſent they could doe, was to ſend Embaſſadours to King Attalus; gratulating his happie ſucceſſe againſt Philip, and entreating him to viſit their Citie. Attalus was hereto the more willing; becauſe he vnderſtood, that the Roman Embaſſadours, houering about Greece for matter of intelligence, had a purpoſe to bee there at the ſame time. So he went thither, accompanied, beſides his owne followers, with ſome of the Rhodians. Landing in the Piræus, hee found the Romans there, with whom he had much friendly conference: they rejoycing that he continued enemy to Philip; and He being no leſſe glad, when he heard of their purpoſe to renew the warre. The Athenians came foorth of their Citie, all the Magiſtrates, Prieſts, and Citizens, with their wiues and children, in as ſolemne a pompe as they could deuiſe, to meet and honour the King. They entertained the Romans that were with him, in very louing manner: but towards Attalus himſelfe they omitted no point of obſeruance, which their flatterie could ſuggeſt. At his firſt comming into the Citie they called the people to Aſſembly: where they deſired him to honour them with his preſence, and let them heare him ſpeake. But he excuſed himſelfe; ſaying, That with an euill grace he ſhould recount vnto them thoſe many benefits, by which he ſtudied to make them know what loue he bore them. Wherefore it was thought fit, that he ſhould deliuer in writing, what he would haue to be propounded. He did ſo. The points of his Declaration were; firſt, what he had willingly done for their ſake: then, what had lately paſſed betweene him and Philip: laſtly, an exhortation vnto them, to declare themſelues againſt the Macedonian, whileſt he with the Rhodians, and the Romans, were willing and readie to take their part: which if they now refuſed to doe, He proteſted, that afterwards it would bee vaine to craue his helpe. There needed little entreatie: for they were as willing to proclaime the warre, as Hee to desire it. As for other matters; they loaded him with immoderate honours: and ordained, That vnto the ten Tribes, whereof the bodie of their Citizens consisted, should be added another, and called after his name; as if Hee were in part one of their Founders. To the Rhodians they also decreed a Crowne of Gold, in reward of their vertue; and made all the Rhodians free Citizens of Athens.

Thus beganne a great noyse of warre, wherein little was left vnto the Romans for their part; Attalus and the Rhodians taking all vpon them. But while these were vainly mis-spending the time, in seeking to draw the Ætolians to their partie: that contrarie to their olde manner were glad to bee at quiet: Philip wanne the Townes of Maronea and Ænus, with many other strong places about the Hellespont. Likewise passing ouer the Hellespont, Hee layd siege vnto Abydus; and wanne it, though Hee was faine to stay there long. The Towne held out, rather vpon an obstinate resolution, and hope of succour from Attalus and the Rhodians, then any great ability to defend it selfe against so mightie an Enemie. But the Rhodians sent thither onely one Quadrireme Gallie: and Attalus no more than three hundred men; farre too weake an aide to make good the place. The Roman Embassadours wondred much at this great negligence, of them that had taken so much vpon them.

These Embassadours C. Claudius, M. Æmylius, and P. Sempronius, were sent vnto Ptolemie Epiphanes King of Ægypt, to acquaint him with their victorie against Hannibal and the Carthaginians; as also to thanke him for his fauour vnto them shewed in that warre; and to desire the continuance thereof, if they should neede it against Philip. This Ægyptian King was now in the third or fourth yeere of his Reigne, which (as his Father Philopator had done before him) Hee beganne a very young boy. The courtesie for which the Romans were to thanke him, was, That out of Ægypt they had lately beene supplied with Corne, in a time of extreme Dearth; when the miseries of Warre had made all their owne Prouinces vnable to relecue them. This message could not but bee welcome to the Ægyptian: since it was well knowne, how Philip and Antiochus had combined themselues against him; conspiring to take away his Kingdome. And therefore it might in reason bee hoped, that Hee, or his Councell for him, should offer to supplie the Romans with Corne: since this their Macedonian Expedition concerned his Estate no lesse than theirs.

But as the errand was for the most part complementall: so had the Embassadours both leisure, and direction from the Senate, to looke vnto the things of Greece by the way. Wherefore they agreed, that M. Æmylius the yongest of them should steppe aside, and visit Philip, to trie if he could make him leaue the siege of Abydus; which else He was like to carry. Æmylius, comming to Philip, telles him, that his doings are contrarie to the League that Hee had made with the Romans. For Attalus and the Rhodians, vpon whom Hee made warre, were Confederate with Rome: and the Towne of Abydus, which Hee was now besieging, had a kind of dependancie vpon Attalus. Hereto Philip answered, That Attalus and the Rhodians had made warre vpon him: and that He did onely requite them with the like. Doe you also (sayd Æmylius) requite these poore ABYDENI with such terrible Warre, for any the like Invasion by them first made vpon you? The King was angry to heare himselfe thus taken short: and therefore Hee roundly made answere to Æmylius; It is your youth, Sir, and your beautie, and (aboue all,) your being a Roman, that makes you thus præsumptuous. But I would wish yee to remember the League that yee haue made with mee, and to keepe it: If yee doe otherwise, I will make yee vnderstand, that the Kingdome, and Name of Macedon is in matter of Warre, no lesse noble than the Roman. So Hee dismissed the Embassadour; and had the Towne immediatly yeelded to his discretion. The people had entertained a resolution, to haue died euery one of them, and set their Towne on fire; binding themselues hereto

by a fearefull oath, when Philip denied to accept them vpon reaſonable Conditions. But having in deſperate fight, once repelling him from the Breach, loſt the greateſt number of their Youth: it was thought meete by the Gouernours and Ancients of the Citie to change this reſolution; and take ſuch peace as could be gotten. So they carried out their Gold and Siluer to Philip: about which whileſt they were buſie, the memorie of their oath wrought ſo effectually in the yonger ſort; that, by exhortation of their Prieſts, they fell to murdering their women, children, and themſelues. Hereof the King had ſo little compaſſion, that He ſaid, he would grant the Abydeni three dayes leiſure to die: and to that end forbad his men to enter the Towne; or hazard themſelues in interrupting the violence of thoſe mad fooles.

The Romans decree warre againſt PHILIP, and ſend one of their Conſuls into Greece, as it were in defence of the Athenians their Confederats. How poore the Athenians were at this time, both in qualitie and eſtate.

THis calamitie of the Abydeni, was likened by the Romanes vnto that of the Saguntines: which indeed it neerely reſembled; though Rome was not alike intereſſed in the quarrell. But to helpe themſelues with pretence for the warre, they had found out another Saguntum, euen the Citie of Athens: which if the Macedonian ſhould winne, then reſted there no more to doe, than that he ſhould preſently embarke himſelfe for Italie, whither he would come, not as Hannibal from Saguntum in fiue moneths, but in the ſhort ſpace of fiue dayes ſayling. Thus P. Sulpicius the Conſul tolde the Multitude, when he exhorted them to make warre vpon Philip; which at his firſt propounding they had denied. The example of Pyrrhus was by him alleadged; to ſhew, what Philip, with the power of a greater kingdome, might dare to vndertake: as alſo the fortunate Voyage of Scipio into Africk; to ſhew the difference of making warre abroad, and admitting it into the bowels of their owne Countrey. By ſuch arguments was the Commonaltie of Rome induced to beleeue, that this warre with the Macedonian was both juſt and neceſſary. So it was decreed: and immediatly the ſame Conſul haſted away towards Macedon, hauing that Prouince allotted vnto him before, and all things in a readineſſe, by order from the Senate; who followed other Motiues, than the people muſt bee acquainted with. Great thankes were giuen to the Athenian Embaſſadours, of their conſtancie (as was ſayd) in not changing their faith at ſuch time as they ſtood in danger of being beſieged. And indeed great thankes were due to them, though not vpon the ſame occaſion. For the people of Rome had no cauſe to thinke it a benefit vnto themſelues, that any Greeke Towne, refuſing to ſue vnto the Macedonian for peace, requeſted their helpe againſt him. But the Senate intending to take in hand the Conqueſt of the Eaſterne parts; had reaſon to giue thankes vnto thoſe, that miniſtred the occaſion. Since therefore it was an vntrue ſuggeſtion, That Philip was making ready for Italy: and ſince neither Attalus, the Rhodians, nor any other State in thoſe quarters, deſired the Romanes to giue them protection: theſe buſi-headed Athenians, who falling out with the Acarnanians, and conſequently with Philip, a matter of May-game, (as was ſhewed before) ſent Embaſſadours into all parts of the World, euen to Ptolemie of Egypt, and to the Romans, as well as to Attalus and others their neighbours; muſt be accepted as cauſe of the warre, and Authours of the benefit thence redounding.

Neuertheleſſe as it loues to fall out where the meaning differs from the pretence: the doings of P. Sulpicius the Conſul were ſuch, as might haue argued Athens to bee the leaſt part of his care. Hee ſailed not about Peloponneſus, but tooke the readie way to Macedon; and landing about the Riuer of Apſus, betweene Dyrrachium and Apollonia, there beganne the warre. Soone vpon his comming the Athenian Embaſſadours were with him, and craued his helpe: whereof they could make no benefit whileſt he was ſo farre from them. They bemoaned themſelues as men beſieged, and intreated him to deliuer them. For which cauſe He ſent vnto them C. Claudius with twenty Gallies, and a competent number of men: but the maine of his forces Hee retained with him, for the proſequution of a greater deſigne. The Athenians were not indeed beſieged: onely ſome Rouers from Chalcis, in the Ile of Eubœa; and ſome bands of aduenturers out of Corinth, vſed to take their ſhippes and ſpoile their fields, becauſe they had declared themſelues againſt King Philip, that was Lord of theſe two Townes. The Robberies done by theſe Pyrats and Free-booters, were by the more eloquent than warlike Athenians, in this declining Age of their Fortune and Vertue, called a Siege. From ſuch detriment the arriuall of Claudius, and ſhortly after of three Rhodian Gallies, eaſily preſerued them. As for the Athenians themſelues; they that had been wont, in ancient times, to vndertake the Conqueſts of Ægypt, Cyprus, and Cicil; to make warre vpon the great Perſian King; and to hold ſo much of Greece in ſubiection, as made them redoubtable vnto all the reſt; had now no more than three ſhippes, and thoſe open ones, not much better then long Boates. Yet thought they not themſelues a whit the worſe men; but ſtood as highly vpon the glory and vertue of their Anceſtors, as if it had been ſtill their owne.

§. X.

The Towne of Chalcis in Eubœa, taken and ſackt by the Romans and their Aſſociates, that lay in Gariſon at Athens. PHILIP attempteth to take Athens by Surpriſe: waſteth the Countrey about: and makes a iourney into Peloponneſus. Of NABIS the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, and his wife. PHILIP offers to make Warre againſt NABIS for the Achæans. He returneth home through Attica, which he ſpoyleth againe: and prouides againſt his Enemies. Some exploits of the Romans. Diuers Princes ioyne with them. Great labouring to draw the Ætolians into the warre.

PHILIP, returning home from Abydus, heard newes of the Roman Conſul his being about Apollonia. But ere he ſtirred forth to giue him entertainement; or perhaps before hee had well reſolued, whether it were beſt awhile to ſit ſtill, and trie what might bee done for obtaining of peace, or whether to make oppoſition, and reſiſt theſe Inuaders with all his forces: Hee receiued aduertiſement from Chalcis of a grieuous miſhap there befallen him, by procurement of the Athenians. For C. Claudius with his Romans, finding no ſuch worke at Athens as they had expected, or as was anſwerable to the fame that went abroad; purpoſed to doe ſomewhat that might quicken the Warre, and make his owne imployment better. Hee grew ſoone weary of ſitting as a Scarre-Crowe, to ſaue the Athenians grounds from ſpoyle; and therefore gladly tooke in hand a buſineſſe of more importance. The Towne of Chalcis was negligently guarded by the Macedonian Souldiours therein, for that there was no enemie at hand; and more negligently by the Townſmen, who repoſed themſelues vpon their Garriſon. Hereof Claudius hauing aduertiſement, ſailed thither by night for feare of being diſcried; and, arriuing there a little before breake of day, tooke it by Scalado. He vſed no mercie, but ſlue all that came in his way: and wanting men to keepe it, (vnleſſe hee ſhould haue left the heartleſſe Athenians to their owne defence) Hee ſet it on fire; conſuming the Kings Magazines of Corne, and all prouiſions for Warre, which were plenteouſly filled. Neither were Hee and his Aſſociats contented with the great abundance of spoyle which they carried about their ships, and with inlarging all those, whom Philip, as in a place of most securitie, kept there imprisoned: but to shew their despight and hatred vnto the King, they ouerthrew and brake in pieces the Statuas vnto him there erected. This done, they hasted away towards Athens: where the newes of their exploit were like to bee ioyfully welcomed. The King lay then at Demetrias about some twenty miles thence; whither when these tidings, or part of them, were brought him, though he saw that it was too late to remedie the matter; yet hee made all haste to take reuenge. Hee thought to haue taken the Athenians, with their trustie Friends, busie at worke in ransaking the Towne, and loading themselues with spoyle: but they were gone before his comming. Fiue thousand light-armed-foote hee had with him, and three hundred horse: whereof leauing at Chalcis onely a few to burie the dead, Hee marched thence away speedily toward Athens: thinking it not vnpossible to take his enemies, in the ioy of their Victory, as full of negligence, as they had taken Chalcis. Neither had he much failed of his expectation, if a Foot-Post that stood Scout for the Citie vpon the borders, had not descried him afarre off, and swiftly carried word of his approch to Athens. It was mid-night when this Post came thither: who found all the Towne asleepe, as feareless of any danger. But the Magistrates, hearing his report, caused a Trumpet out of their Citadell to sound the Alarme; and with all speed made ready for defence. Within a few houres Philip was there: who seeing the many lights, and other signes of busie preparation vsuall in such a case, vnderstood that they had newes of his comming; and therefore willed his men, to repose themselues till it were day. It is like, that the paucitie of his followers did helpe well to animate the Citizens, which beheld them from the walls. Wherefore though Claudius were not yet returned (who was to fetch a compasse about by Sea, and had no cause of haste) yet hauing in the Towne some mercinarie Souldiers, which they kept, of their owne, besides the great multitude of Citizens; they aduentured to issue forth at a gate, whereto they saw Philip make approch. The King was glad of this; reckoning all those his owne, that were thus hardie. He therfore onely willed his men to follow his example; and presently gaue charge vpon them. In that fight he gaue singular proofe of his valour: and beating downe many of the Enemies with his owne hands, draue them with great slaughter backe into the Citie. The heat of his courage transported him further, than discretion would haue allowed, euen to the very gate. But he retired without harme taken; for that they which were vpon the Towres ouer the gate, could not vse their casting weapons against him, without indangering their owne people that were thronging before him into the Citie. There was a Temple of Hercules, a place of exercise, with a Groue, and many goodly Monuments besides, neere adioyning vnto Athens: of which he spared none; but suffered the rage of his anger to extend, euen vnto the sepulchres of the dead. The next day came the Romans, and some Companies of Attalus his men from Ægina; too late in regard of what was already past: but in good time, to preuent him of satisfying his anger to the full, which as yet hee had not done. So he departed thence to Corinth: and hearing that the Achæans held a Parliament at Argos, He came thither to them vnexpected.

The Achæans were deuising vpon warre: which they intended to make against Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon: who being started vp in the roome of Machanidas, did greater mischiefe then any that went before him. This Tyrant relied wholly vpon his Mercinaries; and of his subjects had no regard. He was a cruell oppressor; a greedy extortioner vpon those that liued vnder him; and one that in his naturall condition smelt rankly of the Hangman. In these qualities, his wife Apega was very fitly matched with him, since his dexteritie was no greater in spoyling the men, than hers in fleecing their wiues; whom she would neuer suffer to be at quiet, till they had presented her with all their iewels and apparell. Her husband was so delighted with her propertie, that hee caused an Image to bee made liuely representing her; Liu. lib 32.

and apparrelled it with such costly garments as shee vsed to weare. But it was indeede an Engine, seruing to torment men. Hereof he made vse, when he meant to trie the vertue of his Rhetorick. For calling vnto him some rich man, of whose monie hee was desirous; Hee would bring him into the roome where this Counterfait Apega stood, and there vse all his Art of perswasion, to get what hee desired, as it were by good will. If he could not so speede, but was answered with excuses: then tooke he the refractorie denier by the hand, and told him, that perhaps his wife Apega (who sate by in a Chaire) could perswade more effectually. So hee led him to the Image, that rose vp and opened the armes, as it were for imbracement. Those armes were full of sharpe yron nayles, the like whereof were also sticking in the 10 brests, though hidden with her clothes: and herewith she griped the poore wretch, to the pleasure of the Tyrant, that laughed at his cruell death. Such, and worse (for it were long to tell all here that is spoken of him) was Nabis in his Gouernment. In his dealings abroad he combined with the Ætolians, as Machanidas and Lycurgus had done before him. By these he grew into acquaintance with the Romanes; and was comprehended in the League which they made with Philip, at the end of their former Warre. Of Philopœmens vertue hee stood in feare; and therefore durst not prouoke the Achæans, as long as they had such an able Commander. But when Cycliades, a farre worse Captaine, was their Prætor; and all, or the greatest part of their Mercinaries were discharged; Philopœmen being also gone into Crete, to follow his 20 beloued Occupation of Warre: then did Nabis fall vpon their Territory; and wasting all the fields, made them distrust their owne safetie in the Townes.

Against this Tyrant the Achæans were preparing for warre, when Philip came among them; and had set downe, what proportion of Souldiours euery Citie of their Corporation should furnish out. But Philip willed them, not to trouble themselues with the care of this businesse; forasmuch as he alone would ease them of this warre, and take the burden vpon himselfe. With exceeding ioy and thankes they accepted of this kinde offer. But then hee told them, That, whilest he made warre vpon Lacedæmon, Hee ought not to leaue his owne Townes vnguarded. In which respect he thought they would be pleased, to send a few men to Corinth, and some 30 Companies into the Ile of Eubœa; that so he might securely pursue the warre against Nabis. Immediatly they found out his deuice; which was none other, than to engage their Nation in his warre against the Romans: Wherefore their Prætor Cycliades made him answer, That their Lawes forbade them to conclude any other matters in their Parliament, than those for which it was assembled. So passing the Decree, vpon which they had agreed before, for preparing warre against Nabis; hee brake vp the Assemblie, with euery mans good liking; whereas in former times, Hee had been thought no better than one of the Kings Parasites.

It grieued the King to haue thus failed in his purpose with the Achæans. Neuertheless, he gathered vp among them a few Voluntaries; and so returned by Co- 40 rinth backe into Attica. There he met with Philocles one of his Captaines, that with two thousand men had been doing what harme he might vnto the Countrie. With this addition of strength, he attempted the Castle of Eleusine, the Hauen of Pyræus, and euen the Citie of Athens. But the Romans made such haste after him by Sea, thrusting themselues into euery of these places; that hee could no more then wreak his anger vpon those goodly Temples, with which the Land of Attica was at that time singularly beautified. So Hee destroyed all the workes of their notable Artificers, wrought in excellent Marble; which they had in plenty, of their owne; or, hauing long agoe been masters of the Sea, had brought from other places, where best choice was found. Neither did hee onely pull all downe: but caused his men to 50 breake the very stones, that they might be vnseruiceable to the reparation. His losse at Chalcis being thus reuenged vpon Athens, Hee went home into Macedon: and there made prouision, both against the Roman Consul that lay about Apollonia; and against the Dardanians, with other his bad neighbours, which were likely to infest feſt him. Among his other cares he forgot not the Ætolians: to whoſe Parliament, ſhortly to be held at Naupactus, he ſent an Embaſſage; requelling them to continue in his friendſhip. Thus was Philip occupied.

Sulpicius the Roman Conſul encamped vpon the Riuer of Apſus. Thence he ſent forth Apuſtius, his Lieutenant, with part of the Armie to waſte the borders of Macedon. Apuſtius tooke ſundrie Caſtles and Townes; vſing ſuch extremitie of ſword and fire at Antipatria, the firſt good Towne which he wanne by force, that none durſt afterwards make reſiſtance, vnleſſe they knew themſelues able to holde out. Returning towards the Conſul with his ſpoile, He was charged in Rere, vpon the paſſage of a Brooke, by Athenagoras a Macedonian Captaine: but the Romans had the better; and killing many of theſe enemies, tooke priſoners many more, to the increaſe of their bootie, with which they arriued in ſafetie at their Campe. The ſucceſſe of this Expedition, though it were not great; yet ſerued to draw into the Roman friendſhip, thoſe that had formerly no good inclination to the Macedonian. Theſe were Pleuratus, the ſonne of Scerdilaidas the Illyrian; Aminander King of the Athamanians; and Bato, the ſonne of Longarus, a Prince of the Dardanians. They offered their aſſiſtance vnto the Conſul, who thanked them: and ſaid, That hee would ſhortly make vſe of Pleuratus and Bato, when hee entred into Macedon: but that the friendſhip of Aminander, whoſe Countrie lay betweene the Ætolians and Theſſalie, might bee perhaps auaileable with the Ætolians, to ſtirre them vp againſt Philip.

So the preſent care was wholy ſet vpon the Ætolian Parliament at hand. Thither came Embaſſadours from the Macedonian, Romans, and Athenians. Of which, the Macedonian ſpake firſt: and ſaide, That as there was nothing fallen out, which ſhould occaſion the breach of peace betweene his Maſter and the Ætolians: ſo was it to be hoped, that they would not ſuffer themſelues without good cauſe, to be caried away after other mens fancies. Hee prayed them to conſider, how the Romans heretofore had made ſhew, as if their warre in Greece tended onely to defence of the Ætolians: and yet notwithſtanding had beene angrie, that the Ætolians, by making peace with Philip, had no longer neede of ſuch their Patronage. What might it be that made them ſo buſie, in obtruding their protection vpon thoſe that needed it not? Surely it was euen the generall hatred, which theſe Barbarians bore vnto the Greekes. For euen after the ſame ſort had they lent their helpe to the Mamertines: and afterwards deliuered Syracuſe, when it was oppreſſed by Carthaginian Tyrants: but now both Syracuſe and Meſſana, were ſubiect vnto the Rods and Axes of the Romans. To the ſame effect he alleadged many examples, adding, That in like ſort it would happen to the Ætolians: who, if they drew ſuch Maſters into Greece, muſt not looke hereafter to hold, as now, free Parliaments of their owne, wherein to conſult about Warre and Peace: the Romans would eaſe them of this care, and ſend them ſuch a Moderator, as went euery yeere from Rome to Syracuſe. Wherefore he concluded, That it was beſt for them, whileſt as yet they might, and whileſt one of them as yet could helpe the other, to continue in their League with Philip: with whom if at any time, vpon light occaſion, they happened to fall out, they might as lightly bee reconciled: and with whom they had three yeeres agoe made the peace which ſtil continued; although the ſame Romans were then againſt it, who ſought to breake it now. It would haue troubled the Romans, to frame a good anſwere to theſe obiections. For the Macedonian had ſpoken the very truth, in ſhewing whereto this their Patronage, which they offered with ſuch importunitie, did tend. Wherefore the Athenians were ſet on by them to ſpeake next: who had ſtore of eloquence, and matter of recrimination enough, to make Philip odious. Theſe affirmed, that it was a great impudence in the Macedonian Embaſſadour, to call the Romans by the name of Barbarians: knowing in what barbarous manner his owne King had, in few dayes paſt, made war vpon the gods themſelues, by deſtroying all their Temples in Attica. Herewithall they made a pitifull rehearſall of their

owne calamities: and said, that if Philip might haue his will, Ætolia, and all the rest of Greece, should feele the same that Attica had felt; yea that Athens it selfe, together with Minerua, Iupiter, Ceres, and other of the gods, were like to haue felt, if the wals and the Roman armes had not defended them. Then spake the Romans: who excusing, as well as they could, their owne oppression of all those, in whose defence they had heretofore taken armes, went roundly to the point in hand. They sayd, that they had of late made warre in the Ætolians behalfe, and that the Ætolians had without their consent made peace: whereof since the Ætolians must excuse themselues, by alleaging that the Romans, being busied with Carthage, wanted leisure to giue them aid conuenient: so this excuse being now taken away, and the Romans wholly bent against their common Enemie, it concerned the Ætolians to take part with them in their warre and victorie, vnlesse they had rather perish with Philip.

It might easily be perceiued, that they which were so vehement, in offering their helpe ere it was desired, were themselues carried vnto the war by more earnest motiues, than a simple desire to helpe those friends, with whom they had no great acquaintance. This may haue beene the cause, why Dorymachus the Ætolian Prætor shifted them off awhile with a dilatorie answere: though hee told his Countrymen, That by reseruing themselues, till the matter were inclined one way or other, they might afterwards take part with those that had the better fortune. His answere was, first, in generall termes; That ouer-much haste was an enemie to good counsell: for which cause they must further deliberate, ere they concluded. But comming neerer to the matter in hand, He passed a Decree, That the Prætor might at any time call an Assemblie of the States, and therein conclude vpon this businesse; any Law to the contrary notwithstanding: whereas otherwise it was vnlawfull to treat of such affaires, except in two of their great Parliaments, that were held at set times.

§. XI.

The meeting of PHILIP with the Romans, and skirmishing with them on his borders. The Ætolians inuade his dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of ATTALVS and the Roman Fleet.

PHILIP was glad to heare, that the Romans had sped no better in their sollicitation of the Ætolians. He thought them hereby disappointed, in the very beginning, of one great helpe; and meant himselfe to disappoint them of another. His sonne Perseus, a very boy, was sent to keepe the Streights of Pelagonia against the Dardanians; hauing with him some of the Kings Councell, to gouerne both him and his armie. It was iudged, as may seeme, that the presence of the Kings sonne, how young soeuer, would both encourage his followers, and terrifie the enemies; by making them at least beleeue, that he was not weakely attended. And this may haue been the reason, why the same Perseus, a few yeeres before this, was in like manner left vpon the borders of Ætolia by his father; whom earnest businesse called thence another way. No danger of enemies being left on either hand: it was thought, that the Macedonian Fleet vnder Heraclides, would serue to keepe Attalus, with the Rhodians and Romans, from doing harme by sea, when the Kings backe was turned; who tooke his journie Westward against Sulpicius the Consul.

The Armies met in the countrey of the Dassaretij, a people in the vtmost borders of Macedon towards Illyria, about the mountaines of Candauia; that running along from Hæmus in the North vntill they ioyne in the South with Pindus, inclose the Westerne parts of Macedon. Two or three dayes they lay in sight the one of the other, without making offer of battaile. The Consul was the first that issued forth

of his Campe into the open field. But Philip was not confident in the ſtrength which he had then about him; and therefore thought it better to ſend foorth ſome of his light-armed Mercinaries, and ſome part of his horſe, to entertaine them with skirmiſh. Theſe were eaſily vanquiſhed by the Romans, and driuen backe into their Campe. Now although it was ſo, that the King was vnwilling to hazard all at firſt vpon a Caſt, and therefore ſent for Perſeus with his Companies, to increaſe his owne forces: yet being no leſſe vnwilling to loſe too much in reputation; He made ſhew a day after, as if he would haue fought. He had found the aduantage of a place fit for ambuſh, wherein he beſtowed as many as he thought meet of his Targettiers: and ſo gaue charge to Athenagoras, one of his Captaines, to prouoke out the Romans to fight; inſtructing both him and the Targettiers, how to behaue themſelues reſpectiuely, as opportunitie ſhould fall out. The Romans had no miſtruſt of any ambuſh; hauing fought vpon the ſame ground a day before. Wherefore perhaps they might haue ſuſtained ſome notable detriment, if the Kings directions had beene well followed. For when Athenagoras began to fall backe, they charged him ſo hotly, that they draue him to an haſtie flight, and purſued him as hard as they were able. But the Captaines of the Targettiers, not ſtaying to let them runne into the danger, diſcouered themſelues before it was time; and thereby made fruſtrate the worke, to which they were appointed. The Conſul heereby gathered, that the King had ſome deſire to trie the fortune of a battaile: which hee therefore preſented the ſecond time; leading forth his Armie, and ſetting it in order, with Elephants in front: a kind of helpe which the Romans had neuer vſed before, but had taken theſe of late from the Carthaginians. Such are the alterations wrought by Time. It was ſcarce aboue foureſcore yeeres ere this, that Pyrrhus carried Elephants out of Greece into Italie, to affright the Romans, who had neuer ſeene any of thoſe beaſts before. But now the ſame Romans (whileſt poſſibly ſome were yet aliue, which had knowne that Expedition of Pyrrhus) come into Macedon, bringing Elephants with them: whereof the Macedonians and Greekes haue none. Philip had patience to let the Conſul braue him at his Trenches: wherein hee did wiſely: for the Roman had greater neede to fight, than Hee. Sulpicius was vnwilling to loſe time: neither could hee without great danger, lying ſo neere the Enemie, that was ſtrong in horſe, ſend his men to fetch in corne out of the fields. Wherefore he remoued eight miles off: preſuming that Philip would not aduenture to meete him on euen ground; and ſo the more boldly he ſuffered his Forragers to ouer-runne the Countrie. The King was nothing ſorry of this; but permitted the Romans to take their good pleaſure: euen till their preſumption, and his owne ſuppoſed feare, ſhould make them careleſſe. When this was come to paſſe, hee tooke all his horſe, and light-armed-foote, with which hee occupied a place in the midway, betweene the Forragers and their Campe. There he ſtayed in Couert with part of his forces; to keepe the paſſages that none ſhould eſcape. The reſt hee ſent abroad the Countrie, to fall vpon the ſtraglers: willing them to put all to the ſword, and let none run home with newes to the Campe. The ſlaughter was great: and thoſe which eſcaped the handes of them that were ſent abroad to ſcowre the fields, lighted all or moſt of them vpon the King and his companies in their flight: ſo as they were cut off by the way. Long it was ere the Campe had newes of this. But in the end there eſcaped ſome: who though they could not make any perfect relation how the matter went: yet by telling what had happened to themſelues, raiſed a great tumult. Sulpicius hereupon ſends foorth all his horſe, and bids them helpe their fellowes where they ſaw it needfull: He himſelfe with the Legions followed. The companies of Horſe diuided themſelues, accordingly as they met with aduertiſements vpon the way, into many parts: not knowing where was moſt of the danger. Such of them as lighted vpon Philips Troupes, that were canuaſſing the field, tooke their taske where they found it. But the maine bulke of them fell vpon the King himſelfe. They had the diſaduantage: as comming fewer, and vnprepared, to one that was readie for them.

So

So they were beaten away: as their fellowes alſo might haue beene, if the King had well bethought himſelfe, and giuen ouer in time. But while, not contented with ſuch an harueſt, he was too greedie about a poore gleaning: the Roman Legions appeared in ſight: which emboldened their horſe to make a re-charge. Then the danger apparant, enforced the Macedonians to looke to their owne ſafety. They ranne which way they could: and (as men that lie in waite for others, are ſeldome heedfull of that which may befall themſelues) to eſcape the Enemie, they declined the faireſt way; ſo as they were plunged in Mariſhes and Bogges, wherein many of them were loſt. The Kings horſe was ſlaine vnder him: and there had hee beene caſt away, if a louing ſubiect of his had not alighted; mounted him vpon his owne horſe; and deliuered him out of perill, at the expence of his owne life, that running on foote was ouertaken, and killed.

In the common opinion Philip was charged with improuident raſhneſſe; and the Conſul, with as much dulneſſe, for his dayes ſeruice. A little longer ſtay would haue deliuered the King from theſe enemies without any blowe: ſince when all the fields about them were waſted, they muſt needes haue retired backe to the Sea. On the other ſide it was not thought vnlikely, That if the Romans following the King, had ſet vpon his Campe, at ſuch time as he fled thither, halfe amazed vvith feare of being either ſlaine or taken, they might haue vvonne it. But that noble Hiſtorian, Liuie, (as is commonly his maner) hath iudiciouſly obſerued, That neither the one, nor the other, were much too blame in this dayes worke. For the maine body of the Kings Armie lay ſafe in his Campe; and could not bee ſo aſtoniſhed with the loſſe of two or three hundred Horſe, that it ſhould therefore haue abandoned the defence of the Trenches. And as for the King himſelfe; He was aduertiſed, that Pleuratus the Illyrian, and the Dardanians, were fallen vpon his Countrey; when they found the paſſage thereinto open, after Perſeus was called away from cuſtodie of the Streights. This was it which made him aduenture to doe ſomewhat betimes; that he might ſet the Romans going the ſooner, and afterwards looke vnto his troubleſome neighbours. In conſideration of this, Philip was deſirous to cleere himſelfe of the Romans, as ſoone as he might. And to that purpoſe he ſent vnto the Conſul; requeſting a day of truce for buriall of the dead. But in ſtead of ſo doing, hee marched away by night; and left fires in his Campe to beguile the Enemie, as if hee had not ſtirred out of the place. Sulpicius, when hee heard of the Kings departure, was not ſlow to follow him. He ouertooke the Macedonians in a place of ſtrength, which they had fenced (for it was a wooddie ground) by cutting downe trees, and laying them athwart the way where it was moſt open. In making of ſuch places good, the Macedonian Phalanx was of little vſe; being a ſquare battaile of pikes, not fit for euerie ground. The Archers of Crete were iudged, and were indeed, more ſeruiceable in that caſe. But they were few; and their arrowes were of ſmall force againſt the Roman ſhield. The Macedonians therefore helped them by flinging of ſtones. But to no purpoſe. For the Romans got within them; and forced them to quit the place. This victory (ſuch as it was) layd open vnto the Conſul ſome poore Townes thereabout; which partly were taken by ſtrong hand, partly yeelded for feare. But the ſpoyle of theſe, and of the fields adioyning, was not ſufficient to maintaine his Armie; and therefore he returned backe to Apollonia.

The Dardanians, hearing that Philip vvas come backe, vvithdrevv themſelues apace out of the Countrey. The King ſent Athenagoras to vvaite vpon them home; vvhileſt he himſelfe vvent againſt the Ætolians. For Damocritus the Prætor of the Ætolians, who had reſerued himſelfe and his Nation vnto the euent of things, hearing report, that Philip was beaten once and againe: as alſo that Pleuratus and the Dardanians were fallen vpon Macedon; grew no leſſe buſie on the ſudden, than before hee had beene vviſe. He perſwaded his Nation to take their time: and ſo, not ſtaying to proclaime warre, ioyned his forces with Aminander the Athamanian; and made inuaſion vpon Theſſalie. They tooke and cruelly ſacked a few Townes: whereby they grew confident; as if, without any danger, they might doe what they listed. But Philip came vpon them ere they looked for him: and killing them as they lay dispersed, was like to haue taken their Campe; if Aminander, more warie than the Ætolians, had not helped at need, and made the Retrait through his owne mountaynous Countrie.

About the same time; the Roman Fleet, assisted by Attalus and the Rhodians, had taken some small Islands in the Ægean Sea. They tooke likewise the Towne of Oreum in the Ile of Eubœa; and some other places thereabout. The Townes were giuen to Attalus, after the same Compact that had formerly beene made with the Ætolians: the goods therein found were giuen to the Romans; and the people, for slaues. Other attempts on that side were hindred; either by foule weather at Sea; or by want of daring, and of meanes.

§. XII.

VILLIVS the Roman Consul wastes a yeere to no effect. Warre of the Gaules in Italie. An Embassie of the Romans to Carthage, MASANISSA, and VERMINA. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdome: and T. QVINTIVS FLAMINIVS is sent against him.

THus the time ranne away: and P. Villius, a new Consul, tooke charge of the warre in Macedon. Hee was troubled with a Mutinie of his oldest Souldiors: whereof two thousand, hauing serued long in Sicil and Africk, thought themselues much wronged, in that they could not bee suffered to looke vnto their owne estates at home. They were (belike) of the Legions that had serued at Cannæ: as may seeme by their complaint, of hauing beene long absent from Italie; whither faine they would haue returned, when by their Colonels they were shipped for Macedon. How Villius dealt with them, it is vncertaine. For the Historie of his yeere is lost: whereof the misse is not great; since hee did nothing memorable. Valerius Antias, as we find in Liuie, hath adorned this Villius with a great exploit against Philip. Yet since Liuie himselfe, an Historian to whom few of the best are matchable, could finde no such thing recorded in any good Authour; we may reasonably beleeue, that Villius his yeere was idle. Liui. l. 32.

In the beginning of this Macedonian Warre, the Romans found more trouble than could haue bin expected with the Gaules. Their Colonie of Placentia, a goodly and strong Towne, which neither Hannibal, nor after him Asdrubal, had beene able to force; was taken by these Barbarians, and burnt in a manner to the ground. In like sort Cremona was attempted, but saued her selfe, taking warning by her neighbours calamitie. Amilcar a Carthaginian, that staied behind Asdrubal, or Mago, in those parts; was now become Captaine of the Gaules, in these their enterprises. This when the Romans heard, they sent Embassadours to the Carthaginians: giuing them to vnderstand, That, if they were not wearie of the peace, it behoued them to call home, and deliuer vp, this their Citizen Amilcar, who made warre in Italie. Herevnto it was added (perhaps lest the message might seeme otherwise to haue sauoured a little of some feare) That of the Fugitiue slaues belonging vnto the Romans, there were some reported to walke vp and down in Carthage: which if it were so, then ought they to bee restored backe to their Masters; as was conditioned in the late Peace. The Embassadours that were sent on this errand; had further charge to treat with Masanissa, as also with Vermina the sonne of Syphax. Vnto Masanissa, besides matter of complement, they were to signifie what pleasure Hee might doe them; by lending them some of his Numidian Horse, to serue in their Warre against against the Macedonian. Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchsafe vnto him the name of King: and promised thereafter to deserue it, by his readinesse in doing them all good offices. But they were somewhat scrupulous in the matter: and said, That hauing beene, and being still (as they tooke it) their Enemie, He ought first of all to desire peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they vsed not to conferre vpon any, saue onely vpon such as had royally deserued it at their hands. The authoritie to make peace with him, was wholly committed vnto these Embassadours vpon such termes as they should thinke fit; without further relation to the Senate and People. For they were then busied with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle answere, That they wholly disclaimed Amilcar: banishing him; and confiscating his goods. As for the Fugitiues: they had restored as many as they could finde; and would in that point, as farre as was requisite, giue satisfaction to the Senate. Herewithall they sent a great proportion of Corne to Rome; and the like vnto the Armie that was in Macedon. King Masanissa would haue lent vnto the Romans two thousand of his Numidian Horse: but they were contented with halfe the number; and would accept no more. Vermina met with the Embassadours, to giue them entertainment, on the borders of his Kingdome; and, without any disputation, agreed with them vpon termes of peace.

Thus were the Romans busied in taking order for their Macedonian Warre, that they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilcar and his Gaules: they laid siege vnto Cremona; where L. Furius a Roman Prætor came vpon them, fought a battaile with them, and ouercame them. Amilcar the Carthaginian died in this battaile: and the fruit of the Victorie was such, as both made amends for losses past, and left the worke easie to those, that afterwardes should haue the managing of warre among those Gaules. So was there good leisure to thinke vpon the businesse of Macedon: where Philip was carefully prouiding to giue contentment vnto his subjects, by punishing a bad Counsailour whom they hated; as also to assure vnto himselfe the Achæans, by rendring vnto them some Townes that he held of theirs; and finally to strengthen his Kingdome, not onely by exercising and trayning his people, but by fortifying the passages that led thereinto out of Epirus. This was in doing, when Villius, hauing vnprofitably laboured to find way into Macedon, taking a journie (as Sulpicius had done before him) wherein he could not be supplied with victuals, determined at length to trie a new course. But then came aduertisement, that T. Quintius Flaminius was chosen Consul, and had Macedon allotted him for his Prouince; whose comming was expected; and he very shortly arriued at the Armie.

§. XIII.

The Romans beginne to make warre by negotiation. T. QVINTIVS winnes a passage against PHILIP. Thessalie wasted by PHILIP, the Romans, and Ætolians. The Achæans forsaking the Macedonian, take part with the Romans. A treatie of peace, that was vaine. PHILIP deliuers Argos to NABIS the Tyrant, who presently enters into League with the Romans.

THE Romans had not beene wont in former times, to make Warre after such a trifling manner. It was their vse, to giue battaile to the Enemie, as soone as they met with him. If hee refused it, they besieged his Townes: and so forced him to trie the fortune of a day, with his disaduantage in reputation, when hee had long forborne it (as it would bee interpreted) vpon knowledge of his owne weaknesse. But in this their Warre with Philip, they beganne to learne of the subtle Greekes, the arte of Negotiation: wherein wherein hitherto they were not growne so fine, as within a little while they proued. Their Treasury was poore, and stood indebted, * many yeeres after this, vnto priuate men, for part of those monies that had been borrowed in the second Punicke Warre. This had made the Commonalty auerse from the Macedonian Warre; and had thereby driuen the Senators greedy of the enterprize, to make vse of their cunning. Yet beeing weary of the slow pace wherewith their businesse went forward, they determined to increase their Armie, that they might haue the lesse neede to relie vpon their Confederats. So they leauied eight thousand foot, and eight hundred Horse (the greater part of them of the Latines) which they sent with T. Quintius Flaminius, the new Consul into Macedon. Their Nauie, and other meanes could well haue serued, for the setting foorth and transportation of a greater Armie: but by straining themselues to the most of their abilitie, they should (besides other difficulties, incident vnto the sustenance of those that are too many and too farre from home) haue bred some iealoulie in their friends of Greece, and thereby haue lost some friends, yea, perhaps haue increased the number of their enemies more than of their owne Souldiours. This present augmentation of the forces was very requisite; for that Attalus, about the same time, excused himselfe vnto them, by his Embassadours; requesting that either they would vndertake the defence of his Kingdome against Antiochus, who inuaded it; or else that they would not take it vncourteously, that he quitted the Warre with Philip, and returned home, to looke vnto that which more concerned him. Their answere was remarkable. They said, That it was not their manner to vse the aid of their friends, longer than their friends had good opportunitie, and could also be well contented to affoord it; That they could not honestly take part with Attalus, their good friend though he were, against Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but, That they would deale with Antiochus by Embassadours, and (as common friends vnto both of the Kings) doe their best to perswade an atonement betweene them. In such louing fashion did they now carrie themselues, towards their good friend the King Antiochus: who reciprocally at their intreaty, withdrew his Armie from the Kingdome of Attalus. But how little they regarded these tearmes of friendship, after that once they had made an end with Philip; it will very soone appeare.

T. Quintius hasting away from Rome, came betimes into his Prouince, with the supplie decreed vnto him; which consisted, for the most part, of olde Souldiours, that had serued in Spaine and Africk. He found Villius the old Consul, (whom at his comming he presently discharged) and King Philip of Macedon, encamped one against the other, in the Streights of Epirus; by the Riuer of Apsus or Aous. It was manifest, that either the Romans must fetch a compasse about, and seeke their way into Macedon, through the poore Countrey of the Dassaretians; or else winne, by force, that passage, which the King defended. In taking the former way, they had already two yeeres together mis-spent their time, and beene forced to returne backe without profit, for want of Victuals: whereof they could neither carrie with them store sufficient, nor finde it on the way. But if they could once get ouer these Mountaines, which diuided the South of Epirus from Thessalie: then should they enter into a plentiful Countrey; and which by long dependance on the Macedonian, was become (in a manner) part of his Kingdome, whereof it made the South border. Neuertheless, the desire of winning this passage, was greater than the likelyhood. For the Riuer of Apsus, running along through that Valley which alone was open betweene the Mountains, made it all a deep Marish and vnpassable Bogge: a very narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the maine Rocke by mans hand. Wherefore Quintius assailed to climbe in the Mountaines: but finding himselfe disappointed of this hope, through the diligence of his Enemie, who neglected not the gard of them that was very easie; Hee was compelled to sit still, without doing any thing for the space of fortie dayes.

This long time of rest gaue hope vnto Philip, that the Warre might be ended by com-

against the Macedonian. Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchsafe vnto him the name of King: and promised thereafter to deserue it, by his readinesse in doing them all good offices. But they were somewhat scrupulous in the matter: and said, That hauing beene, and being still (as they tooke it) their Enemie, He ought first of all to desire peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they vsed not to conferre vpon any, saue onely vpon such as had royally deserued it at their hands. The authoritie to make peace with him, was wholly committed vnto these Embassadours vpon such termes as they should thinke fit; without further relation to the Senate and People. For they were then busied with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle answere, That they wholly disclaimed Amilcar: banishing him; and confiscating his goods. As for the Fugitiues: they had restored as many as they could finde; and would in that point, as farre as was requisite, giue satisfaction to the Senate. Herewithall they sent a great proportion of Corne to Rome; and the like vnto the Armie that was in Macedon. King Masanissa would haue lent vnto the Romans two thousand of his Numidian Horse: but they were contented with halfe the number; and would accept no more. Vermina met with the Embassadours, to giue them entertainment, on the borders of his Kingdome; and, without any disputation, agreed with them vpon termes of peace.

Thus were the Romans busied in taking order for their Macedonian Warre, that they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilcar and his Gaules: they laid siege vnto Cremona; where L. Furius a Roman Prætor came vpon them, fought a battaile with them, and ouercame them. Amilcar the Carthaginian died in this battaile: and the fruit of the Victorie was such, as both made amends for losses past, and left the worke easie to those, that afterwardes should haue the managing of warre among those Gaules. So was there good leisure to thinke vpon the businesse of Macedon: where Philip was carefully prouiding to giue contentment vnto his subjects, by punishing a bad Counsailour whom they hated; as also to assure vnto himselfe the Achæans, by rendring vnto them some Townes that he held of theirs; and finally to strengthen his Kingdome, not onely by exercising and trayning his people, but by fortifying the passages that led thereinto out of Epirus. This was in doing, when Villius, hauing vnprofitably laboured to find way into Macedon, taking a journie (as Sulpicius had done before him) wherein he could not be supplied with victuals, determined at length to trie a new course. But then came aduertisement, that T. Quintius Flaminius was chosen Consul, and had Macedon allotted him for his Prouince; whose comming was expected; and he very shortly arriued at the Armie.

§. XIII.

The Romans beginne to make warre by negotiation. T. QVINTIVS winnes a passage against PHILIP. Thessalie wasted by PHILIP, the Romans, and Ætolians. The Achæans forsaking the Macedonian, take part with the Romans. A treatie of peace, that was vaine. PHILIP deliuers Argos to NABIS the Tyrant, who presently enters into League with the Romans.

THE Romans had not beene wont in former times, to make Warre after such a trifling manner. It was their vse, to giue battaile to the Enemie, as soone as they met with him. If hee refused it, they besieged his Townes: and so forced him to trie the fortune of a day, with his disaduantage in reputation, when hee had long forborne it (as it would bee interpreted) vpon knowledge of his owne weakenesse. But in this their Warre with Philip, they beganne to learne of the subtle Greekes, the arte of Negotiation: wherein wherein hitherto they were not growne so fine, as within a little while they proued. Their Treasury was poore, and stood indebted, * many yeeres after this, vnto priuate men, for part of those monies that had been borrowed in the second Punicke Warre. This had made the Commonalty auerse from the Macedonian Warre; and had thereby driuen the Senators greedy of the enterprize, to make vse of their cunning. Yet beeing weary of the slow pace wherewith their businesse went forward, they determined to increase their Armie, that they might haue the lesse neede to relie vpon their Confederats. So they leauied eight thousand foot, and eight hundred Horse (the greater part of them of the Latines) which they sent with T. Quintius Flaminius, the new Consul into Macedon. Their Nauie, and other meanes could well haue serued, for the setting foorth and transportation of a greater Armie: but by straining themselues to the most of their abilitie, they should (besides other difficulties, incident vnto the sustenance of those that are too many and too farre from home) haue bred some iealoulie in their friends of Greece, and thereby haue lost some friends, yea, perhaps haue increased the number of their enemies more than of their owne Souldiours. This present augmentation of the forces was very requisite; for that Attalus, about the same time, excused himselfe vnto them, by his Embassadours; requesting that either they would vndertake the defence of his Kingdome against Antiochus, who inuaded it; or else that they would not take it vncourteously, that he quitted the Warre with Philip, and returned home, to looke vnto that which more concerned him. Their answere was remarkable. They said, That it was not their manner to vse the aid of their friends, longer than their friends had good opportunitie, and could also be well contented to affoord it; That they could not honestly take part with Attalus, their good friend though he were, against Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but, That they would deale with Antiochus by Embassadours, and (as common friends vnto both of the Kings) doe their best to perswade an atonement betweene them. In such louing fashion did they now carrie themselues, towards their good friend the King Antiochus: who reciprocally at their intreaty, withdrew his Armie from the Kingdome of Attalus. But how little they regarded these tearmes of friendship, after that once they had made an end with Philip; it will very soone appeare.

T. Quintius hasting away from Rome, came betimes into his Prouince, with the supplie decreed vnto him; which consisted, for the most part, of olde Souldiours, that had serued in Spaine and Africk. He found Villius the old Consul, (whom at his comming he presently discharged) and King Philip of Macedon, encamped one against the other, in the Streights of Epirus; by the Riuer of Apsus or Aous. It was manifest, that either the Romans must fetch a compasse about, and seeke their way into Macedon, through the poore Countrey of the Dassaretians; or else winne, by force, that passage, which the King defended. In taking the former way, they had already two yeeres together mis-spent their time, and beene forced to returne backe without profit, for want of Victuals: whereof they could neither carrie with them store sufficient, nor finde it on the way. But if they could once get ouer these Mountaines, which diuided the South of Epirus from Thessalie: then should they enter into a plentiful Countrey; and which by long dependance on the Macedonian, was become (in a manner) part of his Kingdome, whereof it made the South border. Neuertheless, the desire of winning this passage, was greater than the likelyhood. For the Riuer of Apsus, running along through that Valley which alone was open betweene the Mountains, made it all a deep Marish and vnpassable Bogge: a very narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the maine Rocke by mans hand. Wherefore Quintius assailed to climbe in the Mountaines: but finding himselfe disappointed of this hope, through the diligence of his Enemie, who neglected not the gard of them that was very easie; Hee was compelled to sit still, without doing any thing for the space of fortie dayes.

compoſition, vpon ſome reaſonable termes. He therefore ſo dealt with ſome of the Epirots, (among whom hee had many friends) that Hee and the Conſul had a meeting together. But nothing was effected. The Conſul would haue him to ſet all Townes of Greece at libertie; and to make amends for the injuries, which hee had done to many people in his late Warres. Philip was contented to giue libertie to thoſe whom he had ſubdued of late: but vnto ſuch, as had been long ſubiect vnto him and his Anceſtors, He thought it againſt all reaſon, that he ſhould relinquiſh his claime and dominion ouer them. Hee alſo ſaid, That as farre foorth as it ſhould appeare that he had done wrong vnto any Towne or people whatſoeuer, He could well be pleaſed to make ſuch amends, as might ſeeme conuenient in the iudgement of ſome free State, that had not been intereſſed in thoſe quarrels. But herewithall Quintius was not ſatisfied. There needed (hee ſayd) no iudgement or compromiſe; foraſmuch as it was apparant, that Philip had alwaies beene the Inuader; and had not made warre, as one prouoked, in his owne defence. After this altercation, when they ſhould come to particulars: and when the Conſul was required to name thoſe Townes, that he would haue to be ſet at libertie; the firſt that hee named were the Theſſalians. Theſe had been Subiects (though conditionall) vnto the Macedonian Kings, euer ſince the dayes of Alexander the Great, and of Philip his Father. Wherefore, as ſoone as Flaminius had named the Theſſalians; the King in a rage demanded, what ſharper Condition Hee would haue layd vpon him, had he been but vanquiſhed. And herewithall abruptly he flang away; refuſing to heare any more of ſuch diſcourſe.

After this the Conſul ſtroue in vaine two or three dayes together, to haue preuailed againſt the difficulties of that paſſage which Philip kept. When he had well wearied himſelfe, and could not reſolue what courſe to take: there came to him an Heardſman, ſent from Charopus a Prince of the Epirots that fauoured the Romans, who hauing long kept beaſts in thoſe Mountaines, was throughly acquainted with all by-paths, and therefore vndertooke to guide the Romans, without any danger, to a place where they ſhould haue aduantage of the Enemie. This guide, for feare of treacherous dealing, was faſt bound: and, being promiſed great reward, in caſe he made good his word; had ſuch Companies as was thought fit, appointed to follow his directions. They trauailed by night (it being then about the full of the Moone) and reſted in the day-time, for feare of being diſcouered. When they had recouered the hill-toppes, and were aboue the Macedonians, (though vndiſcouered by them, becauſe at their backs) they raiſed a great ſmoke; whereby they gaue notice of their ſucceſſe vnto the Conſul. Some skirmiſhes, whileſt theſe were on their iournie, T. Quintius had held with the Macedonian; thereby to auert him from thought of that which was intended. But when on the third morning hee ſaw the ſmoke ariſe more and more plainely, and thereby knew that his men had attained vnto the place whither they were ſent: He preſſed as neere as he could vnto the Enemies Campe; and aſſailed them in their ſtrength. Hee preuailed as little as in former times; vntill the ſhoutings of thoſe that ranne downe the Hill, and charged Philip on the backe, aſtoniſhed ſo the Macedonians, that they betooke themſelues to flight. The King, vpon firſt apprehenſion of the danger, made all ſpeed away to ſaue himſelf. Yet anon conſidering, that the difficulty of the paſſage muſt needes hinder the Romans from purſuing him: He made a ſtand at the end of fiue miles; and gathered there together his broken troupes, of whom hee found wanting no more than two thouſand men. The greateſt loſſe was of his Campe and prouiſions: if not rather perhaps of his reputation; for that now the Macedonians beganne to ſtand in feare, leſt being driuen from a place of ſuch aduantage, they ſhould hardly make good their partie againſt the Enemie, vpon equall ground. Neither was Philip himſelfe much better perſwaded. Wherefore he cauſed the Theſſalians, as many of them as in his haſtie retrait he could viſit, to forſake their Townes and Countrie; carrying away with them as much as they were able, and ſpoyling all the reſt. But all of them could not be perſwaded, swaded, thus to abandon (for the pleasure of their King) their ancient habitations, and all the substance which they had gotten. Some there were that forcibly resisted him; which they might the better doe, for that hee could not stay to vse any great compulsion. He also himselfe tooke it very grieuously, that he was driuen to make such waste of a most pleasant and fruitfull Countrey, which had euer been well affected vnto him: so that a little hinderance did serue, to make him breake off his purpose; and withdraw himselfe home into his Kingdome of Macedon.

The Ætolians and Athamanians, when this fell out, were euen in a readinesse to inuade Thessalie; whereinto the wayes lay more open, out of their seuerall Countries. When therefore they heard for certaintie, that Philip was beaten by the Romanes: they foreslowed not the occasion; but made all speede, each of them to lay hold vpon what they might. T. Quintius followed them within a little while: but they had gotten so much before his comming, that He, in gleaning after their harueſt, could not finde enough to maintaine his Armie. Thus were the poore Thessalians, of whose libertie the Romans a few daies since had made shew to bee very desirous, wasted by the same Romans and their Confederates; not knowing which way to turne themselues, or whom to auoide. T. Quintius wan Phaleria by assault: Metropolis and Piera yeelded vnto him. Rhage he besieged: and hauing made a faire breach, yet was vnable to force it; so stoutly it was defended both by the Inhabitants, and by a Macedonian Garrison therein. Philip also at the same time, hauing somewhat recollected his spirits, houered about Tempe with his Armie; thrusting men into all places, that were like to be distressed. So the Consul, hauing wel-neere spent his victuals, and seeing no hope to preuaile at Rhage; brake vp his siege, and departed out of Thessalie. Hee had appointed his shippes of burden to meete him at Anticyra, an Hauen towne of Phocis, on the Gulfe of Corinth: which Countrie being friend to the Macedonian, he presently inuaded; not so much for hatred vnto the people, as because it lay conueniently seated betweene Thessalie and other Regions, wherein he had businesse, or was shortly like to haue. Many Townes in Phocis he wan by assault: many were yeelded vp vnto him for feare; and within short space he had (in effect) mastered it all.

In the meane time L. Quintius the Consuls brother, being then Admirall for the Romans in this warre, ioyned with King Attalus and the Rhodian Fleet. They wan two Cities in Eubœa; and afterward layd siege vnto Cenchree, an Hauen and Arcenal of the Corinthians on their Easterne Sea. This enterprise did somewhat helpe forward the Achæans, in their desire to leaue the part of Philip: since it might come to passe, that Corinth it selfe, ere long time were spent; and that Cenchree, with other places appertaining to Corinth, now very shortly should be rendred vnto their Nation, by fauour of the Romans.

But there were other Motiues, inducing the Achæans to preferre the friendship of the Romans, before the patronage of Philip; whereto they had beene long accustomed. For this King had so many wayes offended them in time of peace, that they thought it the best course to rid their hands of him; whileſt being intangled in a dangerous warre, he wanted meanes to hinder the execution of such counsaile, as they should hold the safest. His tyrannous practices to make himselfe their absolute Lord: His poysoning of Aratus their old Gouernour: His false dealing with the Messenians, Epirots, and other people their Confederates, and his owne dependants: together with many particular outrages by him committed; had caused them long since to hold him as a necessary euill, euen whileſt they were vnable to bee without his assistance. But since by the vertue of Philopœmen, they were growne somewhat confident in their owne strength, so as without the Macedonians helpe they could as well subsist, as hauing him to friend: then did they onely thinke how euill he was; and thereupon reioyce the more, in that he was become no longer necessary. It angred him to perceiue how they stood affected: and therefore he sent murderers, to take away the life of * Philopœmen. But failing in this enterprise, and being detected, he

he did thereby onely set fire to the Wood, which was throughly drie before, and prepared to burne. Philopœmen wrought so with the Achæans, that no discourse was more familiar with them, than what great cause they had to with-draw themselues from the Macedonian. Cycliadæs, a principall man among them, and lately their Prætor, was expelled by them, for shewing himselfe passionate in the cause of Philip; and Aristænus chosen Prætor, who laboured to ioyne them in societie with the Romans.

These newes were very welcome to T. Quintius. Embassadours were sent from the Romans, and their Confederates, King Attalus, the Rhodians, and Athenians, to treat with the Achæans; making promise, that they should haue Corinth restored vnto them, if they would forsake the Macedonian. A Parliament of the Achæans was held at Sicyon, to deliberate and resolue in this weighty case. Therein the Romans and their adherents desired the Achæans, to ioyne with them in making warre vpon Philip. Contrariwise, the Embassadours of Philip, whom he had also sent for this busines, admonishing the Achæans of their Alliance with the King, and of their faith due vnto him; requested them, that they would be contented to remaine as Neuters. This moderate request of Philips Embassadour, did no way aduance his Masters cause. Rather it gaue the Achæans to vnderstand, That hee, who could be satisfied with so little at their hands, knew himselfe vnable to gratifie them in any reciprocall demand. Yet were there many in that great Councel; who remembring the benefits of Philip and Antigonus, laboured earnestly for the preseruation of the ancient League. But in fine, the sence of late iniuries, and expectation of like or worse from him in the future; prevailed against the memorie of those old good turnes, which he, (and Antigonus before him) had partly sold vnto them, and partly had vsed as baites, whereby to allure them into absolute subiection. Neither was it perhaps of the least importance; That the Romans were strong, and likely to preuaile in the end. So after much altercation the Decree passed, That they should thenceforward renounce the Macedonian, and take part with his enemies in this war. With Attalus and the Rhodians, they forthwith entred into society: with the Romans (because no League would be of force, vntill the Senate and People had approued it) they forbore to decree any society at the present, vntill the returne of those Embassadours from Rome, which they determined to send thither of purpose. The Megalopolitans, Dymæans, and Argiues, hauing done their best for the Macedonian, as by many respects they were bound; rose vp out of the Councell, and departed before the passing of the Decree, which they could not resist, nor yet with honestie thereto giue assent. For this their good will, and greater, which they shortly manifested, the Argiues had so little thanke; that all the rest of the Achæans may be the better held excused, for escaping how they might, out of the hands of so fell a Prince.

Soone after this, vpon a solemne day at Argos, the affection of the Citizens discouered it selfe so plainely, in the behalfe of Philip, that they which were his Partisans within the Towne, made no doubt of putting the Citie into his hands, if they might haue any small assistance. Philocles, a Lieutenant of the Kings, lay then in Corinth, which he had manfully defended against the Romans and Attalus. Him the Conspirators drew to Argos; whither comming on a sudden, and finding the Multitude readie to ioyne with him, Hee easily compelled the Achæan Garrison to quit the place.

This getting of Argos, together with the good defence of Corinth and some other Townes, as it helped Philip a little in his reputation, so they gaue him hope to obtaine some good end by Treatie, whilest as yet with his honour he might seeke it: and when (the Winter being now come on) a new Consul would shortly bee chosen; who should take the worke out of Titus his hands, if it were not concluded the sooner. Titus had the like respect vnto himselfe; and therefore thought it best, since more could not be done, to prædispose things vnto a Conclusion, for his owne reputation. The meeting was appointed to be held on the Sea-shore, in the Bay

then called the Malian, or Lamian Bay, now (as is ſuppoſed) the Gulfe of Ziton, in the Ægæan Sea, or Archipelago. Thither came Titus, with Aminander the Athamanian; an Embaſſadour of Attalus, the Admirall of Rhodes; and ſome Agents for the Ætolians and Achæans. Philip had with him ſome few of his owne Captaines, and Cyclia-das, lately baniſhed for his ſake out of Achaia. He refuſed to come on ſhore: though fearing (as he ſaid) none but the immortall Gods: yet miſdoubting ſome treachery in the Ætolians. The demands of Titus in behalfe of the Romans were, That he ſhould ſet all Cities of Greece at liberty; deliuer vp to the Romans and their Confederates, all priſoners which he had of theirs, and Renegado's; likewiſe whatſoeuer hee held of theirs in Illyria; and whatſoeuer about Greece or Aſia he had gotten from Ptolemie then King of Ægypt, after his fathers death. Attalus demanded reſtitution to be made entire, of Ships, Townes, and Temples, by him taken and ſpoyled in the late warre betweene them. The Rhodians would haue againe the Countrie of Peræa, lying ouer againſt their Iland; as alſo that he ſhould withdraw his Garriſons, out of diuers Townes about the Helleſpont, and other Hauens of their friends. The Achæans deſired reſtitution of Argos and Corinth: about the one of which they might, not vniuſtly, quarrell with him; the other had beene long his owne by their conſent. The Ætolians tooke vpon them angerly, as Patrons of Greece: willing him to depart out of it, euen out of the whole Countrie, leauing it free; and withall to deliuer vp vnto them, whatſoeuer hee held that had at any time been theirs. Neither were they here-withall content: but inſolently declaimed againſt him, for that which he had lately done in Theſſalie; corrupting (as they ſaid) the rewards of the Victors, by deſtroying, when he was vanquiſhed, thoſe Townes which elſe they might haue gotten. To anſwer theſe malapert Ætolians, Philip commanded his Gallie to row neerer the ſhore. But they began to plie him afreſh: telling him, that he muſt obey his betters; vnleſſe he were able to defend himſelfe by force of Armes. He anſwered them, (as he was much giuen to gybing) with ſundry ſcoffes; and eſpecially with one, which made the Roman Conſul vnderſtand, what manner of companions theſe Ætolians were. For hee ſaid, That he had often dealt with them; as likewiſe the beſt of the Greekes; deſiring them to abrogate a vvicked Lavv, vvhich permitted them to take ſpoile from ſpoile: yet could he get no better an anſwere, than that they would ſooner take Ætolia out of Ætolia. Titus wondred what might bee the meaning of this ſtrange Law. So the King told him, That they held it a laudable cuſtome, as often as warre happened betweene their friends, to hold vp the quarrell by ſending voluntaries to ſerue on both ſides, that ſhould ſpoyle both the one and the other. As for the libertie of Greece, He ſaid it was ſtrange that the Ætolians ſhould be ſo carefull thereof, ſince diuers Tribes of their owne, which he there named, were indeede no Grecians: werefore hee would faine know, whether the Romanes would giue him leaue to make ſlaues of thoſe Ætolians, which were no Greekes. Titus hereat ſmiled, and was no whit offended, to heare the Ætolians well rattled vp; touching whom he began to vnderſtand, how odious they were in all the Countrie. As for that generall demand of ſetting all Greece at libertie, Philip acknowledged, that it might well beſeeme the greatneſſe of the Romans; though hee would alſo conſider, vvhat might beſeeme his ovvne dignitie. But that the Ætolians, Rhodians, and other petrie Eſtates, ſhould thus preſume, vnder countenance of the Romans, to take vpon them, as if by their great might he ſhould be hereunto compelled: it vvas, he ſaid, a ſtrange and ridiculous inſolence. The Achæans he charged vvith much ingratitude; reciting againſt them ſome Decrees of their ovvne; vvherein they had loaden both Antigonus and him, vvith more then humane honors. Neuertheleſſe he ſaid, that he vvould render Argos vnto them: but, as touching Corinth, that he would further deliberate vvith Titus himſelfe. Thus he addreſſed himſelfe vvholly to the Roman Generall; vnto vvhom if he could giue ſatisfaction, he cared little for all the reſt. With Attalus and the Rhodians, his late vvarre, (he ſaid) vvas onely defenſiue; they hauing been the offerers: or if he gaue them any occaſion, it was onely in helping Prusias, his sonne-in-law; neither did hee see why they should rather seeke amends at his hands, than hee at theirs. For whereas they complained, that, spoyling a Temple of Venus, hee had cut downe the Groue, and pleasant walkes thereabouts: what could hee doe more, than send Gardiners thither with yong plants; if one King of another would stand to aske such recompence? Thus he iested the matter out: but offered neuertheless, in honour of the Romans, to giue backe the Region of Perœa to the Rhodians; as likewise to Attalus, the Ships and Prisoners of his, whereof he had then possession. Thus ended that dayes conference, because it was late: Philip requiring a nights leisure to thinke vpon the Articles, which were many, and he ill prouided of Counsaile, wherewith to aduise about them. For your being so ill prouided of Counsaile, said TITVS, you may euen thanke your selfe; as hauing murdered all your friends, that were wont to aduise you faithfully. The next day Philip came not, vntill it was late at night; excusing his long stay by the waightinesse of the things propounded, whereon he could not suddenly tell how to resolue. But it was beleeued, that he thereby sought to abbridge the Ætolians of leisure to raile at him. And this was the more likely, for that hee desired conference in priuate with the Roman Generall. The summe of his discourse, as Titus afterward related it, was, That hee would giue the Achæans both Argos and Corinth; as also that he would render vnto Attalus and the Rhodians, what he had promised the day before; likewise to the Ætolians, that hee would grant some part of their demands; and to the Romans, whatsoeuer they did challenge. This when Titus his associats heard, they exclaimed against it, saying, That if the King were suffered to retaine any thing in Greece, he would shortly get possession of all which hee now rendred vp. The noise that they made came to Philips eare: who thereupon desired a third day of meeting; and protested, that if he could not perswade them, hee would suffer himselfe to be perswaded by them. So the third day they mette early in the morning: at what time the King intreated them all, that they would with sincere affection harken vnto good offers of peace; and immediatly conclude it, if they could like well of those Conditions, which he had already tendred; or otherwise, that they would make truce with him for the present, and let him send Embassadours to Rome, where hee would referre himselfe to the courtesie of the Senate.

This was euen as Quintius would haue it: who stood in doubt, lest a new Consul might happen to defraud him of the honour, which he expected byending of the warre. So hee easily preuailed with the rest, to assent hereunto: forasmuch as it was Winter, a time vnfit for seruice in the warre; and since, without authoritie of the Senate, he should be vnable to proceed resoluedly either in Warre or peace. Further, he willed them to send their seuerall Embassadours to Rome: which intimating vnto the Senate what each of them required, should easily hinder Philip, from obtaining any thing to their preiudice. Among the rest hee perswaded King Aminander, to make a iourney to Rome in person: knowing wel, that the name of a King, together with the confluence of so many Embassadours, would serue to make his owne actions more glorious in the Citie. All this tended to procure, that his owne Command of the Armie in Greece might be prorogued. And to the same end had he dealt with some of the Tribunes of the people at Rome: who had already (though as yet he knew not so much) obtained it for him, partly by their authoritie, partly by good reasons vvhich they alleaged vnto the Senate.

The Embassadours of the Greeks, when they had audience at Rome, spake bitterly against the King, with good liking of the Senate; vvhich was more desirous of victorie, than of satisfaction. They magnified the honourable purpose of the Romans, in vndertaking to set Greece at libertie. But this (they said) could neuer be effected; vnlesse especiall care were taken, that the King should bee dispossessed of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. In this point they vvere so vehement, producing a Map of the Countrey, and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in seruilitie; litie; that the Senate agreed to haue it euen ſo as they deſired. When therfore the Embaſſadours of Philip were brought in, and began to haue made a long Oration; they were briefly cut off in the middeſt of their Preface, with this one demand: whether their Maſter would yeeld vp Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias: Heereto they made anſwere, That, concerning thoſe places, the King had giuen them no direction or Commiſſion what to ſay, or doe. This was enough. The Senate would no longer harken to Philips deſire of peace; wherein they ſaid hee did no better than trifle. Yet might his Embaſſadours haue truely ſaide, That neither the Ætolians, Achæans, nor any of their fellowes, had in the late Treatie required by name, that Chalcis and Demetrias ſhould be yeelded vp. For which of them indeed could make any Claime to either of theſe Townes? As for Corinth, whereto the Achæans had ſome right; (though their right were no better, than that, hauing ſtolne it from One Macedonian King in a night, they had, after mature deliberation, made it away by bargaine vnto an Other) Philip had alreadie condeſcended to giue it backe vnto them. And this perhaps would haue beene alleadged, euen againſt the Greekes in excuſe of the King, by ſome of T. Quintius his friends; that ſo hee might haue had the honour to conclude the warre, if a Succeſſor had beene decreed vnto him. But ſince Hee was appointed to continue Generall: neither his friends at Rome, nor Hee himſelfe, after the returne of the Embaſſadours into Greece, cared to giue eare vnto any talke of peace.

Philip, ſeeing that his Achæans had forſaken him, and ioyned with their common enemies; thought euen to deale with them in the like manner, by reconciling himſelfe vnto Nabis, whom they hated moſt. There were not many yeeres paſt, ſince the Lacedæmonians vnder Cleomenes, with little other helpe than their owne ſtrength, had beene almoſt ſtrong enough both for the Macedonians and Achæans together. But now the condition of things was altered. Nabis his force conſiſted in a manner wholly in his Mercinaries: for he was a Tyrant; though ſtiling himſelfe King. Yet he ſorely vexed the Achæans: and therefore ſeemed vnto Philip one likely to ſtand him in great ſtead, if he could be won. To this purpoſe it was thought meet, that the Towne of Argos, which could not otherwiſe be eaſily defended, ſhould bee conſigned ouer into his hands; in hope, that ſuch a benefit would ſerue to tie him faſt vnto the Macedonian. Philocles the Kings Lieutenant, who was appointed to deale with Nabis, added further, That it was his Maſters purpoſe to make a ſtreight alliance with the Lacedæmonian, by giuing ſome daughters of his owne in marriage vnto Nabis his ſonnes. This could not but be well taken. Yet Nabis made ſome ſcruple in accepting the Towne of Argos; vnleſſe by decree of the citizens themſelues He might be called into it. Hereabout Philocles dealt with the Argiues: but found them ſo auerſe; that, in open aſſemblie of the people, they deteſted the verie name of the Tyrant, with many railing words. Nabis hearing of this, thought hee had thereby a good occaſion to rob and fleece them. So hee willed Philocles, without more adoe, to make ouer the Towne which he was readie to receiue. Philocles accordingly did let him with his Armie into it by night; and gaue him poſſeſſion of the ſtrongeſt places therein. Thus dealt Philip with the Argiues: who for very loue had forſaken the Achæans, to take his part. Early in the morning, the Tyrant made himſelfe Maſter of all the Gates. A few of the principall men, vnderſtanding how things went, fled out of the Citie at the firſt tumult. Wherefore they were all baniſhed, and their goods confiſcated. The reſt of the chiefe Citizens that ſtayed behinde, were commaunded to bring foorth, out of hand, all their Gold and Siluer. Alſo a great impoſition of money was laid vpon all thoſe, that were thought able to pay it. Such as made their contribution readily, were diſmiſſed without more adoe. But if any ſtood long vpon the matter: or played the theeues, in purloyning their owne goods; they were put to the whip, and, beſides loſſe of their wealth, had their torments to boot. This done, the Tyrant began to make popular Lawes: namely ſuch, as might ſerue to make him gracious with the raſcall multitude: abro-

gating all debts, and diuiding the Lands of the rich among the poore. By such art of oppressing the great ones, it hath beene an olde custome of Tyrants, to assure themselues of the Vulgar for a time.

As soone as Nabis had gotten Argos, Hee sent the newes to T. Quintius; and offered to joyne with him against Philip. Titus was glad of it: so as he tooke the paines to crosse ouer the Streights into Peloponnesus, there to meet with Nabis. They had soone agreed (though King Attalus, who was present with the Consul, made some cauill touching Argos) and the Tyrant lent vnto the Romans sixe hundred of his Mercinaries of Crete: as also hee agreed with the Achaans, vpon a Truce for foure moneths, reseruing the finall conclusion of peace betweene them vntill the Warre of Philip should be ended; which after this continued not long.

§. XIIII.

The battaile at Cynoscephalæ, wherein PHILIP was vanquished by T. QVINTIVS.

TITVS QVINTIVS, as soone as he vnderstood that he was appointed to haue Command of the Armie, without any other limitation of time, than during the pleasure of the Senate; made all things readie for diligent pursuit of the Warre. The like did Philip: who hauing failed in his negotiation of peace, and no lesse failed in his hopes of getting Nabis to friend in that Warre; meant afterwardes wholly to relie vpon himselfe.

Plut. in vita T. Q. Flam.

Titus had in his Armie about sixe and twentie thousand: and Philip a proportionable number. But neither of them knew the others strength, or what his Enemie intended to doe. Onely Titus heard that Philip was in Thessalie; and thereupon addressed himselfe to seeke him out. They had like to haue met vnawares, neere vnto the Citie of Pheræ: where the vant-courriers on both sides discouered each other; and sent word thereof vnto their seuerall Captaines. But neither of them were ouerhastie, to commit all to hazard vpon so short warning. The day following each of them sent out three hundred Horse, with as many light armed Foot, to make a better discouerie. These met, and fought a long while: returning finally backe into their seuerall Campes, with little aduantage vnto either side. The Countrie about Pheræ was thicke set with Trees: and otherwise full of Gardens and mud-walles; which made it vnproper for seruice of the Macedonian Phalanx. Wherefore the King dislodged, intending to remoue back vnto Scotusa in the Frontier of Macedon; where he might be plentifully serued with all necessaries. Titus conceiued aright his meaning: and therefore purposed also to march thitherwards; were it only to waste the Countrie. There lay betweene them a great ledge of hils, which hindered the one from knowing what course the other tooke. Neuertheless they encamped not farre asunder, both the first and the second night; though neither of them vnderstood what was become of the other. The third day was very tempestuous; and forced each of them to take vp his lodging, where he found it, by chance. Then sent they forth discouerers againe, in greater number than before. These meeting together, held a long fight, wherein at first the Macedonians had the worse. But Philip anon sent in such strong supply; that if the resistance of the Ætolians had not beene desperate, the Romans their fellowes had beene driuen backe into their Campe. Yet, all resistance notwithstanding, the Macedonians preuailed: so that Titus himselfe was faine to bring foorth his Legions, that were not a little discouraged, by the defeat of all their Horse, to animate those which were in flight.

It was altogether besides the Kings purpose, to put the fortune of a battaile in trust that day, with so much of his estate as might thereon depend. But the newes came to him thicke and tumultuouſly, how the enemies fled, and how the day was his own; if he could vſe an occaſion, the like whereof he ſhould not often find. This cauſed him to alter his purpoſe: inſomuch as he embattailed his men; and climbed vp thoſe hils, which, for that the knops thereon had ſome reſemblance vnto Dogs heads, were called, by a word ſignifying as much, Cynoſcephalæ. As ſoone as hee was on the hil-top; it did him good to ſee that they of his owne light armature were buſie in fight, almoſt at the verie Campe of the Enemies; whom they had repelled ſo farre. He had alſo libertie to chooſe his ground, as might ſerue beſt his aduantage: foraſmuch as the Romans were quite driuen from all parts of the Hill. But of this commoditie he could make no great vſe: the roughneſſe of the place among thoſe Dogs heads, as they were called, ſeruing nothing aptly for his Phalanx. Neuertheleſſe hee found conuenient roome, wherein to marſhall the one part of his Armie: and gaue order vnto his Captaines, to follow with the reſt; embattailing them as they might. Whileſt hee was doing this: Hee perceiued that his Horſemen and light armature beganne to ſhrinke; as being falne vpon the Roman Legions, by force whereof they were driuen to recoyle. He ſets forward to helpe them: and they no leſſe haſtily draw vnto him for ſuccour; hauing the Romans not farre behinde them.

As the Legions beganne to climbe the Hill; Philip commanded thoſe of his Phalanx to charge their pikes, and entertaine them. Heere Titus found an extreme difficult piece of worke. For this Phalanx, being a great ſquare battaile of armed pikes, like in all points to thoſe which are now vſed in our moderne Warres: and being in like manner vſed, as are ours; was not to bee reſiſted by the Roman Targettiers, as long as the Phalanx it ſelfe held together vndiſſolued. The Macedonians were embattailed in very cloſe order: ſo that two of them ſtood oppoſite to one of the Romans; as alſo the pikes of the firſt ranke, had their points aduanced two or three foot before their fore-man. Wherfore it is no maruel, if the Romans gaue backe: euery one of them being troubled (as it were) with tenne enemies at once; and not able to come neerer vnto the next of them, than the length of a doozen foot or thereabout. Titus finding this, and not knowing how to remedie it; was greatly troubled: for that ſtill the Phalanx bare downe all which came in the way. But in the meane while hee obſerued, That they which were appointed by Philip to make his left wing, were not able through the much vneuenneſſe of the ground, to put themſelues in order: ſo as either they kept their places on the Hil-tops; or elſe (which was worſe) vpon deſire either of beholding the paſtime, or of ſeeming to bee partakers in the worke, ranne fooliſhly along by the ſide of their fellowes, which were occupied in fight.

Of this their diſorder Hee made great and preſent vſe. Hee cauſed the right wing of his Battaile to march vp the hill, againſt theſe ill ordered troupes: his Elephants leading the way, to increaſe the terrour. The Macedonians were readier to diſpute what ſhould bee done in ſuch a caſe, than well aduiſed what to doe; as hauing no one man appointed, to command that part in chiefe. Indeede if they ſhould haue done their beſt, it could not haue ſerued; ſince the ground whereon they ſtood, made their weapons vnuſefull. For let it be ſuppoſed, that Philip hauing ſixe and twentie thouſand in his Armie (as he is ſaid to haue beene equall to the Enemie in number) had foure thouſand Horſe, foure thouſand Targettiers, and foure thouſand light-armed: ſo ſhall there remaine fourteene thouſand Pikes; whereof hee himſelfe had embattailed the one halfe in a Phalanx; the other halfe in the left wing, are they whom Quintius is readie now to charge. The Phalanx hauing vſually ſixeteene in File, muſt, when it conſiſted of ſeuen thouſand, haue well neere foure hundred and fortie in ranke: but foure hundred would ſerue, to make a Front long enough; the other fortie or ſeuen and thirtie Files might bee cut off, and reckoned in the number of the Targettiers, or light-armed. Allowing therefore, as Polybius doth, to euery man of them three foote of ground: this Front muſt haue occupied twelue hundred Foote, or two hundred and forty paces; that that is, very neere a quarter of a mile in length. Such a ſpace of open Champaine, free from incumbrance of Trees, Ditches, Hillocks, or the like impediments, that muſt of neceſſitie diſioyne this cloſe battaile of the Phalanx; was not euery where to be found. Here at Cynoſcephalæ Philip had ſo much roome, as would onely ſuffice for the one halfe of his men: the reſt were faine to ſtand ſtill and looke about them; being hindred from putting themſelues in order, by the roughneſſe of the Dogges heads. But the Romans, to whom all grounds were much alike, were not hindered from comming vp vnto them; nor found any difficultie in maſtring thoſe enemies, whoſe feet were in a manner bound by the diſcommoditie of the place. The very firſt impreſſion of the Elephants, cauſed them to giue backe; and the comming on of the Legions, to betake themſelues vnto flight. A Roman Tribune or Colonell, ſeeing the victorie on that part aſſured, left the proſequution of it vnto others: and being followed by twenty Enſignes or Maniples, that is, (as they might fall out) by ſome two thouſand men, tooke in hand a notable piece of worke; and mainely helpfull to making of the Victorie complete. Hee conſidered that Philip, in purſuing the right wing of the Romans, was runne on ſo farre; as that himſelfe with his fellowes, in mounting the Hill to charge the left wing of the Macedonians, was already gotten aboue the Kings head. Wherefore hee turned to the left hand: and making downe the Hill after the Kings Phalanx, fell vpon it in the Rere. The hindmoſt rankes of the Phalanx, all of them indeed ſaue the firſt fiue, were accuſtomed, when the battailes came to joyning, to carrie their Pikes vpright; and with the whole weight of their bodies to thruſt on their foremen: and ſo were they doing at the preſent. This was another great inconuenience in the Macedonian Phalanx, That it ſerued neither for offence nor defence, except onely in Front. For though it were ſo, that Alexander, when he was to fight with Darius in Meſopotamia, arranged his Phalanx in ſuch order, that all the foure ſides of it were as ſo many Fronts looking ſundry wayes, becauſe hee expected that he ſhould be encompaſſed round: yet it is to bee vnderſtood, that herein he altered the vſuall forme; as alſo at the ſame time he embattailed his men in looſe order, that ſo with eaſe they might turne their weapons, which way need ſhould require. Like wiſe it is to be conſidered, That Alexanders men being thus diſpoſed, were fit onely to keep their owne ground; not being able to follow vpon the Enemie, vnleſſe their hindmoſt rankes could haue marched backwards. But in this preſent caſe of Philip, there was no ſuch prouiſion for reſiſtance. Therefore his men, being otherwiſe vnable to helpe themſelues, threw downe their weapons, and fled. The King himſelfe had thought vntill now, that the fortune of the battaile was euery where alike, and the day his owne. But hearing the noyſe behind him, and turning a little aſide with a troupe of Horſe, to ſee how all went: when he beheld his men caſting downe their weapons, and the Romans at his backe on the higher ground; Hee preſently betooke himſelfe to flight. Neither ſtaid hee afterwards in any place (except onely a ſmall while about Tempe, there to collect ſuch as were diſperſed in this ouerthrow) vntill hee was gotten into his owne Kingdome of Macedon.

There died of the Roman Armie in this battaile, about ſeuen hundred: of the Macedonians about eight thouſand were ſlaine; and fiue thouſand taken Priſoners.

§. XV.

§. XV.

T. QVINTIVS falleth out with the Ætolians; and grantes truce vnto PHILIP, with conditions, vpon which the peace is ratified. Libertie proclaimed vnto the Greeks. The Romans quarrell with ANTIOCHVS.

THe Ætolians wonderfully vanted themselues; and desired to haue it noised through all Greece, That the victorie at Cynoscephalæ was gotten (in a manner) wholly by their valour. They had gotten indeed the most of the bootie; by sacking the Macedonian Campe, whilest the Romans were busied in the chace. Titus therefore being offended both at their vaine glory, and at their rauenous condition; purposed to teach them better maners, by regarding them as slightly, as they thought highly of themselues. He also well perceiued, That by vsing them with any extraordinarie fauor, he should greatly offend the rest of his Confederates in Greece; who detested the Ætolians much more vehemently, than euer they had done the Macedonians. But this displeasure brake not foorth yet awhile.

After the battaile Titus made haste vnto Larissa, a Citie of Thessalie: which he presently tooke. Before his comming, Philip had sent thither one of his Courtiers to burne all his letters, and passages whatsoeuer in writing, betwixt him and others: of which many were there kept. It was well done of the King, that among the cares of so much aduersitie, he forgot not to prouide for the safetie of his friends. Yet by his thus doing, they of Larissa might well perceiue, that hee gaue them as alreadie lost. Wherefore wee finde not that they, or any of their neighbours, did make delay of opening their gates to Titus. At the same time, the Towne of Leucas bordering vpon Acarnania, was taken by the Roman Fleete: and verie soone after, all the Acarnanians, a warlike Nation, and in hatred of the Ætolians euer true to Philip; gaue vp themselues vnto the Romans, hearing of the victorie at Cynoscephalæ. The Rhodians also were then in hand with the conquest of Perœa, a Region of the Continent ouer against their Iland; whereof they had demanded restitution, in the late Treatie of peace with Philip. They did herein more manly, than any other of the Greekes: forasmuch as they awaited not the good leisure of the Romans; but with an Armie of their owne, and some helpe which they borrowed of the Achæans and other their friends, gaue battaile to Dinocrates the Kings Leiutenant, wherein they had the victorie, and consequently recouered the whole Prouince. It angred Philip worse than all this, that the Dardanians gathered courage out of his affliction, to inuade his Kingdome; wasting and spoyling, as if all had beene abandoned to their discretion. This made him gather an Armie in all haste, of sixe thousand foot and fiue hundred horse: wherewith comming vpon them, he draue them, with little or no losse of his owne, and great slaughter of theirs, hastily out of the Kingdome. Which done, He returned to Thessalonica.

In this one enterprise Hee had successe answerable to his desire: but seeing what bad fortune accompanied his affaires, in all other parts at the same time, he thought it wisedome to yeeld vnto necessitie; and therefore sent in all haste Limnæus and Demosthenes, with Cycliadas the banished Achæan, in whom hee reposed much confidence, Embassadours vnto Titus. These had conference a long while in priuate, with Titus and some of his Roman Colonels: by whom they were gently entertained, and in very friendly wise dismissed. It seemes that they had Commission, to referre all vnto Titus his owne discretion; as Philip himselfe in few dayes after did. There was granted vnto them a Truce for fifteene dayes: in which time, the King himselfe might come and speake with the Roman General. In the meane season manie nie ſuſpitious rumors went of Titus; as if he had been corrupted with great rewards from the King, to betray the Greekes his Confederates. Of theſe bruits the Ætolians were chiefe authors: who being wont to regard neither friendſhip nor honeſtie, where profit led them a wrong way, iudged alike of all men elſe. But againſt the day appointed for the meeting betwixt him and Philip, Titus had ſent letters vnto his Aſſociates; willing them to haue their Agents readie by a time appointed, at the entrance of Tempe, where the Treatie ſhould be held. There when they were all aſſembled, they entred into conſultation before the Kings arriuall, what ſhould be moſt expedient for the common benefit of them all, and for euery Eſtate in particular. The poore King Aminander beſought them all, and eſpecially the Romans, that they would think vpon him; and conſidering his weaknes which he confeſſed, make ſuch prouiſion, that after the Romanes had turned their backs, and were gone home, Philip might not wreake his anger vpon him who was not able to reſiſt. Then ſpake Alexander one of the Ætolians: who commending Titus for ſo much as he had thus aſſembled the Confederates to aduiſe vpon their owne good, and had willed them to deliuer their mindes freely: added, That in the maine of the purpoſe which hee had in hand, hee was vtterly deceiued: for that by making peace with Philip, hee could neither aſſure the Romans of their quiet, nor the Greeks of their libertie. There was, he ſaid, none other end to be made of the warre, which could agree either with the purpoſe of the Senate and People of Rome, or with the faire promiſes made by Titus himſelfe vnto the Greeks, than the chacing of Philip quite out of his Kingdome. And to this effect he made a long diſcourſe. But Titus anſwered, That this Aetolian was ill acquainted, either with the good pleaſure of the Senate and People of Rome, or with the laudable cuſtomes which they generally held: for that it was not the manner of the Romans, to ſeeke the vtter deſtruction of any King or Nation, at ſuch time as they firſt made warre with them; vntill by ſome rebellion they found it a matter of neceſſitie, to take ſuch a rigorous courſe. And heereof he alleaged the Carthaginians as a notable example: adding, That victorie, to generous mindes, was onely an inducement vnto moderation: As concerning the publike benefit of Greece: it was (he ſaid) expedient, that the Kingdome of Macedon ſhould be greatly weakened and brought low; not that it ſhould bee vtterly deſtroyed: foraſmuch as it ſerued as a barre, to the Thracians, Gaules, and a multitude of other ſauage Nations, which would ſoone ouer-flow the whole Continent of Greece, if this kingdome were not interpoſed. Wherefore he concluded, that if Philip would yeeld vnto thoſe demands, wherewith he had preſſed him in the former Treatie; then was there no reaſon to denie him peace. As for the Aetolians: if they thought otherwiſe, it ſhould bee at their owne pleaſure, to take counſaile apart for themſelues as they thought good. Then began Phaneas, another of the Aetolians, to ſay, That all was come to nothing; for that ere long, Philip would trouble all the Greekes, no leſſe than hee had done in time before. But Titus interrupted him, and bad him leaue his babling; ſaying, That himſelfe would take ſuch order, as that Philip, were he neuer ſo deſirous, ſhould thenceforth not haue it in his power to moleſt the Greekes.

The next day King Philip came thither: whom Titus vſed friendly: and ſuffering him to repoſe himſelfe that night, held a Councell the day following; wherein the King yeelded vnto all that had beene required at his hands; offering yet further to ſtand to the good pleaſure of the Senate, if they would haue more added to the Conditions. Phaneas the Ætolian, inſulting ouer him, ſaid it was to bee hoped, that he would then at length giue vp to the Ætolians a many of townes (which he there named) bidding him ſpeake, whether he would, or not. His anſwere was, that they might take them all. But Titus interpoſing himſelfe, ſaid it ſhould be otherwiſe; Theſe were Theſſalian Townes, and ſhould all bee free: one of them onely excepted, which not long agoe had refuſed to commit it ſelfe to the faith of the Romans, and therefore ſhould now bee giuen to the Ætolians. Hereat Phaneas cried out that it was too great an iniurie, thus to defraud them of the Townes that had ſometime belonged belonged vnto their Common-weale. Rather he willed Titus to conſider, that by an ancient Couenant betweene them and the Romans, all the Townes taken ought to be their owne, and the Romans to haue nothing ſaue the pillage and captiues. It is true, that there had beene ſuch a Condition in the former warre: but it ceaſed to be of any validitie, as ſoone as the Ætolians made peace with Philip. And thus much Titus gaue them to vnderſtand; asking them whether they thought it reaſonable, that all the Townes in Greece, which had let in the Romans by compoſition, ſhould be deliuered into ſubiection of the Ætolians. The reſt of the Confederates were verie much delighted, with theſe angry paſſages betweene the Roman and the Ætolians: neither had they great reaſon to feare any hard meaſure; ſince Titus was ſo earneſt in behalfe of thoſe Theſſalians, to giue them libertie, though they had ſtood out againſt him, euen till very feare made them open their gates. Whereforethey oppoſed not themſelues; but gaue their conſent willingly vnto a Truce for foure Moneths.

The chiefe cauſe that mooued Titus to grant peace ſo readily to the Macedonian, beſides that laudable cuſtome by him before alleadged; was, the fame of Antiochus his comming with an Armie from Syria, and drawing neere toward Europe. Hee had alſo perhaps yet a greater motiue; euen the conſideration that his ſucceſſor might happen to defraud him of the honour, if the warre ſhould happen to be protracted. And hee was in the right: For when his letters, together with Embaſſadours from the Macedonian, and ſundry States of Greece, came vnto Rome, new Conſuls were choſen: who, (eſpecially the one of them) ſtood very earneſtly againſt the peace; alleadging friuolous matter of their owne ſuſpition, in hope to get the honour of concluding the warre. The Senate began to be doubtfully affected, betweene the Embaſſadors of Philip, offering to ſtand to whatſoeuer was demanded, and the letters of Titus preſſing them to accept this offer, on the one ſide; and the importunitie of the Conſul on the other; who ſaid, that all theſe goodly ſhewes were fraudulent, and that the King would rebell, as ſoone as the Armie was called out of Greece. But the matter was taken out of the Senatours hands by two of the Tribunes, that referred it to an Aſſemblie of the People; by whoſe ſouereigne authoritie it was concluded, That Peace ſhould be granted vnto the King. So tenne Embaſſadors were ſent from Rome ouer into Greece: in which number were they, that had beene Conſuls before Titus; and it was ordained by their aduice, That Titus ſhould goe through with the buſineſſe of Peace. Theſe would very faine haue retained thoſe three important Cities of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias, vntill the ſtate of Greece were ſomewhat better ſettled. But finally Titus preuailed ſo, that Corinth was (though not immediately) rendered vnto the Achæans; and all the other Greeke Townes which Philip held, as well in Aſia as in Greece, reſtored vnto libertie.

The Conditions of the Peace granted vnto Philip, were, That before the celebration of the next Iſthmian Games*, He ſhould withdraw his Garriſons out of all the Greeke Townes which he held, and conſigne them oner to the Romans: That hee ſhould deliuer vp vnto them all Captiues that he had of theirs, and all Renegado's: Likewiſe all his ſhippes of warre, reſeruing to himſelfe onely fiue of the leſſer ſort, and one of extraordinarie greatneſſe, wherein ſixteene men laboured at euery oare: Further, that hee would pay a thouſand talents, the one halfe in hand, the other in ten yeeres next following, by euen portions. Hereto Liuie* addes, That he was forbidden to make warre out of Macedon, without permiſſion of the Senate. But I finde not that he obſerued this Article, or was at any time charged with the breach of it. Foure hundred talents hee had alreadie deliuered vnto Titus, together with his yonger ſonne Demetrius, to remaine as hoſtage for his true dealing in this matter of peace, at ſuch time as hee lately ſent his Embaſſadours to Rome: when it was promiſed, that the money, and his ſonne, ſhould be reſtored backe vnto him, if the Senate were not pleaſed with the agreement. Whether this money were reckoned as part of the thousand talents, I cannot finde: and it seemeth otherwise, forasmuch as yong Demetrius, who together with those foure hundred Talents was giuen for hostage, remained still in custodie of the Romans, as a part of the bargaine which Titus formerly had made. Letters also were then sent by Titus vnto Prusias King of Bithynia: giuing him to vnderstand what agreement was made with Philip in behalfe of the Greekes; and how the Senate held it reasonable, that the Cians, most miserably spoiled and oppressed by Philip to gratifie this Bithynian his sonne-in-law, should be restored to libertie, and permitted to enioy the same benefit of the Romans, which other of their Nation did. What effect these letters wrought it was not greatly materiall; since the Romans were shortly busied with Antiochus, in such wise that they had not leisure to examine the conformitie of Prusias to their will.

All Greece rejoyced at the good bargaine which Titus had made with Philip. Onely the Ætolians found themselues agrieued that they were vtterly neglected; which was to the rest no smal part of their contentment. The Bœotians continued to fauour the Macedonian; and thereby occasioned much trouble vnto themselues. There were some among them wel-affected to the Romans: who seeing how things were like to goe, made their complaint vnto Titus; saying, that they were no better than lost, for the good will which they had borne vnto him; vnlesse at this time, when he lay close by them with his Armie, their Prætor which was head of the opposite Faction might be made away. Titus refused to haue an hand in the execution, yet neuertheless did animate them in their purpose. So they committed the fact, and hoped to haue kept themselues vndiscouered. But when the murder came out, and somewhat was confessed by those that were put to torture: the hatred of the people brake out violently against the Romans; in such wise, that howsoeuer they durst not take armes against them, yet such of them as they found straggling from their Campe, they murdered in all parts of the Countrie. This was detected within awhile, and many of the dead bodies found. Herevpon Titus requires of the Bœotians, to haue the murderers deliuered into his hands; and for fiue hundred souldiers, which he had lost by them, to haue paid vnto him fiue hundred Talents. In stead of making any such amends, they paid him with excuses; which he would not take as good satisfaction. Hee sends Embassadours to the Achæans and Athenians, informing them what had happened: and requested them not to take it amisse, though he dealt with these their friends as they had deserued. Herewithall he fals to wasting their Countrie; and besiegeth two such Townes of theirs, as did seeme to bee most culpable of the murders lately done. But the Embassadours of the Achæans and Athenians, (especially of the Achæans who offered, if he needed them, to helpe him in this warre; yet besought him rather to grant peace vnto the Bœotians) preuailed so farre with him; that he was pacified with thirtie Talents, and the punishment of such as were knowne offendors.

In like sort, though not so violently, were many States of Greece distracted: some among them reioycing that they were free from the Macedonian; others greatly doubting, that the Roman would proue a worse neighbour. The Ætolians would haue beene glad of any Commotion; and therefore published rumors abroad, That it was the purpose of the Romans, to keepe in their owne handes all those places, wherein Philip lately had his Garrisons. Little did they, or the rest of the Greekes, conceiue, that this Macedonian Warre serued as an introduction to the Warre to bee made in Asia against King Antiochus; where grew the fruit, that was to be reaped of this and many other victories. Wherefore to stay the progresse of bad rumors when the Isthmian games were held, which in time of peace vvere neuer without great solemnitie and concourse: Titus in that great assembly of all Greece, caused proclamation to be made by sound of Trumpet to this effect, That the Senate and people of Rome, and Titus Quintius Flaminius the Generall, hauing vanquished King Philip and the Macedonians, did wil to be at libertie, free from Impositions, free from Garrisons, and liuing at their owne Lawes, the Corinthians, Phocians, Locrians, Eubœans, Eubœans, Achæans of Phthiotis, Magnetians, Thessalians, and Perrhæbians. The suddennesse of this Proclamation astonished men: so as though they applauded it with a great shout; yet presently they cried out to heare it againe, as if they durst scarce credit their owne eares. The Greeks were Crafts-masters in the Art of giuing thanks; which they rendred now to T. Quintius with so great affection, as that they had welneere smothered him, by thronging officiously about him.

This good will of all the Greekes, was like to bee much more auaileable vnto the Romans in their warre against Antiochus, than could haue beene the possession of a few Townes, yea or of all those Prouinces which were named in their Proclamation. Vpon confidence heereof, no sooner were these Isthmian games at an end, than Titus, with the Romans that were of his Councell, gaue audience to Hagesianax and Lysias King Antiochus his Embassadours: whom they willed to signifie vnto their Lord, That he should doe well to abstaine from the free Cities in Asia, and not vexe them with warre: as also to restore whatsoeuer he had occupied, belonging to the Kings, Ptolomie or Philip. Moreouer they willed him by these his Embassadours, that he should not passe ouer his Armie into Europe; adding, That some of them would visit him in person ere it were long, to talke with him further concerning these points. This done, they fell to accomplishing their promises vnto the Greekes; to the rest they gaue what they had promised. But the Phocians and Locrians they gaue vnto the Ætolians; whom they thought it no wisedome to offend ouer-much, being shortly to take a greater worke in hand. The Achæans of Phthiotis they annexed vnto the Thessalians; all saue the Towne of Thebes in Phthiotis, the same which had beene abandoned by T. Quintius to the Ætolians in the last Treatie with Philip. The Ætolians contended very earnestly about Pharsalus and Leucas. But they were put off with a dilatorie answere, and rejected vnto the Senate: for how soeuer somewhat the Councell might fauour them; yet was it not meet that they should haue their will, as it were in despight of Titus. So the Achæans were restored Corinth, Triphylia, and Herea. So the Corinthians were made free indeede (though the Romans yet awhile kept the Acrocorinthus) for that all which were partakers of the Achæan Commonwealth, enjoyed their libertie in as absolute manner, as they could desire. To Pleuratus the Illyrian were giuen one or two places, taken by the Romans from Philip: and vpon Aminander were bestowed those Castles, which hee had gotten from Philip during this Warre; to reigne in them and the grounds which they commanded, as he did among his Athamanians. The Rhodians had been their owne Caruers. Attalus was dead a little before the Victorie; and therefore lost his share. Yet many that were with Titus in Councell, would haue giuen the Townes of Oreum and Eretria, in the Ile of Eubœa, to his sonne and successour King Eumenes. But finally it was concluded, that these as well as the rest of the Eubœans, should be suffered to enjoy their libertie. Orestis, a little Prouince of the Kingdome of Macedon, bordering on Epirus, and lying towards the Ionian Sea, had yeelded vnto the Romans long ere this, and since continued true to them: for which cause it was also set at libertie, and made a free estate by it selfe.

These businesses being dispatcht; it remained, that all care should be vsed, not how to auoid the war with King Antiochus, but how to accomplish it with most ease and prosperity. Wherefore Embassadours were sent both to Antiochus himselfe, to picke matter of quarrell; and about vnto others, to prædispose them vnto the assisting of the Romans therein. What ground and matter of Warre against this King the Romans now had, or shortly after found: as also how their Embassadours and Agents dealt and sped abroad; I referre vnto another place.

§. I.

Polyb. lib. 2.

SELEVCVS NICATOR, the first of his race, King of Asia and Syria, died in the end of the hundred twentie and fourth Olympiad. Hee was trecherously slaine by Ptolemie Ceraunus, at an Altar called Argos; hauing (as is saide) beene warned before by an Oracle, to beware of Argos, as the fatall place of his death. But I neuer haue read that any mans life hath beene preserued, or any mischance auoided, by the predictions of such Deuilish Oracles. Rather I beleeue, That many such predictions of the Heathen Gods, haue beene ante-dated by their Priests or by others; which deuised them after the euent.

Antiochus Soter, the sonne and heire of this Seleucus, was dearely beloued of his Father: who surrendred vp vnto him his owne wife Stratonica, when hee vnderstood how much the young Prince was enamoured on her. Wherefore Ptolemie Ceraunus had great cause to feare, that the death of Seleucus would not bee vnreuenged by this his Successor. But Antiochus was contented to be pacified, either with gifts, or perhaps onely with faire words; containing himselfe within Asia, and letting Ceraunus enioy that quietly, which he had purchased in Europe with the bloud of Seleucus. It is said of this Antiochus, that although he married with the Queen Stratonica in his Fathers life; yet out of modestie he forbore to embrace her, till his Father was dead. So that perhaps his incestuous loue was partly, if not chiefly, the cause of his not prosecuting that reuenge; whereunto Nature should haue vrged him. Afterwards he had warres with Antigonus Gonatas, and with Nicomedes King of Bithynia. Also Lutarius and Leonorius, Kings or Captaines of the Gaules, were set vpon him by the same Nicomedes. With these he fought a great battaile: wherein though otherwise the Enemies had all aduantage against him; yet by the terror of his Elephants, which affrighted both their Horses and them, he wonne the Victorie. Hee tooke in hand an enterprise against Ptolemie Philadelphus: but finding ill successe in the beginning, he soone gaue it ouer. To this King Antiochus Soter it was, that Berosus the Chaldean dedicated his Historie of the Kings of Assyria; the same, which hath since beene excellently falsified by the Frier Annius. He left behind him one sonne, called Antiochus Theos; and one daughter, called Apame, that was married vnto the King of Cyrene. So he died about the end of the hundred twentie and ninth Olympiad, or the beginning of the Olympiad following, in the fiftieth or one and fiftieth yeere of the Kingdome of the Greekes; when he had raigned nineteene yeeres.

Gentbrard. lib. 2. Iust. Mart. in Paran.

Antiochus, surnamed Theos or the god, had this vaine and impious title giuen vnto him, by flatterie of the Milesians; whom hee deliuered from Timarchus, a Tyrant that oppressed them. He held long and difficult, but fruitlesse, warre with Ptolemie Phi-

Philadelphus King of Ægypt; which finally he compounded, by taking to wife Berenice the daughter of Ptolemie.

Of theſe two Kings, and of this Ladie Berenice, Saint Hierome and other Interpreters haue vnderſtood that Prophecie of DANIEL: The Kings daughter of the South, ſhall come to the King of the North, to make an agreement; and that which followeth. Dan.c.11.v.6.

Ptolemie Philadelphus was a great louer of Peace and Learning; and (ſetting apart his inceſtuous marriage with his owne ſiſter Arſinoe) a very excellent Prince: howſoeuer, the worthieſt of all that race. It was Hee, that built and furniſhed with Bookes, that famous Librarie in Alexandria: which to adorne, and to honour the more, Hee ſent vnto Eleazar then high Prieſt of the Iewes, for the Bookes of Moſes and other Scriptures. The benefits of this King vnto the Iewes, had formerly bin very great: for He had ſet at libertie as many of them, as his Father held in ſlauerie throughout all Ægypt; and hee had ſent vnto the * Temple of God in Hieruſalem very rich Preſents. Wherefore Eleazar yeelding to the Kings deſire, preſented him with an Hebrew coppie: which Ptolemie cauſed to be tranſlated into Greeke, by ſeuentie two of the moſt graue and learned perſons, that could bee found among all the Tribes. In this number of the ſeuentie two Interpreters, or (as they are commonly called) the Seuantie; Ieſus the ſonne of Sirach, is thought by Genebrard to haue beene one: who that he liued in this Age, it ſeemes to me very ſufficiently prooued by Ianſenius, in his Preface vnto Eccleſiaſticus. The whole paſſage of this buſineſſe between Philadelphus and the High Prieſt, was written (as h Ioſephus affirmes) by Ariſtæus that was employed therein. Fortie yeeres Ptolemie Philadelphus was King; reckoning the time wherein hee ioyntly reigned with his Father. Hee was exceedingly beloued of his people; and highly magnified by Poets, and other Writers. Towards his end hee grew more voluptuous, than hee had beene in his former yeeres: in which time he boaſted, that hee alone had found out the way how to liue for euer. If this had beene referred vnto his honourable deeds, it might haue ſtood with reaſon: otherwiſe, the Gowt, with which hee was often troubled, was enough to teach him his owne errour. He was the firſt of the Kings, deriued from Alexanders Succeſſors, that entred into League with the Romans: as alſo his Off-ſpring was the laſt among thoſe Royall Families, which by them was rooted vp.

h Ioſan.l.12.c.2 Concerning that Booke which now goes vnder the name of Ariſtæus; many learned men, and among the reſt Lodouicus Viues, hold ſuſpition that it is counterfeit, and the inuention of ſome later Author. Surely if it were to be ſuſpected in the time of Viues; it may be now much more iuſtly ſuſpected: ſince a new Edition of it is come foorth, purged from faults (as the Papiſts terme thoſe bookes, wherein they haue changed what they pleaſe) and ſet foorth by Middendorpius at Colen. An. Dom. 1578.

Antiochus Theos had another wife, called Laodice, at ſuch time as he married with Berenice the daughter of this Ptolemie. After his ſecond marriage, hee vſed his firſt wife with no better regard, than if ſhee had beene his Concubine. Laodice hated him for this: yet aduentured not to ſeeke reuenge; vntill her own ſonne Seleucus Callinicus was of abilitie to bee King. This was two or three yeeres after the death of Ptolemie Philadelphus: at what time ſhee poyſoned her huſband Theos; and by permiſſion of Seleucus her ſonne, murdered Berenice, together with a ſonne that ſhe had borne to Antiochus. Iuſtine reports, that Berenice ſaued herſelfe, together with the yong Prince her child, awhile in the Sanctuarie at Daphne: and that not only ſome Cities of Aſia prepared to ſuccour her, but her brother Ptolemie Euergetes, King of Ægypt, came to reſcue her with an Armie; though too late, for ſhe was ſlaine before.

With ſuch cruelties Seleucus Callinicus, ſucceeding vnto his Father that had fifteene yeeres beene King, beganne his Reigne. His ſubjects were highly offended at his wicked nature; which they diſcouered in his firſt entrance. Wherefore it was like, that his Eſtate would haue beene much endangered, if Ptolemie Euergetes, who came againſt him, had not beene drawne backe into his owne Countrie, by ſome Commotions there in hand. For there were none that would beare armes againſt Ptolemie, in defence of their owne King: but rather they ſided with the Ægyptian; who tooke Laodice the Kings mother, and rewarded her with death as ſhee had well deſerued. Wherefore Seleucus, being freed from this inuaſion, by occaſion of thoſe domeſticall troubles which recalled Euergetes home into Ægypt; went about a dangerous

gerous piece of worke, euen to make Warre vpon his owne ſubiects, becauſe of their bad affection towards him; when as it had beene much better, by well deſeruing, to haue changed their hatred into loue. A great Fleet hee prepared: in furniſhing and manning whereof hee was at ſuch charges, that hee ſcarce left himſelfe any other hope, if that ſhould miſcarrie. Heerein hee embarqued himſelfe; and, putting to Sea, met with ſuch a tempeſt, as deuoured all ſaue himſelfe, and a very few of his friends that hardly eſcaped. This calamity, hauing left him nothing elſe in a manner than his naked body, turned neuertheleſſe to his great good; as anon after it ſeemed. For when his Subiects vnderſtood, in what ſort the Gods (as they conceiued it) had puniſhed him for his offences: they had commiſeration of his Eſtate; and, preſuming that hee would thenceforth become a new man, offered him their ſeruice with great alacritie. This reuiued him, and filled him with ſuch ſpirit; as thinking himſelfe well enough able to deale with the Ægyptian, he made ready a mightie Armie for that purpoſe. But his fortune was no better at Land, than it had beene at Sea. He was vanquiſhed by Ptolemie in a great battaile: whence he eſcaped hardly; no better attended, than after his late ſhipwracke. Hafting therefore backe to Antioch, and fearing that the Enemie would ſoone bee at his heeles; He wrote vnto his brother Antiochus Hierax, who lay then in Aſia, praying him to bring ſuccour with all ſpeed; and promiſing, in recompence of his faith and diligence, the Dominion of a great part of Aſia. Antiochus was then but fourteene yeeres olde, yet extremely ambitious; and therefore glad of ſuch an occaſion to make himſelfe great. He leuied a mighty Armie of the Gaules; wherewith he ſet forwards to helpe his brother; or rather to get what hee could for himſelfe. Hereof Ptolemie being aduertiſed: and hauing no deſire to put himſelfe in danger more than needed; tooke Truce with Seleucus for tenne yeeres. No ſooner was Seleucus freed from this care of the Ægyptian warre, but his brother Antiochus came vpon him; and needs would fight with him, as knowing himſelfe to haue the better Armie. So Seleucus was vanquiſhed againe; and ſaued himſelfe, with ſo few about him, that he was verily ſuppoſed to haue periſht in the battaile. Thus did Gods juſtice take reuenge of thoſe murders, by which the Crowne was purchaſed; and ſettled (as might haue beene thought) on the head of this bloudie King. Antiochus was glad to heare of his brothers death; as if thereby hee had purchaſed his hearts deſire. But the Gaules, his Mercinaries, were gladder than He. For when he led them againſt Eumenes King of Pergamus, in hope to get honour by making a Conqueſt in the beginning of his Reigne: theſe perfidious Barbarians tooke counſaile againſt him; and deuiſed how to ſtrippe him of all that hee had. They thought it very likely, that if there were none of the Royall houſe to make head againſt them; it would be in their power, to doe what ſhould beſt bee pleaſing to themſelues, in the lower Aſia. Wherefore they laide hands on Antiochus; and enforced him to ranſome himſelfe with money, as if hee had beene their lawfull Priſoner. Neither were they ſo contented; but made him enter into ſuch Compoſition with them, as tended little to his honour. In the meane while Seleucus had gathered a new Armie; and prepared once more to trie his fortune againſt his brother. Eumenes hearing of this, thought the ſeaſon fit for himſelfe, to make his profit of their diſcord. Antiochus fought with him, and was beaten: which is no great maruaile; ſince he had great reaſon to ſtand in no leſſe feare of the Gaules his owne ſouldiers, than of the enemie with whom hee had to deale. After this, Eumenes wanne much in Aſia; whileſt Antiochus went againſt his brother. In the ſecond battaile, fought betweene the brethren, Seleucus had the vpper hand: and Antiochus Hierax or the Hawke, (which ſurname was giuen him, becauſe he ſought his prey vpon euery one, without care whether hee were prouoked or not) ſoared away as farre as he could, both from his brother, and from his owne Gaules. Hauing fetcht a great compaſſe through Meſopotamia and Armenia, He fell at length in Cappadocia; where his father-in-law King Artamenes tooke him vp. Hee was entertained very louingly in outward ſhew; but with a meaning to betray him.

This

This hee ſoone perceiued: and therefore betooke him to his wings againe; though he knew not well, which way to bend his flight. At length hee reſolued to beſtowe himſelfe vpon Ptolemie; his owne conſcience telling him, what euill hee had meant vnto Seleucus his brother; and therefore what little good he was reciprocally to expect at his hands. Infidelitie can find no ſure harbour. Ptolemie well vnderſtood the perfidious and turbulent nature of this Hierax. Wherefore hee layd him vp in cloſe priſon: whence, though by meanes of an harlot, he got out; yet flying from his keepers, he fell into the hands of theeues, by whom he was murdered. Neare about the ſame time died Seleucus. The Parthians and Bactrians had rebelled againſt him, during his warres with his brother. He therefore made a iourney againſt Arſaces founder of the Parthian kingdome: wherein his euill fortune, or rather Gods vengeance, adhered ſo cloſely to him, that he was taken priſoner. Arſaces dealt friendly with him, and diſmiſſed him, hauing euery way giuen him royall entertainment: but in returning home, he brake his necke by a fall from his horſe, and ſo ended his vnhappie reigne of twenty yeeres. Hee had to wife Laodice, the ſiſter of Andromachus, one of his moſt truſtie Captaines: which was father vnto that Achæus, who making his aduantage of this affinitie, became ſhortly after (as he ſtiled himſelfe) a king; though rather indeed, a great troubler of the world in thoſe parts. By Laodice hee had two ſonnes; Seleucus the third, ſurnamed Ceraunus; and Antiochus the third, called afterwards the Great.

Seleucus Ceraunus reigned onely three yeeres: in which time he made warre vpon Attalus the firſt, that was King of Pergamus. Being weake of bodie through ſickneſſe, and in want of monie, He could not keepe his men of warre in good order: and finally he was ſlaine by treaſon of Nicanor, and Apaturius a Gaule. His death was reuenged by Achæus, who ſlue the Traitors, and tooke charge of the Armie: which he ruled very wiſely, and faithfully awhile; Antiochus, the brother of Seleucus, being then a Childe.

§. II.

The beginning of the Great ANTIOCHVS his reigne. Of PTOLEMIE EVERGETES, and PHILOPATOR, Kings of Ægypt. Warre betweene ANTIOCHVS and PHILOPATOR. The rebellion of MOLO: an Expedition of ANTIOCHVS againſt him. The recontinuance of ANTIOCHVS his Ægyptian warre: with the paſſages betweene the two Kings: the victory of PTOLEMIE, and Peace concluded. Of ACHAEVS, and his rebellion; his greatneſſe, and his fall. ANTIOCHVS his Expedition againſt the Parthians, Bactrians, and Indians. Somewhat of the Kings reigning in India, after the death of the Great ALEXANDER.

ANTIOCHVS was ſcarcely fifteene yeeres olde, when hee began his reigne, which laſted ſixe and thirty yeeres. In his Minoritie, Hee was wholly gouerned by one Hermias, an ambitious man, and one which maligned all vertue, that he found in any of the Kings faithful ſeruants. This vilde qualitie in a Counſailour of ſuch great place, how harmefull it was vnto his Lord, and finally vnto himſelfe; the ſucceſſe of things will ſhortly diſcouer.

Soone after the beginning of Antiochus his reigne, Ptolemie Euergetes King of Ægypt died; and left his heire Ptolemie Philopator, a yong Boy likewiſe, as hath elſwhere beene remembred. This was that Euergetes, who relieued Aratus and the Achæans: who afterwards tooke part with Cleomenes; and louingly entertained him, when he was chaced out of Greece by Antigonus Gonatas. Hee annexed vnto his Dominion the Kingdome of Cyrene; by taking to wife Berenice, the daughter of King Magas. He was the third of the Ptolemies; and the laſt good King of the race.

The

The name of Euergetes, or the doer of good, was giuen him by the Ægyptians; not so much for the great spoiles which hee brought home, after his victories in Syria; as for that he recouered some of those Images or Idols, which Cambyses, when hee conquered Ægypt, had carried into Persia. He was ready to haue made war vpon the Iewes, for that Onias their high Priest, out of meere couetousnesse of mony, refused to pay vnto him his yeerely tribute of twenty talents: but hee was pacified by the wisedome of Iosephus a Iew, vnto whom afterwards he let in farme the Tributes and Customes that belonged vnto him, in those parts of Syria which hee held. For Cœlosyria, with Palæstina and all those parts of the Countrie that lay neerest vnto Ægypt, were held by the Ægyptian; either as hauing fallen to the share of Ptolemie the first, at such time as the great Antigonus was vanquished and slaine in the battaile at Ipsus; or as being won by this Euergetes, in the troublesome and vnhappie reigne of Seleucus Callinicas. The victories of this Euergetes in Syria, with the contentions that lasted for many succeeding ages betweene the Ptolemies and the Seleucidæ; were all foretold by Daniel in the Prophecie before cited, which is expounded be S. Hierome. This Ptolemie Euergetes reigned six and twentie yeeres; and died towards the end of the hundred thirtie and ninth Olympiad. It may seeme by that, which we find in the Prologue vnto Iesus the sonne of Sirach his booke, that he should haue reigned a much longer time. For Siracides there saith, that he came into Ægypt in the eight and thirtieth yeere, when Euergetes was King. It may therefore be, That either this King reigned long together with his father: or that those eight and thirtie yeeres, were the yeeres of Iesus his owne age; if not perhaps reckoned (as the Iewes did otherwhiles reckon) from some notable accident that had befallen them.

Not long after the death of Euergetes, Hermias the Counsailer, and in a manner the Protectour of King Antiochus, incited his Lord vnto warre against the Ægyptian; for the recouery of Cœlosyria and the Countries adioyning. This counsaile was verie vnseasonably giuen; when Molo, the Kings Lieutenant in Media, was broken out into rebellion, and sought to make himselfe absolute Lord of that rich Countrie. Neuertheless Hermias, being more froward than wise, maintained stifly, that it was most expedient, and agreeable with the Kings honour, to send forth against a rebellious Captain, other Captaines that were faithful; whileft He in person made warre vpon one, that was like himselfe, a King. No man durst gainsay the resolution of Hermias; who therfore sent Xenætas an Achæan, with such forces as he thought expedient, against the Rebell; whileft in the meane season an Armie was preparing for the Kings Expedition into Cœlosyria. The King hauing marched from Apamea to Laodicea, and so ouer the Desarts into the Vallie of Marsyas, betweene the Mountaines of Libanus and Anti-libanus; found his way there stopped by Theodotus an Ætolian, that serued vnder Ptolemie. So hee consumed the time there awhile to none effect: and then came newes, that Xenætas, his Captaine, was destroyed with his whole Armie; and Molo thereby become Lord of all the Countrie, as farre as vnto Babylon.

Xenætas, whileft he was yet on his iourney, and drew neere to the Riuer of Tygris; receiued many aduertisements, by such as fledde ouer vnto him from the Enemie, That the followers of Molo were, for the most part, against their wills, drawne by their Commander to beare armes against the King. This report was not altogether false; but Molo himselfe stood in some doubt left his followers would leaue him in time of neceſſitie. Xenætas therefore making shew, as if hee had prepared to passe the Riuer by Boats in face of his Enemie; left in the night time such as he thought meete to defend his Campe; and with all the floure of his Armie went ouer Tygris, in a place ten miles lower than Molo his Campe. Molo heard of this, and sent forth his horse to giue impediment: but hearing that Xenætas could not so bee stopped, He himselfe dislodged, and tooke his iourney towards Media; leauing all his baggage behinde him in his Campe. Whether he did this, as distrusting the faith of his owne

ſouldiours: or whether thereby to deceiue his Enemie; the great folly of Xenætas made his ſtratageme proſperous. For Xenætas, hauing borne himſelfe proudly before, vpon the countenance of Hermias by whom he was aduanced vnto this charge; did now preſume, that all ſhould giue way to his authoritie, without putting him to much trouble of vſing the ſword. Wherefore he ſuffered his men to feaſt, with the prouiſions which they found ready in the forſaken Campe: or rather hee commanded them ſo doe, by making Proclamation, That they ſhould cheriſh vp themſelues againſt the iourney, which hee intended to take next day, in purſuit of the Rebels that fled. And to the ſame purpoſe he buſied himſelfe, in tranſporting the remainder of his Armie, which he had left on the other ſide of Tygris. But Molo went no further that day, than he could eaſily returne the ſame night. Wherefore vnderſtanding what good rule the Kings men kept: hee made ſuch haſte backe vnto them, that he came vpon them early in the morning; whileſt they were yet heauie with the wine and other good cheare, that they had ſpent at ſupper. So Xenætas and a very few about him, died fighting in defence of the Campe: the reſt were ſlaughtered, without making reſiſtance; and many of them, ere they were perfectly awake. Likewiſe the Campe on the other ſide of Tygris, was eaſily taken by Molo: the Captaines flying thence, to ſaue their owne liues. In the heat of this victorie, the Rebell marched vnto Seleucia, which he preſently tooke: and, maſtering within a little while the Prouince of Babylonia, and all the Countrie downe to the Red-Sea, or Bay of Perſia, He haſted vnto Suſa; where at his firſt comming hee wan the Citie: but failing to take the Caſtle that was exceeding ſtrong, returned backe to Seleucia, there to giue order concerning this buſineſſe.

The report of theſe things comming to Antiochus, whileſt he lay (as is ſaid before) in the Vale of Marſyas; filled him with great ſorrow, and his Campe with trouble. He tooke counſaile what to doe in this needfull caſe; and was well aduiſed by Epigenes the beſt man of warre hee had about him, to let alone this Enterpriſe of Cœloſyria; and bend his forces thither, where more neede required them. This counſaile was put in execution with all conuenient haſte. Yet was Epigenes diſmiſſed by the way, and ſoone after ſlaine, by the practice of Hermias; who could not endure to heare good counſaile giuen, contrary to his owne good liking and allowance. In the iourney againſt Molo, the name and preſence of the King was more auailable, than any oddes which hee had of the Rebel in ſtrength. Molo diſtruſted his owne followers: and thought, that neither his late good ſucceſſe, nor any other conſideration, would ſerue to hold them from returning to the Kings obedience; if once they beheld his perſon. Wherefore he thought it ſafeſt for him, to aſſaile the Kings Campe in the night time. But going in hand with this, He was diſcouered by ſome that fled ouer from him to the King. This cauſed him to returne backe to his Campe: which, by ſome errour, tooke alarme at his returne; and was hardly quieted, when Antiochus appeared in ſight. The King was thus forward in giuing battaile to Molo, vpon confidence which hee had that many would reuolt vnto him. Neither was he deceiued in this his beliefe. For not a few men, or Enſignes: but all the left wing of the Enemie, which was oppoſite vnto the King, changed ſide forthwith as ſoone as euer they had ſight of the Kings perſon; and were ready to doe him ſeruice againſt Molo. This was enough to haue wonne the Victorie: but Molo ſhortned the worke, by killing himſelfe; as did alſo diuers of his friends, who for feare of torments preuented the Hang-man with their owne ſwords.

After this Victorie came ioyfull newes, that the Queene Laodice, daughter of Mithridates King of Pontus, which was married vnto Antiochus awhile before, had brought foorth a ſonne. Fortune ſeemed bountifull vnto the King: and therefore he purpoſed to make what vſe hee could, of her friendly diſpoſition while it laſted: Being now in the Eaſterne parts of his kingdome, Hee iudged it conuenient to viſit his Frontiers, were it onely to terrifie the Barbarians, that bordered vpon him. Hereunto his Counſailer Hermias gaue aſſent: not ſo much reſpecting the Kings honour;

as considering what good might thereby happen to himselfe, For if it should come to passe, that the King were taken out of the world by any casualtie: then made hee no doubt of becomming Protector to the yong Prince; and thereby of lengthening his owne Gouernment. Antiochus therefore went against Artabazanes, who reigned among the Atropatians; hauing the greatest part of his kingdome, situate betweene the Caspian and the Euxine Sea. This barbarous King was very old and fearefull; and therfore yeelded vnto whatsoeuer Conditions it pleased Antiochus to lay vpon him. So in this iourney Antiochus got honour, such as well contented him; and then returned homewards. Vpon the way, a Physician of his brake with him as concerning Hermias; informing him truely, how odious hee was vnto the people; and how dangerous he would be shortly vnto the Kings owne life. Antiochus beleeued this, hauing long suspected the same Hermias; but not daring, for feare of him, to vtter his suspitions. It was therefore agreed, that he should be made away on the sudden: which was done, he being trained forth by a sleight a good way out of the Campe, and there killed without warning or disputation. The King needed not to haue vsed so much Art, in ridding his hands of a man so much detested. For howsoeuer hee seemed gracious whilest hee was aliue: yet they that for feare had been most obsequious to him, whilest hee was in case to doe them hurt, were as ready as the foremost, to speake of him as hee had deserued, when once they were secure of him: Yea, his wife and children lying then at Apamea, were stoned to death by the wiues and children of the Citizens; whose indignation brake forth the more outragiously, the longer that it had been concealed.

About these times, Achæus (of whom we spake before) thinking that Antiochus might happen to perish in some of those Expeditions which hee tooke in hand; was bold to set a Diademe vpon his owne head, and take vpon him as a King. His purpose was to haue inuaded Syria: but the fame of Antiochus his returning thitherwards, made him quit the enterprise; and studie to set some handsome colour on his former presumption. It is very strange, that Antiochus neither went against Achæus; nor yet dissembled the notice which he had taken, of these his traiterous purposes: but wrote vnto him, signifying that he knew all; and vpbraiding him with such infidelitie, as any offender might know to be vnpardonable. By these meanes he emboldened the Traitor: who being already detected, might better hope to maintaine his former actions by strong hand, than to excuse them, or get pardon by submission. Antiochus had at that time a vehement desire to recouer Cœlosyria, or what else he could, of the Dominions of Ptolemie Philopater in those parts. He began with Seleucia, a very strong Citie neere vnto the mouth of the Riuer Orontes; which ere long he won, partly by force, partly by corrupting with brybes the Captaines that lay therein. This was that Seleucia, whereto Antigonus the great who founded it, gaue the name of Antigonia: but Seleucus getting it shortly after, called it Seleucia; and Ptolemie Euergetes hauing lately won it, might, if it had so pleased him, haue changed the name into Ptolemais. Such is the vanity of men, that hope to purchase an endlesse memoriall vnto their names, by workes proceeding rather from their greatnesse, than from their vertue; which therefore no longer are their owne, than the same greatnesse hath continuance. Theodotus the Ætolian, he that before had opposed himselfe to Antiochus, and defended Cœlosyria in the behalfe of Ptolemie; was now growne sorrie, that he had vsed so much faith and diligence, in seruice of an vnthankfull and luxurious Prince. Wherefore, as a Mercinarie, he began to haue regard vnto his owne profit: which thinking to finde greater, by applying himselfe vnto him that was (questionlesse) the more worthie of these two Kings; He offered to deliuer vp vnto Antiochus, the Cities of Tyrus and Ptolemais. Whilest he was deuising about this treason, and had already sent messengers to King Antiochus: his practice was detected, and he besieged in Ptolemais by one of Ptolemies Captaines, that was more faithfull then himselfe. But Antiochus hasting to his rescue, vanquished this Captaine who met him on the way: and afterwards got possession, not onely of Tyrus and Ptolemais, with a good fleete of the Ægyptian Kings that was in those Hauens: but of so many other Townes in that Countrie, as emboldned him to thinke vpon making a iourney into Ægypt it selfe. Agathocles and Sosibius bore all the sway in Egypt at that time: Ptolemie himselfe being loth to haue his pleasures interrupted, with businesse of so small importance, as the safetie of his Kingdome. Wherefore these two agreed together, to make prouision as hastily, and yet as secretly as might be, for the warre: and neuertheless, at the same time, to presse Antiochus with daily Embassadors to some good agreement. There came in the heate of this businesse, Embassadours from Rhodes, Byzantium, and Cyzicus, as likewise from the Aetolians; according to the vsuall courtesie of the Greekes, desiring to take vp the quarrell. These were all entertained in Memphis, by Agathocles and Sosibius: who intreated them to deale effectually with Antiochus. But whilest this Treatie lasted, great preparations were made at Alexandria for the warre: wherein these two Counsailours perswaded themselues reasonably, that the victory would bee their owne; if they could get, for monie, a sufficient number of the Greekes to take their parts. Antiochus heard onely what was done at Memphis, and how desirous the Gouernours of Ægypt were to be at quiet: whereunto he gaue the readier beliefe, not onely for that he knew the disposition of Ptolemie, but because the Rhodians, and other Embassadours, comming from Memphis, discoursed vnto him all after one manner; as being all deceiued, by the cunning of Agathocles and his fellow. Antiochus therefore hauing wearied himselfe, at the long siege of a Towne called Dura, which he could not winne: and being desirous to refresh himselfe and his Armie in Seleucia, during the Winter which then came on; granted vnto the Egyptian a Truce for foure moneths, with promise that he would be ready to hearken vnto equall Conditions, when they should bee offered. It was not his meaning to bee so courteous, as he would faine haue seemed, but onely to lull his enemies asleepe, whilest he tooke time to refresh himselfe; and to bring Achæus to some good order, whose treason dayly grew more open and violent. The same negligence which he thought the Aegyptian would haue vsed, Hee vsed himselfe; as presuming, that when time of the yeere better serued, little force would be needfull; for that the Townes would voluntarily yeelde vnto him, since Ptolemie prouided not for their defence. Neuertheless, he gaue audience to the Embassadours, and had often conference with those that were sent out of Aegypt: pleasing himselfe well, to dispute about the iustice of his quarrell; which he purposed shortly to make good by the sword, whether it were iust or no. He said, that it was agreed betweene Seleucus his Ancestor, and Ptolemie the sonne of Lagi, That all Syria, if they could win it from Antigonus, should be giuen in possession to Seleucus: and that this bargaine was afterwards ratified, by generall consent of all the Confederates, after the battaile at Ipsus. But Ptolemies men would acknowledge no such bargaine. They said, that Ptolemie the sonne of Lagi, had wonne Cœlosyria, and the Prouinces adioyning for himselfe: as also that he had sufficiently gratified Seleucus, by lending him forces to recouer his Prouince of Babylon, and the Countries about the Riuer of Euphrates. Thus whilest neither of them greatly cared for peace; they were, in the end of their disputation, as farre from concluding as at the beginning. Ptolemie demanded restitution; Antiochus thought, that he had not as yet gotten all that was his owne: Also Ptolemie would needes haue Achæus comprehended in the League betweene them, as one of their Confederates; But Antiochus would not endure to heare of this, exclaiming against it as a shamefull thing, that one King should offer to deale so with another, as to take his Rebell into protection, and seeke to ioyne him in Confederacie with his owne Souereigne Lord. When the Truce was expired, and Antiochus prepared to take the field againe: contrary to his expectation hee was informed, That Ptolemie, with a very puissant Armie, was comming vp against him out of Ægypt. Setting forward therefore to meet with the Enemie, he was encountred on the way by those Captaines of Ptolemie, that had resisted him the yeere before. They held against him the passages of Libanus, whence neuertheleſſe he draue them: and, proceeding onward in his iournie, wan ſo many places, that he greatly increaſed his reputation; and thereby drew the Arabians, with diuers of the bordering people, to become his followers. As the two Kings drew neare together: many Captaines of Ptolemie forſooke his pay, and fled ouer to Antiochus. This notwithſtanding, the Ægyptian had the courage to meete his Enemie in the field. The battaile was fought at Raphia: where it was not to be decided, whether the Ægyptians or Aſiatiques were the better Souldiers (for that the ſtrength of both Armies conſiſted in Mercinaries, chiefly of the Greekes, Thracians, and Gaules) but whether of the Kings was the more fortunate. Ptolemie, with Arſinoe his ſiſter and Wife, rode vp and downe encouraging his men; the like did Antiochus on the other ſide: each of them reheartſing the braue deedes of their Anceſtors; as not hauing of their owne, wherby to valew themſelues. Antiochus had the more Elephants: as alſo his, being of Aſia, had they beene fewer would haue beaten thoſe of Africke. Wherefore by the aduantage of theſe beaſts, Hee draue the enemies before him, in that part of the battaile wherein hee fought himſelfe. But Ptolemie had the better men: by whoſe valour he brake the Groſſe of his Enemies battaile, and wan the victorie; whileſt Antiochus was heedleſly following vpon thoſe, whom hee had compelled to retire. Antiochus had brought into the field aboue ſeuentie thouſand foot, and ſix thouſand Horſe: whereof though he loſt ſcarce ten thouſand foote, and not foure hundred horſe; yet the fame of his ouerthrow tooke from him all thoſe places which he had lately wonne. When therefore he was returned home to Antioch: Hee began to ſtand in feare, leſt Ptolemie and Achæus, ſetting vpon him both at once, ſhould put him in danger of his whole Eſtate. This cauſed him to ſend Embaſſadors vnto the Ægyptian to treat of peace: which was readily graunted; it being much againſt the nature of Ptolemie, to vexe himſelfe thus with the tedious buſines of warre. So Ptolemie, hauing ſtaied three moneths in Syria, returned home into Ægypt clad with the reputation of a Conqueror; to the great admiration of his ſubiects, and of all thoſe that were acquainted with his voluptuous and ſlothfull condition.

Achæus was not compriſed in the League betweene theſe two Kings: or if hee had beene included therein; yet would not the Ægyptian haue taken the paines, of making a ſecond Expedition for his ſake. The beſt was, that he thought himſelfe ſtrong enough, if fortune were not too much againſt him, to deale with Antiochus. Neither was hee confident without great reaſon: For beſides his many victories, whereby hee had gotten all that belonged vnto Antiochus on this ſide of Taurus, Hee had alſo good ſucceſſe againſt Attalus King of Pergamus; that was an able man of warre, and commanded a ſtrong Armie. Neither was hee, as Molo the Rebell had beene, one of meane regard otherwiſe, and carryed beyond himſelfe by apprehending the vantage of ſome opportunitie: but Couſin german to the King, as hath beene ſhewed before; and now lately the Kings brother-in-law, by taking to wife a yonger daughter of the ſame Mithridates King of Pontus, which was alſo called Laodice, as was her ſiſter the Queene, Antiochus his wife. Theſe things had added maieſtie vnto him; and had made his followers greatly to reſpect him, euen as one to whome a Kingdome was belonging. Neither made it a little for him, That King Ptolemie of Ægypt held him in the nature of a friend: and that King Antiochus was now lately vanquiſhed in the battaile at Raphia; and had thereby loſt all his gettings in Syria. But all theſe hopes and likelihoods came to nothing: For the King of Pontus, if he would meddle in that quarrel betweene his ſonnes-in-law, had no reaſon to take part againſt the more honourable. As for the Ægyptian: Hee was not onely ſlothfull; but hindred by a rebellion of his owne ſubiects, from helping his friends abroad. For the people of Ægypt, of whom Ptolemie, contrarie to the manner of his Progenitors, had armed a great number to ſerue in the late Expedition; began to entertaine a good opinion of their owne valour, thinking it not inferiour

to the Macedonian. Hereupon they refuſed to ſuffer as much as formerly they had done: ſince they leſſe eſteemed, than they had done, the force of the Kings Mercinarie Greekes; which had hitherto kept them in ſtreight ſubiection. Thus brake out a warre betweene the King and his ſubiects: wherein though the ill-guided force of the Multitude was finally broken; yet King Ptolemie thereby waſted much of his ſtrength, and much of his time, that might haue beene ſpent, as hee thought, much better in reuelling; or, as others thought, in ſuccouring Achæus. As for Antiochus, He had no ſooner made his peace with the Ægyptian, than hee turned all his care to the preparation of warre againſt Achæus. To this purpoſe he entred into League with Attalus; that ſo hee might diſtract the forces of his Rebell, and finde him worke on all ſides. Finally, his diligence and fortune were ſuch, that within a-while he had pent vp Achæus into the Citie of Sardes; where he held him about two yeeres beſieged. The Citie was very ſtrong, and well victualled: ſo as there appeared not, when the ſecond yeere came, any greater likelihood of taking it, than in the firſt yeeres ſiege. In the end, one Lagoras a Cretan found meanes how to enter the Towne. The Caſtle it ſelfe was vpon a very high Rocke, and in a manner impregnable, as alſo the Towne-wall adioyning to the Caſtle, in that part which was called the Sawe, was in like manner ſituated vpon ſteepe Rocks, and hardly acceſſible; that hung ouer a deepe bottome, whereinto the dead carkaſes of Horſes, and other beaſts, yea, and ſometimes of men, vſed to be throwne. Now it was obſerued by Lagoras, that the Rauens and other birds of prey, which hanted that place by reaſon of their food which was there neuer wanting, vſed to flie vp vnto the top of the Rockes, and to pitch vpon the walls; where they reſted without any diſturbance. Obſeruing this often, he reaſoned with himſelfe, and concluded, that thoſe parts of the Wall were left vnguarded, as beeing thought vnapproachable. Heereof hee informed the King: who approoued his iudgement, and gaue vnto him the leading of ſuch men, as hee deſired for the accompliſhing of the enterprize. The ſucceſſe was agreeable to that which Lagoras had afore conceiued: and, though with much labour, yet without reſiſtance, he ſcaled thoſe Rockes, and (whileſt a generall aſſault was made) entred the Towne in that part; which was, at other times vngarded, then vnthought vpon. In the ſame place had the Perſians, vnder Cyrus, gotten into Sardes; when Cræſus thought himſelfe ſecure on that ſide. But the Citizens tooke not warning, by the example of a loſſe many ages paſt; and therefore out of memorie. Achæus held ſtill the Caſtle: which not onely ſeemed by nature impregnable, but was very well ſtored with all neceſſaries; and manned with a ſufficient number, of ſuch as were to him well aſſured. Antiochus therefore was conſtrained to waſte much time about it; hauing none other hope to preuaile, than by famiſhing the incloſed. Beſides the vſuall tedioufneſſe of expectation; his buſineſſe called him thence away into the higher Aſia, where the Bactrians, and Parthians with the Hyrcanians, had erected Kingdomes taken out of his Dominions, vpon which they ſtill incroched. But hee thought it not ſafe, to let Achæus breake looſe againe. On the other ſide there were ſome Agents of Ptolemie the Ægyptian, and good friends vnto Achæus; that made it their whole ſtudie, how to deliuer this beſieged Prince. If they could reſcue his perſon, they cared for no more: but preſumed, that when he ſhould appeare in the Countries vnder Taurus, he would ſoone haue an Armie at commaund, and be ſtrong enough to hold Antiochus as hardly to worke as at any time before. Wherefore they dealt with one Bolis a Cretan, that was acquainted well with all the wayes in the Countrie, and particularly with the by-paths and exceeding difficult paſſages among thoſe Rockes, whereon the Caſtle of Sardes ſtood. Him they tempted with great rewards, which he ſhould receiue at the hands of Ptolemie, as well as of Achæus; to doe his beſt for performance of their deſire. He vndertooke the buſineſſe: and gaue ſuch likely reaſons of bringing all to good effect, that they wrote vnto Achæus, by one Arianus, a truſtie meſſenger, whom Bolis found meanes to conueigh into the Caſtle. The faith of theſe Negotiators tiators Achæus held moſt aſſured. They alſo wrote vnto him in priuie characters, or Ciphers, wherewith none ſaue he and they were acquainted: whereby hee knew, that it was no fained deuice of his Enemies, in the name of his friends. As for the meſſenger; he was a truſtie fellow, and one whom Achæus found, by examination, heartily affected vnto the ſide. But the Contents of the Epiſtle, which were, That hee ſhould bee confident in the faith of Bolis, and of one Cambylus whom Bolis had wonne vnto the buſineſſe, did ſomewhat trouble him. They were men to him vnknowne: and Cambylus was a follower of Antiochus; vnder whom he had the commaund of thoſe Cretans, which held one of the Forts that blocked vp the Caſtle of Sardes. Neuertheleſſe other way to eſcape hee ſaw none, than by putting himſelfe to ſome aduenture. When the meſſenger had therefore paſſed often to and fro: it was at length concluded, That Bolis himſelfe ſhould come ſpeake with Achæus, and conduct him forth. There was none other than good faith meant by any of the reſt, ſaue onely by Bolis and Cambylus; which were Cretans, and (as all their Countrimen, * ſome few excepted, haue beene, and ſtill are) falſe knaues. Theſe two held a conſultation together, that was, as [k] Polybius obſerues it, rightly Cretical: neither concerning the ſafetie of him whoſe deliuerance they vndertooke, nor touching the diſcharge of their owne faith; but onely how to get moſt with leaſt adoe and danger to themſelues. Briefly they concluded, That firſt of all they would equally ſhare betweene them ten Talents, which they had already receiued in hand: and then, That they would reueale the matter to Antiochus; offering to deliuer Achæus vnto him, if they might be well rewarded both with preſent monie, and with promiſe of conſideration anſwerable to the greatneſſe of ſuch a ſeruice, when it ſhould be diſpatched. Antiochus hearing this promiſe of Cambylus, was no leſſe glad; than were the friends of Achæus well pleaſed with the comfortable promiſes of Bolis. At length when all things were in readineſſe on both ſides, and that Bolis with Arianus was to get vp into the Caſtle, and conueigh Achæus thence: Hee firſt went with Cambylus to ſpeake with the King, who gaue him very priuate audience; and confirmed vnto him by word of mouth the aſſurance of his liberall promiſes. And after that, putting on the countenance of an honeſt man, and of one that was faithfull vnto Ptolemie whom he had long ſerued; He accompanied Arianus vp into the Caſtle. At his comming thither, Hee was louingly entertained; yet queſtioned at large by Achæus, touching all the weight of the buſineſſe in hand. But he diſcourſed ſo well, and with ſuch grauitie; that there appeared no reaſon of diſtruſting either his faith or judgement. Hee was an old Souldiour, had long been a Captaine vnder Ptolemie, and did not thruſt himſelfe into this buſineſſe; but was inuited by honourable and faithfull men. He had alſo taken a ſafe courſe, in winning (as it ſeemed) that other Countriman of his, who kept a Fort that ſtood in their way; and thereby had already ſundry times giuen ſafe paſſage and repaſſage vnto Arianus. But againſt all theſe comfortable hopes, the importance of ſo great an aduenture ſtirred vp ſome diffidence. Achæus therefore dealt wiſely, and ſaid, That hee would yet ſtay in the Caſtle a little longer: but that he meant to ſend away with Bolis three or foure of his friends; from whom when hee receiued better aduertiſement, concerning the likelihood of the enterpriſe, then would hee iſſue forth himſelfe. Hereby he tooke order, not to commit himſelfe wholly vnto the faith of a man vnknowne. But, as Polybius well notes, he did not conſider that he playd the Cretian with a man of Crete: which is to ſay, That hee had to doe with one, whoſe knauery could not be auoided by circumſpection. Bolis and Cambylus had layd their plots thus, That if Achæus came forth alone, then ſhould he eaſily be taken by the ambuſh prepared for him: if he were accompanied with many of his friends, then ſhould Arianus be appointed to leade the way, as one that of late had troden it oft; and Bolis following behinde, ſhould haue an eye vpon Achæus, to preuent him not onely from eſcaping in the tumult, but from breaking his owne necke, or otherwiſe killing himſelfe: to the end that beeing taken aliue, Hee might bee to Antiochus the more welcome Preſent.

* Among theſe few I doe not except one, calling himſelfe Eudæmon Iohn Andrew, a Cretan: who in one of his late ſhameleſſe libels, wherein he traduceth our King, Religion, and Countrey, with all the good & worthy men of whom he could learne the names, hath, by inſerting my name, twice belied me; in calling me a Puritan, & one that haue been dangerous vnto my Soueraigne. It is an honour to bee ill ſpoken of by ſo diligent a ſupporter of Treaſons, and Architect of Lies: in regard whereof I may not denie him the commendation of Creticiſme no leſſe voluminous, than he in multiplicitie of name is beyond any the Cretians in elder times, that were alwayes Lyers, euill beaſts, and ſlow bellies.

sent. And in such order came they now forth: Arianus going before as Guide; the rest following, as the way serued, and Bolis in the Rere. Achæus made none acquainted with his purpose, till the very instant of his departure. Then signified hee the matter to his wife Laodice; and comforting her with hope as well as hee could, appointed foure of his especiall friends to beare him companie. They were all disguised: and one of them alone tooke vpon him to haue knowledge of the Greeke tongue; speaking and answering, as neede should require, for all, as if the rest had been Barbarians. Bolis followed them, craftily deuising vpon his businesse, and much perplexed. For (saith Polybius) Though he were of Crete, and prone to surmise any thing to the mischiefe of another: yet could hee not see in the darke, nor know which of them was Achæus, or whether Achæus himselfe were there. The way was very vneasie, and in some places dangerous; especially to those that knew it not. Wherefore they were faine to stay in diuers places, and helpe one another vp or downe. But vpon euery occasion, they were all of them very officious toward Achæus; lending him their hands, and taking such care of him, as easily gaue Bolis to vnderstand, that hee was the man: and so by their vnseasonable dutie, they vndid their Lord. When they came to the place where Cambylus lay in waite; Bolis whistled, and presently clasped Achæus about the middle, holding him fast that hee should not stirre. So they were all taken by the Ambush, and carried forthwith to Antiochus: who sate vp watching in his Pauilion, expecting the euent. The sight of Achæus, brought in bound vnto him, did so astonish the King, that he was vnable to speake a word, and anon brake out into weeping. Yet was hee before informed of the plot, which might haue kept him from admiration: as also the next morning betimes assembling his friends together, Hee condemned Achæus to a cruell death; which argues, that hee was not moued with pittie towards this vnhappie man. Wherefore it was the generall regard of calamities, incident vnto great fortunes, that wrung from him these teares: as also the raritie of the accident, that made both him and his friends to wonder: though it bee so, that such a course as this of his, in employing two mischieuous knaues against one Traitour, doth not rarely succeed well; according to that Spanish Prouerbe, A vn traydor dos alleuosos. The death of Achæus brought such astonishment vpon those which held the Castle, that after a while they gaue vp the place and themselues vnto the King; whereby he got entire possession of all to him belonging in the lesser Asia.

Some yeeres passed after this, ere Antiochus was ready for his Expedition against the Parthians, and Hyrcanians. The Parthians were a little Nation of obscure beginnings; and commonly subiect vnto those that ruled in Media. In the great shuffling for Prouinces, after the death of Alexander, the Gouernment ouer them was committed by Antipater to one Philip, a man of small regard; shortly they fell to Eumenes; then to Antigonus; and from him, together with the Medes, to Seleucus: vnder whose posteritie they continued vntil the Reigne of Seleucus Callinicus, being ruled by Lieutenants of the Syrian Kings. The lustfull insolencie of one of these Lieutenants, together with the misfortune of Callinicus, that was vanquished and thought to bee slaine by the Gaules; did stirre vp Arsaces, a Noble man of the Countrie, to seeke reuenge of iniuries done, and animate him to rebell. So he slue the Kings Lieutenant; made himselfe King of the Parthians, and Lord of Hyrcania; fought prosperously with those that disturbed him in his beginnings; and tooke Seleucus Callinicus prisoner in battaile, whom he royally entertained, and dismissed. Hereby he wanne reputation as a lawfull King; and by good gouernment of his Countrie, procured vnto himselfe such loue of his subiects, that his name was continued vnto his Successors; like as that of the Ptolemies in Ægypt, and that of the Cæsars afterwards in Rome. Much about the same time the Bactrians rebelled: though these at length, and all belonging vnto the Seleucida beyond Euphrates, increased the Parthians Dominion. Now Antiochus went against them with so strong an Armie, that they durst not meet him in plaine field; but kept themselues in Woods, or places of strength, and defended fended the Streights and passages of Mountaines. The resistances they made availed them not. For Antiochus had with him so great a multitude, and so well sorted, as hee needed not to turne out of the way, from those that lay fortified against him, in Woods and Streights betweene their Mountaines; it being easie to spare out of so great a number, as many as fetching a compasse about, might either get aboue the Enemies heads; or come behinde, and charge them on the backe. Thus did he often imploy against them his light armature: wherewith hee caused them to dislodge, and giue way vnto his Phalanx; vpon which they durst not aduenture themselues in open ground. Arsaces, the second of the name, (for his Father was dead before this) was then King of Parthia: who though hee was confident in the fidelitie of his owne subiects; yet feared to encounter with so mighty an inuader. His hope was, that the bad wayes, and Desarts, would haue caused Antiochus, when he was at Ecbatane in Media, to giue ouer the journey, without proceeding much further. This not so falling out; He caused the Wels and Springs in the Wildernesse, through which his Enemie must passe, to bee dammed vp and spoyled. By which meanes, and the resistance before spoken of, when he could no preuaile, Hee withdrew himselfe out of the way; suffering the Enemie to take his pleasure for a time, in wasting the Countrie: wherein, without some victory obtained, hee could make no long abode. Antiochus hereby found, That Arsaces was nothing strongly prouided for the warre. Wherefore hee marched through the heart of Parthia: and then forward into Hyrcania; where hee wanne Tambrace, the chiefe Citie of that Prouince. This indignitie, and many other losses, caused Arsaces at length, when he had gathered an Armie that seemed strong enough, to aduenture a battaile. The issue thereof was such, as gaue to neither of the Kings hope of accomplishing his desires, without exceeding difficultie. Wherefore Arsaces craued Peace, and at length obtained it: Antiochus thinking it not amisse, to make him a friend, whom he could not make a subiect.

The next Expedition of Antiochus, was against Euthydemus King of the Bactrians; one that indeed had not rebelled against him or his Ancestors: but hauing gotten the Kingdome from those that had rebelled, kept it to himselfe. With Euthydemus he fought a battaile by the Riuer Arius, where he had the victory. But the victorie was not so greatly to his honour; as was the testimonie which he gaue of his owne priuate valour, in obtaining it. He was thought that day to haue demeaned him more couragiously, than did any one man in all his Armie. His Horse was slaine vnder him; and he himselfe receiued a wound in his mouth, whereby hee lost some of his teeth. As for Euthydemus, He withdrew himselfe backe into the further parts of his Kingdome, and afterwards protracted the Warre, seeking how to end it by composition. So Embassadours passed betweene the Kings: Antiochus complaining, That a Countrie of his was vniustly vsurped from him: Euthydemus answering, That he had wonne it from the children of the Vsurpers: and further, That the Bactrians, a wilde Nation, could hardly be retained in order, saue by a King of their owne; for that they bordered vpon the Scythians, with whom if they should joyne, it would be greatly to the danger of all the Prouinces that lay behind them. These allegations, together with his owne wearinesse, pacified Antiochus, and made him willing to grant Peace, vpon reasonable Conditions. Demetrius, the sonne of Euthydemus, being a goodly Gentleman, and employed by his Father as Embassadour in this Treatie of Peace, was not a little auaileable vnto a good Conclusion: For Antiochus liked him so well, that he promised to giue him in marriage one of his owne daughters: and therewithall permitted Euthydemus to retaine the Kingdome; causing him neuertheless to deliuer vp all his Elephants; as also to binde himselfe by oath, to such Couenants as he thought requisite.

So Antiochus leauing the Bactrian in quiet, made a journey ouer Caucasus, and came to the borders of India, where he renewed with Sophagasenus, King of the Indians, the societie that had been betweene their Ancestors. The Indians had remained mained ſubject vnto the Macedonians, for a little while, after Alexanders death. Eumenes in his Warre againſt Antigonus, rayſed part of his forces out of their Countrie. But when Antigonus after his victorie turned Weſtward, and was ouer-buſied in a great ciuill Warre: then did one Sandrocottus, an Indian, ſtirre vp his Countrimen to Rebellion; making himſelfe their Captaine, and taking vpon him as Protector of their libertie. This Office and Title he ſoone changed, though not without ſome contention, into the Name and Maieſtie of a King. Finally hee got vnto himſelfe, (hauing an Armie of ſixe hundred thouſand men) if not all India, yet as much of it as had beene Alexanders. In this Eſtate he had well confirmed himſelfe, ere Seleucus Nicator could find leiſure to call him to account. Neither did He faint, or humble himſelfe, at the comming of Seleucus: but met him in field, as readie to defend his owne; ſo ſtrongly and well appointed, that the Macedonian was contented, to make both peace and affinitie with him, taking only a reward of fiftie Elephants. This League, made by the Founders of the Indian and Syrian kingdomes, was continued by ſome Offices of loue betweene their children, and now renewed by Antiochus: whoſe number of Elephants were increaſed thereupon, by the Indian King, to an hundred and fiftie: as alſo he was promiſed, to haue ſome treaſure ſent after him; which hee left one to receiue. Thus parted theſe two great Kings. Neither had the Indians, from this time forwards, in many generations, any buſineſſe worthie of remembrance with the Weſterne Countries. The poſteritie of Sandrocottus, is thought to haue retained that kingdome vnto the dayes of Auguſtus Cæſar: to whom Porus, then reigning in India, ſent Embaſſadours with Preſents, and an Epiſtle written in Greeke: wherein, among other things, Hee ſaide, That He had command ouer ſixe hundred Kings. There is alſo found, ſcattered in ſundrie Authors, the mention of ſome which held that kingdome, in diuers Ages, euen vnto the time of Conſtantine the great: being all peraduenture of the ſame race. But Antiochus, who in this Treatie with Sophagaſenus carried himſelfe as the worthier perſon, receiuing Preſents; and after marched home through Drangiana and Carmania, with ſuch reputation, that all the Potentates not onely in the higher Aſia, but on the hither ſide of Taurus, humbled themſelues vnto him, and called him The Great: ſaw an end of his owne Greatneſſe within few yeeres enſuing, by preſuming to ſtand vpon points with the Romans; whoſe Greatneſſe was the ſame in deed, that his was onely in ſeeming.

§. III.

The lewd Reigne of PTOLEMIE PHILOPATOR in Ægypt: with the tragicall ende of his fauourites, when hee was dead. ANTIOCHVS prepares to warre on the young child PTOLEMIE EPIPHANES, the ſonne of PHILOPATOR. His irreſolution in preparing for diuers warres at once. His Voyage toward the Helleſpont. Hee ſeekes to hold amitie with the Romans, who make friendly ſhew to him; intending neuertheleſſe to haue warre with him. His doings about the Helleſpont; which the Romans made the firſt ground of their quarrell to him.

THis Expedition being finiſhed; Antiochus had leiſure to repoſe himſelfe awhile, and ſtudie which way to conuert the terror of his puiſſance, for the enlargement of his Empire. Within two or three yeeres Ptolemie Philopator died: leauing his ſonne Ptolemie Epiphanes, a young Boy, his ſucceſſor in the kingdome; vnlikely by him to bee well defended, againſt a neighbour ſo mightie and ambitious. This Ptolemie ſurnamed Philopator, that is to ſay, a louer of his Father, is thought to haue had that ſurname giuen him in meere deriſion; as hauing made away both his Father and Mother. His yong yeeres, being newly paſt his childhood when he beganne to reigne, Iuſtin. l. 30.

may seeme to discharge him of so horrible a crime, as his Fathers death: yet the beastlinesse of all his following life, makes him not vnlike to haue done any mischiefe, whereof he could be accused. Hauing wonne the battaile at Raphia, He gaue himselfe ouer to sensuality; & was wholy gouerned by a Strumpet called Agathoclea. At her instigation Hee murdered his owne wife and sister; which had aduentured herselfe with him, in that onely dangerous Action by him vndertaken and performed with honor. The Lieutenant-ships of his Prouinces, with all Commands in his Armie, and Offices whatsoeuer; were wholly referred vnto the disposition of this Agathoclea, and her brother Agathocles, and of Oenanthe a filthie Bawd that was mother vnto them both. So these three gouerned the Realme at their pleasure, to the great griefe of all the Countrie, till Philopator died: who hauing reigned seuenteene yeeres, left none other sonne than Ptolemie Epiphanes a childe of fiue yeeres old, begotten on Arsinoe that was his sister and wife. After the Kings death; Agathocles beganne to take vpon him, as Protector of young Epiphanes, and Gouernour of the Land. He assembled the Macedons (which were the Kings ordinarie forces in pay, not all borne in Macedonia, but the race of those that abode in Ægypt with Ptolemie the first, and would not bee accounted Ægyptians; as neither would the Kings themselues) and bringing foorth vnto them his sister Agathoclea, with the yong King in her armes; beganne a solemne Oration. He told them, That the deceased father of this their King, had committed the child into the armes of his sister, but vnto the faith of them: on whose valiant right hands, the whole state of the Kingdome did now relie. He besought them therefore that they would bee faithfull, and, as great need was, defend their King against the treason of one Tlepolemus, an ambitious man, who traiterously went about to set the Diademe vpon his owne head, being a meere stranger to the Royall bloud. Herewithall hee produced before them a witnesse, that should justifie his accusation against Tlepolemus. Now though it were so, that he deliuered all this with a fained passion of sorrow, and counterfeiting of teares: yet the Macedons that heard him, regarded not any word that he spake; but stood laughing, and talking one to another, what a shamelesse dissembler he was, to take so much vpon him, as if he knew not how greatly hee was hated. And so brake vp the Assembly: Hee that had called it, being scarce aware how. Agathocles therefore, whom the old Kings fauour had made mighty, but neither wise nor well qualified; thought to goe to worke, as had formerly beene his manner, by vsing his authoritie, to the suppression of those that he distrusted. Hee haled out of a Temple the mother-in-law of Tlepolemus; & cast her into prison. This filled Alexandria with rumors, and made the people (though accustomed to suffer greater things, whilest they were committed in the old Kings name) to meet in knots together, and vtter one to another their mindes; wherein they had conceiued extreme hate, against these three pernicious misgouernours of the old King. Besides their consideration of the present injurie done to Tlepolemus, they were somewhat also mooued with feare of harme; which, in way of requitall, Tlepolemus was likely to doe vnto the Citie. For He was, though a man most vnapt for Gouernment, as afterwards hee proued; yet no bad Souldier, and well beloued of the Armie. It was also then in his power, to stop the prouision of victuals which was to come into Alexandria. As these motiues wrought with the people: so by the remedie which Agathocles vsed, were the Macedons more hastily, and more violently stirred vnto vprore. He secretly apprehended one of their number, whom he suspected of conspiracie against him; and deliuered him vnto a follower of his owne, to be examined by torture. This poore souldior was carried into an inner roome of the Palace, and there stripped out of all his apparrell to be tormented. But whilest the whippes were brought foorth, and all things euen in a readinesse for that purpose, there was brought vnto the Minister of Agathocles, a sad report of Tlepolemus his being at hand. Hereupon the Examiner, and his Torturers, one after another, went out of the roome; leauing Moeragenes the Souldior alone by himselfe, and the dores open. Hee perceiuing this, naked as he was, conueighed himselfe out of the Palace, and got vnto the Macedonians; of whom hee found some in a Temple thereby at dinner. The Macedonians were as fierce in maintenance of their Priuiledges, as are the Turkes Ianizars. Being assured therefore that one of their fellowes had thus been vsed; they fell to Armes in a great rage, and began to force the Palace: crying out, That they would see the King, and not leaue him in possession of such a dangerous man. The whole multitude in the Citie, with lowd clamours, made no lesse adoe than the Souldiours, though to lesse effect. So the old Bawd Oenanthe fled into a Temple: her Sonne and Daughter staid in the Court, vntill the King was taken from them; and they, by his permission which hee easily gaue, and by appointment of those that now had him in their hands, deliuered vp to the furie of the people. Agathocles himselfe was stabbed to death, by some which therein did the office of friends; though in manner of enemies. His sister was dragged naked vp and downe the streetes; as was also his mother, with all to them belonging: the enraged multitude committed vpon them a barbarous execution of justice; biting them, pulling out their eyes, and tearing them in pieces.

These troubles in Ægypt, serued well to stirre vp King Antiochus; who had very good leisure, though he wanted all pretence, to make warre vpon young Ptolemie. Philip of Macedon had the same delire, to get what part he could of the childes estate. But it happened well, that Ptolemie Philopator in the Punick Warre, which was now newly ended, had done many good offices vnto the Romans. Vnto them therefore the Ægyptians addressed themselues, and craued helpe against these two Kings: who though they secretly maligned one the other, yet had entred into couenant to diuide betweene them, all that belonged vnto this Orphan; whose Father had beene Confederate with them both. So * M. Lepidus was sent from Rome, to protect from all violence the King of Ægypt; especially against Antiochus. As for the Macedonian; Hee was very soone found busied, with warre at his owne doores. Also Scopas the Ætolian, being a Pensioner to the Ægyptian, was sent into Greece to rayse an Armie of Mercinaries. What Lepidus did in Ægypt, I doe not find: and therefore thinke it not improbable, that Hee was sent thither onely one of the three Embassadours, ° in the beginning of the Warre with Philip, as hath beene shewed before. As for Scopas; He shortly after went vp into Syria with his Armie: where winning many places, among the rest of his Acts, He subdued the Iewes; who seeme to haue yeelded themselues a little before vnto Antiochus, at such time as they saw him prepare for his Warre, and despaired of receiuing helpe from Egypt. But it was not long, ere all these Victories of Scopas came to nothing. For the very next yeere following, which was (according to Eusebius) the same yeere that Philip was beaten at Cynoscephalæ; Antiochus vanquished Scopas in battaile, and recouered all that had beene lost. Among the rest, the Iewes with great willingnesse returned vnder his obedience; and were therefore by him very gently entreated.

Vid. Ioseph. ant. Iud. l. 12. c. 3.

The Land of Ægypt this great King did forbeare to inuade; and gaue it out, that he meant to bestow a daughter of his owne in marriage vpon Ptolemie: either hoping, as may seeme, that the Countrie would willingly submit it selfe vnto him, if this yong child should happen to miscarrie; or else that greater purchase might be made in the Westerne parts of Asia, whilest Philip was held ouer-laboured by the Romans. It appeares that he was very much distracted; hunting (as we say) two Hares at once with one Hound. The quarrels betweene Attalus, Philip, and the Greekes, promised to affoord him great aduantage, if he should bring his Armie to the Hellespont. On the other side, the state of Ægypt being such as hath beene declared, seemed easie to be swallowed vp at once. One while therefore hee tooke what hee could get in Syria: where all were willing (and the Iewes among the rest, though hitherto they had kept faith with the Ægyptian) to yeeld him obedience. Another while, letting Ægypt alone, He was about to make inuasion vpon Attalus his Kingdome; yet suffered himselfe easily to be perswaded by the Roman Embassadors, ſadours, and deſiſted from that enterpriſe. Hauing thus farre gratified the Romans; He ſends Embaſſadours to the Senate, to conclude a perfect amitie betweene him and them. It is not lightly to be ouerpaſſed, That theſe his Embaſſadours were louingly entertained at Rome; and diſmiſſed, with a Decree and anſwere of the Senate, altogether to the honour of King Antiochus. But this anſwere of the Romans was not ſincere; being rather framed according to regard of the Kings good liking, than of their owne intent. They had not as yet made an end with Philip: neither would they gladly be troubled with two great warres at once. Wherefore, not ſtanding much vpon the nice examination of what belonged vnto their honour, they were content to giue good words for the preſent. In the meane time Antiochus fights with Scopas in Syria, and ſhortly prepares to winne ſome Townes elſewhere, belonging vnto Ptolemie; yet withall hee ſends an Armie Weſtward, intending to make what profit hee can of the diſtractions in Greece. Likewiſe it is conſiderable, as an argument of his much irreſolution, How notwithſtanding his attempts vpon both of their Kingdomes, he offered one of his daughters to Ptolemie, and another to Eumenes the ſonne of Attalus, newly King of Pergamus: ſeeking each of their friendſhips, at one and the ſame time, when he ſought to make each of them a ſpoile. Thus was he acting and deliberating at once; being carried with an inexplicable deſire of repugnancies; which is a diſeaſe of great, and ouer-ſwelling fortunes. Howſoeuer it was, He ſent an Armie to Sardes by Land, vnder two of his owne ſonnes: willing them there to ſtay for him; whileſt he himſelfe with a Fleete of an hundred Gallies, and two hundred other veſſels, intended to paſſe along by the Coaſts of Cilicia and Caria, taking in ſuch places as held for the Ægyptian. It was a notable Act of the Rhodians, that, whileſt the war of Philip lay yet vpon their hands, they aduentured vpon this great Antiochus. They ſent vnto him a proud Embaſſage: wherby they gaue him to vnderſtand, That if he paſſed forward beyond a certaine Promontorie in Cilicia, they would meete him and fight with him; not for any quarrell of theirs vnto him; but becauſe hee ſhould not ioyne with Philip their enemie, and helpe him againſt the Romans. It was inſolently done of them, neither ſeemed it otherwiſe, to preſcribe ſuch limits vnto the King: yet he tempered himſelfe, and without any ſhew of indignation gaue a gentle anſwere; partly himſelfe to their Embaſſadours; partly vnto their whole Citie, by Embaſſadours which he thither ſent. He ſhewed his deſire, to renew the ancient Confederacies betweene his Anceſtors and them: and willed them not to be afraid, leſt his comming ſhould tend vnto any hurt, either of them, or of their Confederates. As touching the Romans whom they thought that he would moleſt: they were (he ſaid) his verie good friends; whereof, he thought there needed no better proofe, than the entertainement and anſwer by them newly giuen to his Embaſſadours.

The Rhodians appeare to haue been a cunning people, and ſuch as could foreſee what weather was like to happen. This anſwer of the King, and the relation of what had paſſed betweene his Embaſſadours and the Senate, mooued them not a whit; when they were informed ſhortly after, that the Macedonian warre was ended at the battaile of Cynoſcephalæ. They knew that Antiochus his turne would be next; and prepared to be forward on the ſtronger ſide. Wherefore they would not bee contented to ſit ſtill; vnleſſe the Townes on the South Coaſt of Aſia, belonging to Ptolemie their friend and Confederate, were ſuffered to bee at quiet. Herein alſo they did well; for that they had euer been greatly beholding to all the race of the Ptolemies. They therefore, in this time of neceſſitie, gaue what aid they could vnto all the ſubiects of the Aegyptian in thoſe parts. In like manner did King Eumenes, the ſonne of Attalus, prognoſticate as concerning the warre that followed, betweene Antiochus and the Romans. For when King Antiochus made a friendly offer, to beſtow one of his daughters vpon him in marriage: Hee excuſed himſelfe, and would not haue her. Attalus and Philetærus, his brethren, wondered at this. But he told them, that the Romans would ſurely make warre vpon Antiochus; and therein finally preuaile.

uaile. Wherefore he said, That by abstayning from this affinitie, it should be in his power to ioyne with the Romans, and strengthen himselfe greatly with their friendship. Contrariwise, if hee leaned to Antiochus: as he must be partaker in his ouerthrow; so was he sure to be oppressed by him, as by an ouer-mightie neighbour, if he happened to win the victorie.

Antiochus himselfe wintered about Ephesus: where hee tooke such order as hee thought conuenient, for the reducing of Smyrna and Lampsacus to obedience; that had vsurped their libertie, and obstinately strouc to maintaine it, in hope that the Romans would protect them. In the beginning of the Spring hee sailed vnto the Hellespont: where hauing won some Townes that Philip had gotten not long before this, hee passed ouer into Europe side; and in short space mastered the Chersonesus. Thence went hee to Lysimachia: which the Thracians had gotten and destroyed, when Philip withdrew his Garrison thence, to employ it in the Roman warre. The Ætolians obiected as a crime vnto Philip, in the Conference before T. Quintius, that hee had oppressed Lysimachia, by thrusting thereinto a Garrison. Hereunto Philip made answere, that his Garrison did not oppresse the Towne, but saue it from the Barbarians: who tooke and sackt it, as soone as the Macedonians were gone. That this answere was good and substanciall, though it were not accepted as such; might appeare by the miserable case, in which Antiochus found Lysimachia at his comming thither. For the Towne was vtterly razed by the Barbarians; and the people, carried away into slauerie. Wherefore the King tooke order to haue it reedified: as also to redeeme those that were in bondage; and to recollect as many of the Citizens, as were dispersed in the Countrie thereabout. Likewise hee was carefull to allure thither, by hopefull promises, new inhabitants; and to repleniſh the Citie with the wonted frequencie. Now to the end that men should not be terrified from comming thither to dwell, by any feare of the neighbour Thracians: he tooke a iournie in hand against those barbarous people, with the one halfe of his Armie; leauing the other halfe to repaire the Citie. These paines he tooke; partly in regard of the conuenient situation, and former glory of Lysimachia; partly for that he thought it highly redounding vnto his owne honour, to recouer and establish the dominion in those parts, which his fore-father Seleucus Nicator had won from Lysimachus, and thereby made his Kingdome of greater extent, than it occupied in any following time. But for this ambition hee shall dearely pay: and as after that victorie against Lysimachus, the death of King Seleucus followed shortly; so shall a deadlie wound of the Kingdome founded by Seleucus ensue very speedily, after the reconqueſt of the same Countrie, which was the last of Seleucus his purchases.

§. IIII.

The Romans hold friendly correspondence with ANTIOCHVS, during their warre with PHILIP: after which they quarrell with him. The doings of HANNIBAL at Carthage: whence hee is chased by his enemies, and by the Romans: His flight vnto the King ANTIOCHVS. *The Aetolians murmure against the Romans in Greece. FOr the Romans, though they were vnable to smother their desire of warre with Antiochus, whereof notice was alreadie taken both by their friends and by their enemies: yet was it much against their will to keepe the rumour on foot, which they meant shortly to make good, of this intended warre, so long as they wanted matter of quarrell; whereof they were furnished, by this enterprise of the Kings about Lysimachia. It was not long, since King Attalus, a friend and helper of the Romans in their war with Philip, could obtain of them none other help against Antiochus, than Embassadors to speake for him; because the one of these Kings was held no lesse a friend than the other. Neither did there afterwards passe between them any other offices, than very friendly. Antiochus, at the request of their Embassadors, withdrew his Inuasion from the Kingdome of Pergamus: also verie shortly after he sent Embassadours to them, to make a perfect League of amitie betweene them. This was whilest as yet they were busied with Philip; and therfore had reason to answere his good will with good acceptation: as they did in outward shew. But when the Macedonian war was at an end, and all, or most of all the States in Greece, were become little better than Clients vnto the Romans: then was all this good correspondence changed, into termes of worse, but more plaine, meaning. For T. Quintius, with his ten Counsailors sent from Rome, requited (as hath beene * shewed before) with a commination of warre, this kings gratulation of their victorie; as also his long-professed amitie, and desire to continue in the same.

These ten Counsailors were able to informe T. Quintius, and acquaint him with the purpose of the Senate: whereof yet it seemes that he was not ignorant before; since, in regard of Antiochus, hee was the more inclinable vnto peace with Philip. It was therefore agreed, when they diuided themselues to make progresse through diuers quarters of Greece for the execution of their late Decree, That two of them should visit King Antiochus; and the rest, where occasion serued, vse diligence to make a partie strong against him. Neither was the Senate at Rome vnmindfull of the busines: wherein lest T. Quintius, with his ten Assistants, should happen to forget any thing to their parts belonging; L. Cornelius was sent from Rome of purpose, to deale with the King about those controuersies, that were betweene him and Ptolemie. What other priuate instructions Cornelius had; wee may coniecture by the mannaging of this his Embassage. For comming to Selymbria: and there vnderstanding that P. Villius and L. Terentius, hauing beene sent by Titus, were at Lysimachia, He hastned thither; whither also came P. Lentulus (another of the ten Counsailours) from Bargille, to be present at the Conference. Hegesianax and Lysias were also there; the same, who had lately brought from Titus those peremptorie Conditions, which the Embassadours present shall expound vnto their Master. After a few dayes Antiochus returned from his Thracian Expedition. The meeting and entertainment betweene Him and these Romans, was in appearance full of loue. But when they came to treat of the businesse in hand; this good mood was quite altered. L. Cornelius, in two or three words, briefly deliuered his errand from Rome: which was, That Antiochus had reason to deliuer backe vnto Ptolemie those Townes of his, whereof he had lately gotten possession. Hereunto he added, and that very earnestly, That hee must also giue vp the Townes of late belonging vnto Philip; and by him newly occupied. For what could bee more absurd, than such folly in the Romans; as to let Antiochus enioy the profit of that warre, wherein they had laboured so much, and He done nothing? Further He warned the King, that hee should not molest those Cities that were free: and finally Hee demaunded of him, vpon what reason hee was come ouer with so great an Armie into Europe; for that other cause of his iournie there was none probable, than a purpose to make war vpon the Romans. To this the King made answere, That hee wondered why the Romans should so trouble themselues, with thinking vpon the matters of Asia: wherewith He praied them to let him alone; euen as He, without such curiositie, suffered them to doe in Italie what they thought good. As for his comming ouer into Europe: they saw well enough what businesse had drawne him thither; namely, the warre against the barbarous Thracians: the rebuilding of Lysimachia, and the recouerie of Townes to him belonging, in Thrace and Chersonesus. Now concerning his title vnto that Countrie, He deriued it from Seleucus: who made conquest thereof, by his victorie against Lysimachus. Neither was it so, that any of the places in controuersie betweene betweene him and the other Kings, had beene ſtill of old belonging to the Macedonians or Ægyptians; but had beene ſeized on by them, or by others from whom they receiued them, at ſuch time as his Anceſtors, being Lords of thoſe Countries, were hindred by multiplicitie of buſines, from looking vnto all that was their owne. Finally he willed them, neither to ſtand in feare of him, as if hee intended ought againſt them from Lyſimachia; ſince it was his purpoſe to beſtow this Citie vpon one of his ſonnes, that ſhould reigne therein: nor yet to be grieued with his proceedings in Aſia; either againſt the free Cities, or againſt the King of Ægypt; ſince it was his meaning to make the free Cities beholding vnto himſelfe, and to ioyne ere long with Ptolemie, not onely in friendſhip, but in a bond of neere affinitie. Cornelius hauing heard this, and being perhaps vnable to refute it; would needes heare further, what the Embaſſadours of Smyrna and of Lampſacus, whom he had there with him, could ſay for themſelues. The Embaſſadors of Lampſacus being called in, began a tale; wherein they ſeemed to accuſe the King before the Romans, as it were before competent Iudges. Antiochus therefore interrupted them, and bade them holde their peace; foraſmuch as he had not choſen the Romans, but would rather take the Citizens of Rhodes, to be Arbitrators betweene Him and them.

Thus the Treatie held ſome few dayes, without any likelihood of effect. The Romans, hauing not laide their complaints in ſuch ſort, as they might be a conuenient foundation of the war by them intended: nor yet hauing purpoſe to depart wel ſatisfied, and thereby to corroborate the preſent peace; were doubtfull how to order the matter, in ſuch wiſe as they might neither too rudely, like boiſterous Gallo-Greekes, pretend only the goodneſſe of their ſwordes; nor yet ouer-modeſtly, to retaine among the Greekes an opinion of their iuſtice, forbeare the occaſion of making themſelues great. The King on the other ſide was wearie of theſe tedious gheſts; that would take none anſwere, and yet ſcarce knew what to ſay. At length came newes, without any certaine author, That Ptolemie was dead. Hereof neither the King, nor the Romans, would take notice, though each of them were deſirous to haſten into Ægypt: Antiochus, to take poſſeſſion of the Kingdome; and L. Cornelius, to preuent him thereof, and ſet the Countrie in good order. Cornelius was ſent from Rome Embaſſadour, both to Antiochus and to Ptolemie: which gaue him occaſion to take leaue, and prepare for his Ægyptian voyage. Both He, and his fellow Embaſſadors, had good leaue to depart all together: and the King foorthwith made readie, to be in Ægypt with the firſt. To his ſonne Seleucus hee committed his Armie; and left him to ouer-ſee the building of Lyſimachia: but all his Sea-forces Hee tooke along with him, and ſailed vnto Epheſus. Thence hee ſent Embaſſadours to T. Quintius: whom he requeſted to deale with him in this matter of Peace, after ſuch ſort, as might ſtand with honeſtie and good faith. But as he was further proceeding on his voyage; He was perfectly informed that Ptolemie was aliue. This made him beare another way from Ægypt: and afterwards a tempeſt, with a grieuous ſhipwracke, made him, without any further attempt on the way, glad to haue ſafely recouered his Port of Seleucia. Thence went he to Antiochia, where he wintered: ſecure, as might appeare, of the Roman warre.

But the Romans had not ſo done with him. During the Treatie at Lyſimachia, (at leaſtwiſe not long before or after it) one of their Embaſſadours that had beene ſent vnto the Macedonian gaue him counſaile, as in a point highly tending to his good; Not to reſt contented with the Peace which was granted vnto him by the Romans, but to deſire ſocietie with them, whereby they ſhould bee bound to haue the ſame friends and enemies. And this he aduiſed him to doe quickly, before the Warre brake out with Antiochus; leſt otherwiſe he might ſeeme, to haue awaited ſome fit occaſion of taking Armes againe. They who dealt thus plainely, did not meane to be ſatisfied with weake excuſes. In like manner ſome of the Greekes were ſollicited; and particularly the Ætolians, That conſtantly and faithfully they ſhould abide in the friendſhip of the People of Rome. It was needleſſe to ſay plainly ly whereto this entreatie tended: the froward answere made by the Ætolians, declares them to haue well vnderstood the purpose. They complained, that they were not alike honoured by the Romans after the Victorie, as they had beene during the Warre. They that so complained were the most moderate of them. Others cryed out, that they had beene wronged, and defrauded of what was promised vnto them: vpbrayding withall the Romans, as men to them beholding; not onely for their Victorie ouer Philip; but euen for helping them to set foot in Greece, which else they neuer could haue done. Hereto the Roman gaue gentle answeres: telling them that there was no more to doe, than to send Embassadors to the Senate, and vtter their griefes; and then should all be well.

Such care tooke the Romans in Greece, for their Warre intended against Antiochus. The fame hereof arriuing at Carthage, gaue matter vnto the enemies of Hannibal, wherewith both to picke a thanke of the Roman Senate; and to chace out of their Citie this honourable man, whom they so greatly hated. Hee had of late exercised his vertue against them in the Ciuill administration; and giuen them an ouerthrow, or two, in the long Robe. The Iudges at that time bore all the sway in Carthage: holding their places during life; and hauing subiect vnto them, the liues, goods, and fame of all the rest. Neither did they vse this their power with moderation: but conspired in such wise together, that whoso offended any one of them, should haue them all to be his enemies; which being once knowne, He was sure to be soone accused and condemned. In this their impotent rule of the Citie, Hannibal was chosen Prætor. By vertue of which Office, though hee was superiour vnto them during that yeere: yet had it not beene their manner to beare much regard vnto such an annual Magistrate, as at the yeeres end must be accomptable to them, if ought were laid vnto his charge. Hannibal therefore sending for one of the Quæstors, or officers of the Treasurie, to come and speake with him: the proud Quæstor set lightly thereby, and would not come. For he was of the aduerse Faction to Hannibal; and men of his place were to bee chosen into the Order of Iudges: in contemplation whereof, hee was filled alreadie with the spirit of his future Greatnesse. But he had not to doe with such a tame Prætor, as were they that had occupied the place before. Hannibal sent for him by a Pursiuant; and hauing thus apprehended him, brought him into judgement before a publique assemblie of the people. There he not onely shewed, what the vndutiful stubbornnesse of this Quæstor had beene; but how vnsufferable the insolencie of all the Iudges at the present was: whose vnbridled power made them to regard neither Lawes nor Magistrates. To this Oration when hee perceiued that all the Citizens were attentiue and fauourable; He foorthwith propounded a Law, which passed with the generall good liking; That the Iudges should be chosen from yeere to yeere, and no one man be continued in that Office two yeeres together. If this Law had beene passed, before he passed ouer Iberus: it would not perhaps haue beene in the power of Hanno, to haue brought him vnto necessitie of reforming another grieuance, concerning the Roman Tribute. This Tribute the Carthaginians were faine to leuie by Taxation layed vpon the whole Commonaltie; as wanting money in their publique Treasurie, wherewith to defray eyther that, or diuers other needefull charges. Hannibal considering this, beganne to examine the publique Reuenues; and to take a perfect note, both how much came into the Treasurie, by wayes and meanes whatsoeuer; and in what sort it was thence laid out. So he found, That the ordinarie charges of the Common-wealth did not exhaust the Treasurie: but that wicked Magistrates, and corrupt Officers, turning the greatest part of the monies to their owne vse, were thereby faine to load the people with needlesse burdens. Hereof he made such plaine demonstration, that these Robbers of the common Treasure were compelled to restore, with shame, what they had gotten by knauerie: and so the Carthaginians were freed from the necessitie of making such poore shifts, as formerly they had vsed, when they knew not the valew of their owne Estate. But as the vertue of Hannibal, was highly commended by all that were good Citizens: ſo they of the Roman Faction, which had, ſince the making of the peace vntill now, little regarded him, beganne to rage extremely; as being by him ſtript of their ill-gotten goods, and ill-employed authoritie, both at once; euen when they thought themſelues to haue been in full poſſeſſion of the vanquiſhed Carthage. Wherefore they ſent letters to their friends at Rome: wherein they complained, as if the Barchine Faction grew ſtrong againe, and Hannibal would ſhortly be in armes. Queſtionleſſe, if oppreſſing the Citie by iniuſtice, and robbing the Treaſurie, were the onely way to hold Carthage in peace with Rome: theſe enemies to the Barchines might well crie out, That hauing done their beſt alreadie to keepe all in quiet, they ſaw none other likelihood than of Warre. But hauing none other matter to alleadge, than their owne inuentions: they ſaid, That Hannibal was like vnto a wilde beaſt, which would neuer be tamed: That ſecret meſſages paſt betweene him, and King Antiochus: and that hee was wont to complaine of idleneſſe, as if it were harmefull to Carthage; with what elſe to like effect they could imagine. Theſe accuſations they directed not vnto the Senate: but addreſſing their letters craftily, euery one to the beſt of his owne friends at Rome, and ſuch as were Senators; they wrought ſo well, that neither publike notice of their Conſpiracie was taken at Carthage; nor the authoritie of the Roman Senate, wanting to the furtherance of their malicious purpoſe. Onely P. Scipio is ſaid to haue admoniſhed the Fathers, that they ſhould not thus diſhonourably ſubſcribe, and become Seconds to the accuſers of Hannibal: as if they would oppreſſe, by ſuborning or countenancing falſe witneſſes againſt him, the Man, againſt whom in warre they had not of long time preuailed, nor vſed their Victorie in ſuch baſe manner, when they obtained it. But the Romans were not all ſo great-minded as Scipio: they wiſhed for ſome ſuch aduantage againſt Hannibal; and were glad to haue found it. Three Embaſſadours they ſent ouer to Carthage, C. Seruilius, Q. Terentius, and M. Claudius Marcellus; whoſe very names import ſufficient cauſe of bad affection to Hannibal. Theſe hauing paſt the Sea, were entertained by thoſe that had procured their comming; and, being by them inſtructed how to carrie themſelues, gaue out, That they were ſent to end ſome controuerſies, betweene the Carthaginians and Maſaniſſa. But Hannibal had kept ſuch good eſpiall vpon the Romans, that hee knew their meaning well enough: againſt which he was neuer vnprepared. It were enough to ſay, That hee eſcaped them by flight: but in the actions of ſo famous a man, I hold it not impertinent to rehearſe the particularities. Hauing openly ſhewed himſelfe, as was his manner, in the place of Aſſembly, Hee went foorth of the Towne when it beganne to wexe darke, accompanied with two which were ignorant of his determination; though ſuch as he might well truſt. Hee had appointed Horſes to be in a readineſſe at a certaine place: whence riding all night, Hee came to a Towre of his owne by the Sea-ſide. There had hee a Ship furniſhed with all things needfull; as hauing long expected the neceſſitie of ſome ſuch journey. So He bade Africk farewell; lamenting the misfortune of his Countrie, more than his owne. Paſſing ouer to the Ile of Cercina; he found there in the Hauen ſome Merchants ſhips of Carthage. They ſaluted him reſpectiuely: and the chiefe among them beganne to enquire, whither hee was bound. He ſaid, Hee went Embaſſadour to Tyre: and that he intended there in the Iland to make a ſacrifice; whereto Hee inuited all the Merchants, and Maſters of the Shippes. It was hote weather: and therefore Hee would needs hold his Feaſt vpon the ſhore; where, becauſe there wanted couert, He made them bring thither all their ſailes and yards to be vſed in ſtead of Tents. They did ſo; and feaſted with him till it was late at night: at which time hee left them there aſleepe; and putting to Sea, held on his courſe to Tyre. All that night, and the day following, Hee was ſure not to bee purſued. For the Merchants did neither make haſte to ſend any newes of him to Carthage, as thinking him to be gone Embaſſadour: neither could they, without ſome loſſe of time, ſuch of them as made moſt ſpeed homeward, get away from Cercina; being buſied awhile in fitting their tackle. At Carthage, the miſſe of ſo great a perſon was diuerſly conſtrued. Some gheſſed aright, That he was fled. But the more common opinion was, That the Romans had made him away. At length came newes where he had been ſeene: and then the Roman Embaſſadours, hauing none other errand thither, accuſed him (with an euill grace) as a troubler of the Peace; whereby they onely diſcouered the miſchiefe by them intended againſt him, and the malice of their Senate; miſſing the while their purpoſe, and cauſing men to vnderſtand, that Hee fled not thus without great reaſon.

Hannibal, comming to Tyre, the Mother-Citie of Carthage, was there entertained Royally: as one, in whoſe great worth and honour the Tyrians, by reaſon of affinitie betweene their Cities, thought themſelues to haue intereſt. Thence went hee to Antioch; and, finding the King departed, viſited his ſonne in Daphne: who friendly welcommed him, and ſent him vnto his Father at Epheſus, that exceedingly reioyced at his comming.

As Antiochus had cauſe to be glad, in that he had gotten Hannibal: ſo had the Romans no great cauſe to bee therefore ſorrie; otherwiſe than as they had much diſgraced themſelues, by diſcouery of their impotent malice, in chacing him thus out of his Countrie. For it would not prooue alike eaſie vnto this great Commander, to make ſtout Souldiours of baſe Aſiatiques; as it had been by his trayning and diſcipline, to make very ſeruiceable and skilfull men of Warre of the Spaniards, Africans, Gaules, and other Natious, that were hardie though vnexperienced. Or were it ſuppoſed, that one mans worth, eſpecially being ſo extraordinary, could alter the nature of a cowardly people: yet was it therewithall conſiderable, that the vanities of Antiochus, the pride of his Court, the baſeneſſe of his Flatterers, and a thouſand other ſuch vexations, would bee farre more powerfull in making vnprofitable the vertue of Hannibal; now a deſolate and baniſhed man, than had been the villanie of Hanno and his Complices, hindering him in thoſe Actions wherein hee had the high Command, and was ſeconded by his warlike brethren. Wherefore the name of this Great Carthaginian, would onely helpe to ennoble the Roman Victorie: or if it further ſerued to hearten Antiochus, and make him leſſe carefull to auoid the warre; then ſhould it further ſerue, to juſtifie the Romans in their quarrell. And it ſeemes indeed, that it was no little part of their care, to get a faire pretence of making warre. For Antiochus, as is ſaid before, hauing newly ſent Embaſſadours to T. Quintius, requiring that the Peace might faithfully be kept: it was not probable, that he had any meaning to take Armes; vnleſſe by meere violence hee were thereto enforced. Onely the Ætolians were greatly ſuſpected, as a turbulent people, deſirous of innouation, and therefore practiſing with this Great King; whom they wiſhed to ſee among them in Greece. In this regard, and to appeaſe them; they had of late been anſwered with gentle words by one of the ten Counſailours, That the Senate would grant them whatſoeuer with reaſon they ſhould aske. But this promiſe was too large, and vnaduiſed. For when their Embaſſadours came to Rome, the Senate would grant them nothing; but wholly referred them to T. Quintius, who fauoured them leaſt. Hereat they murmured, but knew not how to right themſelues: otherwiſe than by ſpeaking ſuch words, as might haſten the Romans out of Greece for very ſhame; who had no deſire to be thence gone.

The dayly talke at Rome was of warre with Antiochus; but in Greece, when the Romans would leaue the Countrey. For the Ætolians were wont to vpbraid the reſt of the Greekes, with the vaine libertie which the Romans had proclaimed, ſaying, That theſe their Deliuerers had layd heauier fetters vpon them, than formerly they did weare; but yet brighter and fairer, than thoſe of the Macedonian: likewiſe, That it was a gracious act of Titus, to take from the legs of the Greeks their chaine, & tie it about their necks. There was indeed no cauſe of tarrying longer in Greece, if the Romans had no other meaning than what they pretended. For Philip had made no de-

laie, in accompliſhment of that which was laid vpon him: all the Townes of Greece were at libertie, and the whole Countrey at peace, both with the Romans, and within it ſelfe. As for Antiochus; He made it his dayly ſuit, That the Peace betweene him and Rome, ſuch as it was, might be confirmed, and ſtrengthened by a League of more aſſurance. Neuertheleſſe T. Quintius would needs feare that Antiochus meant forthwith to ſeize vpon Greece, as ſoone as hee and his Armie were thence departed: And in this regard, He retained ſtill in his owne hands Chalcis, Demetrias, and the Acrocorinthus: by benefit of which Townes, he might the better withſtand the dangerous Inuaſion like to be made by Antiochus. Suteable vnto the doings of Quintius were the reports of the tenne Embaſſadours, that had been ſent ouer to aſſiſt him; when they returned backe into the Citie. Antiochus, they ſaid, would queſtionleſſe fall vpon Greece: wherein he ſhould finde not onely the Ætolians, but Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, readie to giue him entertainment. Wherefore there was none other way, than to doe ſomewhat againſt theſe their ſuſpected enemies: eſpecially againſt Nabis, who could worſt make reſiſtance; whileſt Antiochus was farre away in Syria, and not intentiue to his buſineſſe. Theſe reports went not onely current through the Citie, among the Vulgar; but found ſuch credit with the chiefe of the Senate, that in the following yeere, againſt which time it was expected that Antiochus ſhould be ready to take his great enterpriſe in hand; P. Cornelius Scipio the African deſired, and obtained, a ſecond Conſulſhip, with intention to be Generall in the Warre, againſt the King and his Hannibal. For the preſent, the buſineſſe with Nabis was referred vnto Titus; to deale with him as hee thought good. This would bee a faire colour of his longer tarriance in Greece. Therefore he was glad of the employment: whereof alſo hee knew that many of the Greekes would not be ſorry; though for his owne part, hee wanted all good pretence of taking it in hand. For Nabis had entred into friendſhip with him, two or three yeeres before this, as is alreadie ſhewed, whileſt hee had Warre with Philip: and had further beene contented for the Romans ſake to bee at peace with the Achæans; neither ſince that time had hee done any thing, whereby hee ſhould draw vpon himſelfe this Warre. Hee was indeed a deteſtable Tyrant, and hated of the Achæans; as one, that beſides his owne wicked Conditions, had formerly done to them great miſchiefe. Titus therefore had a plauſible Theme, whereon to diſcourſe before the Embaſſages of all the Confederate Cities; Which hee cauſed to meete for that purpoſe at Corinth. He told them, That in the warre with Philip, not onely the Greekes, but the Romans themſelues, had each their motiues apart (which hee there briefly rehearſed) that ſhould ſtirre them vp, and cauſe them to be earneſt. But in this which hee now propounded to them concerning Nabis, the Romans had none other intereſt, than onely the making perfect of their honour, in ſetting all Greece at liberty: which noble Action was in ſome ſort maimed, or incompleat, whileſt the noble Citie of Argos was left in ſubjection to a Tyrant, that had lately occupied it. It therefore belonged vnto them, the Greekes, duly to conſider, whether they thought the deliuerance of Argos a matter worthy to be vndertaken; or whether otherwiſe to auoid all further trouble, they could bee well contented to leaue it as it was. This concerned them, and not the Romans: who in taking this worke in hand, or letting it alone, would wholly be ruled by the Greekes themſelues. The Athenian Embaſſadour made anſwere hereunto very eloquently, and as pleaſing as he could deuiſe. He gaue thankes to the Romans for what was paſt; extolled their vertues at large; and magnified them highly in regard of this their Propoſition: wherein vnrequeſted they freely made offer to continue that bounty, which at the vehement requeſt of their poore Aſſociates, they had already of late extended vnto the Greekes. To this Hee added, That great pittie it was to heare, ſuch notable vertue and high deſerts ill ſpoken of by ſome: which tooke vpon them, out of their owne imaginations to foretell, what harme theſe their Benefactors meant to doe hereafter: when as Thankfulnes rather would haue required an acknowledgement, of the benefits and pleasures already receiued. Euery one found the meaning of this last clause, which was directly against the Ætolians. Wherefore Alexander the Ætolian rose vp, and told the Athenians their owne: putting them in minde of their ancient glorie, in those times when their Citie had beene the Leader of all Greece, for defence and recouerie of the libertie generall: from which honour they were now so farre fallen, that they became Parasites vnto those whom they thought most mighty; and by their base assentation, would lead all the rest into seruitude. Then spake Hee against the Achæans, Clients that had been a long time vnto the Macedonian; and souldiors of Philip, vntill they ranne away from his aduersitie. These, Hee said, had gotten Corinth, and must now haue warre be made for their sakes, to the end that they might also bee Lords of Argos: whereas the Ætolians, that had first made warre with Philip, and alwayes been friends vnto the Romans, were now defrauded of some places, anciently to them belonging. Neither did hee thus containe himselfe, but obiected vnto the Romans fraudulent dealing: forasmuch as they kept their Garrisons in Demetrias, Chalcis, and the Acrocorinth; hauing been alwayes wont to professe, That Greece could neuer bee at libertie, whilest those places were not free. Also now at last, what else did they seeke by this discourse of warre with Nabis, than businesses wherewith to finde themselues occupied, that so they might haue some seeming cause of abiding longer in the Countrie? But they should doe well, if they meant as they spake; to carrie their Legions home out of Greece: which could not indeed bee free, till their departure. As for Nabis; the Aetolians themselues did promise, and would vndertake, That they would either cause him to yeeld to reason, and relinquish Argos freely, withdrawing thence his Garrison; or else compell him by force of Armes, to submit himselfe to the good pleasure of all Greece, that was now at vnitie. These words had been reasonable, if they had proceeded from better men. But it was apparent, that no regard of the common libertie wrought so much with these Aetolians; as did their owne rauenous desire of oppressing others, and getting vnto themselues, that worse would vse it, the whole Dominion in Greece, which Philip had lost. Neither could they well dissemble this; making it no small part of their grieuance, That the old League was forgotten: wherein it had been couenanted, That the Romans should enioy the spoile of all, but leaue the Townes and Lands in possession of the Ætolians. This, and the remembrance of a thousand mischiefes by them done in former times, made the whole Assembly, especially the Achæans, crie out vpon them: entreating the Romans to take such order before they went, that not onely Nabis might be compelled to doe right; but the Ætolian theeues be enforced to keepe home, and leaue their neighbours in quiet. All this was highly to the pleasure of Titus: who saw, that by discountenancing the Ætolians, He was become the more gracious with all the rest. But whether it pleased him so well, that Antiochus his Embassadours did presently after lie hard vpon him, to drawe the peace to some good conclusion, it may bee greatly doubted. Hee cast them off with a slight answere: telling them, That the ten Embassadors or Counsailours which had beene sent vnto him from Rome, to be his assistants in these matters of weight, were now returned home; and that, without them, it was not in his power to conclude vpon any thing.

Now concerning the Lacedæmonian warre; it was very soone ended. For Titus vsed the helpe of all his Confederates; and made as great preparation against Nabis, both by Land and Sea, as if he should haue had to doe with Philip. Besides the Roman forces, King Eumenes with a Nauie, and the Rhodian Fleet, were inuited to the seruice: as also Philip of Macedon sent aid by Land; doing therein poorely, whether it were to get fauour of the Romans, or whether to make one among the number, in seeking reuenge vpon Nabis, that had done him iniurie. But the most forward in this Expedition were the Achæans, who set out ten thousand Foote, and a thousand Horse. As for the Ætolians: rather to hold good fashion, and sound their dispositions, ſitions, than in hope to ſpeed, their helpe was required; whereof they excuſed themſelues as well as they thought beſt. Thus are the Achæans now become the prime friends of the Romans in Greece; hauing remooued the Ætolians from that degree of fauour: like as they themſelues hereafter (though not in all haſte) ſhall be ſupplanted of the ſame Lacedæmonians, againſt whom they are now marching.

Some of the Argiues more bold then wiſe, began a conſpiracie againſt the Lacedæmonians that held their Towne; meaning to open their gates vnto the Roman. But ere Titus drew neare, they were all detected and ſlaine: excepting a very few, that eſcaped out of the Towne. The fame of this Commotion, cauſed the Armie to march apace toward Argos; with hope to be there, before things were at quiet. But there was no ſtirre within the Walles: the execution done vpon the firſt mouers, hauing terrified all the reſt of the Citizens. Titus then thought it better, to aſſaile Nabis in the head of his ſtrength at Lacedæmon, than to conſume time about other places; eſpecially at Argos: for the freedom wherof ſince the Warre was made, pittie it were, that the calamities of the warre ſhould thereon fall moſt heauily.

Nabis had in readineſſe an Armie of fifteene thouſand, wherewith to defend himſelfe againſt theſe Inuaders. Fiue thouſand of them were Mercinaries: the reſt, of his owne Countrie; but ſuch as were of all others the worſt, as manumiſed ſlaues, malefactors and baſe peaſants, vnto whom his Tyrannie was beneficiall. Of the good and worthy Citizens hee ſtood in doubt; and ſince he could not hope to win their loue, his meaning was to hold them quiet by feare. He called them all to an Aſſemblie: and compaſſing them round in with his Armie, told them of the danger that was toward him and them. If they could agree within themſelues; they might, he ſaid, hope the better to withſtand the common Enemie. But foraſmuch as turbulent heads were inuited by light occaſions, to raiſe tumults, and worke dangerous treaſon: it ſeemed vnto him the ſafeſt, and (withall) the mildeſt courſe, to arreſt beforehand, and put in ward, all thoſe whom he found moſt reaſon to ſuſpect. So ſhould he keepe them innocent perforce; and thereby preſerue not onely the Citie and his owne perſon from danger, but them alſo from the puniſhment, which elſe they might haue incurred. Hereupon hee cites and apprehends about foureſcore of them; whom hee leads away to priſon, and the next night puts them all to death. Thus was he ſure that they neither ſhould offend, nor yet breake looſe. As for the death of them, if it ſhould happen to be noiſed abroad: what could it elſe doe than terrifie the people; who muſt thereby vnderſtand, that it was a mortall crime to be ſuſpected? And to the ſame purpoſe his cruelty extended it ſelfe vnto ſome poore wretches: whom he accuſed of a meaning to flie to the Enemie. Theſe were openly whipt through all the ſtreetes, and ſlaine. Hauing thus affrighted the Citizens; He turned the more freely all his thoughts toward the Enemie, that came on apace. Hee welcommed them with a ſallie: wherein, as commonly happens, the Souldiours of the Towne had the better at firſt; but were at length repelled with loſſe. Titus abode not many dayes before Sparta: but ouer-ran the Countrey; hoping belike to prouoke the Tyrant forth to battaile. The Roman Fleet at the ſame time with King Eumenes and the Rhodians, layd ſiege vnto Gytheum, the onely or principall Hauen-towne that Nabis had. Likely they were to haue taken it by force, when there appeared hope of getting it by treaſon. There were two Gouernours within the Towne equall in authoritie: whereof the one, either for feare, or deſire of reward, had a purpoſe to let in the Romans. But the other finding what was in hand, and being ſomewhat more faithfull, ſlue the Traitor; after whoſe death, he himſelfe alone made the better defence. Yet when T. Quintius with part of his Armie came thither to Gytheum: this Captaine of the Towne had not the heart to abide the vttermoſt, and awaite what either Time or his Maſter might doe for him, but was contented to giue vp the place; yet vpon Condition, to depart in ſafety to Sparta with his Garriſon. Pythagoras, the ſonne-in-law of Nabis, and brother vnto his wife, was come from Argos, whereof he had the Gouernment with a thousand Souldiours Mercenaries, and two thousand Argines: it beeing (as may seeme) the Tyrants purpose, to relieue Gytheum: which he thought would haue held longer out. But when they heard that it was lost, then began they to thinke vpon finishing the warre, by some reasonable Composition. Pythagoras therefore was sent his Embassador to Titus: requesting only that he would appoint a time and place for Nabis to meet and speake with him. This was granted. In that Parlee the Tyrant spake very reasonably for himselfe: prouing, that hee suffered wrong, and had done none, and that by many good arguments; whereof the summe was, That whatsoeuer they now did, or could obiect vnto him, was of elder date than the League which they had made with him. Whereupon he inferred, That neither for his keeping the Towne of Argos, nor for any other cause by them alleadged, they ought to make warre vpon him; since Argos, and all other their allegations whatsoeuer, had not hindered them, in time of their more neede of him, from entring into that League with him; which was neuer broken on his part, nor ought to be on theirs. But Quintius was not herewith satisfied. Hee charged him with Tyrannie; and gaue instance, as easily he might, of diuers barbarous cruelties by him committed. In all which points, forasmuch as they knew this Nabis to be guiltie, before they made Peace and Confederacie with him; it was expedient, that some other cause of this Inuasion should be alleadged. Wherefore he said further, That this Tyrant had occupied Messene, a Towne Confederate with the Romans: That he had bargained to ioyne with Philip; when he was their enemie, not onely in League, but also in affinitie: and that his Fleete had robbed many of their ships, about the Cape of Malea. Now touching this Piracie, since in the Articles by Titus propounded vnto Nabis, there was no restitution mentioned, other than of ships, by him taken from the Greekes his neighbours, with whom he had long held warre: it may seeme to haue beene obiected, onely by way of Complement, and to enlarge the volume of those complaints, that were otherwise very friuolous. As for Messene, and the bargaine of Alliance made with Philip: they were matters foregoing the League, that was made betweene the Romans and this Tyrant; and therefore not to haue beene mentioned. All this it seemes that Aristanus, the Prætor of the Achæans, verie well perceiued: who therefore doubting lest the Romans, (that were wont to talke so much of their owne iustice, honour, and faithfull dealing) should now relent, and forbeare to molest him, who, though a wicked man, was yet their Confederate; and had neuer done them wrong; framed his discourse to another end. He entreated Nabis to consider well of his owne estate; and to settle his fortunes, whilest he might doe it without hazzard: alleadging the examples of many Tyrants that had ruled in the neighbour-cities, and therein committed great outrages; yet were afterwards contented to surrender their Estates, and liued in great securitie, honour, and happines, as priuate men. Thus they discoursed vntill night. The next day Nabis was contented to relinquish Argos; and requested them, to deliuer vnto him in writing their other demands, that hee might take counsaile with his friends. The issue of all was, That, in regard of the charges, whereat the Confederates must bee, for maintenance of an Armie to lie in Leaguer all that Winter (as there was no hope of making short worke) before the Citie of Sparta: they were contented to make peace with the Tyrant, vpon such Conditions as Titus should thinke meete. Besides the restitution of Argos, and all the places thereon depending; Titus propounded many other Conditions to Nabis, and some of them very grieuous. Hee would not suffer the Lacedæmonian to haue ought to doe in the Ile of Crete; no, nor to make any Confederacies; nor war, either in that Iland or elsewhere; not to build any Towne or Castle vpon his owne Lands; not to keepe any other shipping, than two small Barkes; besides many other troublesome iniunctions; with imposition of an hundred talents in siluer to be payd out of hand, and fiftie talents yeerely, for eight yeeres next ensuing. For obseruance of these Couenants he demanded fiue hostages, such as he himselfe should name; and one of them to be the Tyrants owne ſonne. If it had beene the meaning of Titus, to withdraw the war from Nabis, becauſe it was not grounded vpon iuſtice: then had it been enough, if not more than enough, to take Argos from him; which hee himſelfe did offer, though it were for feare, to deliuer vp. But if it were thought reaſonable, to diſpenſe a little with the Roman faith, in regard of the great benefit which thereby might redound vnto the ſtate of their beſt friends in Greece, by the extirpation of this Tyrannie: then ſhould this enterpriſe, when once it was taken in hand, haue beene proſecuted vnto the very vtmoſt. As for this middle courſe which the Romans held: as it was not honourable vnto them, to enrich themſelues by the ſpoile of one that had not offended them: nor pleaſing to the Achæans, who iudged it euer after a great blemiſh to the noble acts of Titus: ſo did it miniſter vnto the Ætolians, and to ſuch as curiouſly pried into the faults of thoſe which tooke vpon them to bee Patrons of Greece, no barren Subiect of malicious diſcourſe. For ſince Philip, a King, and deſcended of many famous Kings, might not bee ſuffered by theſe Maſterly Romans, to hold any one of thoſe Countries or Townes in Greece, that had belonged vnto his Anceſtors: it was thought very ſtrange, that Lacedæmon, once the moſt famous Citie among all the Greekes, was by the ſame Romans left in poſſeſſion of a Tyrant, that had vſurped it but yeſterday: and Hee therein rooted by their authoritie, as their friend and Confederate. Nabis on the other ſide thought himſelfe vnmercifully dealt withall, by the ſelfe-ſame Romans, whoſe amitie he had preferred in time of a doubtfull warre, before the loue and affinitie of the Macedonian King, that had committed the Citie of Argos into his hands. But falſly had he dealt with the Macedonian: and falſly was he dealt with by thoſe, to whom he did betake himſelfe. Among theſe Articles propounded, there was nothing that pleaſed him; ſaue onely that for the baniſhed Lacedæmonians, (of whom a great number were in the Roman Campe; hauing among them Ageſipolis the naturall King of Sparta, that being a yong childe was driuen out by Lycurgus, the firſt of the Tyrants) there was made no prouiſion, to haue them reſtored vnto their Citie and Eſtates; but onely leaue required for as many of their wiues, as would be ſo contented, to liue abroad with them in baniſhment. Wherefore hee forbore to giue conſent vnto theſe demands: and ſuſtained an aſſault or two; hoping belike that the enemies would ſoone be wearie. But his fearefull nature ſhortly ouercame the reſolution, which the ſenſe of theſe iniuries had put into him. So yeelding vnto all that had beene propounded, Hee deliuered the hoſtages; and thereupon obtained peace, that was confirmed afterwards at Rome by the Senate and People. From this time forward, Hee thought the Romans more wicked than himſelfe; and was readie vpon the firſt aduantage, to doe them all miſchiefe that he could.

The Argiues had heard newes that Lacedæmon was euen at point of being taken: This erected them, and gaue them heart to thinke vpon their owne good. So they aduentured to ſet vpon the Garriſon; which was much weakened, by the remoouе of the three thouſand carried thence by Pythagoras, to helpe the Tyrant at Sparta. There needed vnto their libertie no more, than that all of them ioyntly ſhould ſet their handes to the getting of it; which no ſooner they did than they obtained it. Preſently after this came T. Quintius to Argos, where hee was joyfully welcommed. Hee was deſeruedly acknowledged as author of that benefit, whereon the Citizens had laied hold without ſtaying for him: and that hee might the better entitle himſelfe thereto, he cauſed the libertie of the Argiues to be proclaimed at the Nemean games; as ratifying it by his authoritie. The Citie was annexed againe to the Councell of Achaia; whereby the Achæans were not more ſtrengthened, than the Argiues themſelues were ſecured from danger of relapſe, into the ſame extremities out of which they had newly eſcaped.

After this, Titus found little buſines or none wherewith to ſet on worke his Armie in Greece. Antiochus was about to ſend another Embaſſage to Rome, deſiring peace and friendſhip of the Senate. Things being therefore in appearance wholy ly disposed vnto quiet; Scipio the African, that was chosen Consul at Rome, could not haue his desire, of being sent Commander into Greece. The vnsincere meaning of Antiochus, and the tumultuous disposition of the Ætolians, were held as considerations worthie of regard: yet not sufficient causes of making Warre. Neither appeared there any more honest way, of confuting the Ætolians, and of throughly perswading all the Greekes (which was not to be neglected, by those that meant to assure vnto themselues the Patronage of Greece) that the good of the Countrie, was their sole intent: than by withdrawing thence their Legions, and leauing the Nation vnto it selfe, til occasion should be ripe, and call them ouer againe. Wherfore after Titus had spent a Winter there, without any matter of employment, either found, or at any neere distance appearing; he called an Assembly of Delegates, from all parts of Greece to Corinth: where hee meant to bid them farewell. There he recounted vnto them all that had passed since his comming into those parts; and willed them to value the Roman friendship, according to the difference of estate, wherein the Romans found and left them. Hereto he added some wholesome counsaile; touching the moderate vse of their libertie, and the care which they ought to haue of liuing peaceably, and without faction. Lastly hee gaue vp Acrocorinthus to the Achæans; withdrawing thence the Roman Garrison, and promising to doe the like (which verie soone hee did) at Chalcis and Demetrias; that so it might be knowne, what liers the Ætolians were, who had accused the Romans, of a purpose to retaine those places. With joyfull acclamations did the Greekes testifie their good liking of that which Titus had said and done: as also (at his request) they agreed, to ransome and enlarge all Romans, that had bin sold into their Countrie by Hannibal.

Thus Titus crowned his actions in Greece with an happie end: and by leauing the Countrie before his departure was vrged, left therein behind him the memorie of his vertue and benefits, vntainted by jelousie and suspition of any euill meaning. At his comming to the Citie, Hee had the honour of a Triumph; which was the goodliest of all that Rome had vntill that day beheld. Three dayes together the shew of his pompe continued: as being set out with the spoiles of a Countrie, more aboundant in things worthie of such a spectacle, than any wherein the Romans had before made Warre. All sorts of Armes, with Statues and curious pieces of Brasse or Marble, taken from the Enemie, were carried in the first dayes Pageant. The second day, was brought in, all the treasure of Gold and Siluer: some in the rude Masse vnwrought; some, in diuers sorts of Coine; and some, in Vessels of sundrie kindes, that were the more highly prized by the workemanship. Among these were tenne shieldes, all of Siluer; and one of pure Gold. The third day Titus himselfe entred the Citie in his Triumphant Chariot. Before him were carried an hundred and foureteene Crownes of Gold, bestowed vpon him by diuers Cities. There were also led the beasts for Sacrifice; the Prisoners, and the hostages: among which, Demetrius the sonne of King Philip, and Armenes the sonne of Nabis, were principall. After him followed his Armie; and (which added much grace, and good liking, to the Shew) the Roman Captiues, by his procurement redeemed from slaueric in Greece.

Not long after his Triumph, He procured audience of the Senate for many Embassages, that were come out of Greece and Asia. They had all very fauourable answeres, excepting those of King Antiochus: whom the Senate would not heare, but referred ouer to T. Quintius, and the tenne that had beene his Counsailors; because their businesse was said to bee somewhat intricate. Hereat the Kings Embassadours wondred. They said vnto Titus and his Associates, That they could not discerne wherein consisted any perplexitie of their message. For all Treaties of peace and friendship, were either betweene the Victor and the vanquished; betweene those, that hauing warred together, were vpon equall termes of aduantage; or betweene those that had liued alwayes in good agreement, without any quarrell. Vnto the Victor, they said, that the vanquished must yeeld; and patiently endure the the impoſition of ſome Couenants, that elſe might ſeeme vnreaſonable. Where Warre had been made, and no aduantage gotten: there was it vſuall to demaund and make reſtitution of things and places claimed, gotten, or loſt; accordingly as both parts could agree. But betweene thoſe which had neuer fallen out, there ought no Conditions of eſtabliſhing friendſhip to bee propoſed: ſince it was reaſonable, that each part ſhould hold their owne; and neyther carrie it ſelfe as ſuperiour vnto the other, in preſcribing ought that might bee troubleſome. Now of this laſt kind, was the League and friendſhip that had beene ſo long in concluſion, betwixt Antiochus and the Romans. Which being ſo: they held it ſtrange, that the Romans ſhould thus inſiſt on points no way concerning them, and take vpon them to preſcribe vnto the King, what Cities of Aſia he ſhould ſet at libertie; from what Cities they would giue him leaue to exact his wonted Tributes; eyther putting, or not putting, his Garriſons into them, as the Senate ſhould thinke fit. Hereto Quintius anſwered, That ſince they went ſo diſtinctly to worke, Hee would alſo doe the like. Wherefore he propounded vnto them two Conditions, and gaue them their choice whether to accept: Eyther that it ſhould bee lawfull for the Romans, to take part in Aſia with any that would ſeeke their friendſhip; Or, if King Antiochus miſliked this, and would haue them forbeare to meddle in Aſia, that then Hee ſhould abandon whatſoeuer hee had gotten in Europe. This was plaine dealing; but no reaſonable nor pertinent anſwere, to that which the Kings Embaſſadours had propounded. For if the Romans might be hired to abſtaine from Aſia, by the gift of all that Antiochus had lately wonne in Europe: then did not the affaires of Smyrna, Lampſacus, or any other Aſiatiques, whom they were pleaſed to reckon as their Confederates, bind them in honour to make warre with a King that ſought their loue, and had neuer done them injurie. But they knew very well, that Antiochus could not without great ſhame be ſo baſe, as to deliuer vp vnto them the Citie of Lyſimachia, whereon of late he had bin at ſo much coſt; in building it vp euen from the foundations, and repeopling it with inhabitants, that had all beene diſperſed, or captiue to the Barbarians. And ſo much the Embaſſadours with great indignation alleadged: ſaying, that Antiochus deſired friendſhip of the Romans; but ſo, as it might ſtand with his honour. Now in point of honour, the Romans tooke vpon them as if their cauſe were farre the ſuperiour. For it was, they ſaid, their purpoſe, to ſet at libertie thoſe Townes, which the King would oppreſſe and hold in ſubiection: eſpecially ſince thoſe Townes were of Greekiſh bloud and language; and fell in that regard vnder the patronage, which Rome had affoorded vnto all Greece beſides. By this colour they might ſoone haue left Antiochus King of not many ſubiects on the hither ſide of Euphrates. Neyther did they forbeare to ſay, That, vnleſſe he would quit what hee held in Europe, it was their meaning not onely to protect thoſe which relied vpon them in Aſia, but therein to make new Alliances: namely (as might bee vnderſtood) with ſuch as were his ſubiects. Wherefore they vrged his Embaſſadours to come to a point, and tel them plainly which of theſe two Conditions their King would accept. For lacke of a pleaſing anſwere, which the Embaſſadours could not hereto make; little wanted of giuing preſently defiance to the King. But they ſuffered themſelues to bee entreated, and were contented once againe to ſend ouer P. Villius, and others that had beene alreadie with the King at Lyſimachia; by whom they might receiue a finall anſwere, whether theſe demands made by Quintius and his Aſſociates would bee accepted, yea, or no. By this reſpite of time, and the fruitleſſe Treaties enſuing, Antiochus got the leiſure of two yeeres, or thereabouts, to prepare for warre; finding in the Romans, all that while, no diſpoſition to let him liue in peace.

§. V.

§. V.

Of the long Warres which the Romans had with the Gaules, Ligurians, and Spaniards. Of M. PORCIVS CATO. Iniuries done by MASANISSA to the Carthaginians, that sue to the Romans for iustice in vaine.

THE Insubrians, Boijans, and other of the Cisalpine Gaules, together with the Ligurians; made often, and (in a manner) continuall warre vpon the Romans in Italie, euen from such time as Hannibal and his brother Mago departed thence, vntill such time as they themselues were vtterly subdued: which was not, before the Romans were almost at the height of their Empire. These Nations, hauing serued vnder Mago for wages, and afterwards hauing gotten Amilcar a Carthaginian, to be Leader vnto them all, as hath beene alreadie shewed; by this their fellowship in Armes, grew to be such willing partakers each of others fortune, that seldome afterwards either the Gaules or Ligurians did stirre alone, but that their companions, hearing it, were readie to second them. How the Romans first preuailed, and got large possessions in Gallia Cisalpina now called Lumbardie; it hath beene long since rehearsed, betweene the first and second Punick Warres. As also it hath since appeared, how they lost the greatest part of their hold in that Countrie, by meanes of Hannibal his passage there-through. Neither is it likely that the reconquest would haue beene more difficult or tedious vnto the Romans, than was the first purchase: if, besides the greater employments which they had of their Armies abroad, their forces appointed vnto this warre had not beene distracted by the Ligurians; that alwayes made them to proceed warily, hauing an eye to the danger at their backes. The Ligurians were a stout Nation, light and swift of bodie; well practised in laying ambushes, and not discouraged with any ouerthrow, but foorthwith readie to fight againe. Their Countrie was mountainous, rough, wooddie, and full of streight and dangerous passages. Few good Townes they had; but many Castles, exceedingly well fortified by nature: so as without much labour, they could neither bee taken nor besieged. They were also very poore; and had little or nothing that might giue contentment, vnto a victorious Armie that should spoile their Land. In these respects they serued excellently well, to traine vp the Roman Souldiors to hardnesse and militarie patience: teaching them (besides other exercises of warre) to endure much, and liue contented with a little. Their quarrell to Rome, grew partly from their loue vnto the Gaules, their neighbours and companions; partly from their delight in robbing and spoiling the Territorie of their borderers, that were subiect vnto Rome. But their obstinate continuance in the Warre which they had begunne, seemes to haue beene grounded vpon the Condition of all Saluages; To be friends or foes, by custome, rather than by Iudgement: and to acknowledge no such vertue in Leagues, or formall conclusions of Peace, as ought to hinder them from vsing their aduantage, or taking reuenge of injuries when they returne to minde. This qualitie is found in all, or most of the West-Indians: who, if they be demanded a reason of the Warres betweene them and any of their neighbours, vse commonly this answere, It hath still beene the custome for vs and them, to fight one against the other.

Diuers ouerthrowes, though none that were great, these Ligurians gaue vnto the Romans: but many more, and greater, they receiued. Often they sought peace, when they found themselues in distresse; and brake it againe as often, when they thought it profitable so to doe. The best was, that as their Countrie was a good place of exercise vnto the Romans, so out of their own Countrie they did little harme:

not

not ſending any great Armies farre from home; perhaps, becauſe they knew not how to make warre, ſaue on their owne ground.

The Countrie of Spaine, as it was the firſt part of the Continent out of Italie that became ſubiect vnto the Romans: ſo was it the laſt of all their Prouinces, which was wholly and throughly by them ſubdued. It is likened in figure by ſome Geographers vnto an Oxe-hide: and the Romans found in it the propertie of that Oxe-hide, which Calanus the Indian ſhewed vnto the Great Alexander, as an Embleme of his large Dominions. For, treading vpon any ſide of it, the further parts would riſe from the ground. And thus was it with Spaine. Seldome did it happen, that thoſe parts from which the Roman Armies lay furtheſt, were not vp in rebellion. The Spaniards were a very hardie Nation, and eaſily ſtirred vp to armes; but had not much knowledge in the Art of warre, nor any good Captaines. They wanted alſo (which was their principall hinderance) good intelligence among themſelues: and beeing diuided into many ſmall Signories, that had little other communion than of language, they ſeldome or neuer prouided in generall for the common good of their Countrie; but made it their chiefe care, each of them to looke vnto their owne Territorie. Such priuate reſpects made them often to fall aſunder; when many had vnited themſelues together, for chacing out of the Romans. And theſe were the cauſes of their often ouerthrowes: as deſire of libertie, rather than complaint of any wrong done to them, was the cauſe of their often taking armes.

The Carthaginians had beene accuſtomed, to make euacuation of this Chollerick Spaniſh humour; by employing, as Mercinaries in their warres abroad, thoſe that were moſt likely to bee vnquiet at home. They had alſo taken Souldiers from one part of the Countrie, and vſed them in another: finding meanes to pay them all, out of the profits which they rayſed vpon the whole Countrie; as being farre better huſbands, and of more dexteritie than were the Romans, in that kind. But contrariwiſe the Romans, vſing the ſeruice of their owne Legions, and of their ſure friends the Latines, had little buſineſſe for the Spaniards; and therefore were faine to haue much buſineſſe with them. Spaine was too farre diſtant, and withall too great, for them to ſend ouer Colonies thither, whereby to hold it in good order, according to the courſe that they tooke in Italie. Wherefore it remained, that they ſhould alwayes maintaine ſuch Armies in the Countrie, as might ſerue to hold it in obedience perforce; and ſuch heedfull Captaines, as might bee ſtill readie to oppoſe the Barbarians in their firſt Commotion. This they did: and thereby held the Countrie; though ſeldome in peace.

Very ſoone after the departure of Scipio, there was raiſed warre in Spaine againſt the Romans, euen vpon the ſame generall ground, that was the foundation of all the Spaniſh warres following. It was thought vnreaſonable, that the Spaniards ſhould one while helpe the Carthaginians againſt the Romans, and another while the Romans againſt the Carthaginians; baſely forgetting to helpe themſelues againſt thoſe that were ſtrangers, yet vſurped the Dominion ouer them. But the forces which Scipio had left behind him in that Countrie, being well acquainted with the manner of warre in thoſe parts, ſuppreſſed this Rebellion by many victories: and, together with ſubiection, brought peace vpon the Countrie; which laſted fiue yeeres. This Victorie of the Romans, though it happily ended the warre: yet left it ſtill remaining the cauſe of the warre; which after fiue yeeres brake out againe. The Spaniards fought a battaile with the Roman Proconſul, whom they ſlew; and had a great Victorie, that filled them with greater hopes. Yet the happie ſucceſſe of their Warres in Greece, made the Romans thinke it enough to ſend thither two Prætors, and with each of them ſome two Legions. Theſe did ſomewhat: yet not ſo much, but that M. Porcius Cato, who was Conſul the yeere following, and ſent into that Prouince; found at his comming little leſſe to doe, than the reconquering of all Spaine. But it fell out happily, that all the Spaniards were not of one minde: ſome were faithfull to Rome; and ſome were idle beholders of the paines

that others tooke. Yet when Cato had wonne a great Victorie vpon the chiefe of them; they rose against him in many parts of the Countrie, and put him to much new trouble. Whilest hee was about to make a journie against those that were as yet vnsubdued: some of the lately vanquished, were euen readie to rebell. Hee therefore disarmed them: which they tooke so heauily, that many of them slew themselues for very griefe. Hearing of this, and well vnderstanding, that such desperation might worke dangerous effects; Hee called vnto him the principall among them: and commending vnto them peace and quietnesse, which they neuer had disturbed but vnto their owne great losse, He praied them to deuise what course might be taken, for holding them assured vnto Rome, without further trouble. None of them could, or would giue counsaile in a matter of this nature. Hauing therefore talked with them once or twice, and finding their inuention barren in this kind of Subiect; He gaue expresse charge, That vpon a day appointed they should throw downe the wals of all their Townes. Afterwards he carried the Warre about from place to place; and with singular industrie finished it in short time. Neither thought he it any disgrace to him or to Rome, in this time of danger, to imitate the Carthaginians, and hire an Armie of the Celtiberians, against other of their Countrimen: excusing the indignitie, such as it seemed, with a iest, That if he were vanquished and slaine, then should he need to pay them nothing; whereas if he had the Victorie, hee could pay them with the Enemies monie. Finally Hee brought the Warre to so good end, that in long time after, though Spaine were often troublesome, yet was it in no danger of being lost. He increased also the publike Reuenues in that Prouince, by causing some Mynes of Iron and Siluer to be wrought, that had before laine vnregarded. Herein he did benefit the Common-wealth, by a vertue much agreeable to his owne peculiar disposition.

For this M. Cato was not onely very notable in the Art of War, which might well bee then termed The Occupation of the Romans; but so well furnished with all other vseful qualities, that very little was wanting in him, which might seeme requisite to the accomplishment of a perfect man. Hee was very skilful in the Roman Lawes, a man of great Eloquence, and not vnprofitable in any businesse either priuate or publike. Many Bookes he wrote: wherof the principal were, of the Roman antiquities, and of husbandrie. In matter of husbandrie he was notable, and thereby most increased his substance; being of meane birth, and the first of his House. Strong of bodie hee was, and exceeding temperate: so as he liued in perfect health to very old age. But that which most commended him vnto the better sort of the Romans, was his great sinceritie of life, abstinence from bribes, and fashioning himselfe to the ancient laudable Customes of the Citie. Herein hee had merited singular commendations, if the vehemencie of his nature had not caused him to maligne the vertue of that Noble Scipio the African, and some other worthie men; that were no lesse honest than himselfe, though farre lesse rigid, and more gallant in behauiour. Otherwise, Hee was a very good Citizen, and one of such temper, that hee could fashion himselfe to all occasions; as if he neuer were out of his Element. He loued businesse so well, or rather hated vice so earnestly; that euen vnto the end of his life, He was exercised in defending himselfe, or accusing others. For at the age of fourescore and sixe yeeres, He pleaded in his own defence: and foure yeeres after, he accused Sergius Galba vnto the People. So beganne the Nobilitie of Cato his family; which ended in his great grandchild M. Cato the Vtican: one, that being of like vertue and feruencie had all his good purposes dasht, and was finally wearied out of his life, by men of such Nobilitie and greatnesse as this his Ancestor had continually vexed.

The Spanish Warres, after Cato his departure out of the Countrie, though they were not very dangerous, yet were they many; and the Countrie seldome free from insurrection, in one part or other. The Roman Prætors therefore, of which two euery yeere were sent ouer Commaunders into Spaine (that was diuided into two euery yeere were sent ouer Commanders into Spaine (that was diuided into two Gouernments) did rarely faile of such worke; as might affoord the honour of Triumph. One slew thirteene thousand Spaniards in a battaile: another tooke fiftie Townes: and a third enforced many States of the Countrey to sue for Peace. Thus euery one of them, or most of them, did some laudable seruice; yet so, that commonly there were of men, townes, and people, new that rebelled, in stead of the old that were slaine, taken, or reclaimed. At the causes hereof I haue alreadie pointed; and therefore thinke it enough to say, That the businesse in Spaine required not the imployment of a Roman Consul, from such time as Cato thence departed, vntil the Numantian Warre brake out; which was verie long after.

In all other Countries to the West of the Ionian Seas, the Romans had peace; but so had not the Carthaginians. For when Hannibal was gone from them, and that the enemies of the Barchine House promised all felicitie which Rome could grant, vnto themselues and their obedient Cities; Masanissa fell to disputing with the sword, about the title to the best part of their Lands. He began with Emporia, a fruitfull Region about the lesser Syrtis: wherein among other Cities was that of Leptis, which daily paid a Talent vnto Carthage for Tribute. This countrie the Numidian challenged; and by winning some part of it, seemed to better his claime vnto the whole. He had a great aduantage: for that the Carthaginians might not make any Warre, without leaue obtained from their Masters the Romans. They had none other way of redresse, than by sending to Rome their Complaint of his doings. And surely they wanted not good matter to alleadge, if the Iudges had been vnpartiall. For besides that Scipio, in limiting out vnto them their bounds, had left them the possession of this Countrie: Masanissa himselfe, now very lately, pursuing a Rebell that fled out of his Kingdome, desired leaue of the Carthaginians, for himselfe to passe through it in his way to Cyrene: thereby acknowledging (had it otherwise beene questionable) that the Countrie was theirs. This notwithstanding, Masanissa had wherewith to iustifie his proceedings, especially vnto the Roman Senate. Hee gaue the Fathers to vnderstand by his Embassadors, what faithlesse people the Carthaginians were, and how ill-affected to the State of Rome. There had lately been sent vnto them from Hannibal, one that should perswade them to take part with Antiochus. This man they had examined vpon some suspition of his errand; yet neither arresting him nor his ship, had thereby affoorded him meanes to escape. Hence the Numidian concluded, That certainly it was their purpose to rebell; and therefore good policie to keepe them downe. As for the Countrie of Emporia: it had alwayes, he said, beene theirs, that were able to hold it by strong hand: and so belonged sometimes vnto the Numidian Kings; though now of late it was in possession of the Carthaginians. But if trueth were knowne, the Citizens of Carthage had no very warrantable title vnto any more ground, than that whereon their Citie stood; or scarcely to so much. For they were no better than strangers in Africk, that had gotten leaue there to build vpon so much ground, as they could encompasse with an Oxe-hide cut into small thongs. Whatsoeuer they held without such a compasse, was purchased by fraud, and wrongfull encrochments. This considered, Masanissa requested of the Senate, That they would not adiudge vnto such vsurpers, the Countrie sometimes appertaining to the Ancestors of him their assured friend. The Romans hauing heard these allegations on both sides, found the matter so doubtfull, that they could not on the sudden tell what to determine. Wherefore because they would doe nothing rashly; they sent ouer three Embassadours, of whom P. Scipio the African was one and the chiefe, to decide the controuersie: yet secretly giuing them instructions, to leaue all as they found it, without making any end one way or other. The Embassadours followed their directions, and left all doubtfull. So was it likely, that Masanissa with a strong Armie should quickly preuaile, against those that could no more than talke of their right, and exclaime against the wrong. By such Arts were the Carthaginians held, not onely from stirring in fauour of King Antiochus, if they had thereto any disposition; but were prepared by little and little vnto their finall destruction: that came vpon them, when the Romans had leisure to expresse the vtmost of their hatred.

§. VI.

The Ætolians labour to prouoke ANTIOCHVS, PHILIP, and NABIS, to warre vpon the Romans; by whom they hold themselues wronged and disgraced. NABIS besieged Gytheum, and wasteth some part of Achæa. The exact skill of PHILOPŒMEN, in aduantage of ground: whereby he vtterly vanquisheth NABIS. ANTIOCHVS being denied Peace by the Romans, ioynes with the Ætolians. The Ætolians surprize DEMETRIAS; and by killing NABIS, their Confederate seize vpon Sparta. But they are driuen out by the Citizens: who at PHILOPŒMEN his perswasions annex themselues to the Achæans.

ALL Greece being at peace, and the Roman Armies thence departed: it grieued much the Ætolians to thinke, that they who had promised vnto themselues the whole spoile of Philip, and the highest reputation among the Greekes; were not onely disappointed of their couetous hopes, but quite forsaken by their ancient dependants; and of all other the most vnregarded. Yet was there made a great accesse to their Estate; by adding much vnto them, of that which had beene taken from the Macedonian. This might haue well sufficed them, if their desires had not beene immoderate; and their indignation, more vehement, than their desire. But they were not so pleased with that which they had, since they thought it no more than part of their due; as they were vexed with the deniall of that which they claimed, and with finding themselues to be wholly disesteemed, wherein they thought that they had vnsufferable wrong. Wherefore they deuised, in a Parliament which they shortly held, by what meanes they best might right themselues; and giue the Romans a sorrowfull knowledge of the difference, betweene their enmitie and friendship. To this purpose they soone agreed, as concurring all in one affection, That they would not onely perswade Antiochus to make warre vpon the Romans, as one to whom the Romans had long refused Peace; but that they would deale with the King of Macedon their ancient Enemie, and with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, to ioyne all together in a new Confederacie: whose ioynt forces could not in all likelihood but farre surmount those of the Romans, Achæans, Rhodians, and King Eumenes, with all that were of their Faction. This was a great enterprise, which the Ætolians tooke in hand; and well beseeming them, for they were great darers. They sent Embassadours to all these Kings, with perswasions as they thought most forcible. But Philip was irresolute; and Antiochus willing to trie first all other courses. Nabis the Lacedæmonian, who neither (as Philip) had lost much, nor (as Antiochus) was in feare of any warre; yet shewed himselfe of all other the most forward: and not staying so much as to seeke any good pretence, beganne immediatly to lay siege to Gytheum, that had beene lately taken from him by the Romans. The Achæans, to whose care chiefly Titus at his departure had commended the affaires of Peloponnesus, were not slow to admonish Nabis of his duetie: neither would they haue staied long from repressing his violence by open warre; had not some of them thought it wisedome to aske counsaile of the Romans, and particularly of T. Quintius, before they engaged themselues in a businesse of such importance. Whilest thus they spent the time in sending Embassadours, and were aduised by Quintius to let all alone, and to waite for the comming of the Roman forces that would shortly be amongst them: Nabis was bold to giue them iuster cause of complaint, by wasting their owne Territorie.

making war there for his mindes ſake and recreation. Vnto him the Achæans referred themſelues, giuing him leaue to order the warre at his pleaſure; either ſtaying vntill the Romans came; or doing otherwiſe, as hee ſhould thinke beſt. He made all haſte to relieue Gyttheum, by Sea; fearing leſt the Towne, and the Achæan Garriſon within it, ſhould bee loſt, if hee vſed any delay. But Philopœmen was ſo bad a Seaman, that he knew not a ſtrong Ship from a rotten. He made a Quadrireme Gallie his Admirall, that had foureſcore yeeres agoe been counted a gallant veſſell, in the Nauie of Antigonus Gonatas. Neither was the reſt of his Fleete ſo good, as might encounter with that of the Lacedæmonian. Onely it fell out well, that he committed himſelfe to a light Pinnace or Brigandine, that fought better with her wings, than with her tallons. For his Admirall Gallie was ſtemmed at the firſt; and being rotten with age, ſprang ſo many leakes, and tooke in water ſo faſt, that ſhe was faine to yeeld without further reſiſtance. When the reſt of the Fleet ſaw what was become of their Admirall, all were preſently diſcouraged, and ſaued themſelues with what ſpeede they could. But Philopœmen was not herewith danted. If hee had failed in Sea-ſeruice, which was none of his Occupation, Hee ſaid, that he would make amends by Land. The Tyrant withdrew part of his Armie from the ſiege of Gyttheum, to ſtop the Achæans if they ſhould inuade his Countrie. But vpon theſe which were placed in guard of Laconia, Philopœmen came inexpected; fired their Campe; and put all, ſaue a very few of them, to the ſword. Then marched he withall his Armie towards Lacedæmon: within ten mile whereof he was, when the Tyrant met him that had already taken Gyttheum. It was not expected that Nabis would haue been ready for them ſo ſoone. Or if hee ſhould come from Gyttheum, with any part of his forces: yet was it thought that hee muſt ouertake them, and charge them in Rere. They marched therefore almoſt ſecurely, in a long Troupe reaching ſome fiue miles; hauing their Horſe, & the greateſt part of their Auxiliaries at their backs, to beare off any ſudden impreſſion. But Nabis, who formerly vnderſtood, or at leaſt ſuſpected, what courſe they would take, appeared in the front of them with all his Armie; encamped there where they meant to haue lodged. It was the cuſtome of Philopœmen, when he walked or trauelled abroad with his friends, to marke the ſituation of the Countrie about him; and to diſcourſe, what might befall an Armie marching the ſame way. Hee would ſuppoſe, That hauing with him there ſuch a number of Souldiours, ordered and ſorted in ſuch manner, and marching towards ſuch a place; he were vpon that ground encountered by a greater Armie, or better prepared to the fight. Then would he put the queſtion, whether it were fit for him to hold on his way, retire, or make a ſtand? what piece of ground it were meete for him to ſeize vpon? and in what manner he might beſt doe it? in what ſort he ſhould order his men? where beſtow his Carriages, and vnder what Gard? in what ſort encampe himſelfe? and which way march the day following? By ſuch continuall meditation Hee was growne ſo perfect, that hee neuer mette with any difficultie, whence he could not explicate himſelfe and his followers. At this time hee made a ſtand: and hauing drawne vp his Rere, Hee encamped neare vnto the place where he was; within halfe a mile of the Enemie. His baggage, with all thereto belonging, he beſtowed on a Rocke; encompaſſing them round with his Souldiours. The ground was rough, the wayes bad, and the day almoſt quite ſpent; ſo as Nabis could not at the preſent greatly moleſt him. Both Armies were to water at one Brooke; whereto the Achæans lay the nearer. This watering therefore was like to miniſter the firſt occaſion of skirmiſh. Philopœmen vnderſtood this; and layd an ambuſh in place conuenient; whereinto the Mercenaries of Nabis fell, and were ſlaughtered in great numbers. Preſently after this, he cauſed one of his owne Auxiliaries to goe to the Tyrant, as a fugitiue, and tell him, that the Achæans had a purpoſe to get betweene him and Lacedæmon; wherby they would both debarre his returne into the Citie, and withall encourage the people, to take armes for the recouery of their freedome. The Tyrant hearing this, marched haſtily away; and left his Campe; which hardly otherwiſe would haue been forced. Some Companies hee made to ſtay behinde, and ſhew themſelues vpon the Rampart, thereby to conceale his departure. But Philopœmen was not ſo to be beguiled. He eaſily won the Campe; and gaue chace to Nabis: whoſe followers being ouertaken, had no courage to turne about and make head. The enemies being thus diſperſed, and fled into Woods, where they lay in couert all that day; Philopœmen conceiued aright, that their feare and neceſſitie would teach them to creepe homewards, and ſaue themſelues, when it grew darke. Wherefore in the Euening, when he had gathered together all thoſe of his Light-armature, which had followed the chace whileſt it was day, Hee led forth the reſt that had well refreſhed themſelues, and occupied the two moſt ordinarie paſſages vnto Lacedæmon. So Nabis his men, when it was darke night, perceiuing in Philopœmens Campe great ſtore of lights; thought that all had been at reſt: and therefore aduentured to make an eſcape home. But they were ſo way-laid, that hardly one quarter of them got into Sparta. Thirtie dayes together after this, did Philopœmen waſte the Countrey round about, whleſt Nabis durſt not iſſue foorth of his Towne; and then returned home, leauing the Tyrant in a manner without forces.

The Roman Embaſſaddours were then in Greece, and T. Quintius among them; labouring to make their partie ſtrong againſt Antiochus and Nabis, whom they knew to be ſollicited by the Ætolians. Verie faire countenance they alſo made vnto Philip; and with comfortable promiſes drew him to make ſhew, whatſoeuer hee thought, of good correſpondence. They promiſed to reſtore vnto him his ſonne: and were contented to let him hope, that hee ſhould receiue other fauours at their hands; and regaine poſſeſſion of many places, by them taken from him. Thus did the Romans prepare for warre againſt Antiochus in Greece, whileſt their Embaſſadours that were with him in Aſia, denied otherwiſe to grant him Peace, than if he would yeeld vnto one of the Conditions, by them ſo often propounded. The long abſence of this King in Syria, where he had accompliſhed the marriage betweene Ptolemie and his daughter; together with the death of yong Antiochus the Kings ſonne, which happened during the Treatie, and hindered, or ſeemed to hinder the King, from giuing audience in perſon to the Embaſſadours; cauſed them to returne home to Rome; as vncertaine of their anſwere as at their ſetting forth. One thing that might haue beene, and partly was, beneficiall vnto them, they brought to paſſe during their abode at Epheſus; either by cunning, or (as Liuie rather thinkes) by chance. Finding Hannibal there, they diſcourſed often with him, and blamed him for hauing thus fled vnto Antiochus, vpon a cauſeleſſe ſuſpition wherein hee held the Romans: that honoured his vertue, and intended him no harme. Many haue affirmed that P. Scipio was one of theſe Embaſſadours; and that hee, among other diſcourſes with Hannibal, demanded once, Which of all the famous Captaines that had liued, HANNIBAL iudged the moſt worthy? So Hannibal gaue to Alexander of Macedon the firſt place: to Pyrrhus the ſecond: and the third he challenged vnto himſelfe. But Scipio who thought his owne title better, than that it ought to be ſo forgotten: asked yet further, What wouldeſt thou haue ſaid then, Hannibal, if thou hadſt vanquiſhed mee? To whom the Carthaginian replied, Then would not I haue giuen the firſt place to Alexander, but haue claimed it as due vnto my ſelfe. Now whether this were ſo, or otherwiſe: the often and friendly conference of Hannibal with the Roman Embaſſadours, made him ſuſpected of Antiochus: who therefore did forbeare awhile to vſe his counſell. Yet afterwards, when Hannibal perceiued this change in the King: and plainely deſiring him to tell the cauſe thereof, heard what it was; He eaſily recouered his former grace, and credit. For he told how his Father had cauſed him to ſweare at the Altars, when hee was a little boy, That hee neuer ſhould bee friend vnto the Romans. Wherefore he willed the King not to regard any vaine ſurmiſes:

miſes: but to know thus much, That as long as he thought vpon warre with Rome, ſo long would Hannibal doe him all good ſeruice: whereas contrariwiſe if he intended to make peace, then ſhould it behooue him to vſe the counſaile of ſome other man.

The Aetolians, and their friends, were no leſſe buſie all this while, in making their partie ſtrong againſt the Romans, than were the Romans, in muſtering vp their friends in Greece. They had ſo often dealt with Antiochus, vanting much of their owne forces, and arrogating to themſelues the honour of the victorie againſt Philip; that finally they preuailed with him: eſpecially when the Roman Embaſſadors had left him without hope of peace, vnleſſe hee would buy it at too deare a rate. They dealt in like ſort with the Macedonian. But in vaine. Hee vnderſtood the Romans, and himſelfe, too well. Wherefore it concerned them to improue their owne forces to the vtmoſt: as knowing, that all the burthen muſt lie vpon Antiochus and themſelues, without helpe from any; ſaue onely from ſome few that were diſcontented in Greece. Whileſt they were about this, and had with them an Embaſſador of the King Antiochus that animated them to reſolution: the Athenian Embaſſadors, whom Titus had requeſted to be at their meeting, ſtayed their vehemencie a little; by exhorting them, not to conclude raſhly, without firſt hearing the Romans, that lay neere at hand. For want of a ready anſwer hereto, they were contented to approue the motion. Titus hearing this, thought the buſines worthy of his preſence. For ſince Antiochus had now declared himſelfe againſt the Romans: it would bee no ſmall piece of ſeruice, to withdraw from his friendſhip, thoſe by whoſe encouragement he had made the aduenture. Wherefore hee came to their Panætolium, or great Aſſemblie of the Nation; where he forgot nothing that might ſerue to appeaſe them. Hee willed them to conſider the weight of the enterpriſe which they tooke in hand; whereby Greece was like to become a Champaigne-field, on which, to the ruine of the Countrie, the Romans, and King Antiochus, that commanded no ſmall part of the World, ſhould fight for the Maſterie: the Ætolians, as Maſters in that kinde of Fence, ſetting them on, and becomming * the Sticklers. As for thoſe grieuances which did thus exaſperate them, and vrge them to ſuch violent courſes, Hee willed them to conſider how ſlight they were, and how much better they might doe to ſend Embaſſadours to Rome, that ſhould either pleade their right in the Senate, or (if their right vnto the places which they claimed, were not good) make requeſt to haue what they deſired: than thus to ſet the world in an vproare, and be afterwards the firſt that ſhould repent it. But what he ſayd, or could ſay, it skilled not much. They had already done ill, to make the Embaſſador of the King, whoſe helpe they had ſought, waite ſo long for an anſwer, and ſtay doubting what good end they ſhould make with the Romans. Neither was it newes vnto them to heare thoſe comfortable words, That, by ſending to Rome, they might happen to obtaine what they deſired; either as their right, or elſe by way of fauour. For with ſuch Termes had they beene feaſted once already: and were by the Senate reiected vnto Titus: who, hauing it in his owne power, gaue them no ſatisfaction; yet would now againe referre them to the Senate. This were onely loſſe of time, and might abate their credit with Antiochus. Wherefore without more adoe they made a Decree, That King Antiochus the Great ſhould be entreated to come ouer into Greece, as well to ſet the Countrie at libertie, as alſo to decide the controuerſies depending betweene the Romans and Ætolians. Such a Decree they would not haue made, had they not vnderſtood the Kings minde before. Hauing made it; they forgot no point of brauerie, vvherby to vaunt themſelues to the Kings Embaſſadours, and againſt the Romans. Titus deſired of their Prætor, to let him ſee a Copie of this nevv Decree. The Prætor anſvvered, That then hee had other things to do: but that this Decree, & their further anſvver, they vvould ſhortly let him knovv, if he came to their camp in Italy vpon the riuer of Tibris. Gentler words would haue done better, as the Ætolians are like to vnderſtand hereafter. But hauing thus begun, they meant henceforth to goe roundly to worke. The care of the warre they referred vnto the more priuate Councel of their Nation; that no occaſion might ſlip, in waiting for the Authoritie of a generall Aſſembly. The Apocleti (ſo were the Priuie Councell of Ætolia called) went as hotly to worke as any of the yongeſt heads could haue done. They layd a plotte, how to get into their hands at one time the Townes of Chalcis, Demetrias, and Sparta: to each of which they ſent men for the purpoſe. Demetrias they tooke vpon the ſudden; entring, ſome of them as friends to conduct home a principall man of the Citie: who for ſpeaking words againſt T. Quintius, had been driuen to flee thence, but was, by interceſſion of thoſe that loued him, againe recalled. His Ætolian companions, that were not many, ſeized vpon a Gate; whereat they let in a Troupe which they had left not far behind them; and ſo fell to murdering the chiefe of the Roman Faction. At Chalcis they ſped not ſo well. Thither alſo they had a baniſhed man to bring home: but they came ſo ſtrong, that their purpoſe was diſcouered, and the Towne prepared to defend it ſelfe againſt them. Being therefore demanded the cauſe of this hoſtilitie, they gaue a gentle anſwer, ſaying, That they came not thither as enemies, but onely to deliuer the Towne from the Romans; who more inſolently dominered ouer it, than euer the Macedonians had done. By which Rhethoricke they preuailed no more, than they could doe by plaine force. For the Towneſ-men replied, That they neither found any abridgement of their libertie, nor needed any Garriſon to keepe them from the Romans; from whom they neither feared any danger, nor receiued iniurie. So this buſines was daſht. The attempt vpon Sparta was more ſtrange and deſperate. Nabis their good friend, was Lord of the Towne; ſtyling himſelfe King: but, more truely by all men called Tyrant. He had wel-neare loſt all, by meanes of the ouerthrow which Philopœmen had lately giuen him: ſince, he durſt not ſtirre abroad; and dayly expected the miſchiefe, that on all ſides threatned him. Wherfore he ſent meſſengers, one after another, to the Ætolians; requeſting them, That as He had not been ſlow to ſtirre in their behalfe, but aduentured himſelfe vpon the vtmoſt of danger, when all others were backward; ſo They would be pleaſed to ſend him what helpe they might, ſince his bad fortune had cauſed him preſently to need it. It hath been often ſayd, That the rauenous Ætolians were onely true to themſelues, and regarded neither faith nor friendſhip otherwiſe than as it might conduce to their owne ends. And ſo dealt they now. For ſince Nabis his mercinarie forces, which vpheld his Tyrannie, were in a manner conſumed: they thought it expedient for their Eſtate, to put him out of the way; and, by ſo doing, to aſſure Lacedæmon vnto themſelues. To this purpoſe, they ſent thither Alexamenus, one whom they thought a man fit for ſuch a worke. To him they gaue a thouſand Foot, and thirtie Horſe, choſen for the purpoſe. Theſe thirtie were by Damocritus the Prætor brought into the Councell of the Apocleti, where they were commanded to be no wiſer than they ſhould bee, nor to thinke that they were ſent to make warre with the Achæans, or to doe ought elſe, ſaue onely what Alexamenus ſhould command them; which, were it neuer ſo deſperate, and in ſeeming againſt all reaſon; yet muſt they vnderſtand, that vnleſſe they performed it, they ſhould haue no good welcome home. So Alexamenus came to the Tyrant, whom hee encouraged with braue words: telling him that Antiochus was already in Europe, and would be anon in Greece, meaning to couer all the Land and Sea with his mighty Armies; and that the Romans were like to finde other manner of worke, than of late with Philip: ſince the Elephants of this great King, without other helpe, would ſuffice to tread them downe. As for the Ætolians, Hee ſaid, that if need ſhould ſo require, they would preſently ſend away to Lacedæmon all the forces that they could raiſe: But that they were very deſirous at the preſent, to make as goodly a muſter as they could before the great King; which cauſed them to ſend him thither afore

with no greater companie. Hereupon he willed Nabis to take heart; bring forth his men, that had beene long pent vp in the Citie; and traine them without the wals: as if ſhortly he ſhould employ them in worke of conqueſt, rather than defence. Nabis was glad of this: and daily exerciſed his men in the field; riding vp and downe with his Alexamenus, and no more than three or foure horſe about him, from one point to another, to order and behold them. During this time of exerciſe, Alexamenus made it his faſhion to ſtep aſide alone to his Ætolians, and ſay ſomewhat as he thought fit: which done, he ſtill returned againe to Nabis. But when he ſaw time for the great worke that he had in hand: Hee then went aſide to his thirtie Horſemen, and bade them remember the taske enioyned them at their ſetting foorth; telling them that they were all in caſe of baniſhed men, vnleſſe they would anon come vp to him, and helpe him to finiſh that which they ſhould ſee him take in hand. Herewithall the Tyrant beganne to draw neere them: and Alexamenus making towards him, charged him on the ſudden, and ſtruck him downe. The thirtie Ætolians neuer ſtood to deliberate vpon the matter: but all flew in; and, before any ſuccour could arriue, had made an end of this wretched Nabis. Preſently vpon the fact committed, the Tyrant his Mercinaries ranne vnto the dead bodie: where in ſtead of ſeeking reuenge, they ſtood fooliſhly gazing as beholders. Alexamenus with his Ætolians haſted into the Citie, and ſeized on the Palace: where hee fell to ranſacking the Treaſure; and troubled himſelfe with none other care, as though all were alreadie done. Such of his followers as were diſperſed in the Towne, did alſo the like; with the greater indignation of the Citizens: who ſeeing themſelues free by the death of the Tyrant, could not endure to ſee thoſe that had ſlaine him, beginne to tyrannize anew. Wherefore all the Towne was ſhortly in Armes: and for lacke of another Captaine, they tooke a little Boy of the Royall ſtocke, that had beene brought vp with Nabis his children; whom they mounted vpon a Good Horſe, and made him their chiefe. So they fell vpon the Ætolians that were idely ſtragling about; and put them all to the ſword. Alexamenus with not many of his Companie, were ſlaine in keeping the Citadell: and thoſe few that eſcaped thence into Arcadia, were taken by the Magiſtrates; who ſolde them all as bond-ſlaues. In this doubtfull Eſtate of things at Lacedæmon, Philopœmen came thither: who calling out the chiefe of the Citie, and ſpeaking ſuch wordes vnto them, as Alexamenus ſhould haue done after hee had ſlaine the Tyrant; eaſily perſwaded them for their owne good and ſafetie, to incorporate themſelues with the Achæans. Thus by the enterpriſe, no leſſe diſhonourable than difficult, of the Ætolians, and the ſmall, but effectuall, trauaile of Philopœmen; the Achæans made a notable purchaſe: and Lacedæmon, that had hitherto bin gouerned eyther by Kings, or by Tyrants that called themſelues Kings, became the member of a Common-wealth; whereof the name had ſcarce any reputation, when Sparta ruled ouer all Greece.

§. VII.

ANTIOCHVS, perswaded by THOAS the Ætolian, comes ouer into Greece, ill attended. Sundrie passages betweene him, the Ætolians, Chalcidians and others. Hee winnes Chalcis, and thereby the whole Ile of Eubœa. The vanitie of the Kings Embassadors and the Ætolians, with the Ciuil answere of TITVS to their discourse, before the Achæans. That it concerned the Greekes to haue desired peace, betweene the Romans and ANTIOCHVS; as the best assurance of their owne libertie. Of many pettie Estates that fell to the King. Of AMINANDER; and an idle vanitie, by which King PHILIP was lost. HANNIBAL giues good counsaile in vaine. Some Townes wonne in Thessalie. The King retires to Chalcis; Where hee marrieth a young Wife, and reuels away the rest of Winter. Vpon the comming of the Roman Consul all forsake ANTIOCHVS. Hee with two thousand Ætolians keepes the Streights of Thermopylæ. Hee is beaten, and flies into Asia: leauing all in Greece vnto the Victors.

ANTIOCHVS was troubled much in Asia with Smyrna and Lampsacus, that would not hearken to any Composition. He thought it neither safe nor honourable, to leaue them Enemies behind him; and to winne them by force, was more than hitherto hee was able. Yet was hee desirous with all speed conuenient to shew himselfe in Greece; where he had bin told, that his presence would effect wonders. It was said, That in all the Countrie there was a very small number, which bore heartie affection vnto the Romans: That Nabis was alreadie vp in Armes: That Philip was like a Bandog in a chaine, desiring nothing more than to breake loose; and that the Ætolians, without whom the Romans had done nothing, nor nothing could haue done, were readie to conferre vpon him the greatnesse, which they had vnworthily bestowed vpon insolent Barbarians. Of all this the least part was true. Yet that which was true made such a noise, as added credit vnto all the rest. Whileſt therefore the King was thinking to send Hannibal into Africk, there to molest the Romans, and so giue him the better leisure of vsing his owne opportunities in Greece: Thoas the Ætolian came ouer to him, and bade him lay all other care aside; for that his Countreymen had alreadie taken Demetrias; a Towne of maine importance, that should giue him entertaiment, whence hee might proceed as became the greatnesse of his vertue and fortune. This did serue to cut off all deliberation. As for Hannibal: Thoas was bold to tell the King, first, That it was not expedient for him to diuide his forces at such a time, when the very reputation of his numbers, brought into Greece, might serue to lay open vnto him all places, without need of vsing violence: and secondly, That in any such great enterprise there could not bee chosen a more vnfit man to be employed in the Kings seruice, than was that famous Hannibal the Carthaginian. For he said, That the King should as greatly feele the losse of a Fleet or Armie, perishing vnder such a notable Commaunder if his fortune were bad, as if the same had miscarried vnder one of meaner qualitie: whereas neuertheleſſe if Hannibal preuailed; Hannibal alone should haue all the honour, and not Antiochus. In this regard hee was of opinion, That such a renowned Warriour should bee alwayes neere vnto the Kings person, to giue aduice: which being followed as often as it was found commodious, the good successe would wholly redound vnto the honour of him that had the soueraigne Command; euen of the King himselfe. Antiochus gladly hearkned vnto this admonition; being iealous of the vertue, that shined brighter than the Maiestie of his owne fortune. And thereupon hee laid aside the determination; which tended more to the aduancement of his desires, than did any thing else by him then or after thought vpon.

Presently after this He made readie for Greece. Before his setting forth, in a friuolous

lous pomp of ceremony, he went vp from the Sea-ſide to Ilium; there to do ſacrifice to Minerua of Troy. Thence paſſing ouer the Aegean Sea, Hee came to Demetrias. Eurylochus the Magnetian, the ſame whome the Ætolians had lately waited on home, when by that pretext they wanne Demetrias; was now the chiefe man and Ruler of his Nation. Hee therefore with his Countreymen, in great frequencie, came to doe their duties to the King Antiochus, and bid him welcome. The King was glad of this: and tooke it as a ſigne of good lucke, to bee ſo entertained at the beginning. But it may bee ſuſpected, that the Magnetians found not the like cauſe of joy. For whereas they had expected a Fleet and Armie ſomewhat like to that of Xerxes: they ſaw three hundred ſhips, of which no more than fortie were ſeruiceable for the Warres; with an Armie of tenne thouſand Foot, fiue hundred Horſe, and ſixe Elephants. The Aetolians no ſooner heard of his comming, than they called a Parliament; and made a Decree, whereby they inuited him into their Countrie. He knew before that they would ſo doe; and was therefore well onward on his way towards them, when they met him that brought the Decree. At his comming to Lamia, the Aetolians gaue him as ioyfull entertainment as they could deuiſe. Being brought into their Councell, He made an Oration: wherein hee deſired them to hold him excuſed, that hee came not followed with a greater Armie. This was, he ſaid, in true eſtimation a ſigne of his good will: in that hee ſtaid not to make all things readie; but haſted vnto their aid, euen whileſt the ſeaſon was vnfit for nauigation. Yet it ſhould not be long, ere the hope of all thoſe which had expected him, would be ſatisfied vnto the full. For it was his meaning to fill all Greece with Armies, and all the Sea-coaſt with his Fleets. Neyther would hee ſpare for any charge, trauaile, or danger, to follow the buſineſſe which hee had vndertaken: euen to driue the Romans and their authoritie out of Greece; leauing the Countrie free indeed, and the Aetolians therein the chiefe. Now as the Armies that were following him, ſhould be very great: ſo was it his meaning, that all prouiſions to them belonging ſhould be correſpondent; becauſe hee would not bee any way burdenſome vnto his Confederates. But at the preſent he muſt needs entreat them, hauing thus haſtily come ouer vnto their aide, vnprouided of many neceſſaries: that they would helpe him with Corne and other victuals, whereof he ſtood in need. So he left them to their conſultation: the concluſion whereof was, after a little diſpute, (for a vaine motion was made by ſome, that the differences betweene the Romans and them, ſhould be put by Compromiſe to the deciſion of Antiochus) That they would yeeld vnto the Kings deſire, and aſſiſt him with all their forces. Here we may obſerue, how vaine a thing it is for an abſolute Prince to engage himſelfe, as did Antiochus, in a buſineſſe of dangerous importance, vpon the promiſed aſſurance of a State that is meerely popular. For if the vehemencie of Thoas, and ſome other of that Faction, had not preuailed in this Councell: the Aetolians, for gaine of two or three Townes, yea for hope of ſuch gaine that might haue deceiued them; were like to haue abandoned this King their friend, vnto the diſcretion of the Romans. And what remedie had there beene, if this had ſo fallen out? He could haue bemoaned himſelfe to Thoas, and complained of the wrong: but he muſt haue been contented with this anſwere, That the fault was in thoſe of the oppoſite ſide; whom Thoas would therefore haue pronounced to bee very wicked men. It happened much better for the preſent; though in the future it prooued much worſe, both for him, and for the Aetolians. He was choſen Generall of all their forces: and thirtie Commiſſioners were appointed to bee about him, as a Councell of Warre for the Nation. Theſe armed ſuch as readily they could, whileſt it was in diſpute where they ſhould beginne the Warre. Chalcis was thought the meeteſt place to be firſt vndertaken: whither if they came ſuddenly, they ſhould not peraduenture need to vſe much force. The King had brought with him into Aetolia but a thouſand Foot; leauing the reſt behind him at Demetrias. With theſe hee haſted away directly toward Chalcis; being ouertaken by no great number of the Aetolians, which which accompanied him thither. At his comming, the Magistrates, and some of the chiefe Citizens, issued forth to parle with him. There the Ætolians beganne, as they had lately done before, to tell, how the Romans had onely in words and false semblance, set Greece at libertie. But such libertie, as might be true and vsefull, they said would neuer be obtained; vntill by remouing the necessitie of obeying their pleasure that were most mightie, euerie seuerall Estate had where to find redresse of any pressure. And to this end was the great Antiochus come thither; a King well able to counterpoise, yea to ouerweigh the Romans: who neuertheless desired them onely, so to joyne with him in League, as that if either the Romans or Hee should offer them wrong, they might keepe it in their power, to seeke redresse at the other hands. The Chalcidians made hereto the same answere, which, to the like allegations, they had made not long before: That their freedome was not imaginarie, but absolute; for which they were to thanke the Romans; without whose good liking, they would enter into no new confederacie. That which they spake of themselues, they could likewise affirme of all the Greekes: forasmuch as none of them payed any Tribute; was kept vnder, by any Garrison; or liued otherwise than by their owne Lawes, and without being tied vnto condition which displeased them. Wherefore they wondred, why the King should thus trouble himselfe, to deliuer Cities that were alreadie free. But since hee, and the Ætolians, requested their friendship: they besought both him, and the Ætolians, to doe a friendly Office, in departing from them quietly, and leauing them in such good case as they were. With this answere the King departed: for he was not, as then, strong enough to force them. But very soone after, hee brought thither a greater power; which terrified them, and made them yeeld: before all the succours could arriue, which Titus had sent for their defence.

The chiefe Citie of Eubœa being thus gotten; all the rest of the Iland shortly yeelded to Antiochus. Foure or fiue hundred Roman Souldiers, that came ouer late to haue defended Chalcis, reposed themselues at Delium, a little Towne of Bœotia, lying ouer against the Iland; where was a Temple and Groue, consecrated vnto Apollo, that had the priuiledge of an inuiolable Sanctuarie. In this place were some of them walking, and beholding the things there to be seene, whilest others were busied as they found cause: without feare of any danger; as being in such a place, and no warre hitherto proclaimed. But Menippus, one of Antiochus his Captaines, that had wearied himselfe in many vaine Treaties of peace; tooke aduantage of their careleſseneſſe, and vsed them with all extremitie of warre. Very few of them escaped: fiftie were taken; and the rest slaine. Hereat Quintius was grieued: yet so, as it pleased him well to consider, that his Romans had now more just cause than before, to make warre vpon the King.

Antiochus liked well these beginnings, and sent Embassadours into all quarters of Greece; in hope, that his reputation should perswade very many to take his part. The wiser sort returned such answere, as the Chalcidians had done. Some reserued themselues vntill hee should come among them: knowing that eyther, if hee came not, Hee must holde them excused for not daring to stirre; or, if hee came, the Romans must pardon their just feare, in yeelding to the stronger. None of those that lay farre off, joyned with him in true meaning; saue the Eleans, that alwayes fauoured the Ætolians, and now feared the Achæans. Little reason there was, that hee should thinke to draw the Achæans to his partie. Neuertheless hee assayed them, vpon a vaine hope that the enuie, which Titus was said to beare vnto Philopœmens vertue, had bred a secret dislike betweene that Nation and the Romans. Wherefore both Hee and the Ætolians sent Embassadours to the Councell at Ægium; that spared not braue wordes, if the Achæans would haue so beene taken. The Kings Embassadour told of great Armies and Fleets that were comming: reckoning vp the Dahans, Medians, Elimæans and Cadusians; names that were not euery day heard of, and therefore as hee thought, the more terrible. Then told he them what notable men at Sea, the Sydonians, Tyrians, Aradians, and Pamphylians were; ſuch indeed as could not be reſiſted. Now concerning monie and all warlike furniture: it was, he ſaid, well knowne, that the Kingdomes of Aſia had alwayes thereof great plenty. So as they were much deceiued: who conſidering the late warre made againſt Philip, did thinke that this with Antiochus would prooue the like: the caſe was too farre different. Yet this moſt powerfull King, that for the libertie of Greece was come from the vtmoſt parts of the Eaſt; requeſted no more of the Achæans, than that they would hold themſelues as neutrall, and quietly looke on, whileſt He tooke order with the Romans. To the ſame effect ſpake the Ætolian Embaſſadour: and further added, That in the battell at Cynoſcephalæ, neither Titus had done the part of a Generall, nor the Romans of good Souldiers: but that both Hee and his Armie had beene there deſtroyed, had they not beene protected by vertue of the Ætolians, which carried the day. Titus was preſent at the Councell, and heard all this: to which he made as fit anſwere, as could haue beene deſired. He told the Achæans, That neither the Kings Embaſſadour, nor the Ætolian, did ſo greatly labour to perſwade thoſe vnto whom they addreſſed their Orations; as to vant themſelues the one vnto the other. So as a man might well diſcerne, what good correſpondence in vanitie it was, that had thus linked the King and the Ætolians together. For euen ſuch bragges as here they made; before the Achæans who knew them to be liers, had the Ætolians alſo made vnto King Antiochus: proclayming the victorie ouer Philip to bee meerely their Act: and the whole Countrie of Greece to bee dependant on them. Interchangeably had they beene feaſted by the King, with ſuch tales as his Embaſſadour told euen now; of Dahans, and Aradians, and Elimæans, and a many others: that were all but a companie of Syrians, ſuch as were wont to be ſold about for bondſlaues, and good for little elſe. Theſe diuers names of raſcall people were, he ſaid, like to the diuerſitie of Veniſon, wherewith a friend of his at Chalcis (no ſuch vanter as were theſe Embaſſadours) had ſometime feaſted him. For all that varietie, whereat hee wondred, was none other, as his Hoſt then merrily tolde him; than ſo many pieces of one tame ſwine, dreſt after ſeuerall faſhions with varietie of ſawces. Setting therefore aſide this vanity of idle pomp: it were good to make iudgement of the great King, by his preſent doings. He had, notwithſtanding all this great noyſe, no more than ten thouſand men about him: for which little Armie he was faine in a manner, to begge victuailes of the Aetolians; and take vp monie at vſurie, to defray his charges. And thus he ran vp and downe the Countrie; from Demetrias to Lamia; thence backe to Chalcis; and being there ſhut out, to Demetrias againe. Theſe were the fruits of lies: wherewith ſince both Antiochus and the Aetolians had each deluded other; meet it was that they ſhould, as perhaps alreadie they did, repent, whileſt wiſer men tooke heed by their example. To a fauourable Auditorie much perſwaſion is needleſſe. The Achæans did not loue ſo well the Aetolians, as to deſire that they ſhould become Princes of Greece: but rather wiſhed to ſee them, of all other, made the verieſt abiects. Wherefore they ſtood not to hearken after newes, what Antiochus did, how he ſped in Eubœa, or what other Cities were like to take his part: but readily proclaymed war againſt him, and againſt the Aetolians.

How the hatred betweene theſe two Nations grew inueterate: ſufficiently appeares in the ſtorie foregoing. Now haue they gotten each their Patrons; the one, the Romans; the other, King Antiochus. Herein did each of them vnwiſely: though far the greater blame ought to be laid, on the turbulent ſpirits of the Aetolians. For when the Romans departed out of Greece, and left the Countrie at reſt: there was nothing more greatly to haue beene deſired, than that they might neuer finde occaſion to returne with an Armie thither againe. And in this reſpect ought the Greekes to haue ſought, not how Smyrna and Lampſacus might recouer their libertie (which had neuer beene held a matter worth regarding, vntill now of late) but how the powers of the Eaſt and Weſt, diuided and kept aſunder by their Countrie, as two

Seas

Seas by an Isthmus or necke of land, might be kept from ouerflowing the barre that parted them. Neither had the Romans any better pretence for their seeking to make free those base Asiatiques, which originally were Greekish; than the generall applause, wherwith all the Nation entertained this their louing offer. Yet were Lysimachia, and the Townes in Thrace, lately gotten by Antiochus, pretended as a very great cause of feare, that should moue them to take armes euen in their owne defence. But if all Greece would haue made interceſſion, and requested that things might continue as they were, promising ioyntly to assist the Romans, with their whole forces both by Land and Sea, whensoeuer King Antiochus should make the least offer to stirre against them: then had not onely this quarrell beene at an end; but the Roman Patronage ouer the Countrie, had been far from growing, as soone after it did, into a Lordly rule.

The Achæans were at this time, in a manner, the onely Nation of Greece, that freely and generously declared themselues altogether for the Romans, their friends and benefactours. All the rest gaue doubtfull answeres of hope vnto both sides: or if some few, as did the Thessalians, were firme against Antiochus; yet helped they not one another in the quarrel, nor shewed themselues his enemies, till hee pressed them with open force. The Bœotians willingly receiued him, as soone as hee entered vpon their borders, not so much for feare of his power, as in hatred of Titus and the Romans, by whom they had beene somewhat hardly vsed. Aminander the Athamanian, besides his old friendship with the Ætolians, was caught with a bait; which it may be doubted, whether he did more foolishly swallow, or Antiochus cast out. He had married the daughter of an Arcadian, that was an idle-headed man, and vanted himselfe to be descended from Alexander the Great: naming his two sonnes, in that regard, Philip and Alexander. Philip, the elder of these brethren, accompanied his sister to the poore Court of Athamania: where hauing made his follie knowne, by talking of his Pedigree; He was iudged by Antiochus and the Ætolians, a man fit for their turnes. They made him beleeue, that in regard of his high parentage, and the famous memorie of Alexander his forefather; it was their purpose, to doe their best for the conquest of Macedon to his behoofe: since no man had thereto so good title as he. But for the enabling of them hereunto; it behoued him to draw Aminander to their partie, that so they might the sooner haue done with the Romans. Philip was highly pleased herewith; and by perswasions of himselfe, or of his sister, effected as much as they desired. But the first piece of seruice done by this imaginarie King (whether it proceeded from his owne phrenzie, in hope to get loue of the Macedonians that should be his subiects; or whether from some vanitie in King Antiochus that employed him) wrought more harme to his friends, than he and Aminander were able to doe good. There were two thousand men committed to his leading: with which he marched vnto Cynoscephalæ, there to gather vp the bones of the slaughtered Macedonians; whom their King had suffered all this while to lie vnburied. The Macedons troubled not themselues to thinke on this charitable act, as if it were to them any benefit at all: but King Philip tooke it in high indignation; as intended meerely vnto his despight. Wherefore he presently sent vnto the Romans; and gaue them to vnderstand, that hee was readie with all his power to aid them wherein soeuer they should be pleased to vse him.

The Ætolians, Magnetians, Eubœans, Bœotians, and Athamanians, hauing now all ioyned with him; Antiochus tooke counsaile of them about the prosecution of the warre in hand. The chiefe question was, Whether it were meet for him to inuade Thessalie, that would not hearken to his perswasions; or whether to let all alone vntill the Spring: because it was now mid-winter. Some thought one thing, and some another: confirming each his owne sentence, with the weightiest reasons which he could alleadge; as in a matter of great importance. Hannibal was at this meeting: who had long beene cast aside, as a vessell of no vse; but was now required to deliuer his opinion. He freely told the King, That what he should now vt-

ter, was euen the same which hee would haue spoken, had his counsaile at any time before been asked since their comming into Greece. For the Magnetians, Bœotians, and other their good friends, which now so willingly tooke their parts: what were they else than so many poore Estates, that, wanting force of their owne, did adioyne themselues for feare vnto him, that was strongest at the present; and would afterwards, when they saw it expedient, be as readie to fall to the contrary side, alleadging the same feare for their excuse? wherefore hee thought most behouefull, to win King Philip of Macedon vnto their partie: who (besides that being once engaged, he should not afterwards haue power to recoyle and forsake them at his pleasure) was a mighty Prince, and one that had meanes to sustaine the Roman Warre with his proper forces. Now that Philip might be easily perswaded to ioyne with them; the benefit likely to redound vnto himselfe, by their societie, was a very strong Argument: though indeed what neede was there, of prooving by inference the likelihood of this hope? For, said Hee, These Ætolians here present; and namely, this THOAS, being lately Embassador from them into Asia, among other Motiues which he then vsed to excite the King vnto this Expedition, insisted mainly on the same point. He told vs that PHILIP was moued beyond all patience, with the Lordly insolence of the Romans: likening that King to some wild beast, that was chained or lockt vp within some grate, and would faine breake loose. If this be so: let vs breake his chaine, and pull downe the grate, that he may regaine his libertie, and satisfie his angry stomacke, vpon those that are common Enemies to vs and him. But if it proone otherwise, and that his feare be greater than his indignation: then shall it behoue vs to looke vnto him, that hee may not seeke to please his good masters the Romans, by offending vs. Your sonne SELEVCVS is now at Lysimachia, with part of your Armie: if PHILIP will not hearken to your Embassage; let SELEVCVS be in readines, to fall vpon Macedon, and finde him worke to defend his owne on the other side, without putting vs here to trouble. Thus much concerning PHILIP; and the present War in Greece. But more generally for the managing of this great enterprise, wherein you are now embarqued against the Romans, I told you my opinion at the beginning: Whereto had you then giuen eare, the Romans by this time should haue heard other newes, than that Chalcis in Euboea was become ours. Italie and Gaule should haue beene on fire with warre: and, little to their comfort, they should haue vnderstood, that HANNIBAL was againe come into Italie. Neither doe I see what should hinder vs euen now from taking the same course. Send for all your Fleete and Armie hither (but in any case let Shippes of burden come along with them, loaden with store of victuals: For as the case now stands, we haue here too few hands, and too many mouthes.) Whereof let the one halfe be employed against Italie; whilest you in person with the other halfe, tarrying on this side the Ionian Sea, may both take order for the affaires of Greece, and therewithall make countenance, as if you were euen readie to follow vs into Italie: yea, and be ready to follow vs indeed, if it shall be requisite. This is my aduice: who though perhaps I am not very skilfull in all sorts of warre: yet how to warre with the Romans, I haue been instructed by long experience, both to their cost and mine owne. Of this counsaile which I giue, I promise you my faithfull and diligent seruice for the execution: but what counsaile soeuer you shall please to follow, I wish it may bee prosperous. Many were pleased with the great spirit of the man, and said hee had spoken brauely: but of all this was nothing done; saue onely that one was sent into Asia, to make all things ready there. In the meane while they went in hand with Thessalie, about which they had before disputed. There when they had won one Towne by force, many other places, doubting their owne strength, were glad to make submission. But Larissa, that was chiefe of the Countrey, stood out: not regarding any terrible threats of the King that lay before the wals with his whole Armie. This their faith and courage was rewarded by good fortune. For M. Babius, a Roman Proprætor did send helpe thither. Likewise Philip of Macedon professed himselfe Enemie vnto Antiochus: where by the fame of the succour comming to Larissa grew such, as wrought more than the succour could haue done, had it arriued. For Antiochus perceiuing many fires on the Mountaines toppes afarre off; thought that a great Armie of Romans and Macedonians had beene comming vpon him. Therefore excusing himselfe by the time of the yeere; Hee brake vp his siege, and marched away to Chalcis. At Chalcis he fell in loue with a yong Maiden, daughter vnto a Citizen of the Towne: whom, without regard of the much disproportion that was betweene them, both in yeeres and fortune, He shortly married; and so spent the Winter following, as delightfully as he could, without thinking vpon the war in hand. His great men and Captaines followed his example; and the souldiors as readily imitated their Captaines: in such wise that when he tooke the field, he might euidently perceiue in what loose manner of discipline his Armie had passed the Winter. But M. Acilius Glabrio, the Roman Consul, shall meet him very shortly, and helpe him to reclaime them from this loosenesse of nuptiall Reuels; by setting them to harder exercise.

M. Acilius was chosen Consul with P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica. The warre against Antiochus fell to him by lot; whereas otherwise He was no way so honourable, as Nasica his Colleague: vnto whom fell a charge, of farre lesse credit and importance. Nasica, besides the great Nobilitie of his Familie, had beene long since, in time of the Punicke Warre, crowned with the title of The best man in Rome: when the Senate, for very feare and superstition, durst not haue so pronounced him, had they not so thought him; as being commanded by Oracle, That none other man than the verie best, should entertaine an old stone, which the Diuell then taught them to call The Mother of the gods. But no prærogatiue of Birth, Vertue, or good Opinion, gaue such aduantage to the better man, as to make choice of his owne Prouince; or arrogate more vnto himselfe, than his lot should affoord him. This vnpartiall distribution of employments, helped well to maintaine peace and concord. P. Scipio therefore was appointed to make warre against the Boians: wherein he purchased the honour of a Triumph, nothing so glorious as was that of his Colleague; though purchased with harder seruice, requiring the more abilitie in matter of warre. But M. Acilius went ouer into Greece, with ten thousand Foot, two thousand Horse, and fifteene Elephants. Ptolemie King of Ægypt, notwithstanding his late Alliance with King Antiochus: and Philip King of Macedon; had lately sent Embassadours to Rome, making offer to come each of them in person with all his forces into Ætolia, there to assist the Consul in this warre. Ptolemie sent also gold and siluer, toward the defraying of charges; as one that meant none other than good earnest. But hee was too yong, and dwelt too farre off. So his monie was returned vnto him with thankes; and his louing offer as louingly refused. Vnto Philips Embassadors answere was made, that this his friendly offer was gratefully accepted: and that the Senate and People of Rome would thinke themselues beholding to him, for the assistance that Hee should giue to Acilius the Consul. Masanissa likewise, and the Carthaginians, did striue, which of them should be most forward in gratifying the Romans. Each of them promised a great quantitie of graine; which they would send partly to Rome, partly to the Armie in Greece. And herein Masanissa farre out-went the poore Citie of Carthage: as also, in that he offered to lend the Consul fiue hundred Horse, and twentie Elephants. On the other side, the Carthaginians vndertooke to set out a Fleet at their owne charges: and to bring in at one payment all the Tribute-monie, which was behinde, and ought to bee discharged by many yeerely pensions. But the Romans did neither thinke it good, to let them arme a Fleet; nor would let them redeeme themselues out of Tribute, by paying all at once. As for the Corne; it was accepted with Condition, That they should be contented to receiue the price of it.

The hastie and ridiculous issue of this war, that began with such noyse and preparations, were hardly credible: were not the difference exceeding great, betweene the Roman and the Asiatick souldior. Antiochus had gotten this Spring a few townes of Acarnania, after the same manner as hee had preuailed in other parts of Greece; partly by faire words, and treason of the Rulers; partly by terrour, that was like to

proue their excuſe, when they ſhould againe forſake him. But King Philip and Bebius, hauing recouered many places; and the Roman Conſul being arriued, againſt whom none made reſiſtance; He was glad to withdraw himſelfe. Aminander fled out of his Athamania: which the Macedonian tooke and enioyed; as in recompence of his good ſeruice to the Romans. Philip, the brother of Aminanders wife, was taken by the Conſul; made a mocking ſtocke: and ſent away priſoner to Rome. The Theſſalians vſed much more diligence in returning to their old friends, than they had done in yeelding to the King. All their Cities, one after other, gaue vp themſelues: the Garriſons of Antiochus, compounding onely for their owne liues, and departing vnarmed: yet ſo, that a thouſand of them ſtayed behind, and tooke pay of the Romans. This did wonderfully perplex Antiochus: who hauing withdrawne himſelfe to Chalcis, and hearing how things went, cried out vpon his friends: and ſaid, That they had betrayed him. He had taken a great deale of toile during one halfe of a Winter, and ſpent the other halfe in ſuch Nuptials, as were little to his honour: after which, in time of need, He found all the promiſes of the Ætolians meerely verball: and himſelfe reduced into termes of great extremitie. Hee therefore admired Hannibal as a wiſe man, yea a very Prophet, that had foreſeene all this long before. Neuertheleſſe He ſent word to the Ætolians, that they ſhould now make readie all their forces: as conſidering their owne need to bee no leſſe than his. But the Ætolians had cauſe to thinke, that they themſelues were ſhamefully diſappointed by Antiochus: who hauing promiſed to doe great wonders, was in all this while ſeconded by no greater numbers out of Aſia, than ſo many as would fill vp the ſame ten thouſand which he firſt brought ouer. Yet came there ſome of them, though fewer than at any time before, which ioyned with him. Hereat the King was angrie: and could get no better ſatisfaction, than that Thoas and his fellowes had done their beſt, in vaine, to haue made all the Nation take armes. Since therefore neither his owne men came ouer to him out of Aſia, nor his friends of Greece would appeare in this time of danger: He ſeized vpon the Streights of Thermopyla: as meaning to defend them againſt the Romans, vntill more helpe ſhould come. Of the Streights of Thermopyla there hath beene ſpoken enough * before, vpon many occaſions: and then chiefly, when they were defended by Leonidas againſt the huge Armie of Xerxes. Wherefore it may eaſily be conceiued, how the Romans, that landed about Apollonia, and ſo came onwards into Theſſalie, were vnable to paſſe that Ledge of Mountaines, diuiding the one halfe of Greece: vnleſſe they could win this difficult entrance. But there was great difference betweene Leonidas and Antiochus. The former of theſe, with an handfull of men, defended this paſſage two or three dayes together, againſt a World of men comming to inuade the Countrey. The latter, hauing taken vpon him to doe great miracles, and effect what he liſted himſelfe in Greece: did commit himſelfe vnto the ſafetie of this place, when he was charged by not many more than he had in his owne Armie. There whileſt he lay, Hee ſent earneſt meſſages one after other to the Ætolians, entreating them not to forſake him thus: but at leaſt wiſe now to helpe, and keepe the tops of the Mountaines, leſt the Romans finding any by-path, ſhould come downe vpon him. By this importunitie, he got of them two thouſand, that vndertooke to make good the few paſſages: by which onely, and not without extreme difficultie, it was poſſible for the Enemie to aſcend. The Roman Conſul in like ſort, prepared to force the Streights: without ſtaying to expect King Philip: that was hindered by ſickeneſſe from accompanying him. He had with him M. Porcius Cato, and L. Valerius Flaccus, that had both of them beene Conſuls. Theſe he ſent forth by night with two thouſand men, to trie whether by any meanes they could get vp to the Ætolians. He himſelfe encouraged his Armie: not onely by telling them, with what baſe-conditioned enemies they had to deale: but what rich Kingdomes Antiochus held, that ſhould bountifully reward them if they were victors. This was on the day before the battaile. All that night Cato had a ſore iourney (for what happened vnto L. Valerius it is vncertaine, saue onely that hee failed in his intent) and so much the worse, for that he had no skilfull guide. Seeing therefore his men exceedingly tired, with climbing vp steepie Rocks and crooked wayes: Hee commanded them to repose themselues; whilest Hee, being a verie able man of bodie, tooke in hand the discouerie, accompanied with no more than one of like mettle to himselfe. After a great deale of trouble, He found at length a path: which he tooke to be, as indeed it was, the best way leading vnto the Enemies. So thither he brought his men; and held on the same path till toward breake of day. It was a place not haunted, because in time of peace there was a faire way through the Streights below, that required no such trouble of climbing: neyther had this entrance of the Thermopylæ beene so often the Seat of Warre, as might cause any trauailers to search out the passages of those desolate Mountaines. Wherefore the way that Cato followed, though it were the best: yet did it lead him to a bogge at the end, which would suffer him to passe no further. So he staid there vntill day-light: by which he discouered both the Campe of the Greekes vnderneath him; and some of the Ætolians verie neere vnto him, that were keeping watch. He therefore sent foorth a lustie Crue of his men, whom he thought fittest for that seruice; and willed them by any meanes to get him some prisoners. This was effected: and he thereby vnderstood, that these Ætolians were no more than sixe hundred; as also that King Antiochus lay beneath in the Valley. So he presently set vpon the Ætolians; ouerthrew them; slue a great part of them; and chaced the rest, that by flying to their Campe, guided him vnto it. The fight was alreadie begun between the Armies below: and the Romans, that had easily repelled the Kings men, and driuen them into their Campe, found it in a manner a desperate piece of worke to assault the Campe it selfe; which occupied the whole bredth of the Streights; was notably fortified; and not onely defended by Antiochus his long Pikes, which were best at that kinde of seruice; but by Archers and Slingers that were placed ouer them on the Hil-side, and powred downe a showre of weapons on their heads. But Cato his approch determined the matter. It was thought at first, that the Ætolians had beene comming to helpe the Kings men: but when the Roman armes and ensignes were discouered, such was the terrour, that none made offer of resistance; but all of them forsooke the Campe, and fled. The slaughter was not great: for that the badnesse of the way did hinder the Roman Armie from making pursuit. Yet this dayes losse draue Antiochus out of Greece, who directly fled to Chalcis; and from thence, with the first opportunitie, got him backe into Asia.

All the Cities that had embraced the friendship of Antiochus, prepared forthwith to entertaine the Romans, and entreat for pardon: setting open their gates; and presenting themselues vnto the Consul, in manner of suppliants. Briefly, in few dayes all was recouered that Antiochus had gained: the Ætolians onely standing out, because they knew not what else to doe. Neither did the Consul giue them any respite. At his returne from Chalcis He met with King Philip, that hauing recouered health, came to joyne with him against Antiochus: ouer whom since the victorie was already gotten, Hee did gratulate vnto the Romans their good successe; and offered to take part with them in the Ætolian Warre. So it was agreed, That the Consul should besiege Heraclea; and Philip, Lamia; at the same time. Each of them plied his worke hard; especially Philip, who faine would haue taken Lamia before the Consul should come to helpe him. But it could not be. For his Macedonians that vsed to worke by Myne, were ouermuch hindered by the stonie ground. Yet was Lamia euen ready to be taken, when the Consul, hauing wonne Heraclea, came thither; and told Philip, that the spoile of these Townes was a reward vnto those that had fought at Thermopylæ. Herewith Philip must be contented; and therefore went his way quietly. But Acilius, that could so ill endure to see Philip in likelihood of thriuing by the Romans victorie, got not Lamia himselfe: vntill such time as another Consul was readie to ease him of his charge.

The

The losse of Heraclea did so affright the Ætolians, that they thought no way safer than to desire peace. Yet had they sent vnto King Antiochus presently after his flight: entreating him not to forsake them vtterly, but eyther to returne with all those forces which he had purposed to bring into Greece; or if any thing with-held him from comming in person, at leastwise to helpe them with money and other aid. They prayed him to consider, that this did not onely concerne him in honour; but appertained vnto his owne safetie: since it would be much to his hurt, if the Ætolians being wholly subdued, the Romans, without any Enemies at their backes, might set vpon him in Asia. He considered well of this; and found their words true. Therefore He deliuered vnto Nicander, one of their Embassadors, a summe of money, that might serue to defray the charges of the Warre: promising that ere long he would send them strong aid, both by Land and Sea. Thoas, another of their Embassadors, He retained with him: who willingly stayed, that he might vrge the King to make his word good. But when Heraclea was taken from them: then did the Ætolians lay aside all hope of amending their fortune by the helpe of Antiochus; and made suit vnto the Consul to obtaine peace, vpon any reasonable Condition. The Consul would scarce vouchsafe to giue them audience, but said Hee had other businesse in hand: onely He granted them tenne dayes of Truce, and sent L. Valerius Flaccus with them to Hypata; willing them to make him acquainted with as much, as they would haue deliuered vnto himselfe. At their comming to Hypata; they began, as men fauouring their owne cause, to alleadge how well they had deserued of the Romans. Whereto Flaccus would not hearken. He told them plainly, That the memorie of all such good Offices past, was quite obliterated by the malice which they had shewed of late. Wherefore hee willed them to acknowledge their fault, and to entreat pardon. Better they thought to doe so euen betimes, than to stay till they were reduced into termes of more extremity. Hereupon they agreed to commit themselues vnto the faith of the Romans; and to that effect sent Embassadours to the Consul. This phrase of committing vnto the faith; signified, in their vse of it, little else, than the acknowledgement of a fault done, and the craning of pardon. But the Romans vsed those words in another sense; and counted them all one, as yeelding to discretion*. Wherefore when the Consul heard them speake in this manner: Hee asked them whether their meaning were agreeable to their words. They answered that it was: and shewed him the Decree of their Nation, lately made to this purpose. Then sayde Hee, I command you first of all, That none of yee presume to goe into Asia, vpon any businesse priuate or publike: then, That yee deliuer vp vnto me Dicæarchus the Ætolian, Menestratus the Epirot, Aminander the Athamanian, and such of his Countrimen as haue followed him in reuolting from vs. Whilest hee was yet speaking: Phameas the Embassadour interrupted him; and prayed him not to mistake the Custome of the Greekes, who had yeelded themselues vnto his faith; not vnto slauerie. What? (saide the Consul) Doe yee stand to pleade Custome with mee, being now at my discretion? Bring hither a chaine. With that, chaines were brought; and an iron collar by his appointment fitted vnto euerie one of their neckes. This did so affright them, that they stood dumbe and knew not what to say. But Valerius and some others entreated the Consul, not to deale thus hardly with them, since they came as Embassadours; though since, their Condition was altered. Phameas also spake for himselfe: and said, That neither He nor yet the Apoclecti or ordinarie Councel of the Nation, were able to fulfill these iniunctions; without approbation of the generall Assembly. For which cause Hee entreated yet further ten dayes respite; and had granted vnto him Truce for so long.

This surceasance of warre, during tenne and other tenne dayes together, began presently after the taking of Heraclea; when Philip had beene commaunded away from Lamia, that else he might haue wonne. Now because of the indignitie herein offered vnto that King, and to the end that hee might not returne home with his

Armie, like one that could not bee trusted in employment: especially the Romans being like hereafter to haue further need of him, in the continuance of this Warre: He was desired to set vpon the Athamanians, and some other pettie Nations their borderers, whilest the Consul was busie with the Ætolians; taking for his reward, all that He could get. And Hee got in that space all Athamanta, Perrhæbia, Aperantia, and Dolopia. For the Ætolians, hearing what had befalne their Embassadors, were so enraged, That although they were very ill prouided for Warre; yet they could not endure to heare more talke of peace. And it happened, that Nicander about the same time was come backe from Antiochus, with money and hopefull promises: the Romans abiding still about Heraclea; and Philip hauing lately risen from before Lamia, yet not being far gone thence. His monie Nicander conueighed into Lamia, by verie vnusuall dexteritie. But hee himselfe being to passe further to the Assembly of the Ætolians, there to make report of his Embassage; was verie much perplexed about this his journie, which lay betweene the Roman and Macedonian Campes. Yet hee made the aduenture: and keeping as farre as hee could from the Roman side, fell vpon a Station of Macedonians; by whom hee was taken, and led vnto their King. He expected no good; but eyther to bee deliuered vnto the Romans, or vsed ill enough by Philip. But it seemes, that the King had not hitherto concocted well the indignitie, of his being sent away from Lamia. For Hee commanded his seruants to entreat Nicander friendly: and hee himselfe being then at supper, did visit him as soone as hee rose vp: giuing him to vnderstand; That the Ætolians did now reape the fruits of their owne madnesse; forasmuch as they could neuer hold themselues contented, but would needs bee calling strangers into Greece. They had pleased themselues well, in their acquaintance first with the Romans, and then with King Antiochus: but himselfe, being their neighbour, they could neuer well endure. It was now therefore, He said, high time for them to haue regard vnto his friendship, whereof hitherto they had neuer made any triall: for surely their good affection, one vnto the other, would bee much more auaileable vnto each of them; than their mutuall catching of aduantages; whereby they had wrought themselues much displeasure. Thus much the King willed Nicander to signifie vnto his Countrimen; and priuately to hold in minde the courtesie which hee then did him, in sending him safe home. So giuing him a Conuoy to gard him to Hypata; Hee louingly dismissed him. For this benefit, Nicander was alwayes after dutifully affected to the Crowne of Macedon: so as in the warre of Perseus hee made himselfe suspected vnto the Romans; and therefore was had away to Rome, where he ended his life.

When the Consul vnderstood, that the Ætolians refused to make their submission, in such wise as he required it: hee foorthwith meant to prosecute the warre against them, without any longer forbearance. They were preparing to make head against him at Naupactus: whither hee therefore directly marched, to trie what they could or durst. The siege of Naupactus was of greater length, than the Romans had preconceiued it: for it was a strong Citie, and well manned. But Acilius stood vpon point of honour; wherein he thought that hee should haue beene a loser, by rising from before it without Victorie. So He staid there welneere all the following time of his Consulship; whilest the Macedonian King and the Achæans made farre better vse of the Roman Victorie. Philip, as is said before, being allowed to take in such places as had reuolted vnto Antiochus, and were not hitherto reclaimed, wan the strong Citie of Demetrias; and with an hastie course of Victorie, subdued the Athamanians and others. The Achæans called to accompt the Eleans and Messenians: which had long beene addicted to the Ætolian side; and followed it, in taking part with Antiochus. The Eleans gaue good wordes; whereby they saued themselues from trouble awhile. The Messenians being more stout, before they were inuaded; had none other helpe when the Achæan Prætor wasted their Countrie, than to offer themselues vnto the Romans. Titus was then at Corinth: to whom they sent word, word, That at his Commandement their gates ſhould be opened; but that vnto the Achæans it was not their meaning to yeeld. A meſſage from Titus to the Achæan Prætor, did ſuffice to call home the Armie, and finiſh the Warre: as alſo the peremptorie Commaund of the ſame Titus cauſed the Meſſenians to annex themſelues vnto the Achæans, and become part of their Common-weale. Such was now the Majeſtie of a Roman Embaſſador. Titus did fauour the Achæans; yet could not like it well, that eyther they or any other ſhould take too much vpon them. He thought it enough, that they had their libertie, and were ſtrong enough to defend it againſt anie of their neighbours. That they ſhould make themſelues great Lords, and able to diſpute with the Romans vpon euen termes; it was no part of his deſire. They had lately bought the Ile of Zacynthus which had once beene Philips, and was afterward giuen by him to Aminander who ſent a Gouernour thither. But when Aminander in this preſent Warre, was driuen out of his owne Kingdome by Philip: then did the Gouernour of Zacynthus offer to ſell the Iland to the Achæans; whom hee found readie Chapmen. Titus liked not of this: but plainely told them, That the Romans would be their owne Caruers, and take what they thought good, of the Lands belonging to their Enemies; as a reward of the victorie which they had obtained. It was bootleſſe to diſpute. Wherefore the Achæans referred themſelues vnto his diſcretion. So he told them, that their Common-wealth was like a Tortoiſe, whereof Peloponneſus was the ſhell: and that holding themſelues within that compaſſe, they were out of danger; but if they would needes bee looking abroad, they ſhould lie open to blowes, which might greatly hurt them. Hauing ſettled things thus in Peloponneſus, Hee went ouer to Naupactus: where Glabrio the Conſul had laine two moneths, that might haue beene farre better ſpent. There, whether out of compaſſion which Hee had vpon the Ætolians, or out of diſlike of King Philips thriuing ſo faſt: Hee perſwaded the Conſul to grant vnto the beſieged, and to the whole Nation, ſo long Truce, that they might ſend Embaſſadours to Rome; and ſubmitting themſelues, craue pardon of the Senate. Moſt like it is, that Naupactus was in great danger: elſe would not the Ætolians haue made ſuch earneſt ſuit as they did vnto Titus, for procuring of this fauour. But if Glabrio had beene ſure to carrie it, in any ſhort ſpace: it may well bee thought hee would not haue gone away without it; ſince the winning of that Towne, wherein was then the whole floure of the Nation, would haue made the promiſed ſubmiſſion much more humble and ſincere. When they came to Rome, no entreatie could helpe them to better Conditions, than one of theſe two; That either they ſhould wholly permit themſelues to the good pleaſure of the Senate; Or elſe pay a thouſand Talents, and make neither Peace nor Warre with any, further than as the Romans ſhould giue approbation. They had not ſo much monie: neither could they well hope to be gently dealt withall, if they ſhould giue themſelues away vnto diſcretion; which what it ſignified, they now vnderſtood. Wherefore they deſired to haue it ſet downe, in what points, and how farre foorth, they ſhould yeeld vnto the good pleaſure of the Senate. But heereof they could get no certaine anſwere: ſo that they were diſmiſſed as enemies, after long and vaine attendance.

Whileſt the Ætolians were purſuing their hopes of peace, the Conſul had little to doe in Greece; and therefore tooke vpon him grauely to ſet things in order among the tractable Achæans. Hee would haue had them to reſtore the baniſhed Lacedæmonians home into their Countrie; and to take the Eleans into the fellowſhippe of their Common-wealth. This the Achæans liked well enough: but they did not like it, that the Romans ſhould bee meddling in all occurrences. Wherefore they deferred the reſtitution of the baniſhed Lacedæmonians: intending to make it an Act of their owne meere grace. As for the Eleans: they were loth to bee beholding to the Romans, and thereby to diſparage the Achæans: into whoſe Corporation they were deſirous to bee admitted; and ſaw that they ſhould haue their deſire, without ſuch compulſiue mediation.

The

The Roman Admirall C. Liuius, much about the same time, fought a battaile at Sea with Polyxenidas, Admirall to the King Antiochus. King Eumenes brought helpe to the Romans, though it was not great: and fiue and twentie saile of Rhodians came after the battaile, when they were following the Chace. The Kings Fleet was the better of saile: but that of the Romans the better manned. Wherefore Polyxenidas being vanquished in fight, was yet out of danger; as soone as he betooke himselfe to a speedie retrait.

And such end had the first yeeres warre, betweene King Antiochus and the Romans. After this, as many of the Greekes as had followed the vaine hopes of the Ætolians, were glad to excuse themselues by feare; thinking themselues happie when by Embassadours they had obtained pardon. On the contrarie side, Philip of Macedon, Arch-enemie of late vnto the Romans, did now send to gratulate this their Victorie: and, in recompence of his good affection, had restored vnto him Demetrius his yonger sonne; whom some few yeeres they had kept as an hostage. Also King Ptolemie of Ægypt, gratulating the Roman Victorie, sent word how greatly all Asia and Syria were thereby terrified. In which regard Hee desired the Senate not to foreslow time; but to send an Armie, as soone as might be, into Asia: promising, that his assistance, wherein soeuer it pleased them to vse it, should not bee wanting. This Ptolemie was the sonne-in-law of King Antiochus: but hee was the friend of Fortune. He vnderstood long before, as did all that were indifferent beholders of the Contention, that the Romans were like to haue the vpper hand. The same did Antiochus now beginne to suspect, who had thought himselfe awhile as safe at Ephesus, as if hee had beene in another World: but was told by Hannibal, That it was not so farre out of Greece into Asia, as out of Italie into Greece; and that there was no doubt but the Romans would soone be there, and make him trie the chance of a battaile for his Kingdome.

§. VIII.

LVCIVS SCIPIO, hauing with him PVBLIVS the African his elder Brother, for his Lieutenant, is sent into Greece. He grants long Truce to the Ætolians, that so he might at leisure passe into Asia. Much troublesome businesse by Sea; and diuers fights. An inuasion vpon EVMENES his Kingdome; with the siege of Pergamus, raysed by an handfull of the Achæans. L. SCIPIO the Consul comes into Asia: where ANTIOCHVS most earnestly desireth peace, and is denied it. The battaile of MAGNESIA: wherein ANTIOCHVS being vanquished, yeeldeth to the Romans good pleasure. The Conditions of the peace. In what sort the Romans vsed their Victorie. L. CORNELIVS SCIPIO, after a most sumptuous triumph ouer ANTIOCHVS, is surnamed The Asiatique, as his brother was stiled The African.

LVCIVS CORNELIVS SCIPIO, the brother of P Scipio the African, was chosen Consul at Rome with C. Lelius. Lelius was verie gracious in the Senate: and therefore being desirous (as generally all Consuls were) of the more honourable employment, offered to referre to the arbitrement of the Senate, if L. Cornelius would be so pleased, the disposition of their Prouinces; without putting it to the hazard of a Lotterie. Lucius hauing talked with his brother Publius, approued well of the motion. Such a question had not of long time beene put vnto the Fathers: who therefore were the more desirous, to make an vnblameable Decree. But the matter being otherwise somewhat indifferent; P. Scipio the African said openly thus much, That if the Senate would appoint his brother to the warre against Antiochus, He himselfe would follow his brother in that warre, as his Lieutenant. These words were heard with such approbation, that the controuersie was foorthwith at an end. For if Antiochus relied relyed vpon Hannibal, and ſhould happen to be directed wholly by that great Captaine: what better man could they oppoſe, than Scipio; that had beene victorious againſt the ſame Great Worthie? But indeed a worſer man might haue ſerued well enough the turne. For Hannibal had no abſolute Command, nor ſcarce any truſt of great importance: excepting now and then in conſultation; where his wiſdome was much approued, but his libertie and high ſpirit as much diſliked. It is worthie of remembrance; as a ſigne of the freedome that he vſed in his cenſures, euen whileſt he liued in ſuch a Court. Antiochus muſtered his Armie in preſence of this famous Captaine: thinking, as may ſeeme, to haue made him wiſh, that hee had beene ſerued by ſuch braue men in Italie. For they were gallantly decked, both Men, Horſes, and Elephants, with ſuch coſtly furniture of Gold, Siluer, and Purple; as glittered with a terrible braueric on a Sun-ſhine day. Whereupon the King, well pleaſing himſelfe with that goodly ſpectacle, asked Hannibal what he thought; and whether all this were not enough for the Romans. Enough (ſaid Hannibal) were the Romans the moſt couetous men in all the World: meaning, that all this Coſt vpon the backes of Cowardly Aſiatiques, was no better than a ſpoile to animate good Souldiers. How little this anſwere pleaſed the King; it is eaſie to gheſſe. The little vſe that he made of this Carthaginian, teſtifies that his diſlike of the man, cauſed him to loſe the vſe of his ſeruice, when he ſtood in greateſt neceſſitie thereof.

The Scipio's made all haſte away from Rome as ſoone as they could. They carried with them, beſides other Souldiers newly preſt to the warre, about fiue thouſand Voluntaries, that had ſerued vnder P. Africanus. There was alſo a Fleet of thirtie Quinquereme Gallies, and twentie Triremes newly built, appointed vnto L. Æmylius Regillus, that was choſen Admirall the ſame yeere for that Voyage. At their comming into Greece, they found the old Conſul Glabrio beſieging Amphyſſa a Citie of the Ætolians. The Ætolians after that they were denied peace, had expected him once againe at Naupactus. Wherefore they not onely fortified that Towne: but kept all the paſſages thereto leading; which heedleſſely, as in a time of confuſion, they had left vngarded the laſt yeere. Glabrio knowing this, deceiued their expectation, and fell vpon Lamia: which being not long ſince much weakned by Philip, and now by him attempted on the ſudden; was carried at the ſecond aſſault. Thence went Hee to Amphyſſa: which he had almoſt gotten; when L. Scipio, his ſucceſſor, came with thirteene thouſand Foot and fiue hundred Horſe, and tooke charge of the Armie. The Towne of Amphyſſa was preſently forſaken by the inhabitants, but they had a Caſtle, or higher Towne, that was impregnable; whereinto they all retired. The Athenian Embaſſadors had dealt with P. Scipio, in behalfe of the Ætolians: entreating him to ſtand their friend, and helpe them in obtaining ſome tolerable Condition of peace. He gaue them gentle words: and willed them to perſwade the Aetolians, that they ſhould faithfully and with true meaning deſire it. This was gladly taken. But many meſſages paſſing to and fro: though Publius continued to put them in good hope; yet the Conſul made ſtill the ſame anſwere, with which they had beene chaced from Rome. The concluſion was, That they ſhould ſue for a longer time of reſpite from warre: whereby at more leiſure they might attend ſome better diſpoſition of the Senate; or any helpefull commoditie which time ſhould affoord. So they obtained halfe a yeeres Truce: after which, the Winter was like to affoord them another halfe yeeres leiſure of breathing. Hereof were not they more glad, than was P. Scipio: who thought all time loſt, which withheld the Warre from paſſing ouer into Aſia.

The buſineſſe of Ætolia being thus laide aſide: and the olde Conſul Glabrio ſent home into Italie: the Scipio's marched into Theſſalie; intending thence to take their way by Land, through Macedon and Thrace vnto the Helleſpont. Yet they conſidred, That hereby they muſt commit themſelues vnto the loyaltie of King Philip: who might either doe them ſome miſchiefe by the way, if hee were diſpoſed to watch a notable aduantage: or at the leaſt, would he be vnfaithfull, though he were not ſo couragious; couragious; yet might he take such order with the Thracians, that euen for want of victuailes, if by no greater inconuenience, they should be disgracefully forced to returne. He had promised them the vtmost of his furtherance: wherein, whether he meant sincerely, they thought to make some triall; by causing a Gentleman to ride Post vnto him, and obserue his doings as hee should take him on the sudden. The King was merrie at a feast, and drinking, when the Messenger came: whom he louingly bade welcome; and shewed him the next day, not only what prouision of victuailes he had made for the Armie, but how he had made bridges ouer the riuers, and mended the bad wayes by which they were to passe. With these good newes Gracchus returned backe in haste vnto the Scipio's: who entring into Macedon, found all things in a readines, that might helpe to aduance their iourney. The King entertayned them royally; and brought them on their way, euen to the Hellespont: where they stayed a good while, vntill their Nauie was in readinesse to transport them into Asia.

Much was done at Sea in the beginning of this yeere; though, for the most part, little of importance. Polyxenidas, the Admirall of Antiochus, was a banished Rhodian: true to the King; and desirous of reuenge vpon his Countreymen that had expelled him. Hee, hearing that the Rhodian Fleet was at Samos, the Romans and Eumenes hauing not as yet put to Sea; thought to doe somewhat vpon those that were so early in their diligence, before their followes should arriue to helpe them. Yet went he craftily to worke; and sent word, as in great secrecie, to the Rhodian Admirall, That if the sentence of his banishment might be repealed, He would, in requitall thereof, betray all the Kings Fleet. After many passages to and fro, this was beleeued: and the Rhodian Admiral grew so careleſſe, expecting still when he should receiue a watchword from Polyxenidas, that he himselfe was taken by Polyxenidas in his owne Hauen. The Kings Fleet setting foorth from Ephesus by night; and, for feare of being discouered, resting one day in harbour by the way; came the second night to Samos: where, by morning, it was readie to enter the Hauen. Pausistratus the Rhodian Admirall seeing this, thought it his best way of resistance, to bestow his men on the two head-lands or points of the Hauen; so to gard the mouth of it: for that he saw no likelihood of defending himselfe by Sea. But Polyxenidas had alreadie landed some companies, in another part of the Iland: which falling vpon the backe of Pausistratus, compelled him to alter his directions, and command his men aboord. This could not be without great confusion: so as the enemies tooke him out of all order; and sunke or boorded all his Nauie, fiue excepted, that by a sudden deuice made shift to escape. Each of them hung out a burning Cressет vpon two poles, at the Beake-head: and then rowed forwards directly vpon the Enemie: who hauing not bethought himselfe what shift to make against such vnexpected danger of firing, was content to giue way vnto these desperate Gallies; for feare lest they should burne, together with themselues, a part of the Kings Fleete.

Not long after this, the Romans had some losse by tempest: whereof Polyxenidas could not take such aduantage as hee had hoped; because, putting to Sea for that purpose, Hee was driuen backe againe by the like foule weather. But the Rhodians, to shew that they were not discouraged, set forth twentie other Gallies: the Romans also with King Eumenes repaired their Fleet; and all of them together, in great brauerie, presented battaile to Polyxenidas before the Hauen of Ephesus. When hee durst not accept it: they went from place to place, attempting many things, as eyther they were entreated by the Rhodians, or perswaded by some appearing hopes of doing good. Yet performed they little or nothing: for that one while they were hindred by stormes at Sea; and another while by strong resistance, made against them at Land.

and Pergamus: and leauing his ſonne Seleucus to beſiege the royall Citie of Pergamus, did with the reſt of his Armie ſpoile the whole Countrey thereabout. Attalus, the brother of King Eumenes, was then in Pergamus; hauing with him no better men to defend the Citie, than were they that lay againſt it. Wherefore hee had reaſon to ſtand in feare; being too much inferiour in number. There came to his aid a thouſand Foot, and an hundred Horſe of the Achæans: old ſouldiors all, and trayned vp vnder Philopœmen; whoſe Scholler, in the Art of war, Diophanes their Commander was. This Diophanes, beholding from the walles of Pergamus, which was an high Towne, the demeanour of the Enemie; began to diſdaine, that ſuch men as they ſhould hold him beſieged. For Seleucus his Armie which was encamped at the hill-foot, ſeeing that none durſt ſallie foorth vpon them, grew ſo careleſſe: as otherwiſe, than by ſpoyling all behind their backes, they ſeemed to forget that they were in an Enemies Countrie. Diophanes therefore ſpake with Attalus: and told him that hee would goe foorth to viſit them. Attalus had no liking to this aduenture; for he ſaid, that the match was nothing equall. But the Achæan would needes haue his will: and iſſuing forth, encamped not farre from the Enemie. They of Pergamus thought him little better than mad. As for the beſiegers; they wondred at firſt what his meaning was: but when they ſaw that he held himſelfe quiet, they made a ieſt of his boldneſſe; and laughed to ſee with what an handfull of men he looked ſo ſtoutly. So they returned vnto their former negligence and diſorders. Which Diophanes perceiuing, Hee commanded all his men to follow him, euen as faſt as they well might: and he himſelfe, with the hundred Horſe, brake out on the ſudden vpon the Station that was next at hand. Verie few of the enemies had their Horſes readie ſaddled, but more few, or none, had the hearts to make reſiſtance: ſo as He draue them all out of their Campe; and chaced them as farre as he might ſafely aduenture, with great ſlaughter of them, and no loſſe of his owne. Hereat all the Citizens of Pergamus (who had couered the wals of the Towne, men and women, to beholde this ſpectacle) were very ioyfull; and highly magnified the vertue of theſe Achæans. Yet would they not therefore iſſue forth of their gates, to helpe the Achæans in doing what remained to bee done. The next day Seleucus encamped halfe a mile further from the Towne, than hee had done before: and againſt him went foorth Diophanes the ſecond time; who quietly reſted awhile in his old Station. When they had ſtaid many houres, looking who ſhould begin: Seleucus, in faire order as he came, withdrew himſelfe toward his lodging that was further off. Diophanes moued not whileſt the Enemie was in ſight: but as ſoone as the ground betweene them hindred the proſpect, he followed them in all haſte, & ſoone ouertaking them with his Horſe, charged them in Rere; ſo as hee brake them, and with all his forces purſued them at the heeles, to their very Trenches. This boldnes of the Achæans, and the baſeneſſe of his owne men, cauſed Seleucus to quit the ſiege, little to his honour. Such being the qualitie of theſe Aſiatiques; Philopœmen had cauſe to tell the Romans, That hee enuied their victorie. For when Antiochus lay feaſting at Chalcis after his marriage, and his ſouldiors betooke themſelues to Riot, as it had beene in a time of great ſecurity: a good man of war might haue cut all their throates, euen as they were tipling in their victualing houſes; which Philopœmen ſaid that he would haue done, had He beene Generall of the Achæans, and not, as he then was, a priuate man.

Antiochus was full of buſines: and turning his care from one thing to another, with a great deale of trauaile, brought almoſt nothing to paſſe. He had beene at Pergamus: into which Eumenes, leauing the Romans, did put himſelfe with a few of his Horſe and light armature. Before Pergamus he left his ſonne as before hath beene ſhewed, and went to Elea: whither hee heard that Æmylius the Roman Admirall was come, to bring ſuccour to Eumenes. There hee made an Ouerture of peace: about which to conſult, Eumenes was ſent for by Æmylius, and came from Pergamus. But when it was conſidered, that no concluſion could be made without the Conſul; this Treatie brake off. Then followed the Ouerthrow newly mentioned;

oned; which causèd Seleucus to giue ouer the siege of Pergamus. Afterwards, foure or fiue Townes of scarce any worth or note were taken by the King: and the Syrian Fleet, being of seuen and thirtie Saile, was beaten by the Rhodian which was of like number. But of this victorie the Rhodians had no great cause to reioyce: for that Hannibal the Carthaginian, who, together with Apollonius a Courtier of Antiochus, was Admirall of the Syrians, did them in manner as great hurt as they could doe to Apollonius; and hauing the victorie taken out of his hand by Apollonius his flight, yet made such a retrait, that the Rhodians durst not farre aduenture vpon him. Now of these Actions which were but as Præfaces vnto the war; the last and greatest was a victorie of the Romans by Sea, against Polyxenidas the Kings Admirall. The battaile was fought by Myonnesus a Promontorie in Asia: where Polyxenidas had with him fourescore and nine Gallies; and fiue of them greater, than any of the Romans. This being all the strength which he could make by Sea: we may note the vanity of those bragges, wherewith Antiochus vanted the last yeere, That his Armada should couer all the shores of Greece. The Romans had eight and fiftie Gallies; the Rhodians, two and twentie: the Roman being the stronger built, and more stoutly manned; the Rhodian more light-timberd and thin planckt, hauing all aduantage of speed, and good Sea-men. Neither forgot they to helpe themselues by the same deuice; with which, fiue of their Gallies had lately escaped from Samos. For with fire in their prowes they ran vpon the Enemie: who declining them for feare, laid open his side: and was thereby in greater danger of being stemmed. After no long fight, the Kings Nauie hoysted saile: and hauing a faire wind, bore away toward Ephesus as fast as they could. Yet fortie of their Gallies they left behind them: whereof thirteene were taken: all the rest burnt or sunke. The Romans and their fellowes lost only two or three ships: but got hereby the absolute Masterie of the Sea.

The report of this misaduenture, may seeme to haue taken from Antiochus all vse of reason. For as if no hope had beene remayning, to defend those places that hee held in Europe: Hee presently with-drew his Garrisons from Lysimachia: which might easily haue been kept, euen till the end of Winter following, and haue reduced the besiegers (if the siege had beene continued obstinately) to termes of great extremitie. He also gaue ouer the siege of Colophon: and laying aside all thought saue onely of defence, drew together all his Armie; and sent for helpe to his father-in-law, King Ariarathes the Cappadocian.

Thus the Roman Consul, without impediment, not onely came to the Hellespont; but had yeelded vnto him all places there, belonging to Antiochus on Europe side. The Fleet was then also in readinesse, to transport him ouer into Asia: where Eumenes had taken such care before, that Hee landed quietly at his owne good ease; euen as if the Countrie had beene his alreadie. The first newes that hee heard of the Enemie, was by an Embassadour that came to sue for peace. This Embassadour declared in his Masters name, That the same things which had hindered him from obtayning peace of the Romans heretofore, did now perswade him, that hee should easily come to good agreement with them. For in all disputations heretofore, Smyrna, Lampsacus, and Lysimachia, had beene the places about which they varied. Seeing therefore the King had now alreadie giuen ouer Lysimachia; and was further purposed, not to striue with the Romans about Lampsacus and Smyrna: what reason was there, why they should neede to trouble him with warre? If it was their desire, that any other Townes vpon the Coast of Asia, not mentioned by them in any former Treaties, should be also set at libertie, or otherwise deliuered into their handes: the King would not refuse to gratifie them therein. Briefly, let them take some part of Asia: so as the bounds, diuiding them from the King, might not bee vncertaine; and it should bee quietly put into their handes. If all this were not enough: the King would likewise beare halfe the Charges, whereat they had beene in this warre. So praying the Romans to hold themselues contented with these good offers, and not to bee too insolent vpon confidence of their fortune; Hee expected their anſwere. Theſe offers which to the Embaſſadour ſeemed ſo great, were iudged by the Romans to be verie little. For they thought it reaſonable, that the King ſhould beare all the charges of the warre, ſince it began through his onely fault: and that He ſhould not onely depart out of thoſe few Townes, which hee held in Æolis and Ionia; but quite out of Aſia the leſſe, and keepe himſelfe on the other ſide of Mount Taurus. When the Embaſſadour therefore ſaw, that no better bargaine could bee made, He dealt with P. Scipio in priuate: and to him he promiſed a great quantitie of gold, together with the free reſtitution of his ſonne; who (it is vncertaine by what miſchance) was taken priſoner, and moſt honourably entertained by the King. Scipio would not hearken to the offer of gold: nor otherwiſe to the reſtitution of his ſonne, than vpon Condition, That it might bee with making ſuch amends for the benefit, as became a priuate man. As for the publike buſineſſe: Hee onely ſaid thus much, That ſince Antiochus had alreadie forſaken Lyſimachia, and ſuffered the warre to take hold on his owne Kingdome; there was now none other way for him, than either to fight, or yeeld to that which was required at his hands. Wherefore, ſaid He, tell your King in my name, that I would aduiſe him to refuſe no Condition whereby he may haue peace.

The King was not any whit moued with this aduice. For ſeeing that the Conſul demanded of him no leſſe, than if hee had beene alreadie ſubdued: little reaſon there was that he ſhould feare to come to battaile; wherein hee could loſe, as hee thought, no more, than by ſeeking to auoid it he muſt giue away. He had with him threeſcore and ten thouſand Foot, and twelue thouſand Horſe; beſides two and fiftie Indian Elephants, and many Chariots armed with hookes or ſythes, according to the manner of the Eaſterne Countries. Yet was hee nothing pleaſed, to heare that the Conſul drew neere him apace, as one haſtning to fight. But howſoeuer hee was affected; Hee made ſo little ſhew of feare, that hearing P. Scipio to lie ſicke at Elæa, He ſent thither vnto him his ſonne without ranſome: as one both deſirous to comfort this noble Warriour in his ſickenes, and withall not deſirous to retaine the yong Gentleman for a pledge of his owne ſafetie. Thus ought his bountie to bee conſtant. Otherwiſe it might be ſuſpected, That herein he dealt craftily. For ſince he could haue none other ranſome of Scipio, than ſuch as an honourable man, that had no great ſtore of wealth, might pay: better it was to doe ſuch a courteſie before the battell, as would afterwards haue beene little worth; than to ſtay vntill the Romans, perhaps victorious, ſhould exact it at his hands. P. Scipio was greatly comforted with the recouerie of his ſonne: ſo as the ioy thereof was thought, to haue beene much auaileable vnto his health. In recompence of the Kings humanitie, He ſaid onely thus much vnto thoſe that brought him this acceptable Preſent, I am now able to make your King none other amends, than by aduiſing him not to fight, vntill hee ſhall heare that I am in the Campe. What he meant by this, it is hard to coniecture. Antiochus reſolued to follow his counſaile: and therefore withdrew himſelfe from about Thyatira, beyond the Riuer of Phrygius or Hyllus, vnto Magneſia by Sipylus: where encamping, He fortified himſelfe as ſtrongly as hee could. Thither followed him L. Scipio the Conſul; and ſate downe within foure miles of him. About a thouſand of the Kings Horſe, moſt of them Gallo-Greekes, came to bid the Romans welcome: of whom at firſt they ſlue ſome; and were anon, with ſome loſſe driuen backe ouer the Riuer. Two dayes were quietly ſpent, whileſt neither the King nor the Romans would paſſe the water. The third day the Romans made the aduenture: wherein they found no diſturbance; nor were at all oppoſed, vntill they came within two miles and an halfe of Antiochus his Campe. There, as they were taking vp their lodging, they were charged by three thouſand Horſe and Foote: whom the ordinarie Corps du gard repelled. Foure dayes together after this, each of them brought foorth their Armies; and ſet them in order before the Trenches, without aduancing any further. The fift day the Romans came halfe way forward, and preſented battaile; which the King would not accept. Thereupon the Con-

ſul tooke aduice what was to bee done. For either they muſt fight vpon whatſoeuer diſaduantage, or elſe reſolue to abide by it all Winter, farre from any Countrey of their friends, and therefore ſubiect vnto many difficulties: vnleſſe they would ſtaine their honour by returning farre backe, to winter in a more conuenient place; and ſo deferre the warre vntill the next Spring. The Roman ſouldier was throughly perſwaded of that Enemies baſe temper. Wherefore it was the generall Crie, that this great Armie ſhould bee aſſailed, euen in the Campe where it lay: as if rather there were ſo many beaſts to be ſlaughtered, than men to bee fought with. Yet a day or two paſſed, in diſcouering the fortifications of Antiochus, and the ſafeſt way to ſet vpon him. All this while P. Scipio came not. Wherefore the King, being loth to diſhearten his men, by ſeeming to ſtand in feare of the Enemie, reſolued to put the matter to triall. So when the Romans tooke the field againe, and ordered their Battailes: He alſo did the like; and aduanced ſo farre, that they might vnderſtand his meaning to fight.

The Roman Armie conſiſted of foure Legions, two Roman and two Latine: in each of which were fiue thouſand and foure hundred men. The Latines, as vſually, were in the points; the Romans, in the maine battell. All of them, according to their wonted forme, were diuided into Maniples. The Haſtati had the leading: after them followed the Principes, at ſuch diſtance as was vſuall; and laſt of all, the Triarij. Now beſide theſe, there were about three thouſand Auxiliaries; partly Achæans; and partly ſuch as belonged to Eumenes: which were placed in an equall Front beyond the Latines in the right wing. Vtmoſt of all (ſaue ſome fiue hundred Cretians, and of the Trallians) were almoſt three thouſand Horſe: of which, Eumenes had brought thither eight hundred; the reſt being Roman. The left wing was fenced by the banke of the riuer: yet foure Troups of horſe were placed there, though ſuch helpe ſeemed in a manner needleſſe. Two thouſand Voluntaries, Macedonians and Thracians, were left to guard the Campe. The Conſul had with him ſixteene African Elephants, which he beſtowed in his Rere: foraſmuch as had they come to fight with thoſe of Antiochus, they onely would haue ſerued to diſcourage his men; as being ſure to be beaten: the Indian being farre the greater, and more couragious beaſts: whereof Antiochus had likewiſe much aduantage in number.

The Kings Armie being compounded of many Nations, diuerſly appointed, and not all accuſtomed to one manner of fight, was ordered according to the ſeuerall kindes, in ſuch wiſe as each might be of moſt vſe. The maine ſtrength of his Foote conſiſted in ſixteene thouſand, armed all Macedonian-like, and called Phalangiers. Theſe Hee placed in the middeſt, and diuided into tenne Battalions: euery one hauing two and thirtie in File, and fiftie in Front. Betweene euery Battalion were two Elephants, goodly beaſts, and ſuch as being adorned with Frontals, high Creſts, Towres on their backes, and beſides him that gouerned the Elephant, foure men in euery Tower, made a gallant and terrible ſhew. On the right hand of theſe were fifteene hundred Horſe of the Gallo-Greekes: then, three thouſand Barbd Horſe: and Regiment of almoſt a thouſand Horſe, called the Agema, that were all Medians, the choice of the Countrie, and accompanied by ſome others. All which Troupes of Horſe, diuided in their ſeuerall kindes, doe ſeeme to haue followed one another in depth, rather than to haue been ſtretched out in Front. Adioyning to theſe, were ſixteene Elephants together in one flocke. A little further to the right hand, was the Kings owne Regiment; called the Argyraſpides, or Siluerſhields, by a name borrowed from their furniture, but nothing like ſo valiant as thoſe of the ſame name, that had ſerued vnder Great Alexander: then, twelue hundred Archers on horſebacke, three thouſand light-armed Foote, two thouſand and fiue hundred Archers of Myſia; with foure thouſand ſlingers and Archers of the Cirtæans, and Elymæans. On the left hand of the Phalangiers, were placed the like numbers of Gallo-Greekes, and Barbd Horſe: as alſo two thouſand Horſe that were ſent from Ariarathes, with two thouſand and ſeuen hundred of diuers Nations, Nations; and a Regiment of a thouſand Horſe more lightly armed, that were called the Kings Troupe, being Syrians, Phrygians, and Lydians. In Front of all theſe Horſe were the Chariots armed with Hooks or Sythes, and the Dromedaries, whereon ſate Arabians with long Rapiers, that would ſerue to reach from thoſe high Camels. Beyond theſe were, as in the right wing, a rabble of many Nations, Carians, Cilicians, Pamphylians, Piſidians, Cyrteans, Elymeans, and many others, hauing alſo with them ſixteene Elephants. Antiochus himſelfe commanded in the right wing: Seleucus in the left: and three of his principall Captaines commaunded ouer the Phalangiers.

The firſt onſet was giuen by the Dromedaries, and armed Chariots: of which the one, being like to terrifie the Horſe; the other, to breake the Squadrons of the Foot; Eumenes with a few light-armed Cretians, Archers, Darters, and Slingers, eaſily made fruſtrate the danger threatned by them both. For with ſhowtings, and noyſes, and ſome wounds, they were driuen out of the field; and running backe vpon their owne men, did the ſame harme which they had intended to the Enemies. Wherefore the Roman Horſe following this aduantage, charged vpon the left wing: where they found no reſiſtance; ſome being out of order; others being without courage. It is ſhamefull to rehearſe, and ſo ſtrange, that it may hardly ſeeme credible: that the Phalangiers, with ſuch varietie of Auxiliaries, made little or no reſiſtance; but all of them fled, in manner, as ſoone as they were charged. Onely the King, Antiochus himſelfe, being in the left wing of his owne battaile: and ſeeing the Latines, that ſtood oppoſite vnto him, weakly flancked with Horſe: gaue vpon them couragiouſly, and forced them to retire. But M. Æmylius, that had the Guard of the Roman Campe, iſſued foorth with all his power to helpe his fellowes: and, what by perſwaſion, what by threats, made them renewe the fight. Succour alſo came from the right wing, where the Romans were alreadie victorious: whereof when Antiochus diſcouered the approch; He not onely turned his Horſe about, but ranne away vpon the ſpur without further tarriance. The Campe was defended a little while: and with no great valour; though by a great multitude that were fled into it. Antiochus is ſaid to haue loſt in this battaile fiftie thouſand Foot, and foure thouſand Horſe; beſides thoſe that were taken. Of the Romans, there were not ſlaine aboue three hundred Foot, and foure and twentie Horſe: of Eumenes his followers fiue and twentie.

Antiochus fled to Sardes, and from thence to Apamea, the ſame night; hearing that Seleucus was gone thither before. He left the cuſtodie of Sardes, and the Caſtle there, to one whom he thought faithfull. But the Townesmen and Souldiors were ſo diſmayed with the greatneſſe of the Ouerthrow; that one mans faith was worth nothing. All the Townes in thoſe parts, without expecting ſummons, yeelded vp themſelues by Embaſſadors: whom they ſent to the Romans, whileſt they were on the way. Neither were many dayes ſpent, ere Antiochus his Embaſſadour was in the Campe: hauing none other errand, than to know what it would pleaſe the Romans to impoſe vpon the King his Maſter. P. Scipio was now come to his brother, who obtained leaue to make the anſwere, becauſe it ſhould be gentle. They required no more than they had lately done: which was, That hee ſhould quite abandon his Dominions on this ſide of Taurus. For their charges in that warre they required fifteene thouſand Talents: fiue hundred in hand; two thouſand and fiue hundred, when the Senate and People of Rome ſhould haue confirmed the peace; and the other twelue thouſand, in twelue yeeres next enſuing by euen portions. Likewiſe they demanded foure hundred Talents for Eumenes; and ſome ſtore of Corne, that was due to him vpon a reckoning. Now beſides twentie hoſtages which they required, very earneſt they were to haue Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thoas the Ætolian, with ſome others who had ſtirred vp the King to this warre, deliuered into their hands. But any wiſe man might ſo eaſily haue perceiued, that it would be their purpoſe to make this one of their principall demaunds; as no great art was needfull to beguile their malice. The Kings Embaſſadour had full commiſſion, to refuſe nothing that ſhould be enjoyned. Wherefore there was no more to doe, than to ſend immediatly to Rome for the ratification of the Peace.

There were new Conſuls choſen in the meane while at Rome, M. Fuluius, and Cn. Manlius Volſo. The Ætolians deſired peace, but could not obtaine it: becauſe they would accept neither of the two Conditions to them before propounded. So it was decreed, That one of the Conſuls ſhould make Warre vpon the Ætolians, the other, vpon Antiochus in Aſia. Now though ſhortly there came newes, that Antiochus was alreadie vanquiſhed in battaile, and had ſubmitted himſelfe vnto all that could be required at his hands: yet ſince the State of Aſia was not like to bee ſo throughly ſettled by one Victorie, but that many things might fall out worthie of the Romans care; Cn. Manlius, to whom Aſia fell by lot, had not his Prouince changed.

Soone after this came the Embaſſadours of King Antiochus to Rome, accompanied with the Rhodians and ſome others: yea by King Eumenes in perſon; whoſe preſence added a goodly luſtre to the buſineſſe in hand. Concerning the peace to be made with King Antiochus, there was no diſputation: it was generally approoued. All the trouble was, about the diſtribution of the purchaſe. King Eumenes reckoned vp his owne deſerts: and comparing himſelfe with Maſaniſſa, hoped that the Romans would bee more bountifull to him than they had beene to the Numidian, ſince they had found him a King indeed, whereas Maſaniſſa was onely ſuch in title; and ſince both he and his father had alwayes beene their friends, euen in the worſt of the Roman fortune. Yet was there much adoe to make him tell what he would haue: He ſtill referring himſelfe to their courteſie; and they deſiring him to ſpeake plaine. At length he craued that they would beſtow vpon him, as much of the Countrie by them taken from Antiochus, as they had no purpoſe to keepe in their owne hands. Neither thought hee it needfull, that they ſhould trouble themſelues with the care of giuing libertie to many of the Greeke Townes, that were on Aſia ſide. For ſince the moſt of thoſe Townes had beene partakers with the King in his Warre; it was no reaſon that they ſhould be gainers by his ouerthrow. The Rhodians did not like of this. They deſired the Senate to be truly Patrons of the Grecian liberty; and to call to minde, that no ſmall part of Greece it ſelfe had beene ſubiect vnto Philip, and ſerued him in his Warre: which was not alleadged againſt them as a cauſe why they ſhould not be made free, after that Philip was ouercome. But the maine point whereon they inſiſted, was this, That the Victory of the Romans againſt King Antiochus was ſo great, as eaſily might ſatisfie the deſires of all their friends. The Senate was glad to heare of this; and very bountifully gaue away ſo much, that euery one had cauſe to be well pleaſed.

Such end had the Warre againſt King Antiochus: after which, L. Cornelius Scipio, returning home, had granted vnto him the honour of a Triumph: the pompe whereof exceeded in riches, not onely that of Titus Quintius Flaminius, but of any ten that Rome had beheld vntill that day. Now foraſmuch as the ſurname of The African had beene giuen vnto P. Scipio, it was thought conuenient by ſome, to reward L. Scipio with the title of The Aſiatick: which the fortune of his Victorie had no leſſe deſerued; though the vertue, requiſite to the purchaſe thereof, was no way correſpondent.

The Ætolians, and the Gallogreekes, vanquiſhed by the Roman Conſuls FVLVIVS and MANLIVS. MANLIVS hardly obtaines a Triumph: being charged (among other obiections) with attempting to haue paſſed the bounds appointed as fatall to the Romans by SIBYL. Of SIBYLS Prophecies; the Bookes of HERMES; and that Inſcription, SIMONI DEO SANCTO. The ingratitude of Rome to the two SCIPIOES: and that beginning and faction among the Roman Nobilitie.

MARC. FVLVIVS and Cn. Manlius had the ſame charge diuided betweene them, which L. Cornelius Scipio, now ſtyled Aſiaticus, had lately vndergone. It was found more than one mans worke, to looke at once to Greece and to Aſia. And for this reaſon was it apparent, that L. Scipio had graunted ſo long a Truce to the Ætolians. But ſince, in this long Interim of Truce, that haughtie little Nation had not ſought to humble it ſelfe to the Roman Maieſtie, it was now to bee brought vnto more lowlie termes than any other of the Greekes. The beſt was, that ſo great a ſtorme fell not vnexpected vpon the Ætolians. They had foreſeene the danger, when their Embaſſadours were vtterly denied peace at Rome: and they had prouided the laſt remedie; which was, to entreat the Rhodians and Athenians to become interceſſours for them. Neither were they ſo deiected, with any terrible apprehenſions, that they could not well deuiſe, euen vpon helping themſelues, by repurchaſe of Countries loſt, where they ſpied aduantage.

Poore King Aminander liued in exile among them, whileſt Philip of Macedon kept, for him, poſſeſſion of his Lands and Caſtles. But the Athamanians (beſides that manie of them bore a naturall affection to their owne Prince) hauing beene long accuſtomed to ſerue a Mountaine Lord, that conuerſed with them after an homelie manner; could not endure the proud and inſolent manner of commaund, vſed by the Captaines of Philip his Garriſons. They ſent therefore ſome few of them to their King, and offered their ſeruice toward his reſtitution. At the firſt there were onely foure of them; neither grew they, at length, to more than two and fiftie, which vndertooke the worke. Yet aſſurance, that all the reſt would follow, made Aminander willing to trie his fortune. He was at the borders with a thouſand Ætolians, vpon the day appointed: at what time his two and fiftie aduenturers hauing diuided themſelues into foure parts, occupied, by the readie aſſiſtance of the multitude, foure the chiefe Townes in the Countrie, to his vſe. The fame of this good ſucceſſe at firſt; with letters running from place to place, whereby men were exhorted to doe their beſt in helping forward the Action, made the Lieutenants of Philip vnable to thinke vpon reſiſtance. One of them held the Towne of Theium a few dayes; giuing thereby ſome leiſure vnto his King to prouide for the reſcue. But when he had done his beſt, he was forced thence; and could onely tell Philip, whom he met on the way, that all was loſt. Philip had brought from home ſix thouſand men; of whom, when the greater part could not hold out, in ſuch a running march, he left all ſaue two thouſand behind him, & ſo came to Atheneum, a little Athamanian Caſtle, that ſtill was his, as being on the frontier of Macedon. Thence he ſent Zeno, who had kept Theium awhile, to take place lying ouer Argithea, that was chiefe of the Countrie. Zeno did as he was appointed: yet neither he, nor the King had the boldneſſe to deſcend vpon Argithea; for that they might perceiue the Athamanians, all along the hill ſides, readie to come downe vpon them, when they ſhould be buſie. Wherefore nothing was thought more honourable than a ſafe retreat: ſpecially when Aminander came in ſight with his thouſand Ætolians. The Macedonians were called back, from-wards Argithea, and preſently withdrawne by their King towards his owne borders. But they were not ſuffered to depart in quiet at their pleaſure.

The Athamanians and Ætolians way-layd them, and purſued them ſo cloſely, that their retreat was in manner of a plaine flight, with great loſſe of men and armes; few of thoſe eſcaping, that were left behind, as to make a countenance of holding ſomewhat in the Countrey, vntill Philip his returne.

The Ætolians, hauing found the buſineſſe of Athamania ſo eaſie, made attempt, in their owne behalfe, vpon the Amphilochians and Aperantians. Theſe had belonged vnto their Nation, and were lately taken by Philip; from whom they diligently reuolted, and became Ætolian againe. The Dolopians lay next; that had been euer belonging to the Macedonian, and ſo did ſtill purpoſe to continue. Theſe tooke armes at firſt: but ſoone layed them away; ſeeing their neighbours readie to fight with them in the Ætolian quarrell, and ſeeing their owne King ſo haſtily gone, as if hee meant not to returne.

Of theſe victories the ioy was the leſſe; for that newes came of Antiochus his laſt ouerthrow, and of M. Fuluius the new Conſul his haſting with an armie into Greece. Aminander ſent his excuſes to Rome, praying the Senate, not to take it in deſpight, that he had recouered his owne from Philip with ſuch helpe as hee could get. Neither ſeemes it that the Romans were much offended to heare of Philip his loſſes: for of this fault they neither were ſharpe correctors, nor earneſt reprouers. Fuluius went in hand with the buſineſſe, about which he came, and layed ſiege to Ambracia, a goodly Citie, that had beene the chiefe ſeate of Pyrrhus his Kingdome. With this hee began; for that it was of too great importance to bee abandoned by the Ætolians: yet could not by them bee relieued, vnleſſe they would aduenture to fight vpon equall ground. To helpe the Ambracians, it was not in the Ætolians power: for they were, at the ſame time, vexed by the Illyrians at ſea, and ready to be driuen from their new conqueſt, by Perſeus the ſonne of Philip, who inuaded the Countries of the Amphilochians and Dolopians. They were vnable to deale with ſo many at once; and therefore as earneſtly ſought peace with the Romans, as they ſtoutly made head againſt the reſt. In the meane while the Athenian and Rhodian Embaſſadors came; who beſought the Conſul to grant them peace. It helped well that Ambracia made ſtrong reſiſtance, and would not be terrified, by any violence of the aſſaylants, or danger that might ſeeme to threaten. The Conſul had no deſire to ſpend halfe his time about one Citie, and ſo be driuen to leaue vnto his ſucceſſor the honour of finiſhing the warre. Wherefore he gladly hearkened vnto the Ætolians, and bade them ſeeke peace with faithfull intent, without thinking it ouer-deare, at a reaſonable price; conſidering with how great a part of his Kingdome their friend Antiochus had made the ſame purchaſe. He alſo gaue leaue to Aminander, offering his ſeruice as a mediatour, to put himſelfe into Ambracia, and trie what good his perſwaſions might doe with the Citizens. So, after many demaunds and excuſes, the concluſion was ſuch, as was grieuous to the weaker, but not vnſufferable. The ſame Embaſſadours of the Athenians and Rhodians accompanied thoſe of the Ætolians to Rome, for procuring the confirmation of Peace. Their eloquence and credit was the more needfull in this interceſſion, for that Philip had made very grieuous complaint about the loſſe of thoſe Countries, which they had lately taken from him. Hereof the Senate could not but take notice; though it hindered not the peace, which thoſe good Mediatours of Rhodes and Athens did earneſtly ſollicite. The Ætolians were bound to vphold the maieſtie of the people of Rome, and to obſerue diuers Articles, which made them leſſe free, and more obnoxious to the Romans, than any people of Greece; they hauing been the firſt that called theſe their Maſters into the Countrie. The Ile of Cephalenia was taken from them by the Romans: who kept it for themſelues (as not long ſince they had gotten Zacynthus from the Achæans, by ſtiffely preſſing their owne right) that ſo they might haue poſſeſſion along the coaſt of Greece, whileſt they ſeemed to forbeare the Countrey. But concerning thoſe places, whereto Philip, or others, might lay claime, there was ſet downe an Order ſo perplexed, as would neceſſarily require require to haue the Romans Iudges of the controuerſies, when they ſhould ariſe. And hereof good vſe will be ſhortly made: when want of employment elſwhere, ſhall cauſe a more Lordly Inquiſition to be held, vpon the affaires of Macedon and Greece.

Cn. Manlius, the other Conſull, had at the ſame time warre in Aſia, with the Gallo-Greekes and others. His Armie was the ſame that had followed L. Scipio; of whoſe victorie, his acts were the conſummation. Hee viſited thoſe Countries on the hither ſide of Taurus, that had ſcarce heard of the Romans; to whom they were abandoned by Antiochus. Among theſe there were ſome pettie Lords, or Tyrants, ſome free Cities, and ſome that were together at warres, without regard of the great alteration hapned in Aſia. From euery of theſe hee got ſomewhat; and by their quarrels found occaſion to viſit thoſe Prouinces, into which hee ſhould elſe haue wanted an errand. He was euen loaden with bootie, when, hauing fetcht a compaſſe about Aſia, he came at length vpon the Gallogreekes. Theſe had long dominiered ouer the Countrie: though of late times, it was rather the fame and terrour of their forepaſſed acts, than any preſent vertue of theirs, which held them vp in reputation. Of the Romans they had lately ſuch triall, when they ſerued vnder King Antiochus, as made them to know themſelues farre the worſe men. Wherefore they thought it no ſmall part of their ſafetie, that they dwelt vpon the Riuer Halys, in an Inland Countrie, where thoſe enemies were not like to ſearch them out. But when ſuch hopes failed; and when ſome Princes of their owne Nation, that had beene friends of Eumenes, exhorted the reſt to yeeld: then was no counſaile thought ſo good, as to forſake their houſes and Countrie, and, with all that they could carrie or driue, to betake themſelues vnto the high mountaines of Olympus and Margana. Theſe mountaines were exceeding hard of aſcent, though none ſhould vndertake the cuſtodie. Being therefore well manned and victuailed for a long time; as alſo the naturall ſtrength being helpt, by ſuch fortification as promiſed greateſt aſſurance: it was thought, that the Conſul would either forbeare the attempt of forcing them, or eaſily be repelled; and that finally, when he had ſtaied there awhile, winter, and much want, ſhould force him to diſlodge. Yet all this auailed not. For whereas the Gallogreekes had beene careleſſe of furniſhing themſelues with caſting weapons, as if the ſtones would haue ſerued well enough to that purpoſe: the Romans, who came farre otherwiſe appointed, found greater aduantage in the difference of armes, than impediment in diſaduantage of ground. Archers and Slingers did eaſily preuaile againſt caſters of ſtones; eſpecially being ſuch as were theſe Gallogreekes, neither exerciſed in that manner of fight, nor hauing prepared their ſtones before-hand, but catching vp what lay next, the too great, and the too little, oftner than thoſe of a fit ſize. Finally, the Barbarians, wanting defenſiue armes, could not hold out againſt the arrowes and weapons of the Roman light armature: but were driuen from a piece of ground, which they had vndertaken to make good, vp into their Campe on the top of the mountaine; and being forced out of their Campe, had none other way left, than to caſt themſelues headlong downe the ſteepe rockes. Few of the men eſcaped aliue: all their wiues, children, and goods became a prey vnto the Romans. In the very like manner, were the reſt of that Nation ouercome ſoone after, at the other mountaine: onely more of them ſaued themſelues by flight, as hauing fairer way at their backes.

Theſe warres being ended: Fuluius and Manlius were appointed, by the Senate, each of them to retaine as Proconſul his Prouince for another yeere. Fuluius, in his ſecond yeere, did little or nothing. Manlius gaue peace to thoſe whom hee had vanquiſhed; as likewiſe to Ariarathes the Cappadocian, and ſome others, not by him vanquiſhed, but ſubmitting themſelues for feare of the Roman armes. Hee drew from them all, what profit he could: and laide vpon them ſuch conditions, as hee thought expedient. He alſo did finiſh the league of peace with Antiochus; whereto he

he ſwore, and receiued the Kings oath by Embaſſadours, whom hee ſent for that purpoſe. Finally hauing ſet in order the matters of Aſia, he tooke his way toward the Helleſpont, loaden with ſpoile, as carrying with him (beſides other treaſures) all that the Gallogreekes had in ſo many yeeres extorted, from the wealthie Prouinces that lay round about them. Neither did this Armie of Manlius returne home, rich in money alone, or cattell, or things of needfull vſe, which the Roman ſouldier had beene wont to take as the only good purchaſe; but furniſhed with ſumptuous houſhold-ſtuffe, and ſlaues of price, excellent Cookes, and Muſicians for banquets, and, in a word, with the ſeedes of that luxurie, which finally ouer-grew and choked the Roman vertue.

The Countrie of Thrace lay betweene Helleſpont and the Kingdome of Macedon, which way Manlius was to take his iourney homeward. L. Scipio had found no impediment among the Thracians: either for that he paſſed through them, without any ſuch bootie as might prouoke them; or perhaps rather, becauſe Philip of Macedon had taken order, that the Barbarians ſhould not ſtirre. But when Manlius came along with an huge traine of baggage; the Thracians could not ſo well containe themſelues. Neither was it thought, that Philip tooke it otherwiſe than verie pleaſantly, to haue this Roman Armie robbed, and well beaten on the way. He had cauſe to be angry; ſeeing how little himſelfe was regarded, and what great rewards were giuen to Eumenes. For he vnderſtood, and afterwards gaue the Romans to vnderſtand, that Eumenes could not haue abidden in his owne Kingdome, if the People of Rome had not made warre in Aſia: whereas contrariwiſe, Antiochus had offered vnto himſelfe three thouſand talents, and fiftie ſhips of warre, to take part with him and the Ætolians; promiſing moreouer to reſtore vnto him all the Greeke Cities, that had beene taken from him by the Romans. Such being the difference betweene him and Eumenes, when the warre began: he thought it no euen dealing of the Romans, after their victorie, to giue away not onely the halfe of Aſia, but Cherſonneſus and Lyſimachia in Europe, to Eumenes; whereas vpon himſelfe they beſtowed not any one Towne. It agreed not indeed with his Nobilitie, to goe to Rome and begge Prouinces in the Senate, as Eumenes and the Rhodians had lately done. He had entertained louingly the two Scipio's, whom he thought the moſt honourable men in Rome; and was growne into neere acquaintance with Publius, holding correſpondence with him by letters, whereby hee made himſelfe acquainted with the warres in Spaine and Africk. This perhaps he deemed ſufficient, to breed in the Romans a due reſpect of him. But Eumenes tooke a ſurer way. For the Scipio's had not the diſpoſing of that which they wanne from Antiochus: as neither indeed had Manlius, nor the ten Delegates aſſiſting him; but the Senate of Rome, by which thoſe Delegates were choſen, and inſtructed how to proceed. When Philip therefore ſaw theſe vpſtart Kings of Pergamus, whom he accounted as baſe companions, aduanced ſo highly, and made greater than himſelfe; yea himſelfe vnregarded, contemned, and expoſed to many wrongs: then found he great cauſe to wiſh, that he had not ſo haſtily declared himſelfe againſt Antiochus, or rather that hee had ioyned with Antiochus and the Ætolians, by whom he might haue beene freed from his inſolent maſters. But what great argument of ſuch diſcontentedneſſe the Macedonian had, we ſhall verie ſhortly be vrged to diſcourſe more at large. At the preſent it was beleeued, that the Thracians were by him ſet on, to aſſaile the Romans paſſing through their Countrie. They knew all aduantages: and they fell, vnexpected, vpon the carriages, that were beſtowed in the midſt of the Armie; whereof part had alreadie paſſed a dangerous wood, through which the baggage followed; part was not yet ſo farre aduanced. There was enough to get, and enough to leaue behind: though both the getting, and the ſauing, did coſt many liues, as well of the Barbarians as of the Romans. They fought vntill it grew night: and then the Thracians withdrew themſelues; not without as much of the bootie, as was to their full content. And of ſuch trouble there was more, though leſſe dangerous, before the Armie could get out of Thrace into Macedon. Through the Kingdome they had a faire march into Epirus; and ſo to Apollonia, which was their handle of Greece.

To Manlius, and to Fuluius, when each of them returned to the Citie, was granted the honour of Triumph. Yet not without contradiction: eſpecially to Manlius; whom ſome of the ten Delegates, appointed to aſſiſt him, did very bitterly taxe, as an vnworthie Commander. Touching the reſt of their accuſation; it ſufficeth that he made good anſwere, and was approoued by the chiefe of the Senate. One clauſe is worthie of more particular conſideration. Reprehending his deſire to haue hindred the peace with Antiochus; they ſaid, That with much adoe he was kept from leading his Armie ouer TAVRVS, and aduenturing vpon the calamitie threatned by SYBYLS verſes, vnto thoſe that ſhould paſſe the fatall bounds. What calamitie or ouerthrow this was, wherewith Sibyls prophecie threatned the Roman Captaine or Armie, that ſhould paſſe ouer Taurus, I doe not conceiue. Pompey was the firſt, that marched with an Armie beyond thoſe limits: though the victories of Lucullus had opened vnto him the way, and had before-hand wonne, in a ſort, the Countries on the other ſide of the Mount; which Lucullus gaue to one of Antiochus his race, though Pompey occupied them for the Romans. But wee finde not, that either Lucullus or Pompey ſuffered any loſſe, in preſuming to neglect the bounds appointed by Sibyl. Indeed the accompliſhment of this prophecie, fell out neere about one time, with the reſtitution of Ptolemie King of Ægypt; that was forbidden vnto the Romans by the ſame Sibyl. It may therefore ſeeme to haue had reference vnto the ſame things, that were denounced, as like to happen vpon the reduction of the Ægyptian King. Whether the Oracles of Sibyl had in them any truth, and were not, as Tullie noteth, ſowed at randome in the large field of Time, there to take root, and get credit by euent; I will not here diſpute. But I hold this more probable, than that the reſtitution of Ptolemie to his Kingdome by Gabinius the Roman, ſhould haue any way betokened the comming of our Sauiour: as ſome both ancient and moderne Chriſtian Writers haue beene well pleaſed to interprete Sibyl in that prophecie. Of the Sibylline prædictions I haue ſometimes thought reuerendly: though not knowing what they were (as I thinke, few men know) yet following the common beleefe and good authoritie. But obſeruation of the ſhamefull Idolatrie, that vpon all occaſions was aduanced in Rome by the bookes of Sibyl, had well preuailed vpon my credulitie, and made mee ſuſpect, though not the faith and pious meaning, yet the iudgement of Euſebius: when that learned and excellent worke of Maſter Caſaubon vpon the Annales of Cardinall Baronius, did altogether free mee from mine errour; making it apparent, That not onely thoſe prophecies of Sibyl, wherein Chriſt ſo plainely was foreſhewed, but euen the bookes of Heirmes, which haue borne ſuch reputation, were no better than counterfeited pieces, and at firſt entertained (whoſoeuer deuiſed them) by the vndiſcreet zeale of ſuch, as delighted in ſeeing the Chriſtian Religion ſtrengthned with forreine proofes. And in the ſame ranke, I thinke, wee ought to place that notable Hiſtorie, reported by Euſebius from no meane Authors, Of the honour which was done to Simon Magus in Rome; namely, of an Altar to him erected, with an inſcription, Simoni Deo Sancto, that is, To Simon the holy God. For what can be more ſtrange, than that a thing ſo memorable, and ſo publike, ſhould haue beene quite omitted by Tacitus, by Suetonius, by Dion, and by all which wrote of thoſe times? Philoſophers and Poets would not haue ſuffered the matter to eſcape in ſilence, had it beene true; neither can it be thought that Seneca, who then liued and flouriſhed, would haue abſtained from ſpeaking any word of an Argument ſo famous. Wherefore I am perſwaded, that this inſcription, Simoni Deo Sancto, was, by ſome bad Criticiſme, taken amiſſe in place of SEMONI SANCO: a title foure hundred yeeres older than the time of Simon Magus. For the goods of one Vitruuius a Rebell, had many ages before beene conſecrated SEMONI SANCO, that is, To the Spirit or Demi-god Sangus, in whoſe Chappell they were beſtowed. So as either by the ill ſhape of the old Roman letters, letters, or by some spoile that Time had wrought vpon them; it might easily come to passe, that the words should bee misse-read, SIMONI SANCTO, and that some Christian who had heard of Simon Magus, but not of Sangus, thereupon should frame the coniecture, which now passeth for a true Historie. Such coniectures, being entertained without examination, finde credit by Tradition, whereby also, many times, their fashion is amended, and made more Historicall, than was conceiued by the Authour. But it cannot be safe, to let our faith (which ought to stand firme vpon a sure foundation) leane ouer-hardly on a well painted, yet rotten, post.

Now concerning the Triumph of Cn. Manlius, it may be numbred among a few of the richest, which euer the Citie beheld. Out of that which hee brought into the Treasurie, was made the last paiment of those monies which the Common-wealth had borrowed from priuate men, in the second Punicke warre. So long was it, that Rome had still some feeling of Hannibal: which being past, there was remaining neither care, nor memorie, of any danger. This Triumph of Manlius was deferred by him, euen as long as hee well could: for that he thought it not safe, to make his entrance into the Citie, vntill the heat of an Inquisition, then raging therein, should be allayed. The two Scipio's were called, one after other, into iudgement, by two Tribunes of the people; men, onely by this accusation, knowne to Posteritie. P. Scipio the African, with whom they began, could not endure that such vnworthy men should question him, of purloining from the Common Treasury, or of being hired with bribes by Antiochus, to make an ill bargaine for his Countrey. When therefore his day of answere came; hee appeared before the Tribunes, not humbly as one accused, but followed by a great traine of his friends and Clients, with which he passed through the middest of the Assembly, and offered himselfe to speake. Hauing audience, hee told the People, That vpon the same day of the yeere hee had fought a great battell with Hannibal, and finished the Punicke Warre, by a signall victory. In memory whereof, hee thought it no fit season to brabble at the Law; but intended to visit the Capitoll, and there giue thankes to Iupiter, and the rest of the gods, by whose grace, both on that day and at other times, hee had well and happily discharged the most weighty businesse of the Common-wealth. And hereto hee inuited with him all the Citizens: requesting them, That if euer since the seuenteenth yeere of his life, vntill he now grew old, the honourable places by them conferred vpon him, had preuented the capacitie of his age, and yet his deserts had exceeded the greatnesse of those honourable places; then would they pray, that the Princes and great ones of their Citie might still bee like to him. These words were heard with great approbation: so as all the people, euen the Officers of the Court, followed Scipio; leauing the Tribunes alone, with none about them, excepting their owne slaues and a Crier, by whom ridiculously they cited him to iudgement, vntill for very shame, as not knowing what else to doe, they granted him, vnrequested, a further day. After this, when the African perceiued that the Tribunes would not let fall their suit, but enforce him to submit himselfe to a disgracefull triall: hee willingly relinquished the Citie, and his vnthankefull Romans, that could suffer him to vndergoe so much indignitie. The rest of his time hee spent at Liternum: quietly, with a few of his inward friends, and without any desire of seeing Rome againe. How many yeeres he liued, or whether he liued one whole yeere, in this voluntarie banishment; it is vncertaine. The report of his dying in the same yeere, with Hannibal and Philopœmen, as also of his priuate behauiour at Liternum, render it probable, that he out-liued the Tribuneship of his accusers; who meant to haue drawne him backe to his answere, if one of their Colleagues (as one of them had power to hinder all the rest from proceeding) had not caused them to desist. Howsoeuer it was; the same Tribunes went more sharply to worke with L. Scipio the Asiatique. They propounded a Decree vnto the People, touching monie receiued of Antiochus, and not brought into the common Treasury; That the Senate ſhould giue charge vnto one of the Prætors, to inquire, and iudicially determine, thereof. In fauour of this Decree, an Oration was made by Cato, the ſuppoſed author of theſe contentions, and inſtigator of the Tribunes. He was a man of great, but not perfect, vertue; temperate, valiant, and of ſingular induſtrie; frugall alſo, both of the publike, and of his owne; ſo as in this kinde hee was euen faultie: for though hee would not be corrupted with bribes, yet was he vnmercifull and vnconſcionable, in ſeeking to increaſe his owne wealth, by ſuch meanes as the Lawe did warrant. Ambition was his vice; which being poyſoned with enuie, troubled both himſelfe and the whole Citie, whileſt hee liued. His meane birth cauſed him to hate the Nobility, eſpecially thoſe that were in chiefe eſtimation. Neither did he ſpare to bite at ſuch as were of his owne ranke, men raiſed by deſert, if their aduancement were like to hinder his: but lately before this, when Glabrio, whoſe Lieutenant hee had been at Thermopylæ, was his Competitor for the Cenſorſhip, and likely to carrie it, hee tooke an Oath againſt him, which was counted as no better than malicious periurie, That he had not brought into the common Treaſurie ſome veſſels of gold and ſiluer, gotten in the Campe of Antiochus. Now the hatred which he bare vnto the Scipioes grew partly, (beſides his generall ſpight at the Nobilitie) from his owne firſt riſing, wherein hee was countenanced by Fabius Maximus, who brooked not the African; partly from ſome checke, that was giuen vnto himſelfe, in the African voyage, by P. Scipio, whoſe Treaſurer he then was. For when Cato did vtter his diſlike of the Conſuls bad husbandry (iudging Magnificence to be no better) in ſome peremptory manner; Scipio plainely told him, That he had no neede of ſuch double diligence in his Treaſurer. Wherefore, either not caring what lies hee publiſhed, or for want of iudgement, thinking vnworthily of the vertue that was farre aboue him, Cato filled Rome with vntrue reports againſt his Generall; whoſe noble deedes confuted ſufficiently the author of ſuch falſe tales. And thus began the hatred: which being not regarded nor thought vpon by the Scipioes, whileſt it was nouriſhed by their enemie, brake out vpon aduantage, eſpecially againſt L. Scipio, his brother being dead, or out of the way. A ſeuere inquirie and iudgement being appointed of purpoſe againſt Scipio, matters were ſo carried, that he was ſeene condemned in a ſumme of money, farre exceeding his abilitie to pay. For non payment, his bodie ſhould haue beene layd vp in priſon: but from this rigour of the Law hee was freed by Tiberius Gracchus, the ſame Tribune who had cauſed the ſuite againſt the African to be let fall. In his eſtate, which was confiſcated to the vſe of the Citie, when there neither appeared any ſigne of his hauing been beholding to Antiochus, nor was found ſo much as what he had beene condemned to pay; then fell his accuſers, and all whoſe hands had been againſt him, into the indignation of the People. But for this was L. Scipio no whit the better. His kinred, friends, and Clients made ſuch a collection for him, as would haue ſet him in better eſtate than before, if he had accepted it. Hee tooke no more than ſuch of his owne goods, as were of neceſſary vſe, being redeemed for him by his neereſt friends.

Senate

And thus began the ciuill warre of the Tongue, in the Roman pleadings: which had either not beene, or not beene much regardable, vntill now, ſince the Punicke Warre. Securitie of danger from abroad, and ſome want of ſufficient employment, were eſpeciall helpes to the kindling of this fire; which firſt caught hold vpon that great Worthy, to whoſe vertue Rome was indebted, for changing into ſo great ſecuritie her extreme danger. But theſe factious contentions did no long while containe themſelues within heat of words, and cunning practice. For when the Art of leading the multitude, in ſuch quarrelſome buſineſſe, grew to perfection, they that found themſelues ouer-matched by their aduerſaries, at this kinde of weapon, began to make oppoſition, firſt with clubbes and ſtones, afterward with ſwords; and finally, proceeded from frayes and murders in the ſtreets, vnto battaile in the open field. Cornelia, daughter of Scipio the African, a Ladie of rare vertue, that in honour of her two ſonnes was more commonly named Mother of the Gracchi, Gracchi, saw those her two sonnes, whilest they were but yong, slaughtered in Rome, together with some of their friends, by those whom they opposed, and their death not reuenged by order of Law, but rather approued by the Senate. At these times the Senatours began to take vpon them authoritie, more than was to them belonging. They conferred vpon the Consuls all the whole power of the Citie, vnder this forme, Let the Consuls prouide, that the Commonweale receiue no detriment. By this Decree of theirs, and by their proclaiming any Citizen enemie to the State, they thought to haue woon a great aduantage ouer the multitude. But after the death of C. Gracchus, and of Saturninus a popular man, whom by such authority they did put out of the way; it was not long ere Marius, a famous Captaine of theirs, was so condemned, who by force of armes returned into the Citie, and murdered all the principall Senatours: whereupon began the ciuill warres; which giuing vnto Sylla, who preuailed therein, meanes to make himselfe absolute Lord of Rome, taught Cæsar, a man of higher spirit, to affect and obtaine the like soueraigne power, when by the like Decree of the Senate hee was prouoked. It is true, that neuer any Consul had finally cause to rejoyce, of his hauing put in execution such authoritie to him committed by the Senate. But as the furie of the multitude, in passing their Lawes, by hurling of stones, and other violence, made the Citie stand in neede of a Soueraigne Lord: so the vehemencie of the Senate, in condemning as enemies those that would not submit themselues, when they were ouer-topped by voyces in the House, did compell Cæsar, or giue him at least pretence, to right himselfe by armes: wherewith preuailing against his aduersaries, hee tooke such order, that neither Senate, nor People, should thenceforth be able to doe him wrong. So by intestine discord, the Romans consuming all or most of their principall Citizens, lost their owne freedome, and became subiects vnto the arbitrarie gouernment of One: suffering this change in three generations, after this beginning of their insolent rule, wherein they tooke vpon them as the highest Lords on Earth, to doe euen what they listed. Yet had not Rome indeed attained hitherto vnto compleat greatnesse, nor beleeued of her selfe as if she had, whilest a King sate crowned on the Throne of Alexander, continuing and vpholding the reputation of a former Empire. Wherefore this consummation of her honour was thought vpon betimes. How it was effected, the sequele will discouer.

CHAP. VI.
The second Macedonian Warre.

§. I.

The Condition wherein those Princes and Estates remained, which were associates of the Romans, when the warre with ANTIOCHVS was finished. The Romans quarrell with PHILIP. They deale insolently with the Achæans. The Macedonian, being vnreadie for warre, obtaines peace at Rome, by his sonne DEMETRIVS; of whom thencefoorth hee becomes iealous.

AFTER the ouerthrow of Antiochus, although Philip of Macedon, Eumenes King of Pergamus, the Commonweale of the Achæans, and all other the States of Greece, were gouerned by the same Lawes and Magistrates, as they formerly had beene, before the arriuall of the Romans in those parts: yet in verie truth (the publike declaration excepted) they were none other than absolute vassalls to the People of Rome. For of those fiue Prerogatiues belonging to a Monarch, or vnto Soueraigne power, in whomsoeuer ſoeuer it reſt; namely, To make Lawes, To create Magiſtrates, To arbitrate Peace and Warre, To beate Monie, and to reſerue (as the French call it) le dernier reſort, or the laſt Appeales, the Romans had aſſumed foure; and the greateſt of them ſo abſolutely, that is, The Appeale, or laſt reſort, as euery pettie iniurie offered to each other by the fore-named Kings or States, was heard and determined either by the Roman Embaſſadours, or Commiſſioners, in thoſe places whence the Complaint came, or otherwiſe by the Senatours themſelues within Rome: from whoſe arbitrement, or direction, if either King, or Common-weales, declined, He or they were beaten, and enforced to obedience; or had their Eſtates and Regalities vtterly diſſolued. Neuertheleſſe it is true, that they had their owne Lawes, and Officers of their owne ordaining: yet ſo, as neither their Lawes were of force, when the Romans interpoſed their will to the contrary; neither was their election of Magiſtrates ſo free, as that they had not therein eſpeciall regard vnto the good pleaſure of theſe their Maſters.

And to ſuch degree of ſeruitude the ſeuerall Eſtates of Greece did bow verie gently: either as being thankefull for their deliuerance from a yoke more ſenſibly grieuous; or, as being skilfull in the Art of flattery, and therein taking delight, ſince therein conſiſted their chiefe hope of thriuing; or, as being more fearefull of diſpleaſing the ſtrongeſt, than mindfull of their owne honour. But Eumenes liuing further off, and being moſt obſequious vnto the Romans, was not, of long time, queſtioned about any of his doings: his conformitie vnto them in matter of warre and peace, together with the diuerſion of their thoughts another way, giuing him leaue to vſe his owne euen as he liſted, vntill they ſhould otherwiſe diſpoſe of him. Neither was it a little auaileable to him, that his Kingdome bordered vpon the Nations, by them not throughly ſubdued. For vpon the ſame reaſon (as well as vpon his owne high deſerts) were they very loning vnto Maſaniſſa, and to his Houſe, vntill Carthage was ruined, and their Dominion ſettled in Africk: as likewiſe afterwards to the Kings of Mauritania, Cappadocia, and others: holding people in ſubiection vnto themſelues, by the miniſterie of Kings; eſpecially of ſuch Kings, as were vſefull and obſequious vnto them.

Now the Macedonian was of a more noble temper; and ſhewed himſelfe not forgetfull of his owne former greatneſſe, the honour of his race, or the high reputation of his Kingdome. But ſuch magnanimitie was none otherwiſe conſtrued by the Romans, than as want of due reuerence to their Eſtate, and a valuation of himſelfe againſt them: which, in the pride of their fortune, they could not endure. Wherefore, notwithſtanding that hee had lately giuen paſſage to their Armies through his Country, prepared the waies for them, and furniſhed them both with victuals, and other things needfull, to tranſport them ouer the Helleſpont into Aſia, againſt Antiochus: yet vpon the complaint of Eumenes, and the States of Theſſalie and Thrace, hee was commaunded to abandon the Cities of Ænus and Maronea, with all Pieces and Places demaunded by any of his neighbours; whereof many of them hee had lately conquered, by direction, or licence, euen from the Romans themſelues.

Theſe Townes of Ænus and Maronea had beene part of Lyſimachus his Kingdome: who from Thrace Northwards, and to the Northweſt, extended his dominion very farre. He is thought to haue made himſelfe Lord of Tranſyluania: in which Prouince it is ſaid, * That innumerable Medals of gold haue beene found, in the age of our grandfathers, each of them weighing two or three crownes, and ſtamped with his Image on the one ſide, on the other ſide with Victorie. Of all theſe Lordſhips the poſſeſſion, or rather the title (for he liued not to ſettle his eſtate in Europe) fell to Seleucus Nicator by right of warre, whercin he vanquiſhed and ſlue Lyſimachus: as alſo, by the like right, Ptolomie Ceraunus thought them his owne, when he had murdered Seleucus. But the inundation of the Gaules, which the Kingdome of Macedon could not ſuſtaine, did ſhortly and eaſily waſh away from that Crowne, together with the more part of Thrace, all those heapes of land newly thereto annexed. Somewhat of this was afterwards regained by Antigonus the sonne of Demetrius, and his successours: though not much; for they were otherwise busied. The furie of the Gaules being ouer-past, those Countries which lately had beene oppressed by them, recouered their libertie; and not only held it, but learned, some of them, especially the Dardanians and wilde Thracians, to find their aduantages, and make vse of them, euen vpon Macedon. Against the mischiefes commonly done by these, King Philip did prouide the most conuenient remedies: by shutting vp the wayes, whereby the Dardanians might enter into his Kingdome; and by occupying Lysimachia, with some other Townes in Thrace, which he fortified, as Bulwarkes of his owne Countrey, against the Barbarians. Now, although it behoued him thus to doe, for the defence of his owne estate: yet forasmuch as these Townes were, in a manner, at absolute libertie, his possession of them was thought to partake more of violence than of justice. And in this respect he was formerly accused by the Ætolians, of wrongfull vsurpation and oppression, in his hauing occupied Lysimachia. Hereto he made a good answere, That his Garrison did only saue it from the Thracians: who, as soone as hee thence withdrew his men, did seize vpon the Towne, and ruine it. The like perhaps he might haue said, touching Ænus and Maronea; That they were places vnable to defend themselues, and Gates, by which the Barbarians might haue entrance into his Kingdome. But this Plea had not auayled him, in the disputation about Lysimachia: and in the present question, the Romans were not without their owne title; since Antiochus had gotten all the Countrie thereabout, whilest Philip was busied in his former warre: and since they, by their victorie had gotten vnto themselues all the title, which Antiochus thereto could pretend. Wherefore he onely submitted his right vnto the good pleasure of the Senate: referring it vnto their disposition, Whether Ænus and Maronea should be set at libertie, whether left in his hand, or whether bestowed vpon Eumenes; who begged them, as an appendix to Lysimachia and Chersonesus, that were alreadie his by their gift. What they would determine, he might easily perceiue, by the demeanour of their Embassadors towards him: who sitting as Iudges betweene him and all that made complaint vpon him, gaue sentence against him in euery controuersie. Neuertheless, he sent Embassadours to Rome, there to maintaine his right vnto these Townes; wherein he thought, that equitie (if it might preuaile) was wholly on his side. For he had holpen their Consuls in the warre against Antiochus and the Ætolians: wherein whatsoeuer he had gotten for himselfe, was now taken from him by their Embassadours: and would they now depriue him of those two Townes, lying so fitly for the guard of his Kingdome, which he had gotten to himselfe out of the ruines of Antiochus, like as out of his owne ruines Antiochus had gotten in those quarters a great deale more? By such allegations either hee was likely to preuaile, or at leastwise to gaine time, wherein he might bethinke himselfe what hee had to doe. It was not long ere he had word from Rome, That the Senate were no more equall to him, than had beene their Embassadours. Wherefore, considering how insolently the Maronites had behaued themselues, in pleading against him for their libertie, hee tooke counsell of his owne passions; and (as by nature hee was verie cruell) gaue order to Onomastus, that was Warden of the Sea-coasts, to handle these Maronites in such sort, as they might haue little joy of the libertie by them so earnestly desired. Onomastus employed Cassander, one of the Kings men dwelling in Maronea, and willed him to let in the Thracians by night, that they might sacke the Towne, and vse all cruelties of warre. This was done, but so ill taken by the Roman Embassadours, who had better notice, than could haue beene feared, of these proceedings; that the King was by them directly charged with the crime, and called more strictly, than became his Majestie, to an accompt. He would haue remooued the blame from himselfe, and layed it euen vpon the Maronites; affirming, That they, in heat of their Factions, being some inclinable

to him, other some to Eumenes, had fallen into such outrage, that they had cut one anothers throates. And hereof he willed the Embassadours to enquire, among the Maronites themselues: as well knowing, that they who suruiued, were either his owne friends; or so terrified and amazed by the late execution of his vengeance among them, that they durst not vtter an offensiue word. But he found the Romans more seuere, and more throughly informed in the businesse, than to rest contented with such an answere. He was plainely told, that if he would discharge himselfe of the crime obiected; he must send Onomastus and Cassander to Rome, there to bee examined as the Senate should thinke fit. This did not a little trouble him. Yet he collected his spirits, and said, that Cassander should bee at their disposition: but concerning Onomastus, who had not beene at Maronea, nor neere to it, he requested them not to presse him; since it stood not with his honour, so lightly to giue away his friends. As for Cassander, because he should tell no tales; hee tooke order to haue him poisoned by the way. By this we see, that the doctrine, which Machiauel taught vnto Cæsar Borgia, to employ men in mischieuous actions, and afterwards to destroy them when they haue performed the mischiefe; was not of his owne inuention. All ages haue giuen vs examples of this goodly policie, the later hauing beene apt schollers in this lesson to the more ancient: as the reigne of Henry the eighth here in England, can beare good witnesse; and therein especially the Lord Cromwell, who perished by the same vniust Law that himselfe had deuised, for the taking away of another mans life.

Such actions of Philip made an vnpleasant noise at Rome, and were like to haue brought vpon him the warre which he feared, before he was ready to entertaine it. Wherefore he employed his yonger sonne Demetrius as Embassadour vnto the Senate: giuing him instructions, how to make answere to all complaints; and withall to deliuer his owne grieuances, in such wise that if ought were amisse, yet might it appeare that he had beene strongly vrged to take such courses. The summe of his Embassage was, to pacifie the Romans, and make all euen for the present. Demetrius himselfe was knowne to be very acceptable vnto the Senate; as hauing been well approued by them, when he was hostage in Rome: and therefore seemed the more likely, to preuaile somewhat; were it onely in regard that would bee borne vnto his person.

Whilest this businesse with the Macedonian hung in suspense, and whilest he, by his readinesse to make submission, seemed likely to diuert from himselfe some other way the Roman armes: the same Embassadours, that had beene Iudges betweene him and his neighbours, made their progresse through the rest of Greece; and tooke notice of the controuersies, which they found betweene some Estates in the Countrey. The greatest cause that was heard before them, was the complaint of the banished Lacedæmonians against the Achæans. It was obiected vnto the Achæans, That they had committed a grieuous slaughter vpon many Citizens of Lacedæmon: That vnto this cruelty they had added a greater, in throwing downe the walles of the Citie: as also further, in changing the Lawes, and abrogating the famous Institutions of Lycurgus. Hereto Lycortas, then Prætor of the Achæans, made answere, That these banished Lacedæmonians, who now tooke vpon them to accuse the Nation that had once protected them, were notoriously knowne to bee the men, who had themselues committed that murder, whereof shamelesly they laid the blame vpon others: the Achæans hauing onely called those vnto iudgement, that were supposed to be chiefe authors of a Rebellion against both them and the Romans; and these plaintifes hauing slaine them, vpon priuate, though iust hatred, as they were comming to make answere for themselues. Concerning their throwing downe the walles of Lacedæmon, hee said it was most agreeable to Lycurgus his ordinance: who, hauing perswaded his Citizens to defend their Towne and libertie by their proper vertue, did inhibite vnto them all kindes of fortifications; as the Retraits and Nests either of Cowards, or (whereof Lacedæmon had wofull experience) of Tyrants and Vsurpers. Further he shewed, how the same Tyrants that had built these wals, and hemmed in the Spartans, had also quite abolished Lycurgus his ordinances; and gouerned the Citie by their owne lawlesse will. As for the Achæans; they communicated their owne Lawes, which they held for the best, or else would soone change them and take better, vnto the Lacedæmonians; whom they found without Lawes, or any tolerable forme of policie. For conclusion, Lycortas plainly told App. Claudius the chiefe of the Embassadours, That hee and his Countrimen held it strange, being friends and faithfull Allies of the Romans, to see themselues thus constrained, to answere and giue account of their actions; as vassals and slaues vnto the People of Rome. For if they were indeed at libertie: why might not the Achæans as well require to bee satisfied aboue that which the Romans had done at Capua, as the Romans did busie themselues, to take account how things went at Lacedæmon? For if the Romans would stand vpon their greatnesse, and intimate, as they began, that the libertie of their friends was nothing worth, longer than should please themselues to ratifie it: then must the Achæans haue recourse vnto those Agreements, that were confirmed by oath, and which without periurie could not be violated; as reuerencing, and indeede fearing the Romans, but much more, the immortall gods. To this bold answere of Lycortas, Appius found little to reply. Yet taking state vpon him, he pronounced more like a Master than a Iudge, That if the Achæans would not be ruled by faire meanes, and earne thanks whileſt they might; they should be compelled with a mischiefe, to doe what was required at their hands, whether they would or no. This altercation was in the Parliament of the Achæans; which groned to heare the Lordly words of Appius. Yet Feare preuailed aboue Indignation: and it was permitted vnto the Romans to doe as they listed. Hereupon the Embassadours restored some banished and condemned men: but the Roman Senate, very soone after, did make void all Iudgements of death or banishment, that had beene laid by the Achæans vpon any Citizen of Lacedæmon; as likewise they made it a matter of disputation, whether or no the Citie and Territory of Lacedæmon, should bee suffered to continue a member of the Achæan Common-wealth; or taken from them, and made as it had beene an Estate by it selfe. By bringing such a matter into question, the Romans well declared, That they held it to depend vpon their owne will, how much or how little any of their confederates should be suffered to enioy: though by contributing Sparta to the Councell of Achaia, they discouered no lesse, as to them seemed, the loue which they bare vnto the Achaians, than the power which they had ouer them.

Into such slauerie had the Greekes, and all Kings and Common-weales whatsoeuer, bordering vpon any part of the Mediterran Seas, reduced themselues; by calling in the Romans to their succour. They wanted not the good counsaile and perswasions of many wise and temperate men among them; They had also the examples of the Italians, Spaniards, Gaules, and Africans, all subdued by the Romans, and, by seeking Patronage, made meere vassals; to instruct them, what in the like case they should expect: yet could not the true reasons of Estate and Policie so preuaile with them, but their priuate passions, and neighbouring hatred, which hath euermore bought reuenge at the price of selfe-ruine, brought them from the honour which they enioyed, of being free Princes and Cities, into most base and fearefull seruilitie.

All this made well for Philip of Macedon: who though he saw the Greekes very farre from daring to stirre against those, by whom both hee and they were kept in awe; yet was he not without hope, that (few of them excepted, whom the Romans by freeing from his subiection had made his implacable enemies) in heartie affection all the Countrie would be his, whensoeuer he should take armes, as shortly lie he was like to doe. Young Demetrius, comming home from Rome, brought with him the deſired ratification of peace; though qualified with much indignitie ſoone following. Hee had beene louingly vſed at Rome, and heard with great fauour in the Senate. There being confounded with the multitude of obiections, whereto his youth, vnskilfull in the Art of wrangling, could not readily make anſwere: it was permitted vnto him, to reade ſuch briefe notes as hee had receiued from his Father, and out of thoſe the Senate were contented to gather ſatisfaction; more for Demetrius his owne ſake, as they then ſaid and wrote into Macedon, than for any goodneſſe in the defence. Such pride of theirs, in remitting his faults at the entreatie of his ſonne, together with ſome inſolence of his ſonne, growing (as appeared) from this fauour of the Romans; did increaſe in Philip his hatred vnto Rome, and breed in him a iealouſie of his too forward ſonne. To ſet him forward in theſe paſſions, there came daily new Embaſſadours from Rome; ſome bringing one commandement; ſome another; and ſome, requiring him to fulfill thoſe things, which had beene impoſed vpon him by their fore-goers. Neither were there wanting that obſerued his countenance: and when hee had fulfilled all that was required at his hands; yet laid it to his charge that hee had done things vnwillingly, and would be obedient, no longer than he needs muſt. With theſe Embaſſadours young Demetrius was conuerſant: rather perhaps out of ſimplicitie, and for that they made much of him, than for any ambitious reſpect; yet a great deale more than was pleaſing to his father. So the rumour grew current through all Macedon, That Perſeus, the elder ſonne of the King, ſhould not ſucceed vnto his father; but that the Diademe ſhould bee conferred vpon Demetrius, if not by ſome other pretence, yet by meere fauour of the Romans. This offended not onely Perſeus, but Philip himſelfe: who ſuſpected his yonger ſonne, as more Roman than his owne; and accordingly miſconſtrued all his doings. But ere we proceed vnto the bitter fruits of this iealouſie; it will not be amiſſe, to ſpeake of ſome memorable accidents that were in the meane time.

§. II.

The death of PHILOPŒMEN, HANNIBAL, and SCIPIO. That the militarie profeſſion is of all other the moſt vnhappie: notwithſtanding ſome examples, which may ſeeme to proue the contrarie.

THE Romans, wanting other matter of quarrell in the Continent of Greece, had of late beene ſo peremptorie with the Achæans; that they ſeemed not vnlikely to take part againſt them, in any controuerſie that ſhould be moued. Hereupon the Meſſenians, who againſt their will were annexed vnto the Achæan Common-wealth, hauing long beene of a contrarie Faction thereto; grew bold to withdraw themſelues from that Societie, with purpoſe to ſet vp againe an Eſtate of their owne, ſeuered from communion with any other. This was the deuice of ſome that were powerfull in their Citie: who finding the multitude onely inclinable to their purpoſe, and not ouer-ſtrongly affected in the buſineſſe; were carefull to ſeeke occaſion of reducing things to ſuch paſſe, that all their Citizens might be entangled in a neceſſitie of ſtanding out, and of not returning to the Achæan League. And hereupon they began to doe ſome acts of hoſtilitie; whereby it was probable that bloud ſhould bee drawne, and either ſide ſo farre exaſperated, that little hope of agreement would be left. Vpon the fame of their commotion and proceedings; Philopœmen, then Prætor of the Achæans, leuied ſuch forces as hee could in haſte, and went againſt them. Many principall Gentlemen of the Achæans, eſpecially of the Megalopolitans, were ſoone in a readineſſe to wait vpon him. Beſides theſe, which were all, or for the most part, Horse; he had some Auxiliaries out of Thrace and Crete, that vsually were kept in pay. Thus accompanied, he met with Dinocrates, Captaine of the Messenians; whom hee charged, and forced to runne. But whileſt his horsemen were too earneſt in following the chace; there arriued, by chance, a supplie of fiue hundred from Messene, which gaue new courage vnto those that fled. So the Enemies began to make head againe; and with the helpe of those, who very seasonably came to their aide, compelled Philopœmens Horsemen to turne backe. Philopœmen himselfe had long beene sicke of an Ague, and was then very weake: yet the greatneſſe of his courage would not suffer him, to bee negligent of their safetie, which had so willingly aduentured themselues vnder his conduct. He tooke vpon him to make the Retrait: and suffering his horsemen to passe along by him in a narrow lane, he often turned about against the Messenians; whom his reputation, and the knowledge of his great worth, did terrifie from approaching ouer-neere to him. But it fell out vnhappily, that being cast to ground by a fall of his horse, and being withall in very weake plight of bodie, he was vnable to get vp againe. So the Enemies came vpon him, and tooke him; yet scarce beleeued their fortune to bee so good, although their eyes were witnesses. The first messenger that brought these newes to Messene, was so farre from being beleeued, that he was hardly thought to be in his right wits. But when the truth was affirmed by many reports, all the Citie ran forth to meet him, and behold the spectacle seeming so incredible. They caused him to be brought into the Theater, that there they might satisfie themselues with beholding him. The greatest part of them had compassion on his misfortune: and in commemoration both of his vertue, and of the singular benefits by him done vnto them, especially in deliuering them from Nabis the Tyrant; began to manifest their good will for his deliuerie. Contrarywise, Dinocrates and his Faction were desirous hastily to take away his life: because they held him a man implacable, and one that would neuer leaue any disgrace, or iniurie, done to him, vnreuenged. They durst not one trust another with the keeping of him: but committed him into a strong vault vnder ground, that had beene made for the custodie of their Treasure. So thither they let him downe fast bound, and with an engine laid an heauie stone vpon the mouth of the vault. There hee had not staied long, ere his enemies had concluded his present death. The Hangman of the Citie was let downe vnto him, with a cup of poison, which Philopœmen tooke in his hand: and asking no more than whether the Horsemen were escaped, and particularly whether Lycortas was safe, when he heard an answere to his minde, he said it was well: and so with a cheerefull countenance, dranke his last draught. He was seuentie yeeres old, and weakned with long sickneſſe, whereby the poison wrought the sooner, and easily tooke away his life. The Achæans, when they missed him in their flight, were maruellously offended with themselues, for that they had beene more mindfull to preserue their owne liues, than to looke vnto the safetie of so excellent a Commander. Whileſt they were deuising what to doe in such a case: they got aduertisement of his being taken. All Achaia was by this report vehemently afflicted: so as Embassadours were forthwith dispatched vnto Messene, craving his enlargement: and yet preparation made withall, to obtaine it by force, in case that faire meanes would not serue. Lycortas was chosen Generall of the Armie against Messene: who comming thither, and laying siege to the Towne, enforced it in short space to yeeld. Then Dinocrates, knowing what he was to expect, laid hands vpon himselfe, and made an end of his owne life. The rest of those that had beene partakers in the murder, were compelled to wait in bonds vpon the ashes of Philopœmen that were carried home in solemne pompe to Megalopolis; where they were all of them slaine at his funerall, as sacrifices to his Ghost whom they had offended. Q. Martius, a Roman Embassador, was then in Greece; whence, vpon one occasion or other, the Roman Embassadors were seldome absent. He would haue entermedled in this businesse of Messene, had not Lycortas made short worke, and left him nothing to doe.

About

About the ſame time was T. Quintius Flaminius ſent Embaſſador to Pruſias King of Bithynia: not ſo much to withdraw him from proſecuting the warre againſt Eumenes, as to entreat him, that he would deliuer Hannibal, the moſt ſpightfull enemie in all the world vnto the Senate and People of Rome, into his hands. Pruſias (therein vnworthie of the Crowne he ware) did readily condiſcend: or rather (as Liuie thinkes) to gratifie the Romans, he determined either to kill Hannibal, or to deliuer him aliue to Flaminius. For vpon the firſt conference betweene the King and Flaminius, a troupe of Souldiors were directed to guard and enuiron the lodging where Hannibal lay. That famous Captaine hauing found cauſe before this to ſuſpect the faith of Pruſias, had deuiſed ſome ſecret ſallies vnder ground to ſaue himſelfe from any treaſonable and ſudden aſſault. But finding now that all parts about him were fore-cloſed, he had recourſe to his laſt remedie: which he then was conſtrayned to practiſe, as well to fruſtrate his enemies of their triumphing ouer him, as to ſaue himſelfe from their torture and mercileſſe hands; who, as he well knew, would neither reſpect his famous enterpriſes, his honour, nor his age. When therefore he ſaw no way of eſcape, nor counſell to reſort vnto, he tooke the poyſon into his hand, which he alwayes preſerued for a ſure Antidote againſt the ſharpeſt diſeaſes of aduerſe fortune; which being readie to ſwallow downe, hee vttered theſe wordes: I will now (ſaid he) deliuer the Romans of that feare, which hath ſo many yeeres poſſeſt them; that feare, which makes them impatient to attend the death of an old man. This victorie of FLAMINIVS ouer me, which am diſarmed, and betrayed into his hands, ſhall neuer bee numbred among the reſt of his heroicall deedes: No; it ſhall make it manifeſt to all the Nations of the World, how farre the auncient Roman vertue is degenerate and corrupted. For ſuch was the nobleneſſe of their forefathers; as, when PYRRHVS inuaded them in Italie, and was readie to giue them battaile at their owne dores, they gaue him knowledge of the treaſon intended againſt him by poyſon: whereas theſe of a later race haue employed FLAMINIVS, a man who hath heretofore beene one of their Conſuls, to practiſe with PRVSIAS, contrarie to the honour of a King, contrarie to his Faith giuen, and contrarie to the Lawes of Hoſpitalitie, to ſlaughter or deliuer vp his owne Gheſt. He then curſing the perſon of Pruſias, and all his, and deſiring the immortall gods to reuenge his infidelitie, dranke off the poyſon, and died.

In this yeere alſo (as good Authors haue reported) to accompanie Philopœmen and Hannibal, died Scipio the African: theſe being, all of them, as great Captaines as euer the world had; but not more famous, than vnfortunate. Certainely, for Hannibal, whoſe Tragedie we haue now finiſhed, had he beene Prince of the Carthaginians, and one who by his authoritie might haue commaunded ſuch ſupplyes, as the Warre which he vndertooke, required; it is probable, that he had torne vp the Roman Empire by the roots. But he was ſo ſtrongly croſt by a cowardly and enuious Faction at home; as his proper vertue, wanting publike force to ſuſtaine it, did laſtly diſſolue it ſelfe in his owne, and in the common miſerie of his Countrey and Commonweale.

Hence it comes, to wit, from the enuie of our equals, and jealouſie of our Maſters, be they Kings, or Commonweales, That there is no Profeſſion more vnproſperous than that of Men of Warre, and great Captaines, being no Kings. For beſides the enuie and jealouſie of men; the ſpoyles, rapes, famine, ſlaughter of the innocent, vaſtation, and burnings, with a world of miſeries layed on the labouring man, are ſo hatefull to God, as with good reaſon did Monlue the Marſhall of France confeſſe, That were not the mercies of GOD infinite, and without reſtriction, it were in vaine for thoſe of his profeſſion to hope for any portion of them: ſeeing the cruelties, by them permitted and commited, were alſo infinite. Howſoeuer, this is true, That the victories, which are obtayned by many of the greateſt Commanders, are commonly either aſcribed to thoſe that ſerue vnder them, to Fortune, or to the cowardiſe of the Nation againſt whom they ſerue. For the moſt of others, whoſe vertues haue rayſed them aboue the leuell of their inferiours, and haue ſurmounted their enuie: yet

haue they been rewarded in the end, either with disgrace, banishment, or death. Among the Romans we finde many examples hereof; as Coriolanus, M. Liuius, L. Æmylius, and this our Scipio, whom we haue lately buried. Among the Greekes we reade of not many, that escaped these rewards. Yea, long before these times, it was a Legacie that Dauid bequeathed vnto his victorious Captaine Ioab. With this fare Alexander feasted Parmenio, Philotas, and others; and prepared it for Antipater and Cassander. Hereto Valentinian the Emperour inuited Ætius: who, after many other victories, ouerthrew Attila of the Hunnes, in the greatest battaile, for the well fighting and resolution of both Armies, that euer was strucken in the world; for there fell of those that fought beside runne-awaies, an hundred and fourescore thousand. Hereupon it was well and boldly told vnto the Emperour by Proximus, That in killing of Ætius, he had cut off his owne right hand with his left: for it was not long after that Maximus (by whose perswasion Valentinian slue Ætius) murdered the Emperour, which hee neuer durst attempt, Ætius liuing. And, besides the losse of that Emperour, it is true, That with Ætius, the glory of the Westerne Empire was rather dissolued then obscured. The same vnworthy destinie, or a farre worse, had Belisarius; whose vndertakings and victories were so difficult and glorious, as after-ages suspected them for fabulous. For he had his eyes torne out of his head by Iustinian: and he died a blinde begger. Narses also, to the great preiudice of Christian Religion, was disgrac'd by Iustine. That Rule of Cato against Scipio, hath been well obserued in euery age since then; to wit, That the Common-weale cannot bee accounted free, which standeth in awe of any one man. And hence hath the Turkes drawne another Principle, and in deed a Turkish one, That euery warlike Prince should rather destroy his greatest men of Warre, than suffer his owne glory to be obscured by them. For this cause did Baiaret the second dispatch Bassa Acomat; Selim strangle Bassa Mustapha; and most of those Princes bring to ruine the most of their Visiers. Of the Spanish Nation, the great Gonsaluo, who draue the French out of Naples: and Ferdinando Cortese, who conquered Mexico; were crowned with nettles, not with Lawrell. The Earles of Egmond and Horn, had no heads left them to weare garlands on. And that the great Captaines of all Nations haue been payd with this copper Coine; there are examples more than too many. On the contrary it may bee said, That many haue acquired the State of Princes, Kings, and Emperours, by their great abilitie in matter of warre. This I confesse. Yet must it be had withall in consideration, that these high places haue been giuen, or offered, vnto very few, as rewards of their militarie vertue; though many haue vsurped them, by the helpe and fauour of those Armies which they commanded. Neither is it vnregardable, That the Tyrants which haue oppressed the liberty of free Cities: and the Lieutenants of Kings or Emperours, which haue traiterously cast downe their Masters, and stepped vp into their seats; were not all of them good men of warre: but haue vsed the aduantage of some commotion, or many of them by base and cowardly practices, haue obtained those dignities, which vndeseruedly were ascribed to their personall worth. So that the number of those, that haue purchased absolute greatnesse by the greatnesse of their warlike vertue; is farre more in seeming, than in deed. Phocas was a Souldiour, and by helpe of the Souldiours he got the Empire from his Lord Mauritius: but he was a coward; and with a barbarous cruelty, seldome found in any other than cowards, hee slue first the children of Mauritius, a Prince that neuer had done him wrong, before his face, and after them Mauritius himselfe. This his bloudy aspiring was but as a debt, which was paid vnto him again by Heraclius: who tooke from him the Imperiall Crowne, vniustly gotten; and set it on his owne head. Leontius laid hold vpon the Emperour Iustine, cut off his nose and eares, and sent him into banishment: But Gods vengeance rewarded him with the same punishment, by the hands of Tiberius; to whose charge hee had left his owne men of warre. Iustine, hauing recouered forces, lighted on Tiberius, and barbed him after the same

ſame faſhion. Philippicus, commanding the forces of Iuſtine, murdered both the Emperour and his ſonne. Anaſtaſius, the vaſſall of this new Tyrant, ſurpriſed his Maſter Philippicus, and thruſt out both his eyes. But with Anaſtaſius, Theodoſius dealt more gently: for hauing wreſted the Scepter out of his hands, hee enforced him to become a Prieſt. It were an endleſſe, and a needleſſe worke to tell, how Leo rewarded this Theodoſius; how many others haue beene repayed with their owne crueltie, by men alike ambitious and cruell; or how many hundreds, or rather thouſands, hoping of Captaines to make themſelues Kings, haue by Gods iuſtice miſerably periſhed in the attempt. The ordinarie, and perhaps the beſt way of thriuing, by the practice of Armes, is to take what may bee gotten by the ſpoile of Enemies, and the liberalitie of thoſe Princes and Cities, in whoſe ſeruice one hath well deſerued. But ſcarce one of a thouſand haue proſpered by this courſe. For that obſeruation, made by Salomon, of vnthanketulneſſe in this kinde, hath beene found belonging to all Countries and Ages: A little Citie, and few men in it, and a great King came againſt it, and compaſſed it about, and builded Forts againſt it: And there was found a poore and wiſeman therein, and hee deliuered the Citie by his wiſedome: but none remembred this poore man. Great Monarchs are vnwilling to pay great thankes, leſt thereby they ſhould acknowledge themſelues to haue beene indebted for great benefits: which the vnwiſer ſort of them thinke to ſauour of ſome impotency in themſelues. But in this reſpect they are oftentimes coozened and abuſed: which proues that weakeneſſe to be in them indeede, whereof they ſo gladly ſhunne the opinion. Contrariwiſe, free Eſtates are bountifull in giuing thankes; yet ſo, as thoſe thankes are not of long endurance. But concerning other profit which their Captaines haue made, by enriching themſelues with the ſpoile of the enemie, they are very inquiſitiue to ſearch into it, and to ſtrip the wel-deſeruers out of their gettings: yea moſt iniurioůſly to rob them of their owne, vpon a falſe ſuppoſition: that euen they whoſe hands are moſt cleane from ſuch offences, haue purloyned ſomewhat from the common Treaſurie. Hereof I neede not to produce examples: that of the two Scipioes being ſo lately recited. Eccleſ.c.9.14. & 15.

In my late Soueraignes time, although for the warres, which for her owne ſafetie ſhe was conſtrained to vndertake, her Majeſtie had no leſſe cauſe to vſe the ſeruice of Martiall men both by Sea and Land, than any of her Predeceſſors for many yeeres had, yet, according to the deſtiny of that profeſsion, I do not remember, that any of hers, the Lord Admiral excepted, her eldeſt and moſt proſperous Commander, were either enriched, or otherwiſe honoured, for any ſeruice by them performed. And that her Majeſtie had many aduiſed, valiant, and faithfull men, the proſperitie of her affaires did well witneſſe, who in all her daies neuer receiued diſhonour, by the cowardiſe or infidelitie of any Commander, by her ſelfe choſen and imployed.

For as all her old Captaines by Land died poore men, as Malbey, Randol, Drewrie, Reade, Wilford, Layton, Pellam, Gilbert, Cunſtable, Bourchier, Barkeley, Bingham, and others: ſo thoſe of a later and more dangerous imploiment, whereof Nerice and Vere were the moſt famous, and who haue done as great honor to our Nation (for the meanes they had) as euer any did: thoſe (I ſay) with many other braue Collonels, haue left behinde them (beſides the reputation which they purchaſed with many trauailes and wounds) nor title nor eſtate to their poſteritie. As for the L. Thomas Burrough, and Peregrine Berty L. Willoughby of Eresby, two very worthy and exceeding valiant Commanders, they brought with them into the world their Titles and Eſtates.

That her Majeſtie in the aduancement of her Men of warre did ſooner beleeue other men than her ſelfe, a diſeaſe vnto which many wiſe Princes, beſides her ſelfe, haue beene ſubiect, I ſay that ſuch a confidence, although it may ſeeme altogether to excuſe her Noble Nature, yet can it not but in ſome ſort accuſe her of weakeneſſe. And exceeding ſtrange it were, were not the cauſe manifeſt enough, that where the prosperous actions are so exceedingly prized, the Actors are so vnprosperous and so generally neglected. The cause, I say, which hath wrought one and the same effect in all times, and among all Nations, is this, that those which are neerest the person of Princes (which Martial men seldome are) can with no good grace commend, or at least magnifie a Profession farre more noble than their own, seeing therein they should onely mind their Masters of the wrong they did vnto others, in giuing lesse honour and reward to men of farre greater deseruing, and of far greater vse than themselues.

But his Maiestie hath already payed the greatest part of that debt. For besides the relieuing by Pensions all the poorer sort, hee hath honored more Martial men, than all the Kings of England haue done for this hundred yeeres.

He hath giuen a Coronet to the Lord Thomas Haward for his chargeable and remarkeable seruice, as well in the yeere 1588, as at Caliz, the Ilands, and in our owne Seas; hauing first commanded as a Captaine, twice Admirall of a Squadron, and twice Admirall in chiefe. His Maiestie hath changed the Baronies of Montioy and Burley into Earledomes, and created Sidney Vicount, Knollys, Russel, Carew, Danuers, Arundel of Warder, Gerald, and Chicheſter, Barons, for their gouernments and seruices in the Netherlands, France, Ireland, and elsewhere.

§. III.

PHILIP making prouision for warre against the Romans, deales hardly with many of his owne subiects. His negotiation with the Bastarna. His crueltie. He suspecteth his sonne DEMETRIVS. DEMETRIVS accused by his brother PERSEVS; and shortly after slaine, by his fathers appointment. PHILIP repenteth him of his sonnes death; whom he findeth to haue beene innocent: and intending to reuenge it on PERSEVS, he dieth.

QVINTVS MARTIVS the Roman Embassador, who trauailed vp and downe, seeking what worke might be found about Greece, had receiued instruction from the Senate, to vse the most of his diligence in looking into the Estate of Macedon. At his returne home, that hee might not seeme to haue discouered nothing, hee told the Fathers, That Philip had done whatsoeuer they enjoyned him; yet so, as it might appeare, that such his obedience would last no longer, than meere necessitie should enforce him thereunto. Hee added further, That all the doings and sayings of that King did wholly tend vnto rebellion, about which he was deuising. Now it was so indeed, that Philip much repented him of his faithfull obsequiousnes to the Romans, and foresaw their intent, which was, to get his Kingdome into their owne hands, with safety of their honour, if they could finde conuenient meanes; or otherwise (as to him seemed apparant) by what meanes soeuer. He was in an ill case: as hauing beene already vanquished by them; hauing lost exceedingly both in strength and reputation; hauing subiects that abhorred to heare of Warre with Rome; and hauing neither neighbour nor friend, that, if he were thereto vrged, would aduenture to take his part: yet hee prouided as well as hee could deuise, against the necessitie which hee daily feared. Such of his owne people as dwelt in the maritime Townes, and gaue him cause to suspect, that they would doe but bad seruice against the Romans, he compelled to forsake their dwellings, and remoued them all into Emathia. The Cities and Countrey, whence these were transplanted, hee filled with a multitude of Thracians, whose faith he thought a great deale more assured, against those enemies that were terrible to the Macedonians. Further, hee deuised vpon alluring the Bastarna, a strong and hardie Nation, that dwelt beyond the riuer of Danubius, to abandon their ſeat, and come to him with all their multitude: who, beſides other great rewards, would helpe them to roote out the Dardanians, and take poſſeſſion of their Countrey. Theſe were like to doe him notable ſeruice againſt the Romans: being not onely ſtout fighting men; but ſuch as being planted in thoſe quarters by him, would beare reſpect vnto him alone. The leaſt benefit that could be hoped by their arriuall, muſt be the vtter extirpation of the Dardanians; a People alwaies troubleſome to the Kingdome of Macedon, whenſoeuer they found aduantage. Neither was it iudged any hard matter, to perſwade thoſe Baſtarnæ, by hope of ſpoile, and other incitements, vnto a more deſperate Expedition, through Illyria, and the Countries vpon the Adriaticke Sea, into Italie it ſelfe. It was not knowne who ſhould withſtand them vpon the way: Rather it was thought, that the Scordiſci, and peraduenture ſome others, through whoſe Countries they were to paſſe, would accompanie them againſt the Romans, were it onely in hope of ſpoyle. Now to facilitate the remoue of theſe Baſtarnæ from their owne habitations, into the Land of the Dardanians, vpon the border of Macedon; a long and tedious journey vnto them, that carried with them their wiues and children: Philip with gifts did purchaſe the good will of ſome Thracian Princes, Lords of the Countries through which they were to paſſe. And thus hee ſought meanes to ſtrengthen himſelfe, with helpe of the wilde Nations, which neither knew the Romans, nor were knowne vnto them; ſince he was not like to finde aſſiſtance from anie ciuill Nation, about the whole compaſſe of the Mediterranean Seas. But theſe deuices were long ere they tooke effect: ſo as the Baſtarnæ came not before ſuch time as he was dead; his death being the ouerthrow of that purpoſe. In the meane time he neglected not the training of his men to warre, and the exerciſe of them in ſome ſmall Expeditions, againſt thoſe wilde people that bordered vpon him, and ſtood worſt affected toward him.

But theſe his counſailes and proceedings were miſerably diſturbed by the calamities that fell vpon him, both in his Kingdome, and in his owne houſe. The Families and whole Townſhips, which he had cauſed much againſt their wils to forſake their ancient dwellings, and betake themſelues to ſuch new habitations, as hee in his diſcretion thought meeter for them, were vehemently offended at the change: Yet their anger at firſt contained it ſelfe within words: hee hauing done them no great wrong in that alteration, otherwiſe then by neglecting their affection to the places wherein they had long liued: which alſo he did vnwillingly, being himſelfe ouer-ruled by neceſſitie, that ſeemed apparent. This euill therefore would ſoone haue been determined, had not his cruell and vindicatiue nature made it worſe. He could not pardon words proceeding from juſt ſorrow: but imputed all to traiterous malice; and accordingly ſought reuenge where it was needleſſe. In his rage he cauſed many to die: among whom were ſome eminent men; and few or none of them deſeruedly. This encreaſed the hatred of the people, and turned their former exclamations into bitter curſes. Which grew the more generall; when the King in a barbarous and baſe fury, miſtruſting all alike whom he had iniuried, thought himſelfe vnlike to be ſafe, vntill he ſhould haue maſſacred all the children of thoſe parents, whom tyrannically he had put to death. In the execution of this his vnmanly pleaſure, ſome accidents, more tragicall then perhaps he could haue deſired, gaue men cauſe to thinke (as they could not in reaſon thinke otherwiſe) that, not without vengeance powred on him from Heauen, hee felt the like miſerie in his owne children. It is hard to ſay what the Romans intended, in the extraordinary fauour which they ſhewed vnto Demetrius, the Kings yonger ſonne. It may well be (though it may be alſo ſuſpected) that they had no purpoſe to make and nouriſh diſſention betweene the brethren, but onely to cheriſh the vertue and towardlineſſe of Demetrius; like as we finde it in their Hiſtories. But their notable fauour towards this yong Prince, and his mutuall reſpect of them, bred extreme jealouſie in the fathers head. If any cuſtome of the Romanes, the manner of their life, life, the fashion of their apparell, or the vnsightly contriuing and building (as then it was) of the Towne of Rome, were jested at in ordinarie discourse and table-talke, Demetrius was sure to be presently on fire, defending and prayſing them, euen in ſuch points as rather needed excuſe. This, and his dayly conuerſation with their Embaſſadours, as often as they came, gaue his father cauſe to thinke, that he was no fit partaker of any counſaile held againſt them. Wherefore he communicated all his deuices with his elder ſonne Perſeus: who fearing ſo much leſt his brother ſhould ſtep betweene him and the ſucceſſion, conuerted wholly vnto his deſtruction, that grace which he had with his father. Perſeus was then thirty yeeres old; of a ſtirring ſpirit, though much defectiue in valour. Demetrius was yonger by fiue yeeres, more open and vnwarie in his actions, yet thought old and crafty enough, to entertaine more dangerous practices, than his free ſpeeches diſcouered. The jealous head of the King hauing entertained ſuch ſuſpitions, that were much increaſed by the cunning practice of his elder ſonne, a ſlight occaſion made the fire breake out, that had long layne ſmothered. A Muſter, and ceremonious luſtration of the Armie, was wont to be made at certaine times with great ſolemnitie. The manner of it at the preſent was thus: They cleft in twaine a bitch; and threw the head and fore-part, with the entrailes, on the right hand, and the hinder part on the left hand of the way which the Armie was to paſſe. This done, the Armes of all the Kings of Macedon, from the very firſt originall, were borne before the Armie. Then followed the King betweene his two ſonnes: after him came his owne band, and they of his guard; whom all the reſt of the Macedonians followed. Hauing performed other ceremonies, the Armie was diuided into two parts: which, vnder the Kings two ſonnes, charged each other in manner of a true fight, vſing poles, and the like, in ſtead of their pikes and accuſtomed weapons. But in this preſent skirmiſh there appeared ſome extraordinary contention for the victorie: whether happening by chance, or whether the two Captaines did ouer-earneſtly ſeeke each to get the vpper hand, as a betokening of their good ſucceſſe in a greater triall. Some ſmall hurt there was done, and wounds giuen, euen with thoſe ſtakes, vntill Perſeus his ſide at length recoyled. Perſeus himſelfe was ſorr for this, as it had been ſome bad preſage: but his friends were glad, and thoug[h] , that hereof might be made good vſe. They were of the craftier ſort: who perceiuing which way the Kings fauour bent, and how all the courſes of Demetrius led vnto his owne ruine, addreſſed their ſeruices to the more malicious and crafty head. And now they ſaid, that this victory of Demetrius would affoord matter of complaint againſt him; as if the heat of his ambition had carried him beyond the rules of that ſolemne paſtime. Each of the brethren was that day to feaſt his owne companions, and each of them had ſpies in the others lodging, to obſerue what was ſaid and done. One of Perſeus his Intelligencers behaued himſelfe ſo indiſcreetly, that hee was taken and well beaten by three or foure of Demetrius his men, who turned him out of dores. After ſome ſtore of wine, Demetrius told his companions, that he would goe viſit his brother, and ſee what cheare he kept. They agreed to his motion, excepting ſuch of them as had ill handled his brothers man: yet he would leaue none of his traine behinde, but forced them alſo to beare him company. They, fearing to be ill rewarded for their late diligence, armed themſelues ſecretly to preuent all danger. Yet was there ſuch good eſpiall kept, that this their comming armed was forthwith made knowne to Perſeus: who thereupon tumultuouſly locked vp his doores, as if he ſtood in feare to be aſſaulted in his houſe. Demetrius wondred to ſee himſelfe excluded, and fared very angerly with his brother. But Perſeus, bidding him be gone as an enemie, and one whoſe murderous purpoſe was detected, ſent him away with entertainement no better than defiance. The next day the matter was brought before the King. The elder brother accuſed the yonger vnto the father of them both. Much there was alledged, and in effect the ſame that hath been here recited, ſaue that by miſconſtruction all was made worſe. But the maine point of the accuſation, and

which did aggrauate all the reſt, was, That Demetrius had vndertaken this murder, and would perhaps alſo dare to vndertake a greater, vpon confidence of the Romans; by whom hee knew that he ſhould be defended and borne out. For Perſeus made ſhew, as if the Romans did hate him; becauſe hee bore a due reſpect vnto his father, and was ſorie to ſee him ſpoiled, and daily robbed of ſomewhat by them. And for this cauſe he ſaid it was, that they did animate his brother againſt him: as alſo that they ſought how to winne vnto Demetrius the loue of the Macedonians. For proofe hereof he cited a letter, ſent of late from T. Quintius to the King himſelfe: whereof the contents were, That he had done wiſely in ſending Demetrius to Rome; and that he ſhould yet further doe well to ſend him thither againe, accompanied with a greater and more honorable traine of Macedonian Lords. Hence he enforced, That this counſell was giuen by Titus, of purpoſe to ſhake the allegeance of thoſe, that ſhould wait vpon his brother to Rome; and make them, forgetting their ducties to their old King, become ſeruants to this yong Traytor Demetrius. Hereto Demetrius made anſwere, by rehearſing all paſſages of the day and night foregoing, in ſuch manner as hee remembred them, and had conceiued of them: bitterly reprehending Perſeus, that conuerted matters of Paſtime, and what was done or ſpoken in wine, to ſuch an accuſation, whereby he ſought his innocent brothers death. As for the loue which the Romans did beare him; Hee ſaid that it grew, if not from his owne vertue, at leaſt wiſe from their opinion thereof: ſo as by any impious practice, Hee were more like to loſe it wholly, than to encreaſe it. In this wretched pleading there wanted not ſuch paſsions, as are incident to fathers, children, and brethren; beſides thoſe that are common to all Plaintiffes and Defendants, before ordinarie Iudges. The King pronounced like a father, though a iealous father, That he would conclude nothing vpon the exceſſe or error, whatſoeuer it were, of one day and night, nor vpon one houres audience of the matter, but vpon better obſeruation of their liues, manners, and whole carriage of themſelues both in word and deed. And herein hee may ſeeme to haue dealt both iuſtly and compaſſionately. But from this time forward, hee gaue himſelfe ouer wholly to Perſeus: vſing ſo little conference with his yonger ſonne, that when he had matters of weight in hand, ſuch eſpecially as concerned the Romans, He liked neither to haue him preſent, nor neere vnto him. Aboue all, he had eſpeciall care, to learne out what had paſſed betweene Demetrius and T. Quintius, or any other of the Roman great ones. And to this purpoſe he ſent Embaſſadours to Rome, Philocles and Apelles; men whom hee thought no way intereſſed in the quarrels betweene the brethren; though indeed they altogether depended on the elder, whom they ſaw the more in grace. Theſe brought home with them a letter, ſaid to be written by Titus (whoſe ſeale they had counterfetted) vnto the King. The contents whereof were, A deprecation for the yong Prince; with an intimation, as by way of granting it, That his youthfull and ambitious deſires had cauſed him to enter into practices vniuſtifiable, againſt his elder brother; which yet ſhould neuer take effect, for that Titus himſelfe would not be author, or abettor, of any impious deuice. This manner of excuſe did forcibly perſwade the King, to thinke his ſonne a dangerous traytor. To ſtrengthen him in this opinion, one Didas, to whom he gaue Demetrius in cuſtodie, made ſhew as if he had pitied the eſtate of the vnhappy Prince; and ſo wrung out of him his ſecret intentions, which he ſhortly diſcouered vnto Philip. It was the purpoſe of Demetrius to flye ſecretly to Rome; where he might hope not onely to liue in ſafety, from his father and brother, but in greater likelihood, than hee could finde at home, of bettering ſuch claime as he had in reuerſion vnto the Crowne of Macedon. What ſoeuer his hopes and meanings were, al came to nought through the falſhood of Didas; who playing on both hands, offered vnto the Prince his helpe for making the eſcape, and in the meane while reuealed the whole matter to the King. So Philip reſolued to put his ſonne to death, without further expence of time. It was thought behouefull to make him away priuily, for feare leſt

the Romans ſhould take the matter to heart, and held it as proofe ſufficient, at leaſt, of the Kings deſpight againſt them, if not of his meaning to renew the warre. Didas therefore was commanded to rid the vnhappy Prince out of his life. This accurſed Miniſter of his Kings vnaduiſed ſentence, firſt gaue poyſon to Demetrius: which wrought neither ſo haſtily, nor ſo ſecretly, as was deſired. Hereupon he ſent a couple of Ruffians, to finiſh the tragedie: who villanouſly accompliſhed their worke by ſmothering that Prince, in whoſe life conſiſted the greateſt hope of Macedon.

In all the race of Antigonus there had not beene found a King, that had thus cruelly dealt with any Prince of his owne bloud. The houſes of Lyſimachus and Caſſander fell either with themſelues, or euen vpon their heeles; by inteſtine diſcord and iealouſies, grounded on deſire of ſoueraigne rule, or feare of loſing it. By the like vnnaturall hatred, had almoſt beene cut off the lines of Ptolemie and of Seleucus: which though narrowly they eſcaped the danger, yet were their kingdomes thereby grieuouſly diſtempered. Contrariwiſe, it was worthy of extraordinarie note, how that vpſtart family of the Kings of Pergamus had raiſed it ſelfe to maruellous greatneſſe, in very ſhort ſpace, from the condition of meere ſlauery: whereof a principall cauſe was, the brotherly loue maintained by them, with ſingular commendation of their pietie. Neither was Philip ignorant of theſe examples; but is ſaid to haue propounded the laſt of them, to his owne children, as a patterne for them to imitate. Certainly he had reaſon ſo to doe: not more in regard of the benefit which his enemies reaped by their concord, than in remembrance of the tender foſterage, wherewith King Antigonus his Tutor had faithfully cheriſhed him in his minoritie. But Hee was himſelfe of an vnmercifull nature; and therefore vnmeet to bee a good perſwader vnto kindely affection. The murders by him done vpon many of his friends, together with the barbarous outrages, which for the ſatiating of his bloud-thirſty appetite he delightfully had committed vpon many innocents, both ſtrangers, and ſubiects of his owne; did now procure vengeance downe from Heauen, that rewarded Him with a draught of his owne Poyſon. After the death of his ſonne, He too late began to examine the crimes that had bin obiected; and to weigh them in a more equal ballance. Then found he nothing that could giue him ſatisfaction, or by good probabilitie induce him to thinke, that malice had not beene contriuer of the whole proceſſe. His only remaining Son Perſeus could ſo ill diſſemble the pleaſure which hee tooke, in being freed from all danger of competition; as there might eaſily be perceiued in him a notable change, proceeding from ſome other cauſe, than the remoue of thoſe dangers, which he had lately pretended. The Romans were now no leſſe to be feared than at other times, when he, as hauing accompliſhed the moſt of his deſires, left off his vſuall trouble of minde, and carefulneſſe of making prouiſion againſt them. He was more diligently courted, than in former times; by thoſe that well vnderſtood the difference, betweene a riſing and a ſetting Sunne. As for old Philip, hee was left in a manner deſolate, ſome expecting his death; and ſome ſcarce enduring the tediouſneſſe of ſuch expectation. This bred in the King a deep melancholy; and filled his head with ſuſpitious imaginations; the like whereof hee had neuer beene ſlow to apprehend. Hee was much vexed: and ſo much the more, for that he knew, neither well to whom, nor perfectly whereof to complaine. One honourable man, a Couſin of his, named Antigonus, continued ſo true to Philip, that hee grew thereby hatefull to Perſeus: and thus becomming ſubiect vnto the ſame iealous impreſsions which troubled the King, became alſo partaker of his ſecrets. This counſailour, when he found that the anger conceiued againſt Perſeus would not vent it ſelfe, and giue eaſe to the King, vntill the truth were knowne whether Demetrius were guilty or no of the treaſon obiected; as alſo that Philocles and Apelles, (the Embaſſadours which had brought from Rome that Epiſtle of Flaminius, that ſerued as the greateſt euidence againſt Demetrius) were ſuſpected of forgery in the buſines: made diligent inquirie inquirie after the truth. In thus doing, hee found one Xychus, a man moſt likely to haue vnderſtood what falſe dealing was vſed by thoſe Embaſſadors. Him hee apprehended, brought to the Court, and preſented vnto the King: ſaying that this fellow knew all, and muſt therefore bee made to vtter what hee knew. Xychus for feare of torture, vttered as much as was before ſuſpected: confeſsing againſt himſelfe, that hee had beene employed by the Embaſſadors in that wicked piece of buſineſſe. No maruell, if the Fathers paſsions were extreme, when hee vnderſtood, that by the vnnaturall practice of one ſon, he had ſo wretchedly caſt away another, farre more vertuous, and innocent. Hee raged exceedingly againſt himſelfe, and withal againſt the authors of the miſchiefe. Vpon the firſt newes of this diſcouerie, Apelles fled away, and got into Italie, Philocles was taken: and either foraſmuch as hee could not deny it when Xychus confronted him, yeelded himſelfe guilty, or elſe was put to torture. Perſeus was now growne ſtronger, than that hee ſhould neede to flie the Countrie: yet not ſo ſtout as to aduenture himſelfe into his fathers preſence. He kept on the borders of the Kingdome, towards Thrace, whileſt his father wintered at Demetrias. Philip therefore, not hoping to get into his power this his vngracious ſonne; tooke a reſolution, to aliene the Kingdome from him, and confer it vpon Antigonus. But his weake body, and exceſſiue griefe of minde, ſo diſabled him in the trauell hereto belonging; that ere hee could bring his purpoſe to effect, hee was conſtrained to yeeld to nature: Hee had raigned about two and forty yeeres: alwayes full of trouble; as vexed by others, and vexed himſelfe, with continuall warres; of which that with the Romans was moſt vnhappy, and few or none of the reſt found the concluſion, which a wiſe Prince would haue deſired, of bringing forth together, both honour and profit. But for all the euill that befell him, he might thanke his owne peruerſe condition: ſince his vncle, King Antigonus, had left vnto him eſtate, ſo great, and ſo well ſettled, as made it eaſie for him, to accompliſh any moderate deſires, if hee had not abhorred all good counſell. Wherefore he was iuſtly puniſhed: by feeling the difference betweene the imaginarie happineſſe of a Tyrant, which he affected; and the life of a King, whereof he little cared to performe the dutie. His death, euen whileſt yet it was only drawing neere, was foreſignified vnto Perſeus, by Calligenes the Phyſician; who alſo concealed it awhile from thoſe that were about the Court. So Perſeus came thither on the ſuddaine, and tooke poſſeſſion of the kingdome: which in fine he no leſſe improuidently loſt, than he had wickedly gotten.

How the Baſtarnæ fell vpon Dardania. The behauiour of PERSEVS in the beginning of his Reigne. Some warres of the Romans: and how they ſuffered MASANISSA, cruelly to oppreſſe the Carthaginians. They quarrell with PERSEVS. They allow not their Confederates to make warre without their leaue obtained. The Treaſon of CALLICRATES; whereby all Greece became more obnoxious to Rome, than in former times. Further quarrels to PERSEVS. Hee ſeekes friendſhip of the Achæans, and is withſtood by CALLICRATES. The Romans diſcouer their intent of warring vpon him.

IMmediately vpon the death of Philip, came the Baſtarnæ into Thrace: where order had been taken, long before, both for their free paſſage, and for the indemnitie of the Countrie. This compact was friendly obſerued, as long as none other was knowne than that Philip did liue, to recompence all that ſhould be done, or ſuſtained, for his ſeruice. But when it was heard, that a new King raigned in Macedon; and not heard withall, that he tooke any care what became of the enterprize: then was all daſht and confounded. The Thracians would no longer afford so good markets vnto these strangers, as formerly they had done. On the other side, the Bastarnæ would not be contented with reason, but became their owne caruers. Thus each part hauing lost the rich hopes reposed in Philip, grew carefull of thriuing in the present; with little regard of right or wrong. Within awhile they fell to blowes; and the Bastarnæ had the vpper hand, so as they chased the Thracians out of the plaine Countries. But the victors made little vse of their good fortune. For whether by reason of some ouerthrow, receiued by them in assaulting a place of strength; or whether because of extreme bad weather, which is said to haue afflicted them as it were miraculously: all of them returned home, saue thirtie thousand, which pierced on into Dardania. How these thirtie thousand sped in their voyage, I doe not finde. It seemes that by the careless vsing of some victories, they drew losse vpon themselues: and finally tooke that occasion, to follow their companions back into their owne Countrey.

As for Perseus he thought it not expedient, in the noueltie of his Reigne, to embroyle himselfe in a warre so dangerous, as that with the Romans was likely to proue. Wherefore hee wholly gaue his minde to the settling of his Estate: which well done, he might afterwards accommodate himselfe, as the condition of his affaires should require, either for warre or peace. To preuent all danger of rebellion: he quickly tooke away the life of Antigonus. To winne loue of his people; he sate personally to heare their causes in iudgement (though herein hee was so ouerdiligent and curious, that one might haue perceiued this his vertue of iustice to be no better than fained) as also he gratified them with many delightfull spectacles, magnificently by him set forth. Aboue all, he had care to auoide all necessitie of war with Rome: and therefore made it his first worke, to send Embassadors thither, to renue the league; which he obtained, and was by the Senate saluted King, and friend vnto the State. Neither was he negligent in seeking to purchase good will of the Greekes, and other his neighbours: but was rather herein so excessiuely bountifull, that it may seeme a wonder, how in few yeeres, to his vtter ruine, he became so griping and tenacious. His feare was indeed the mastring passion, which ouerruled him, and changed him into so many shapes, as made it hard to discerne which of his other qualities were naturally his owne. For proofe of this, there is requisite no more, than the relation of his actions past and following.

The Romans continued, as they had long, busie in warres against the Spaniards and Ligurians; people often vanquished, and as often breaking forth into new rebellion. They also conquered Istria; subdued the rebelling Sardinians; and had some quarrels, though to little effect, with the Illyrians and others. Ouer the Carthaginians they bore (as euer since the victory) a heauy hand: and suffered Masanissa to take from them what he listed. The Carthaginians, like obedient vassals to Rome, were afraid, though in defence of their owne, to take Armes: from which they were bound by an Article of peace, except it were with leaue of the Romans. Masanissa therefore had great aduantage ouer them: and was not ignorant how to vse it. He could get possession by force, of whatsoeuer he desired, ere their complaining Embassadours could be at Rome: and then were the Romans not hardly entreated, to leaue things as they found them.

So had Hee once dealt before, in taking from them the Countrie of Emporia: and so did hee vse them againe and againe; with pretence of title, where hee had any; otherwise, without it. Gala the Father of Masanissa had wonne some land from the Carthaginians; which afterward Syphax wanne from Gala, and within awhile, restored to the right owners, for loue of his Wife Sophonisba, and of Asdrubal his Father-in-law. This did Masanissa take from them by force: and by the Romans, to whose judgement the case was referred, was permitted quietly to hold it. The Carthaginians had now good experience, how beneficiall it was for their Estate, to vse all maner of submissiue obedience to Rome.

They

They had ſcarcely digeſted his iniury, when Maſaniſſa came vpon them againe, and tooke from them aboue ſeuentie townes and Caſtles, without any colour of right. Hereof by their Embaſſadors they made lamentable complaint vnto the Roman Senate. They ſhewed how grieuouſly they were oppreſſed by reaſon of two articles in their League: That they ſhould not make warre, out of their own lands; nor with any Confederates of the Romans. Now although it were ſo, that they might lawfully withſtand the violence of Maſaniſſa, inuading their Country, howſoeuer he was pleaſed to call it his: yet ſince he was confederate with the Romans, they durſt not preſume to beare defenſiue armes againſt him, but ſuffered themſelues to be eaten vp, for feare of incurring the Romans indignation. Wherfore they entreated, that either they might haue fairer iuſtice; or be ſuffered to defend their owne by ſtrong hand; or at leaſt, if right muſt wholly giue place to fauor, That the Romans yet would be pleaſed to determine, how farre forth Maſaniſſa ſhould bee allowed, to proceed in theſe outrages. If none of theſe petitions could be obtained, then deſired they, that the Romans would let them vnderſtand, wherein they had offended ſince the time that Scipio gaue them peace; and vouchſafe to inflict on them ſuch puniſhment, as they themſelues in honour ſhould thinke meete: for that better and more to their comfort it were, to ſuffer at once what ſhould be appointed by ſuch Iudges; than continually to liue in feare, and none otherwiſe draw breath than at the mercie of this Numidian Hangman. And herewithall the Embaſſadours threw themſelues proſtrate on the ground, weeping in hope to moue compaſſion. Here may wee behold, the fruits of their enuy to that valiant houſe of the Barchines; of their irreſolution, in proſecuting a war ſo important, as Hannibal made for them in Italy; and of their halfe-penny worthing, in matter of expence, when they had aduentured their whole eſtate, in the purchaſe of a great Empire. Now are they ſeruants, euen to the ſeruants of thoſe men, whoſe fathers they haue often chaſed, ſlaine, taken, and ſold as bondſlaues in the ſtreets of Carthage, and in all Cities of Africke and Greece. Now haue they enough of that Roman peace, which Hanno ſo often and ſo earneſtly deſired. Onely they want peace with Maſaniſſa, once their mercinarie, and now their maſter, or rather their tormentor; out of whoſe cruell hands, they beſeech their maſters to take the office of correcting them. In ſuch caſe are they, and adore the Romans, whom they ſee flouriſhing in ſuch proſperitie as might haue beene their owne. But the Romans had farre better entreated Varro, who loſt the battell at Cannæ; then Hannibal that wanne it was vſed by the Carthaginians: they had freely beſtowed, euery man of them, all his priuate riches, vpon the Common-wealth; and employed their labours for the publike, without craning recompence: as alſo they had not thought it much, though being in extreme want, to ſet out an armie into Spaine, at what time the enemie lay vnder their owne wals. Theſe were no Carthaginian vertues: and therefore the Carthaginians hauing fought againſt their betters, muſt patiently endure the miſeries belonging to the vanquiſhed. Their pittifull behauiour bred peraduenture ſome commiſeration; yet their teares may ſeeme to haue beene miſtruſted, as proceeding no leſſe from enuie to the Romans, than from any feeling of their own calamitie. They thought themſelues able to fight with Maſaniſſa: which eſtimation of their forces was able to make them, after a little while, enter into compariſons with Rome. Wherefore they obtained no ſuch leaue as they ſought, of defending their owne right by armes: but contrariwiſe, when without leaue obtained they preſumed ſo far, the deſtruction of Carthage was thought an eaſie puniſhment of that offence. At the preſent, they receiued a gentle anſwere; though they had otherwiſe little amends. Guluſſa the ſonne of Maſaniſſa was then in Rome; and had not as yet craued audience. He was therefore called before the Senate; where hee was demanded the reaſon of his comming; and had related vnto him the complaint made the Carthaginians againſt his Father. Hee anſwered, That his Father not being throughly aware of any Embaſſadours thither ſent from Carthage, had had therefore not giuen him instructions, how to deale in that businesse. Onely it was knowne, that the Carthaginians had held counsell diuers nights, in the Temple of Æsculapius: whereupon he himselfe was dispatched away to Rome, there to entreat the Senate, that these common enemies of the Romans and of his Father might not be ouermuch trusted; especially against his Father, whom they hated most maliciously, for his constant faith to the People of Rome. This answere gaue little satisfaction. Wherefore the Senate replyed, that for Masanissa his sake, they had done, and would doe, whatsoeuer was reasonable; but that it stood not with their iustice, to allow of this his violence, in taking from the Carthaginians those lands, which by the couenants of the league, were granted vnto them freely to enioy. With this milde rebuke they dismissed Gulussa; bestowing on him friendly presents (as also they did on the Carthaginians) and willing him to tell his father, that he should doe well to send Embassadors, more fully instructed in this matter. This happened when the Macedonian warre was euen ready to begin: at which time the Romans were not willing, too much to offend, either the Carthaginians, (for feare of vrging them vnseasonably to rebellion) or Masanissa, at whose hands they expected no little helpe. So were they aided both by the Carthaginians, and Masanissa: by the Carthaginians, partly for feare, partly for hope of better vsage in the future; by Masanissa, in way of thankfulnesse; though if it had happened (which was vnlikely) that they should bee vanquished; hee made none other account, than that all Africke round about him and Carthage therewithall should bee his owne.

In the midst of all these cares, the Romans had not beene vnmindfull of Perseus. They visited him daily with Embassadours; that is, with honourable spies to obserue his behauiour. These Hee entertaind kindly at first, vntill (which fell out ere long) he perceiued whereto their diligence tended. First they quarrelled with him about the troubles in Dardania: neither would they take any satisfaction, vntill the Bastarnæ were thence gone; though he protested, that hee had not sent for them. Afterward they pried narrowly into his doings; and were no lesse ill contented with good offices, by him done to sundry of his neighbours, than with those wrongs, which they said (that he did vnto other some. Where he did harme to any; they called it, making warre vpon their friends: Where hee did good; they called such his bounty, seeking friends to take his part against them. The Dolopians, his subiects, vpon what occasion it is vncertaine) rebelled, and with exquisite torments slue Euphranor, whom he had appointed their gouernour. It seemes that Euphranor had played the Tyrant among them. For they were a people without strength to resist the Macedonian: and therefore vnlikely to haue presumed so farre, vnlesse either they had beene extremely prouoked; or else were secretly animated by the Romans. Whatsoeuer it was that bred this courage in them: Perseus did soone allay it, and reclaime them by strong hand. But the Romans tooke very angerly this presumption of the King: euen as if hee had inuaded some Countrie of their Italian confederates, and not corrected his owne Rebels at home. Faine they would haue had him to draw in the same yoke with the Carthaginians; wherto had he humbled once his necke, they could themselues haue done the part of Masanissa; though Eumenes, or some other fit for that purpose, had beene wanting. And to this effect, they told him, That conditions of the league betweene them were such, as made it vnlawfull, both to his father heretofore, and now to him, to take armes without their licence first obtained.

To the same passe they would also faine haue reduced the Greekes, and generally all their adherents, euen such as had entred into league with them vpon equall termes: whom vsually they rewarded with a frowne, whensoeuer they presumed to right themselues by force of Armes, without seeking first the Oracle at Rome. Hereof the Achæans had good experience: whose cõfidence in their proper strength made them otherwhiles bold to be their owne caruers, and whose hope of extraordinarie dinarie fauour at Rome cauſed them the more willingly to referre their cauſes to arbitrement. For when they went about to haue chaſtiſed the Meſſenians by warre; T. Quintius rebuked them, as too arrogant, in taking ſuch a worke in hand, without his authoritie: yet by his authoritie he ended the matter, wholly to their good liking. Semblably at other times were they reprehended, euen with Lordly threats, when they tooke vpon them to carry any buſineſſe of importance, by their owne power, without ſtanding vnto the good grace of the Romans. Who neuertheleſſe, vpon ſubmiſsion, were apt enough to doe them right. Thus were they tamed by little and little, and taught to forget their abſolute liberty, as by which they were not like to thriue; eſpecially in vſurping the practice of armes, which belonged only to the Imperiall Citie. In learning this hard leſſon, they were ſuch vntoward ſchollers, that they needed, and not long after felt, very ſharp correction. Yet was there no ſmall part of blame to be imputed vnto their Maſters. For the Roman Senate, being deſirous to humble the Achæans; refuſed not onely to giue them ſuch aide as they requeſted, and as they challenged by the tenour of the League betweene them; but further, with a careleſſe inſolencie, reiected this honeſt and reaſonable petition, That the Enemie might not be ſupplied from Italie, with victuals or armes. Herewith not content, The Fathers, as wearied with dealing in the affaires of Greece, pronounced openly, That if the Argiues, Lacedæmonians, or Corinthians, would reuolt from the Achæans; they themſelues would thinke it a buſineſſe no way concerning them. This was preſently after the death of Philopœmen: at what time it was beleeued, that the Common-wealth of Achaia was like to fall into much diſtreſſe; were it not vpheld by countenance of the Romans. All this notwithſtanding; when Lycortas Prætor of the Achæans had vtterly ſubdued the Meſſenians far ſooner than was expected; and when as not onely no Towne rebelled from the Achæans, but many entred into their corporation: then did the Romans with an ill-fauored grace, tell the ſame Embaſſadours, to whoſe petition they had made ſuch bad anſwere (and who as yet were not gone out of the Citie) That they had ſtreightly forbidden all manner of ſuccour to be carried to Meſſene. Thus thinking, by a fained grauitie, to haue ſerued their owne turnes; they manifeſted their condition; both to ſet on the weaker, againſt the ſtronger and more ſuſpected; and alſo to aſſume vnto themſelues a Soueraigne power, in directing all matters of warre, which diſſemblingly they would haue ſeemed to neglect. In like manner dealt they with all their confederates: not permitting any of them to make warre, whether offenſiue or defenſiue; though it were againſt meere ſtrangers; without interpoſing the authoritie of the Senate and People of Rome: vnleſſe peraduenture ſometimes they winked at ſuch violence, as did helpe towards the accompliſhment of their owne ſecret malice. Now theſe Roman arts how ſoeuer many (for gainfull or timerous reſpects) would ſeeme to vnderſtand them; yet were generally diſpleaſing vnto all men endued with free ſpirits. Onely the Athenians, once the moſt turbulent Citie in Greece, hauing neither ſubiects of their own that might rebell, nor power wherewith to bring any into ſubiection; for want of more noble argument wherein to practiſe their eloquence that was become the whole remainder of their ancient commendations, were much delighted in flattering the moſt mighty. So they kept themſelues in grace with the Romans, remained free from all trouble, vntill the warre of Mithridates: being men vnfit for action, and thereby innocent; yet bearing a part in many great actions, as Gratulators of the Roman victories, and Pardon-crauers for the vanquiſhed. Such were the Athenians become. As for thoſe other Common-weales and Kingdomes, that with ouer-nice diligence ſtroue to preſerue their liberties and lands, from conſuming by piece-meale: they were to be deuoured whole, and ſwallowed vp at once. Eſpecially the Macedonian, as the moſt vnpliant, and wherein many of the Greekes began to haue affiance, was neceſſarily to be made an example, how much better it were better to bow than to breake.

Polyb. legat. 51. & 53.

Neither

Neither Perseus nor the Romans were ignorant, how the Greekes at this time stood affected. Perseus, by reason of his neere neighbourhood, and of the daily commerce betweene them and his subiects, could not want good information, of all that might concerne him, in their affaires. He well knew, that all of them now apprehended the danger which Philopœmen had long since foretold; of the miserable subiection, Whereinto Greece was likely to be reduced, by the Roman patronage. Indeed they not onely perceiued the approching danger: but as being tenderly sensible of their liberty, felt themselues grieued with the present subiection, wherto already they were become obnoxious: Wherefore though none of them had the courage, in matters of the publike to fall out with the Romans: yet all of them had the care, to choose among themselues none other Magistrates, than such as affected the good of their Countrie, and would for no ambition, or other seruile respect, bee flatterers of the greatnesse which kept all in feare. Thus it seemed likely, that all domesticall conspiracies would soone bee at an end; when honestie and loue of the Commonweale, became the faireſt way to preferment. Of this carefull prouision for the safety of Greece, the Romans were not throughly aduertised: eyther because things were diligently concealed from their Embassadours, whom all men knew to be little better than Spies; or becausse little account was made of that intelligence, which was brought in by such Traytors (of whom euery Citie in Greece had too many) as were men vnregarded among their owne people, and therefore more like to speake maliciously than truely; or perhaps because the Embassadours themselues, being all Senators, and capable of the greateſt Office or charge, had no will to finde out other matter of trouble, than was fitting to their owne desires of employment. But it is hard to conceale that which many know, from those that are feared or flattered by many. The Achæans being to send Embassadours to Rome, that should both excuse them, as touching some point wherein they refused to obey the Senate; and informe the Senate better in the same businesse; chose one Callicrates, among others, to goe in that Embassage. By their making choise of such a man; one may perceiue the aduantage, which mischieuous wretches, who commonly are forward in pursuing their vile desires, haue against the plaine sort of honest men, that least earnestly thrust themselues into the troublesome businesse of the weale publike. For this Callicrates was in such wise transported with ambition; that hee chose much rather to betray his Country, than to let any other bee of more authoritie than himselfe therein. Wherefore instead of well discharging his credence, and alleadging what was meeteſt in iustification of his people: he vttered a quite contrary tale; and strongly encouraged the Romans, to oppresse both the Achæans, and all the rest of Greece, with a farre more heauy hand. He told the Senate, that it was high time for them, to looke vnto the settling of their authority, among his froward Countrimen; if they meant not wholly to forgoe it. For now there was taken vp a custome, to stand vpon points of confederacie, and lawes: as if these were principally to bee had in regard; any iniunction from Rome notwithstanding. Hence grew it, that the Achæans both now, and at other times, did what best pleased themselues, and answered the Romans with excuses: as if it were enough to say, That by some condition of League, or by force of some Law, they were discharged, or hindred, from obeying the decrees of the Senate. This would not be so, if He, and some other of his opinion, might haue their wils: who ceased not to affirme, That no Columes or Monuments erected, nor no solemne oath of the whole Nation, to ratifie the obseruance of Confederacie or statute, ought to be of force, when the Romans willed the contrarie. But it was euen the fault of the Romans themselues, That the multitude refused to giue eare vnto such perswasions. For howsoeuer in popular Estates, the sound of libertie vsed to be more plausible, than any discourse tending against it: yet if they which vndertooke the maintenance of an argument, seeming neuer so bad, were sure by their so doing, to procure their owne good; the number of them would increase increaſe apace, and they became the preualent faction. It was therfore ſtrange, how the Fathers could ſo neglect the aduancement of thoſe, that ſought wholly to enlarge the amplitude of the Roman maieſty. More wiſely, though with ſeditious and rebellious purpoſe, did the Greekes: who many times, yea and ordinarily, conferred great honours, vpon men otherwiſe of little account or deſert; onely for hauing vttered ſome braue words againſt the Romans. The Fathers, hearing theſe and the like reaſons, wherewith he exhorted them to handle roughly thoſe that were obſtinate, and by cheriſhing their friends, to make their partie ſtrong; reſolued to follow this good counſaile, in euery point; yea to depreſſe all thoſe that held with the right, and to ſet vp their owne followers, were it by right or by wrong. And to this end, they not onely dealt thenceforth more peremptorily with the Achæans, than had bin their maner in former times; but wrote at the preſent vnto all Cities of Greece; requiring them to ſee that their mandate (which was concerning the reſtitution of thoſe that were baniſhed out of Lacedæmon) ſhould bee fulfilled. Particularly in behalfe of Callicrates; they aduiſed all men, to be ſuch, and ſo affected, as hee was, in their ſeueral common-weales. With this diſpatch, Callicrates returned home a ioyfull man: hauing brought his Country into the way of ruine, but himſelfe into the way of preferment. Neuertheleſſe he forbore to vant himſelfe, of his eloquence vſed in the Senate. Onely he ſo reported his Embaſſage, that all men became feare- full of the danger, wherewith hee threatned thoſe that ſhould preſume to oppoſe the Romans. By ſuch arts hee obtained to be made Pretor of the Achæans: in which Magiſtracie, as in all his courſes following, he omitted nothing, that might ſerue to manifeſt his ready obſequiouſnes vnto thoſe whom he had made his Patrons. Polyb. Legat. 58.

Now as the Romans by threatning termes wan many flatterers, and loſt as many true friends: ſo Perſeus on the other ſide, thinking by liberall gifts, and hopefull promiſes, to aſſure vnto himſelfe thoſe that ill could brooke his enemies; got indeed a multitude of partakers, though little honeſter than his enemies had. Thus were all the Cities of Greece diſtracted with factions: ſome holding with the Romans; ſome with the Macedonian; and ſome few, reſpecting only the good of the Eſtates, where- in they liued. Hereat the Lords of the Senate were highly offended; and thought it an indignitie not ſufferable, That a King, no better than their vaſſall, ſhould dare to become head of a faction againſt them. This therefore muſt be reckoned in the number of his treſpaſſes: wherof if not any one alone, yet all of them together, ſhall affoord them iuſt occaſion to make war vpon him. Perſeus hauing finiſhed his buſineſſe among the Dolopians, made a journey to Apollo his temple at Delphi. He tooke his armie along with him; yet went, and returned, in ſuch peaceable and friendly wiſe, that no place was the worſe for his journey, but the good affection towards him generally increaſed therby. With thoſe that were in his way, he dealt himſelfe; to ſuch as lay further off, he ſent Embaſſadors or letters: praying them, That the memory of al wrongs whatſoeuer, done by his father, might be buried with his fa- ther; ſince his own meaning was to hold friendſhip ſincerely with all his neighbors. The Romans perhaps could haue beene pleaſed better, if he had behaued himſelfe after a contrary faſhion, and done ſome acts of hoſtilitie in his paſſage. Yet as if he ought not to haue taken ſuch a journey, without their licence; this alſo was made a valuable matter, and caſt into the heap of his faults. He laboured greatly to recouer the loue of the Achæans: which his father had ſo loſt, that by a ſolemne decree, they forbade any Macedonian to enter their territories. It was jealouſie perhaps, no leſſe than hatred, which cauſed them, at the firſt, to make ſuch a decree. For how ſoeuer Philip had by many vile acts, eſpecially by the death of the two Arati, giuen them cauſe to abhor him: yet in the publike adminiſtration of their eſtate, he had, for the more part, been to them ſo beneficiall, that not without much adoe and at length, without any generall conſent, they reſolued to forſake him. Wherfore it was need- full, euen for preſeruation of concord among them, to vſe al circumſpection; that he might not, by his agents, negotiate, and hold intelligence with any, in a country, towards him so doubtfully affected: especially when by hearkening to his messages, they might make themselues suspected by their new friends. But the continuance of this decree, beyond the time of warre, and when all danger of innouation was past; was vnciuill, if not inhumane, as nourishing deadly hatred, without leauing meanes of reconciliation. And hereof the Achæans reaped no good fruit. For although they were not, in like sort, forbidden the Kingdome of Macedon: yet vnderstanding what would be due to them, if they should aduenture thither, none of them durst set foot therein. Hence it came to passe, that their bondmen, knowing a safe harbour, out of which their masters could not fetch them, ran daily away, in great numbers: exceedingly to the losse of such, as made of their slaues very profitable vse. But Perseus took hold vpon this occasion: as fitly seruing to pacifie those, whose enmitie faine he would haue changed into loue. He therefore apprehended all these fugitiues, to send them home againe: and wrote vnto the Achæans, That as for good will vnto them, he had taken paines to restore back their seruants; so should they doe very well to take order for keeping them, that hereafter they might not runne away againe. His meaning was readily vnderstood, and his letters kindely accepted by the greater part; being openly rehearsed by the Pretor, before the Councell. But Callicrates tooke the matter very angerly; and bade them be aduised what they did: for that this was none other, than a plaine deuice, to make them depart from the friendship of the Romans. Herewithall he tooke vpon him, somewhat liberally, to make the Achæans before-hand acquainted with the warre, that was comming vpon Perseus from Rome. Hee told them, how Philip had made preparations for the same warre; how Demetrius had beene made away, because of his good affection to the Romans; and how Perseus had, since his being King, done many things, tending to the breach of peace. Briefly He rehearsed all those matters, which were afterwards alleaged by the Romans; the inuasion of the Bastarnæ, vpon the Dardanians; the Kings journey against the Dolopians; his voyage to Delphi; and finally, his peaceable behauiour, which was (he said) a dangerous temptation of men to his party. Wherefore he aduised them, to expect the euent of things, and not ouer-hastily to enter into any degree of friendship with the Macedonians. Hereto good answere was made by the Pretors brother: That Callicrates was too earnest, in so light a matter; and that, being neither one of the Kings cabbinet, nor of the Roman Senate, he made himselfe too well acquainted with all that had passed, or was like to follow. For it was well knowne, that Perseus had renued his league with the Romans; that he was by them saluted King, and friend to the Estate; and that He had louingly entertained their Embassadors. This being so: why might not the Achæans, as well as the Ætolians, Thessalians, Epirots, and all the Greekes, hold with him such correspondence, as common humanitie required? Neuertheless Callicrates was growne a man so terrible, by his Roman acquaintance, that they durst not ouer-stiffely gainesay him. Therefore the matter was referred vnto further deliberation: and answere made the whilest, That since the King had onely sent a letter without any Embassadour; they knew not how to resolue. Better it was to say thus, than that they were afraid to doe as they thought most reasonable and conuenient. But when Perseus, herewith not contented, would needs vrge them further, and send Embassadors: then were they faine, without any good pretence, to put on a countenance of anger, & deny to giue audience: which was proofe sufficient (to one that could vnderstand) of the condition wherein they liued. For harkening to this aduice of Callicrates; they were soone after highly commended by a Roman Embassador: whereby it became apparent, that the Romans intended warre vpon the Macedonian; though hitherto no cause of warre was giuen.

§. V.

How EVMENES King of Pergamus was busied with PHARNACES, the Rhodians and others. His hatred to the Macedonian: whom hee accuseth to the Roman Senate. The Senate honours him greatly, and contemnes his enemies the Rhodians; with the causes thereof. The vnusuall stoutnesse of the Macedonian Embassadours. PERSEVS his attempt vpon EVMENES. The brotherly loue betweene EVMENES and ATTALVS. PERSEVS his deuice to poyson some of the Roman Senators: whereupon they decree warre against him, and send him defiance. Other things, concerning the iustice of this warre.

EVMENES King of Pergamus had beene troubled, about these times, by the Kings Pharnaces and Mithridates his neighbours. He had taken the right course; in making first his complaint to the Romans: by whom he was animated with comfortable words, and promise, That they, by their authoritie, would end the businesse, to his content. But Polyb. Legat. 56. & 59. in conclusion, by the helpe of the Kings Prusias and Ariarathes, he ended the warre himselfe; and brought the Enemies to seeke and accept peace, on such conditions as pleased him to giue them. After this being at good leisure; hee began to consider, how the affaires of Macedon stood vnder Perseus. His hatred to Perseus was very great: and therefore hee was glad to vnderstand, that the hatred of the Romans, to the same his Enemy, was as great, and withall notorious. Now besides his ancient and hæreditarie quarrell with the Macedonian; it vexed him exceedingly, That his owne honours (whereof the Greekes, prodigal in that kinde, had heaped immoderate store on his father and him) began to wax euery where stale: whilest Perseus, either by his currying fauour, or by the enuie borne to the Romans, had gotten their best liking and wishes. For despight of this indignitie, Hee stirred vp the Lycians against the Rhodians his old friends: and in helping these rebels was so violent, that he proceeded, in a manner, to open warre. But small pleasure found he, in these poore and indirect courses of reuenge. The Lycians could not be saued by his patronage, from seuere and cruell chastisement, giuen to them by the Rhodians. This rendred him contemptible: as likewise, his acts of hostilitie, little different from robberies, made him hatefull to those which loued him before. As for his Polyb. Legat. 74. honours in the Cities of Greece; they not onely continued falling into neglect; but were abrogated by a decree of the Achæans, as too vnmeasured, misbeseeming them to giue, and affected by him beyond the proportion of his deseruings. All this (which he needed not to haue regarded, had he not beene too vainely ambitious) befell him, especially for his being ouer-seruiceable to the Romans, and for his Liuie lib. 42. malice to that noble Kingdome, which if it fell, the libertie of Greece was not like to stand. Now for the redresse hereof; hee thought it vaine to striue any longer with bounty, against such an aduersarie, as by hopefull promises alone, without any great performance, had ouer-topped him in the generall fauor. And therfore he resolued euen to ouerturne the foundations of this Popularitie, by inducing the Romans vtterly to take away from the eyes of men, this Idol, The Macedonian Kingdome, which all so vainely worshipped. Neither would it proue a difficult matter, to perswade those that were already desirous: rather hee was like to bee highly thanked, for setting forward their wishes; and perhaps to be recompenced with some piece of the Kingdome, as he had beene rewarded, for the like seruice, when Antiochus was vanquished.

To this end, he made a second voyage to Rome: where though hee had little to say which they knew not before; yet his words were heard with such attention, as if they had contained some strange nouelties, and so pondered by the Fathers, as if the weight of them were to turne the ballance, that before was equall. The death of

of Demetrius, the expedition of the Bastarnæ into Dardania; that of Perseus himselfe against the Dolopians, and to Delphi; the great estimation of the Macedonian in Greece; his intermeddling in businesse of neighbours; his riches; and his great prouisions: were all the materiall points of Eumenes his discourse. Only He descended vnto particulars, hauing searched into all (as hee professed) like vnto a Spie. Hee said, That Perseus had thirty thousand foot, and fiue thousand Horse of his owne; money in a readinesse to entertaine ten thousand mercinaries for ten yeeres; armes, to furnish a number thrice as great; The Thracians his friends at hand, readie, at a call, to bring him soldiours as many as he should require; and that he prepared victuals for ten yeeres, because he would not be driuen, either to liue vpon spoile, or to take from his owne subiects. Herewithall Hee prayed them to consider, that King Seleucus the sonne and successor of Antiochus the Great, had giuen his daughter Laodice in marriage to Perseus; Perseus not wooing, but Seleucus offering the match; That King Prusias of Bithynia, by earnest suite, had gotten to wife the sister of Perseus; and that these mariages were solemnized with great concourse of Embassages from all quarters. Neither spared Hee to tell them, (though seeming loth to vtter it plainely) That euen the enuie of their Estate was the cause, why many that could not endure to heare of amitie with Philip, were now growne maruellously well affected to his sonne. All this, and some facts of Perseus, which might either bee denied, or iustified (as that hee had procured the death of some which were friends to the Romans; and that hee had expelled Abrypolis the Illyrian, who inuaded Macedon, out of his Kingdome or Lordship) Eumenes failed not to amplifie vnto the most: saying that he thought it his dutie to forewarne them; since it would bee to Himselfe a great shame, if Perseus got the start of him, and were in Italie making warre vpon the Romans, ere Eumenes could come thither to tell them of the danger.

It were too great folly, to beleeue that the Romans stood in feare of Perseus, lest hee should set vpon them in Italie. Neuertheless forasmuch as they loued not to make warre without faire pretence, not only of wrong done to them or their associates, but of further hurt intended: great thankes were giuen to Eumenes, who had euery way furnished them with such goodly colour, to beautifie their intendment. Now though it were so, that He told them little else than what they knew before: yet his person, and the manner of his comming, made all seeme greater. For if vpon any relation made by their owne Embassadours, or vpon tales deuised by their flatterers and spies, they had warred against Perseus, ere Hee had committed any open act of hostilitie against them; their injustice, and oppression, would haue beene most manifest. But when the wrongs to them done were so notorious, and the danger threatning them so terrible; that such a Prince as Eumenes, came out of his owne Kingdome, as farre as from Asia, to bid them looke to themselues: who could blame them, if they tooke the speediest order to obtaine their owne right and securitie? Toward this justification of the warre, and magnifying the necessitie that enforced them thereto; their more then vsuall curiositie, in concealing what Eumenes had vttered in the Senate, when they could not but vnderstand that his errand was well knowne; helped not a little. The Macedonian and Rhodian Embassadors were at Rome, prouided of answeres to the words, which they knew beforehand that he would speake; and with matter of recrimination. The vanity, either of Him, or of some about him, seemes to haue disclosed all: when the warinesse of the Fathers, in hiding that which all men knew, made a notable shew of some fearefull apprehension; against which, it behooued their wisedome to neglect no possible remedy. Wherefore careless audience was giuen to the Rhodian Embassadours; who accused Eumenes, as one more troublesome to Asia, than Antiochus had euer been, and a prouoker of the Lycians to rebellion. The Rhodians had with great pompe, conueighed by Sea vnto Perseus, his bride Laodice; which friendly office as the Macedonian bountifully requited, so the Romans despightfully accepted.

cepted. Hence it grew, that when the Lycians, as alreadie vanquiſhed, were ſettling themſelues in their obedience to the people of Rhodes: Embaſſadours came from Rome with ſtrange newes, which gaue new life to the rebellion. For the Senate pronounced, That it ſtood not with the manner of the Romans, to aliene quite from their owne protection any people or Nation by them vanquiſhed; and that the Lycians were by them aſſigned vnto thoſe of Rhodes, not as meere vaſſals, but as dependants and aſſociates. For proofe hereof, they referred themſelues vnto the commentaries of the ten Embaſſadors, whom they had ſent to diſpoſe of things in Aſia, after the victorie againſt King Antiochus. Hereat Eumenes, Maſaniſſa, The Ætolians, and all other Kings or Eſtates, that were beholding to Rome for increaſing the number of their ſubiects, had cauſe to find themſelues agrieued if they well conſidered the matter: ſince by force of this or the like decree, thoſe their ſubiects might eaſily be made their fellowes, whenſoeuer it ſhould pleaſe the Senate: though it were ſo, that all men knew the preſent meaning of the Senate, which was only to plague the Rhodians, for their good will to Perſeus, by ſetting them and the Lycians together by the eares. The Fathers could therfore ſee no reaſon to diſlike Eumenes, vpon this complaint made by the Rhodian Embaſſadours; which indeed more neerely touched themſelues. Rather they honoured the King ſo much the more: for that others (as they would needes take it) conſpired againſt him, becauſe of his loue to Rome.

Liu. lib. 41.

But the Macedonian Embaſſage they heard not ſo careleſſely as angrily: though peraduenture it well contented them to find cauſe of anger. For whereas at other times all care had been taken, to pacifie them with gentle words and excuſes: now heard they plainer language, and were told, That King Perſeus deſired much to giue them ſatisfaction, concerning any deed or word of his, that might ſauour of hoſtilitie; but that, if his trauaile in this kind proued vaine, then would he be ready to defend himſelfe by armes, and ſtand to the chance of warre, which often falles out contrarie to expectation. Theſe big words may ſeeme to haue proceeded from the vehemencie of Harpalus, that was chiefe of the Embaſſadors; rather than from inſtruction giuen by the King, with whoſe faint heart they agreed not. Yet was there good reaſon, why Perſeus himſelfe might, at this time, thinke to ſpeed better by a ſhew of daring, than he was like to doe by any ſubmiſſion. For the eyes of all Greece being now caſt vpon him, as on the greateſt hope of deliuerance from the Roman ſeruitude; it was not expedient, that he ſhould leſſen, or perhaps vtterly cut off, the generall expectation, and the good affection borne to him, which thereon depended, by diſcouering his too much weakeneſſe of ſpirit, vnanſwerable to a worke of ſuch importance. Wherefore He, or his Embaſſadour for him, was bold to ſet a good countenance on a game not very bad, but ſubiect (in appearance) to Fortune; which might haue beene his, had he knowne how to vſe it.

Now that this braueric (as better it may bee termed than courage) proceeded from the Kings owne heat; it appeares by his daring to aduenture ſoone after, on a practice that more iuſtly might anger the Romans, and giue them fairer ſhew of reaſon to make warre vpon him. It was knowne that Eumenes, in returning home, would take Delphi in his way, and there doe ſacrifice to Apollo. Perſeus deadly hating him, and thirſting after his bloud, reſolued to way-lay him, and by making there of him a ſacrifice, to rid his owne hands of a moſt miſchieuous enemie. So there were appointed three or foure ſtout ruffians to do the murder: who placing themſelues behind a broken mud wall, on the ſide of a very narrow path leading vp from the Sea to the Temple; did thence aſſault the King; whom they ſorely bruiſed with great ſtones, and left for dead. They might haue finiſhed their worke; ſuch was the opportunitie of the place which they had choſen; but feare of being apprehended, made them, without ſtaying to ſee all ſure, flee in ſuch haſte, that they killed one of their owne companions, who could not hold pace with them, becauſe he ſhould not diſcouer them. Eumenes was conueighed away to the little Iſle of Ægina, gina, where he was cured: being all the while kept so secretly, that the fame of his death was current in Asia. Hence it came, that his brother Attalus tooke vpon him as king, and either took or would haue taken to wife (supposing it belike a matter of state) Stratonica the daughter of King Ariarathes, whom hee then thought the widdow of Eumenes. It may well be numbred among the rare examples of brotherly loue, That when the King returned aliue home, Attalus going forth to meet him and doe his dutie, as in former times, receiued none other checke, than that Hee should forbeare to marrie with the Queene, vntill Hee were well assured of the Kings death. More than this, Eumenes neuer spake of these matters; but bequeathed at his death, vnto the same brother, both his wife and Kingdome. As likewise Attalus forbore to attempt any thing to the prejudice of the King his brother: though the Romans (with whom he continued and grew in especiall fauour, when Eumenes fell into their hatred) were in good readinesse, to haue transferred the Kingdome from his brother to Him. By such concord of brethren was the Kingdome of Pergamus raysed and vpheld: as might also that of Macedon haue beene, if Demetrius had liued and employed his grace with the Romans, to the benefit of Perseus.

It is likely that Perseus was very glad when he vnderstood, that his ministers had both accomplished his will, and had saued all from discouerie. But as hee was deceiued in the maine point, and heard shortly after, that Eumenes liued: so was He beguiled in that other hope, of the concealement; which hee vainly esteemed the lesse materiall. For He had written to one Praxo a Gentlewoman of Delphi, to entertaine the men whom he sent about this busines: and she, being apprehended by C. Valerius a Roman Embassador then attending vpon the matters of Greece, was carried to Rome. Thus all came to light. Valerius also brought with him to Rome, out of Greece, one Rammius a Citizen of Brundusium: who comming newly from the court of Macedon, loaden with a dangerous secret; had presently sought out the Embassador, and thereof discharged himselfe. Brundusium was the ordinary Port, for ships passing betweene Italie and Greece. There had Rammius a faire house; wherein he gaue entertainment, being a wealthie man, to Embassadours, and other honourable personages, both Romans and Macedonians, iourneying to and fro. By occasion of such his hospitalitie, he was commended to Perseus, and inuited into Macedon with friendly letters; as one, whose many courtesies to his Embassadours, the King was studious to requite. At his comming he was much made of; and shortly, with more familiaritie than he expected or desired, made partaker of the Kings secrets. The summe of all was, That he must needs doe a turne, in giuing to such of the Romans as the King should hereafter name, a poyson of rare qualitie, sure in operation, yet not to be perceiued either in the taking or afterward. He durst not refuse to accept this employment: for feare lest the vertue of this medicine should bee tryed vpon himselfe. But being once at libertie, he discouered all. Rammius was but one man, and one whom the King had neuer seene before, nor was like to see againe: and therefore, besides that the Kings deniall ought to be as good as such a fellowes affirmation, the accusatiō was improbable. Thus did Perseus, in time shortly following, answer for himselfe; and in like sort concerning the attempt vpon Eumenes: denying to haue had any hand, either in the one or other: yet withall professing, That such obiections were not to bee made vnto a King, to proue the rightfulnesse of making war vpon him; but rather vnto a subiect pleading for his life in judgment. But howsoeuer the Romans neglected the getting of stronger proofe (which might haue bin easie) than any that we find by them produced: yet the base and cowardly temper of Perseus was very suteable to these practices. Neither did the Senate greatly stand to dispute the matter with him: these his treacheries being held inexcusable. And as for his Royall Estate, wherein he supposed that they ought not to touch him for such priuate offences, it gaue him no priuiledge: they judging him to haue offended in the nature of a King. Herein surely they wanted not good reason. For if hee might might not lawfully make warre vpon Eumenes their confederate; that is, if Hee might not ſend men, to waſte the Kingdom of Pergamus, or to beſiege the Towns: might he ſend Ruffians to murder the King? If it were no leſſe breach of the league to deſtroy the Senators by fire or famine, than by violence of the ſword: was it lawfull for him to doe it by Poyſon? Wherefore they preſently decreed warre againſt him; and ſent Embaſſadours to denounce it vnto him, vnleſſe hee would yeeld to make ſuch amends as they ſhould require. He ſeemes at this time to haue been ſo confident in the generall fauour of Greece, and other comfortable appearances; that if he deſired not warre, yet he did not feare it: or at leaſt he thought by ſhew of courage, to make his enemies the more calme. He cauſed the Embaſſadors to dance attendance, till being weary, they departed without audience. Then called he them backe; and bade them do their errand. They made a tedious rehearſall of all matters, which they had long been collecting againſt him, and wherewith Eumenes had charged him: adding therto, that He had entertained long and ſecret conference in the Ile of Samothrace, with Embaſſadours ſent to him out of Aſia, about ſome ill purpoſe. In regard of all which they peremptorily required ſatisfaction; as was their maner when they intended to giue defiance. Better they might haue ſtood vpon the euidence, brought againſt him by Rummius and Praxo. For if thoſe accuſations could be verified, then wanted they not good ground wheron to build: of which otherwiſe they were deſtitute; it being no fault in a King, to bee ſtrong, welbeloued, and well friended. Perſeus anſwered, for the preſent, in a rage; calling the Romans, Greedy, Proud, Inſolent, & vnderminers of him by their daily Embaſſadors, that were no better then meere ſpies. Finally, hee promiſed to giue them in writing their ful anſwere: which was to this effect; That he would no longer ſtand to the league, made betweene them and his father, and renewed by himſelfe indeed onely for feare: but wiſhed them to deſcend to more equall conditions, whereupon he, for his part, would aduiſe, as they might alſo doe for theirs.

In the forme of the league betweene Philip and the Romans, as it is ſet downe by Polybius, we finde no condition, binding the Macedonian to any inconuenience in the future; excepting thoſe which he immediatly performed. But Liuie inſerts a clauſe, whereby hee was expreſly forbidden, to make any warre abroad, without leaue of the Romans. It is moſt likely, that all the Roman confederats were included in this peace: whereby euery one of the neighbours round about Macedon, entring ſhortly into league with Rome, did ſo binde the Kings hands, that hee could no more make warre abroad, than if hee had been reſtrained by plaine couenant. And thus might that ſeeme an Article of the peace, which neuer was agreed vpon, but onely was inferred by conſequence. Now if the Romanes would vrge this point further, and ſay, that the Macedonian might not beare defenſiue armes, without their permiſſion: then had Perſeus very iuſt reaſon to finde himſelfe agrieued. For ſince they had allowed his father, without controule, to make warre in Thrace, (whileſt they themſelues were vnacquainted with the Thracians) and elſewhere abroad, though he asked not their licence: why ſhould they now interpret the bargaine after another faſhion? Was it now become vnlawfull for him to chaſtiſe his owne Rebels, or to repay an Illyrian that inuaded Macedon? By ſuch allegations hee maintained the right of his cauſe, in very milde ſort; when it was too late. At the preſent, by diſclaiming the league as vniuſt; hee miniſtred occaſion vnto the Embaſſadours, to giue him defiance. Hauing heard the worſt of their meſſage; hee commanded them to be gone out of his kingdome in three dayes. But either hee ſhould haue been leſſe vehement, or more conſtant in his reſolution. For if his heart could ſerue him to vndertake the warre; hee ſhould couragiouſly haue managed it, and haue fallen to worke immediatly, whileſt the Enemie was vnprepared; not haue loſt opportunity, as now and often he did, in hope of obtaining a worſe peace than the former.

SO long had the Romans beene seeking occasion to take in hand this Macedonian warre, that well they might haue been ready for it, when it came; and not (as they were) behinde-hand in prouisions. But it was on a sudden that they met with a confluence of good pretences to make the warre: whereof, if no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together seemed more than sufficient. This opportunitie of making their cause honest in common opinion, was not to be neglected: though otherwise they were vnprepared for the action. Wherefore knowing, or hauing reason to beleeue, that their owne strength was such as would preuaile in the end; they hastily embraced the faire occasion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of Time. Neither was this their vnreadinesse a small helpe, towards examining the disposition of the Greekes, and others; who must afterwards dearely pay for any backwardnesse found in their good will. There was not indeede any cause to feare, that all of the Greekes or other Easterne people should conspire together, and take part with the Macedonian: such was the dissension betweene their seuerall estates; how soeuer the generalitie of them were inclined the same way. Neuertheless Embassadours were sent to deale with them all; and to craue their helpe against Perseus, or rather to demand it, in no lesse ample manner, than heretofore they had yeelded it against Philip and Antiochus, in warres pretending the liberty of Greece. The Embassadours vsed as gentle words for fashions sake, as if they had stood in doubt, that their request might happen to be denied. But the Greekes were now growne well acquainted with such Roman courtesie: and vnderstood, that not onely such as made refusall, but euen they who might seeme to haue granted halfe vnwillingly; were like to heare other manner of words, when once this businesse was ended. Wherefore none of them were scrupulous in promising the best of their helpe to the Romans; * the Achæans and Rhodians, which were chiefe among them, being rather doubtfull, euen when they had done their best, lest it should be ill taken, as if they had halted in some part of their duetie. It is strange, that men could bee so earnest to set vp the side, whereof they gladly would haue seene the ruine. The vulgar sort was euery where addicted to Perseus; of the Nobles and Rulers, if some were vehemently Roman, they wanted not opposers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea, the wisest and most honest, who regarded onely the benefit of their Countrey, wished better to Perseus than to the Romans. And of this number, Polybius the chiefe of Historians was one: who though Hee * iudged the victorie of Perseus, like to proue hurtfull vnto Greece; yet wished hee the Romanes ill to thriue, that so the Greekes might recouer perfect libertie: for his endeuours in which course, hee was at length tyrannically handled, as shall bee shewed hereafter. This considered, it appeares, that that an extraordinary feare, and not onely reuerence of the Imperiall Cit e, made the Achæans and other Estates of Greece, thus conformable to the Romans. The occasion of this their feare, may be iustly imputed vnto the timorous demeanour of Perseus himselfe. He had vndertaken a warre, whereof the benefit should redound, not only to his own Kingdom, but vnto all that were oppressed by the Romans. Yet no sooner were some few companies brought ouer sea, to make a countenance of meaning somewhat against him, than he began to speake the enemie faire, and sue for peace at Rome. Since therefore it was knowne, that euery small thing would serue to terrifie him; and consequently, that it should at all times be in the Romans power, by giuing him any tolerable conditions of peace, to take reuenge at leisure vpon those which had assisted him: little cause was there, why any should aduenture to partake with him. He made indeed a great noise; leading about his armie; taking by force or composition, some few townes; and soliciting all to ioyne with him. But wise men could not be so beguiled. For at the same time, hee sought all meanes of pacification: and to that end, made humble suit vnto the Roman Embassadors. Q. Martius, the chiefe of those Embassadors, and a man of more fineneſſe in cunning than was vsuall among the Romans; made shew of inclination to the Kings desire: and gaue out such comfortable words, that the King intreated, and obtained a meeting at the Riuer Peneus. There did Martius very gently rebuke the King, and charge him with those crimes that are before mentioned. Whereto though Perseus made none other answer, than the same which they could haue made for him; yet the Embassadors, and especially Martius, tooke it in good part, as therewith satisfied; and aduised him to giue the like satisfaction to the Senate. That this might conueniently bee done; a truce was agreed vpon. Thus had Martius his desire; which was, to make the King loſe time. For Perseus had all things then in readines, and might haue done much, ere the Roman army could haue been in Greece. But by the interposition of this truce, he no way increased his forces; he suffred a most conuenient season, of winning vpon the enemie, to slip away; and obtained in recompence nothing else, than leisure and vaine hope. Yet was he pleased herewith, as it had bin with some victory: publishing a copie of the disputation between him and the Romans, whereby he gaue men to vnderstand, how much he had the better, and what great hope there was of Peace. He sent Embassadors also to the Rhodians, of whose good will to him he was best perswaded; not onely to let them know how much he was superiour in cause; but to intreat them, that they would take vpon them, as moderators; to compound the differences betweene him and the Romans, if perhaps, notwithstanding the goodneſſe of his cause, he should be denied peace. These were poore helps. For hereby it appeared, that his late standing vpon point of Honor, was no better than meere vanity: his owne safety being the vtmost of his ambition. This his fearefulnes might seeme excusable, and the blame therof to appertaine vnto the Greekes; who deceiued his expectation, by being wanting to him in time of a neceſſity, that was partly their own: had it not bin his office, who tooke vpon him as their Champion, to giue such a manly beginning to the war, as might incourage al others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, men grew daily more and more auerse from him; and were carefull, not to put their shoulders to a falling wall. The Rhodians, among whom he had many stout partizans, desired him not to craue any thing at their hands, in which they might seeme to do against the good liking of the Romans. The Bœotians also, who had entred of late into a strict societie with the Macedonian; renounced it now, and made the like with the Romans: to whom further, in a sort, they yeelded thēselues as vassals. Neither was Martius contented to accept their submission vnder a generall forme; but caused their seuerall townes to make couenant apart, each for it selfe; to the end, that being thus distracted into many little common-weales, they might not (were they neuer so desirous to rebell) haue such force to do hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated in one, vnder the Citie of Thebes. This work, of separating the Bœotians from Thebes their head; was more than Ageſilaus could effect, or Epaminondas would ſuffer, than when all Greece followed the Lacedæmonians. So far more auailable to Thebes, being deſtitute of helpe from abroad, was the vertue of Epaminondas and a few braue Citizens; than was the ſocietie with King Perſeus, againſt a number not ſo great as followed the Lacedæmonians.

Martius brought this to effect, whileſt the King ſate ſtill, as being bound by the truce: and hauing done this, he returned to the Citie; where vaunting what hee had wrought by his craft, he was commended, and (though ſome reproued it as diſhoneſt) employed againe by the Senate, with commiſſion to deale as hee ſhould thinke expedient. Touching the Embaſſadours which Perſeus had ſent; audience was giuen to them, for that they ſhould not plainly ſee how their Maſter was deluded: but neither excuſe, nor intreatie, would ſerue their turne; the Senate being reſolued before-hand what to doe. It was enough that they were admitted into the Citie, and had thirty dayes reſpite allowed them to depart out of Italy: whereas they, who came laſt on the ſame errand, did their meſſage without the walles, in the Temple of Bellona (the vſuall place of giuing audience to open Enemies, or to ſuch Commanders, as might not, by reaſon of ſome cuſtome, enter the Citie) and had onely the ſhort warning of eleuen dayes, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poore courteſie ſerue alone to hide the craft of Martius, as if hee had meant none other than good earneſt: but it was a likely mean, both to keepe a long while from Perſeus the knowledge of his buſineſſe, and to ſtagger his reſolution, when hee ſhould need it moſt firme.

And accordingly it fell out. For Licinius, the Roman Conſul, was at Apollonia, in a maner as ſoone, as the Macedonian Embaſſadors were with their King at Pella. Which, though it were enough to haue rouzed Perſeus, and haue made him lay aſide all cowardly hope of getting pardon: yet was hee content to deliberate awhile, Whether it were not better to offer himſelfe tributary to the Romans, and to redeeme their good will with ſome part of his Kingdome, that ſo he might enioy the reſt; than to put all at once to hazzard. But finally, the ſtouteſt counſel preuailed; which alſo was the wiſeſt, and ſo would haue proued, had it been ſtoutly and wiſely followed. He now began, as if the warre had not begunne vntill now, to doe what ſhould haue bin done long afore. He cauſed all his forces to be drawne together; and appointed their Rendeuous at Citium, a towne in Macedon. All being in readines, he did royall ſacrifice, with an hundred beaſts, to I know not what Minerua, that was peculiarly honored in his Country: and then with all his Courtiers, and thoſe of his guard, ſet forward to Citium. His armie he found conſiſting of nine and thirty thouſand foot, and foure thouſand horſe: whereof about twelue thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe, were ſtrangers, of ſundry Nations, moſt part Thracians; the reſt his owne Macedonians. Theſe hee animated with liuely ſpeeches; laying before them the glory of their anceſtors, the inſolencie of the Romans, the goodneſſe of his cauſe, the greatneſſe of his prouiſions, and the many aduantages which they had of the Enemie, eſpecially in numbers. They anſwered him cheerefully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all Cities of Macedon there came likewiſe meſſengers, offering to helpe him with money and victuals, according to their ſeuerall abilities. He gaue them thanks: but anſwered, That his owne prouiſions would abundantly ſuffice, willing them only to furniſh him with carts, for his engines and munition.

Out of his owne kingdome he iſſued forth into Theſſalie: knowing that the Romans were to paſſe through that Countrey, in their iourney towards him. Some Townes of Theſſalie opened their gates vnto him, without making offer to defend themſelues; ſome he balked, thinking them too ſtrong or well manned; and ſome he wanne by force. Of theſe laſt was Mylæ; a towne thought impregnable, and therefore, not more ſtoutly then proudly defended by the Inhabitants, who gaue contumelious language to the aſſailants. It was taken by reaſon of a ſally; which the Townesmen rashly made, and being driuen backe, receiued the Macedonians, that entred pell mell with them at the gate. All crueltie of warre was practised heere: to the greater terror of the obstinate. So Velatia and Connus (townes of much importance, especially Connus, which stood in the streights of Ossa, leading into Tempe) yeelded at the first. Hauing well fortified this passage, the King marched onwards to Sycurium, a towne seated on the foot of mount Ossa; where hee rested a while, expecting newes of the Enemie.

Licinius the Consul brought with him only two Roman Legions: being promised other strength of auxiliaries, which was thought sufficient. Eumenes, and Attalus his brother came to him in Thessalie, with foure thousand foot, and a thousand horse. Thither also came, from euery part of Greece, such aide as the seuerall Estates could afford, or thought expedient to send: which from the most of them was very little. Of the kings abroad; Masanissa sent thither his sonne Misagenes, with a thousand foot, as many horse, and two and twentie Elephants. Ariarathes the Cappadocian, by reason of his affinitie with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans, and had sent to Rome his yong sonne, there to bee brought vp: yet hee did little or nothing in this warre; perhaps because Eumenes himselfe began within awhile, but when it was too late, to be otherwise aduised than he had beene in the beginning. Prusias was content to be a looker on: as being allied to Perseus, and yet fearing the Romans. Antiochus and Ptolemie (though Ptolemie was then yong, and vnder Tutors) had busines of their owne; the Syrian meaning to inuade the Ægyptian: yet each of them promised helpe to the Romans, which they cared not to performe. Gentius the Illyrian was inclinable to the Macedonian: yet made good countenance to the Romans, for feare. It was a prettie tricke, wherewith M. Lucretius, the Roman Admirals brother, serued him, for this his counterfeit good will. This king had foure and fiftie shippes, riding in the hauen of Dyrrachium, vncertaine to what purpose: all which Lucretius tooke away, after a very kind sort; making shew to beleeue, That for none other ende than to serue the Romans, their good friend Gentius had sent thither this fleet. But whatsoeuer Gentius thought in the beginning; hee foolishly lost both his kingdome and himselfe, in the ende of this warre; by offering, rather then giuing, his helpe to Perseus.

With none other company than what hee brought ouer the sea, Licinius came into Thessalie: so tyred with a painfull iourney, through the mountainous country of Athamania, which stood in his way from Epirus; that if Perseus had beene ready, attending his descent into the Plaines, the Romans must needs haue taken a great ouerthrow. He refreshed himselfe and his wearied armie, by the riuer Peneus; where he encamped, attending his auxiliaries, that came in as fast as they could. It was not any slender helpe, that could enable him to deale with Perseus. Therefore he resolued, to abide where he then was, and keepe his trenches, vntill his numbers were sufficiently increased: contenting himselfe in the meane while, to haue gotten quiet entrance into the Country. The land of Thessalie, in which these two armies lay, was better affected to the Romans, than any part of Greece besides: as hauing beene freed by them from a more heauie yoke of bondage to the Macedonian, when there was little hope or expectation of such a benefit. It was generally rich, fruitfull, and abounding in all things needfull to mans life. In the midst of it, but somewhat more to the East, was that beautifull valley of Tempe, so exceedingly ful of all delights, that the name was often vsed at large, to signifie the most pleasant and goodly places. This valley of it selfe was not great: but adding to it those huge mountaines, Ossa and Olympus (famous in Poësie) with their Spurres or branches, by which it was on all sides enclosed; it occupied the better part of Thessalie. And this way were the Romans to enter into Macedon; vnlesse they would make an hungrie iourney, thorow the countrey of the Dassaretians, as in the former warre with Philip, they had long, in vaine, attempted to doe. Perseus therefore had no small aduantage, by being master of the streights leading into Tempe: though farre

greater he might haue had, if by misspending of time he had not lost it. For if in defending the ragged passages of these mountaines, he were able to put the Romans often to the worse; yea to winne vpon them (for a while) euery yeere more than other, both in strength and reputation: questionlesse he might haue done far greater things, had hee seized vpon the streights of Aous, which his father once kept, and defended all the countrie behinde the Mountaines of Pindus. Surely not without extreme difficultie, must the Romans haue either trauelled by land, with all their carriages and impediments, through places wherein was no reliefe to bee found; or else haue committed their armies, and all things thereto needefull, vnto the mercie of seas that were very dangerous; if they would haue sought other way into Macedon, than through the heart of Greece: vpon neither of which courses they once deuised, notwithstanding any trouble which they found in this present warre. It may perhaps be said, that the Greekes, and others, whom the King must haue left on his backe, would haue made him vnable to defend any place, too farre from his owne home. But they were all, excepting the Thessalians, better affected now to him, than they had bin to his father in the former warre. The Aetolians, vpon whom the Athamanians depended, grew into suspition with the Romans (as we shall finde anon) euen as soone as they met with Perseus. The Boeotians, how politikely soeuer Martius had wrought with them, aduentured themselues desperately in the Macedonians quarrell: what would they haue done, if hee at first had done his best? The Rhodians, Illyrians, yea and Eumenes himselfe, after awhile began to wauer, when they saw things goe better with Perseus, then they had expected. So that if in stead of discouraging his friends, by suing basely for peace; he had raised their hopes, by any braue performance in the beginning; and encreased the number of his well-willers, yea and bought downe with money (as hee might haue done) some of his enemies, and among them Eumenes, who offered for good recompence, to forget his broken head. then might the Romans perhaps haue bin compelled to forsake their imperious patronage ouer Greece; and to render the libertie, by them giuen, entire; which otherwise was but imaginarie. Such benefit of this warre, since it was hoped for afterwards, might with greater reason haue beene expected at first, from greater aduantages. But as a fearefull companie running from their enemies, till some riuer stay their flight; are there compelled by meere desperation to doe such actes, as done, while the battell lasted, would haue wonne the victorie: so fell it out with Perseus. In seeking to auoid the danger of that war, whereof hee should haue sought the honour; hee left his friends that would haue stood by him, and gaue them cause to prouide for their owne safetie: yet being ouertaken by necessitie, he chose rather to set his back to the mountaines of Tempe, and defend himselfe with his proper forces; than to bee driuen into such miserie, as was ineuitable, if he gaue a little further ground. What was performed by him or the Romans, all the while that he kept his footing in Thessalie, it is hard to shew particularly; for that the historie of those things is much perished. Wherefore we must be contented with the summe.

The Consul hauing no desire to fight, vntill such time as all his forces were arriued; kept within his trenches, and lay still encamped by the Riuer of Peneus, about three miles from Larissa. That which perswaded the Consul to protract the time; did contrariwise incite the King, to put the matter vnto a hasty triall. Wherefore hee inuited the Romans into the field; by wasting the land of the Pheraeans their confederates. Finding them patient of this indignitie; he grew bold to aduenture euen vnto their trenches: out of which if they issued, it was likely, that his aduantage in horse would make the victorie his owne. At his comming they were troubled; for that it was sudden: yet no way terrified; as knowing themselues to bee safely lodged. They sent out a few of King Eumenes his horse, and with them some light armed foot, to entertaine skirmish. The Captaine, and some other of these were slaine: but no matter of importance done; for that neither Licinius, nor Eumenes, manes, found it reaſonable to hazzard battell. Thus day after day, awhile together, Perſeus continued offring battaile: which they ſtill refuſed. Hereby his boldneſſe much increaſed; and much more, his reputation: to the griefe of thoſe, who being ſo farre come to make a Conqueſt, could ill digeſt the ſhame, that fell vpon them by their enduring theſe brauadoes. The towne of Sycurium, where Perſeus then lay, was twelue miles from the Romanes: neither was there any conuenient watering in that long march, which vſed to take vp foure houres of the morning; but he was faine to bring water along with him in carts, that his men might not be both weary and thirſtie when they came to fight. For remedie of theſe inconueniences, he found out a lodging, ſeuen miles neerer to the enemie: whom he viſited the next day by the Sunne riſing. His comming at ſuch an vnuſuall houre, filled the Campe with tumult: in ſo much as though hee brought with him onely his horſe and light armature, that were vnfit to aſſaile the trenches, yet the Conſull thought it neceſſary, and reſolued to giue checke to his pride. Wherefore he ſent foorth his brother C. Licinius, King Eumenes, Attalus, and many braue Captaines, with all his power of horſe, his Velites, and all the reſt of his light armature to trie their fortune: he himſelfe remaining in the Campe, with his Legions in readineſſe. The honor of this morning, was the Macedonian Kings; for he obtained the victorie in a manner entire, (though the Theſſalians made a good retrait) with little loſſe of his owne. But he diſcouered his weakneſſe ere night, by hearkening, as Princes commonly doe, to counſaile giuen by one of his owne temper. For whereas the Romans were in great feare leſt he ſhould aſſault their Campe; and to that purpoſe, vpon the firſt newes of his ſucceſſe, his Phalanx was brought vnto him by the Captaines, though vnſent for: he neuertheleſſe tooke it for ſound aduice, which indeed was timorous and baſe, To worke warily, and moderate his victorie; by which meanes it was ſaid, that either he ſhould get honeſt conditions of peace, or at leaſtwiſe many companions of his fortune. Certainly it was like, that his good fortune would exalt the hope and courage of his friends. Yet had it been greater, and had he wonne the Roman Campe, his friends would haue been the more, and the bolder. But ouer-great was his folly, in hoping then for peace: and in ſuing for it, euen when he had the victory, what elſe did he, than proclaim vnto all which would become his partakers, that neither good nor bad fortune ſhould keepe him from yeelding to the Romans, whenſoeuer they would be pleaſed to accept him? At this time the ioy of his victory would admit none of theſe conſiderations. Hee had ſlaine of the Roman horſe two hundred, and taken of them priſoners the like number. Of their foot he had ſlaine about two thouſand: loſing of his owne no more than twenty horſe and fortie foot. The Roman Campe, after this diſaſter, was full of heauineſſe and feare: it being much doubted that the enemie would ſet vpon it. Eumenes gaue counſaile to diſlodge by night, and remooue to a ſurer place beyond the Riuer Peneus. The Conſul, though aſhamed to profeſſe, by ſo doing, in what feare he ſtood; yet thought it better to acknowledge the loſſe paſt, than by ſtanding on proud tearmes, to drawe vpon himſelfe a greater calamitie. So he paſſed the Riuer in the dead of the night, and encamped more ſtrongly on the further ſide. The Ætolians were ſorely blamed for this loſſe: as if rather a trayterous meaning, than any true feare, had occaſioned their flight, wherein the reſt of the Greekes followed them. Fiue of them, that were men of eſpeciall marke, had been obſerued to be the firſt which turned their backes: an obſeruation likely to coſt them deare, at a time of better leiſure. As for the Theſſalians, their vertue was honoured with reward: ſo as the Greekes might learne, by examples of either kinde, that if they ſhould ſhunne indignation, or incurre fauour, then muſt they aduenture no leſſe for their Lords the Romans, than gladly they would doe for their owne libertie. Thus fared it with the Conſul and his armie. Perſeus came the next day to correct the former dayes errour; which how great it was, hee not vntill then found. The Romans were gotten into a place of ſafety; whither they could neuer

haue attained, if the King had either preſſed his victory, or giuen better heed to them that night: his light armature alone being ſufficient to haue rowted them, whileſt they were conueying themſelues to the other ſide of Peneus. But it was vaine to tell what might haue been done, ſince there was no remedie. The Romans were beaten, euen the flower of their Citie, the Gentlemen of Rome; out of whom were choſen their Senators, and conſequently the Generals themſelues, Pretors, Conſuls, and all that bore office or command among them; yea, they were beaten ſo ſhamefully, that they ſtole away by night, and ſuffered him to gather vp the ſpoyles of them without reſiſtance, as yeelding themſelues ouercome. With ſuch braue words did the King ſet out the glory of his action; diuiding the ſpoiles among his followers. But there was much wanting within him, to haue made his honor ſound. He came neerer to the Romans, and encamped at Mopſelus, a place in the mid-way betweene Tempe and Lariſſa: as if it were his meaning to preſſe them ſomewhat harder. Neuertheleſſe hee was eaſily perſwaded to vſe the occaſion, which he ſeemed to haue, of obtaining peace. Therefore he ſent vnto the Conſul, and offered to yeeld vnto the ſame Conditions, wherein his father had beene bound to the Romans; if the war might ſo take end. It were needleſſe here againe to ſhew the folly of this his courſe. Towards the accompliſhment of this deſired peace, there was in the Conſul no greater power than to grant a truce, whileſt Embaſſadours might goe to Rome: it reſting in the Senate and People to approue the conditions, and ratifie the league. And of ſuch a truce granted by Martius, he had lately found no ſmal diſcommodity redounding. But Licinius dealt plainly, and returned anſwere, That other hope of peace there was none; ſaue that Perſeus would yeeld both his Kingdome and perſon, ſimply and abſolutely, to diſcretion of the Senate. A manly part it was of Licinius, to be ſo reſolute in aduerſitie. On the other ſide, it argued a very faint heart in Perſeus, that hauing receiued an anſwere ſo peremptory, hee ſtill perſiſted, making vaine offers of great tribute. Finding that the peace, which he ſo much deſired, could not be purchaſed with money, the King withdrew himſelfe backe to Sycurium. There he lay hearkening what the Enemie did; whoſe forces were well repaired by the comming of Miſagenes the ſonne of Maſaniſſa, with the aid before mentioned. This diſtance betweene the King and them, cauſed the Romans to waxe the more bold in making their harueſt: about which buſineſſe they ranged ouer all the fields. Their careleſſe demeanour gaue him hope to doe ſome notable exploit: which hee attempted, both vpon their Campe, and vpon thoſe that were abroad. The Campe he thought to haue fired on the ſudden: but the alarme being taken in good ſeaſon, hee failed in the enterprize. As for the forragers; he had a good hand vpon them, if he could haue withdrawne it, and giuen ouer in time. But whileſt he ſtroue to force a guard, he was viſited by the Conſul; by whom either in a skirmiſh of horſe, or (for the report is diuers) in a great battell, he was ouercome. This miſaduenture, whether great or ſmall, cauſed Perſeus, after a few daies, to fall backe into Macedon; as being naturally giuen to feare danger, euen where none was; whereby what loſſe he felt, will appeare hereafter. He left all behinde him, ſaue onely Tempe, weakly guarded: and conſequently an eaſie prey to the Romans.

After the Kings departure, Licinius went ſtraight vnto Connus; hoping to haue taken it, and ſo to haue gotten entrance into Tempe. But finding the work too hard, he returned backe vpon the Perrhæbians and others; from whom he wanne ſome townes, and among the reſt, Lariſſa. There were ſundry townes thereabout, bearing the ſame name of Lariſſa: ſo that this which the Conſull tooke, may ſeeme not to haue belonged vnto the Theſſalians; vnleſſe, perhaps, after his victory, Perſeus did greater Acts than we finde recorded, and got ſome part of Theſſalie.

Of matters happening in Greece at this time, it is hard to giue a preciſe account; for that the hiſtories of them are greatly defectiue. One may thinke it ſtrange, that the Bœtians, whom a Roman Embaſſador could terrifie, and bring altogether to his owne owne will, ſhould not be afraid of a Roman armie, then on foot in Greece, and a Nauie on their coaſt. But more ſtrange it is, that the Thebans, from whom their dependants were taken by the art of Martius; were more true to Rome, than other pettie townes, which by that ſame diſtraction of the Bœotians, became within themſelues more abſolute, than formerly they had beene. The cauſes hereof were to haue beene ſought among the changes happening in their variable factions: wherof the knowledge is now loſt. Some of them rebelled, and were throughly puniſhed by Lucretius the Roman Admirall: who got ſo much by ſpoiling them, that he would haue brought others to rebell in like ſort, if by extreme oppreſsion hee could haue driuen them ſo farre. Neither was Licinius the Conſul vndiligent in the ſame kinde. What his doings were, after ſuch time as he was at leiſure from Perſeus, I finde no where mentioned. Onely this is ſaid in generall; That in the warre which he made, he * cruelly and couetouſly demeaned himſelfe. * Liu.lib.43.

After the ſame faſhion dealt they, that commanded in the yeere following; Hoſtilius the Conſul, and Hortenſius the Admirall, or Prætor of the Fleet. Hoſtilius ſhewed more of his induſtrie, in picking quarrels with the confederats of Rome, than in proſecuting the warre againſt the Macedonian. For concerning the Roman warre vpon his kingdome, after that the Conſul had ſought paſſage in vaine ouer certaine mountaines, Perſeus ſeemed, in a manner, * free from it. He was troubled indeed on that ſide which looked towards Illyria, by Ap. Claudius, whom the Conſul ſent thither with an armie of foure thouſand, and who, by leauies made vpon the Confederates, doubled this his armie. But Claudius thinking to haue taken Vſcana, a border towne of Illyria, by treaſon, came thither in ſuch careleſſe order, that the inhabitants which had made ſhew of treaſon, with purpoſe onely to traine him into danger; ſalied foorth vpon him, ouerthrew him, and chaſed him ſo farre, that hardly hee eſcaped with a fourth part of his company. Yet this towne of Vſcana ſhortly after became Roman: which howſoeuer it happened, Perſeus very ſoone recouered it, and many other places therewithall: Cotys, a Thracian king, ſecuring him on the one ſide of Macedon; and Cephalus an Epirote, reuolted from the Romans, on the other. Perſeus likewiſe made a painefull iourney into Ætolia: where hee was promiſed to be admitted into Stratus, that was the ſtrongeſt Citie in that Region. Of this hope though he were diſappointed by thoſe of the Roman faction; yet in his returne home, hee tooke in Aperantia; and ſhortly heard good newes, That Ap. Claudius was againe throughly beaten by Cleuas, one of his Lieutenants. Such ſucceſſe had the Macedonian war vnder Hoſtilius. The ſame Conſul offended much the Greekes, by the ſtrict inquiſition which his Embaſſadours made into mens affection towards Rome. For theſe Embaſſadors trauelling thorow all the Cities of Peloponneſus, gaue out ſpeeches tending to ſhew, That they liked no better of thoſe who ſought not by might and maine to aduance their buſines, than of thoſe which were of the Macedonian faction. Their meaning was, to haue accuſed by name, in the Parliament of Achaia, Lycortas that worthy Commander, who nobly followed the ſteps of Philopœmen; and together with him, his ſonne Polybius, who ſoone after was Generall of the Achæan horſe, but more notable by that excellent hiſtorie which he wrote, than by his great employments, which hee well and honourably diſcharged. The ſumme of the accuſation ſhould haue beene; That theſe were not heartie friends vnto the Romans, but ſuch as abſtained from raiſing troubles, more for lacke of opportunitie, than for any loue to the common quiet. But ſince no colour of truth could bee found, that might giue countenance to ſuch a tale; it was thought better, for the preſent, to let it alone, and giue gentle words, as if all were well. In like manner dealt they among the Ætolians: They demanded hoſtages; and found ſome in the Councell that approoued the motion: as alſo among the Acarnanians, there were that entreated to haue Roman garriſons beſtowed in their townes. But neither the one nor the other of theſe propoſitions tooke effect. They of the Roman faction; accuſed not only ſuch as were inclinable to the Macedonian, * Polyb.Legat. 70. Polyb.Legat.74.

donian, but also the good Patriotes; making it no lesse than a matter of treason, to be a Grecian in Greece. On the contrary side, there wanted not some, who roundly told these pick-thankes of their base flatterie; rating them openly in such sort, that one of them hardly escaped being stoned, euen in presence of the Embassadours. Thus was all full of accusations and excuses: among which the Embassadors carried themselues, as men that could beleeue none ill; though it were well enough knowne what they thought. The best was, that an order from the Senate was brought into Greece, and published, to this effect: That it should bee free for all men, to refuse obedience to any Roman Magistrate, imposing any burthen for the present warre, vnlesse it were such, as the Senate had likewise thought meete. Of this decree the whole countrie was glad: for it was, or seemed, a good remedie of many inconueniences. But they that standing on priuiledge hereof, refused to fulfill euery commandement, were numbered among the Patriotes; which in the end of this warre, prooued little better, if not worse, than to haue been Traytours. The Senate was driuen to set downe this order; by reason of the many and vehement complaints brought to Rome, concerning the wrongs done by Roman Magistrates, and especially by the Admiralls, Lucretius and Hortensius. Lucretius was condemned in a great summe of money, for the wrongs by him done: highly to the commendation of the Romans, in that they loued not to haue their subiects oppressed. Hortensius being still in office, had warning to amend.

Among the great number of Embassages that came to Rome about this time, either to seeke redresse of iniuries, or to offer their seruices: it is note-worthy, that from Alabanda, a towne of the lesser Asia, there was presented vnto the Senate, and well accepted, a most base piece of flatterie. These Alabanders brought three hundred horsemens targets; and a crowne of gold, to bestow vpon Iupiter in the Capitol. But hauing a desire to gratifie the Romans with some exquisite token of their dutifull obedience, wherein they would bee singular; and being not able to reach vnto any great performance: they built a Temple, vnto the Towne Rome, and appointed anniuersarie games to bee celebrated among them, in honour of that Goddesse. Now who can wonder at the arrogant folly of Alexander, Antigonus, Ptolemie, and the like vaine men, that would bee thought gods; or at the shamelesse flatterie of such as bestowed vpon men, and not the most vertuous of men, diuine honours; when hee sees a Towne of houses, wherein powerfull men dwell, worshipped as a Goddesse, and receiuing (without scorne of the giuers, or shame of the present) the title of Deitie, at the gift of such a rascall Citie as Alabanda?

AFter two yeares of the Macedonian warre, things were further out of tune in Greece, than when the warre began; which had been thought likely to reforme all thoſe Countries, and bring them to what paſſe the Romans deſired; as it did in the end. Perſeus had hitherto the better, and was ſtronger now, than when he liued in peace. He had enlarged his borders on the Illyrian ſide; his friends, in all parts of Greece, took courage daily; and his reputation grew ſuch, as cauſed thoſe that were before wholly Roman, to ſuſpect what the iſſue of the war might proue, and therupon to become wiſe for themſelues. Contrariwiſe, Licinius and Hoſtilius the Conſuls, had one after the other ſpent their time in vaine, ſeeking way into Macedon; and defaced the glorious enterprize of conqueſt, by many loſſes receiued. The Roman Admiralls had ſo demeaned themſelues, that many towns, euē of the beſt affected to Rome, kept them out by force. Generally, the feare was great on the Romans ſide; and the armie much leſſened, not only by caſualties of warre, but by the facilitie of the Tribunes or Colonels, or elſe of the Conſul himſelfe (for they laid the blame one vpon the other) in licencing the ſouldiers to depart. Quintus Martius the new Conſul, who ſucceeded vnto Hoſtilius, was to amend all this: which neuertheleſſe was more then he knew how to doe: though he brought with him a ſtrong ſupply of men. He began hotly to ſet the warre on foot, which a long time had ſlept. And he began the right way: not ſeeking to force the ſtreights that were ſurely garded, but taking paines to clime the mountaines which were thought able to forbid all paſſage ouer them, without helpe or need of any cuſtodie. The King heard of his approch; and being vncertaine what way he meant to take, diſtributed his owne forces, to the defence of all places which might giue entrance, or permit aſcent. But the Conſul proceeded in his iourney: with hope, either not to be diſcouered by the Enemie, or to breake through all oppoſition, or at leaſt wiſe, to fight on as conuenient ground, as they ſhould haue that lay to ſtop him, and at length, if all failed, to make a ſafe retreat. He ſent before him foure thouſand of his moſt expedit foot, to diſcouer the wayes. Two dayes was this company troubled, in ouercomming the difficultie of no more than fifteene miles: after which they had ſight of the Enemie, that lay to deny their paſſage. They occupied therefore a ſafe peece of ground; and ſent backe word to the Conſul, where they were; intreating him to haſten vnto them: which he did. The Macedonians were not a whit diſmayed at his arriuall; but met him, and fought with him, two or three daies together, each returning to their owne Campe at night, with little loſſe on either ſide. This bickering was on the narrow ridge of a mountaine, which gaue ſcarcely roome vnto three to march in front. So that very few hands came to be employed: all the reſt were beholders. In this caſe, it was impoſſible to get forwards: yet a ſhame to returne. Wherefore Martius tooke the onely courſe remaining; and indeed the beſt: Part of his men he left with Popilius, to attend vpon the Macedonians: whileſt he, with the reſt, fetcht a compaſſe about, and ſought out wayes that neuer had beene troden. Herein he found extreame difficultie: which notwithſtanding he ouercame. Beſides the troubles commonly incident to ſuch iourneyes, through places vnfit for habitation: he was compelled, by labour of hand, to make pathes where none were, yea where Nature might ſeeme to haue intended, that none ſhould be. So ſteepe he found the diſcent of the mountaines, in this way which he took: that of ſeuen miles, which they trauelled the firſt day, his men were compelled, for the more part, to rowle themſelues downe; as not daring to truſt their feet. Neither was this the worſt. For they met with rockes, that ſtood one ouer another, ſo vpright, and cumberſome to get downe; that their Elephants were afraid of the giddie proſpect, and caſting their gouernours, made a terrible noiſe, which affrighted the horſes, and bred great confuſion. Hauing therefore gone, or wallowed, foure miles of this grieuous iourney; there was nothing more deſired by the ſouldiours, then that they might be ſuffered to creepe backe againe, the ſame way which they had come. But ſhift was made to let downe the Elephants, by a kinde of bridges, like vnto falling draw-bridges: whereof the one end was ioyned to the edge of the cliffe; the other ſuſtained by two long poſtes, faſtened in the ground below. Vpon theſe two poſtes, or poles, which indeed (not being very ſtrong, ſince it was intended that they ſhould be either cut or broken) were faſtned two rafters, anſwerable in length to the diſtance, between the higher & the lower fall: ſo as the end of one bridge might reach to the beginning of another. Theſe were couered with plankes and turfe; that they might ſeeme continent with the ground; ſo to make the beaſts aduenturous, to goe vpon them. If there were a Plaine of any good extent from the foot of a rocke, to the next downfall; then might the bridge be ſhorter. When an Elephant was gone a pretie way, vpon one of theſe; the poſtes vpholding the frame were cut aſunder; therby cauſing him to ſincke down vnto the next bridge; whence he was conueyed, in like manner, to the third, and onward ſtill, to the very bottome. Thus went they downe ſliding, ſome on their feet, others on their buttockes, till they came to an euen valley. By this it appeares, how throughly prouided the Romans vſed to be in their iourneyes, of things needfull in all occaſions: as alſo what ineſtimable paines they tooke in this deſcent, about the conueyance of themſelues and all their carriages downe the mountaines. The next day they reſted; ſtaying for Popilius and his company, who hardly or perhaps neuer, ſhould haue ouertaken them, if the Enemie had followed, and ſet vpon him from aloft. The third and fourth daies iourneyes were like vnto the firſt: ſaue that cuſtome, and the neareneſſe to their wayes end without meeting enemie, cauſed them the better to endure the labour.

Perſeus could not be ignorant of the Romans comming towards him: ſince they fought with his men vpon the paſſage, three daies together; he lying ſo nigh, that he might welneare haue heard the noiſe. Yet was he ſo poſſeſſed with feare; that he neither ſtirred to helpe his owne men, or to hinder the Conſul, nor made any prouiſion for that which might fall out; but as one void of counſaile, ſate hearkening after the euent. Foure onely paſſages there were, leading into Tempe: the firſt by Connus; which the Romans were vnable to force: the ſecond and third were the ſame which Martius had attempted in vaine, and another like vnto it: the laſt, by the Citie of Dium out of Macedon. All theſe were ſufficiently guarded: and whoſoeuer would ſeeke any other way, muſt be faine to take ſuch paines as Martius had vndergone. The entrance by Dium was fairer then any of the reſt: whereof only the King had benefit; for that his enemies could not get thither, ſaue through the valley it ſelfe, into which they muſt firſt pierce another way. Dium ſtood vpon the foot of the huge mountaine Olympus, about a mile from the ſea: of which mile, the riuer Helicon becomming there a lake, and called Baphyras, tooke vp the one halfe; the reſt being ſuch as might eaſily haue beene fortified. Beſides all theſe, there was in the middeſt of Tempe, a paſſage which ten men might eaſily keepe: where the ſpurres of the mountaines, reaching farre into the valley, drew neare to the verie banks of Peneus, a goodly and deepe riuer which ran thorow it. Wherefore nothing had beene more eaſie, than to make the Conſul repent him of his troubleſome iourney: if Perſeus could haue ſeene his owne aduantages. For the Roman armie was not only in ill caſe to fight, after the vexation of that miſerable trauell: but muſt needs haue either periſhed for want of victuals, or bin enforced to returne the ſame way that it came, if the King had made good the ſtreight of Dium. To haue returned, and climbed vp with their Elephants and carriages, againſt thoſe rockes, from which, with extreame labour, they could hardly get downe, it ſeemes a matter of impoſſibilitie: eſpecially conſidering, how the enemy from aboue their heads, would haue beaten vpon them; being now aware of the path which they had taken, though he knew it not when they ſtole away from him. It may therefore be thought ſtrange, that the Romans did not rather take their iourney into Macedon, from the ſide of Illyria, whence that kingdome had often bin inuaded, as lying open on that part: than put themſelues to the trouble of breaking into Tempe; whence, after that they were there arriued, there was no meanes to eſcape, without forcing one of thoſe paſſages, which they deſpaired to winne. But the cowardize of Perſeus, did commend the counſaile by them followed, as wiſe. For he no ſooner heard that the Enemie was come ouer the mountaines into Tempe; then he fared like one out of his wits; ſaying, That he was vanquiſhed, and had loſt all without battaile. Herewithall he began to take out of Dium, what he could carry away in haſte; and ſtraightwayes abandoned the Towne. In the ſame vehemencie of amazement, he ſent a ſtrait commandement to Theſſalonica, that the Arſenall there ſhould be ſet on fire; and to Pella, that his treaſures there ſhould be caſt into the ſea: as if the Romans were like preſently to be maſters of theſe two Cities. Nicias, who was appointed to drowne the treaſure, performed it haſtily as wel as he could: though ſoone after, his maſter grew ſorie for the loſſe; and it was all, in a manner, recouered by Diuers from vnder the water. But Andronicus, who had charge to ſet fire on the Kings Arſenall, deferred the execution; foreſeeing that repentance might follow: and ſo he preuented the dammage. Whether Niceas, for his abſolute and blinde obedience, or Andronicus, for his carefull prouidence, merited the greater commendation, or more eaſie pardon; it reſted in the King to interpret. The reward of their ſeruice was this. Perſeus growing aſhamed of his mad cowardize, that appeared in this haſtie direction; cauſed them both to be ſlaine. Alſo thoſe poore men, which had fetcht his treaſure out of the ſea by their diuing, were payd their wages after the ſame ſort: that ſo there might be no witnes of the Kings baſe folly. Such end muſt they feare, who are priuie to diſhonourable actions of great Princes. If Perſeus would haue gone ſurely to worke, for the hiding of his fault; then muſt he ſo royally haue behaued himſelfe, that no man might beleeue him to be the author of any vnworthy act or counſaile. But his vertue was of no ſuch capacitie. He thought it enough to lay the blame vpon others. And therefore, hauing called Hippias away (the Captaine which had ſtopped the Conſul on the top of the mountaine) and Aſclepiodatus, from defence of the paſſages, whereto they were by him appointed: he rated them openly; ſaying, that they had betraied vnto the Enemie the gates and barres of Macedon. Of this reproch, if they would diſcharge themſelues, by laying it vpon him, to whom of right it belonged: then might they haue ſped as did Nicias and Andronicus.

The Conſul Martius had great cauſe to reioyce, for that the King ſo haſtily relinquiſhed his poſſeſſion of Tempe, and all the paſſages leading thereinto: ſince the Roman armie, this notwithſtanding was hardly able to ſubſiſt, for want of victuals. He tooke Dium without reſiſtance; & thence went forward into Macedon: wherein hauing trauelled about a dayes iourney, and gotten one towne that yeeled, he was compelled, by meere lacke of food for his men, to returne backe towards Theſſalie. His fleet came to him, in this time of neceſſitie, well appointed to haue holpen him in the war: but hauing left behinde, at Magnesia, the ships of burthen, which carried the prouisions. Wherefore it fell out happily, that one of his Lieutenants had been carefull to occupy the Castles about Tempe, which were forsaken by the Macedonians: for by those waies onely might corne be brought into the army. To meet the sooner with this corne, which was desirously expected; he forsooke Dium, and went to Phila; by which fooliſh iourney (if not worse then fooliſh) he lost more, than a little the longer fasting had bin worth. It is probable that his carts, with all or the most of his store, were lost among the mountaines: for otherwise it had bin madnes to put himself on such an enterprise, so slenderly prouided, as that without enforcement, or sight of the Enemie, he should be faine to quite it. Howsoeuer it was: men thought him a coward, or at least a bad man of warre; since he thus recoyled and gaue off, when it most behoued him to haue prosecuted the action.

By vnderstanding the folly, or cowardize of Martius; the King recollected himselfe; vnderstood his owne error; sought to hide it by such poore means as haue bin shewed; and laboured to make what amends he could. He quickly repossessed the town of Dium, which he hastily repaired, finding it dismantled by the Romans. This done; he encamped strongly by the riuer Enipeus: meaning there to stop the Enemies proceeding all that Summer. Lesse diligence, more timely vsed, would haue bin enough, not onely to haue deliuered Martius into his hand, who had beguiled him with an idle hope of peace: but to haue giuen him such a noble victory, as might cause the Romans to seeke a good end of the war vpon faire conditions, & not to begin againe in haste. Yet this recouery and fortification of Dium, was to the Consul an exceeding hindrance. For little or nothing could afterward be done toward the conquest in hand, in all the continuance of his office. Only the towne of Heraclea, standing on the riuer of Peneus, fiue miles from Dium, was taken by force, or rather by a trick of climing vpon mens heads, somewhat after the maner of our tumblers. But it made such defence as it could; and was not giuen vp for feare. After this Martius did set a bold face towards Dium; as if he would haue taken it againe, and haue driuen the King further off: though his intent or hope was nothing like so great: his chiefe care being to prouide for his wintering. He sent the Admirall to make attempt vpon the sea-townes, Thessalonica, Cassandrea, Demetrias and others. All these were assayed: but in vaine. The fields about Thessalonica were wasted; and some companies, that sundrie times aduentured forth of the towne, were still put to the worse. As for the towne it selfe; there was danger in comming neere it, either by land or sea; by reason of the engins, which shot from the wals, and reached vnto the fleet. Wherfore the Admiral setting saile from thence, ranne along by Ænia, and Antigonea, (landing neare to each of them, and both doing and receiuing hurt) vntill he came to Pallene in the territory of Cassandrea. There King Eumenes ioyned with him, bringing twentie ships of warre: and fiue other were sent thither from King Prusias. With this accesse of strength, the Admirall was bold to trie his fortune at Cassandrea: which was bad. There was a new ditch lately cast by Perseus, before the town: which while the Romans were filling vp, question was made, what became of the earth taken thence, for that it lay not vpon the bank. By this occasion, it was learned, that there were arches in the town wal filled vp with that earth, and couered with one single row of brick. Hence the Admiral gathered hope of making way into the towne, by sapping the wals. To this worke he appointed such as hee thought meetest: giuing an alarme to the other side of the town, therby to shadow his attempt, the breach was soon made. But whilest the Romans were shouting for ioy, & ordering themselues for the assault: the Captaines within the towne perceiued what was done; & salying forth vnexpected, gaue a fierce charge on the companies that were between the ditch & the wall; of whom they slew about six hundred & suffred few to escape vnwounded. This disaster, & the want of good succesſe on that part of the towne which king Eumenes assailed (a supply in the meane while entring the towne by sea) caused the siege to breake vp. Torone was the next place which which the Admirall thought meet to attempt: and thence likewiſe he was repelled. Finding this too well manned; he made way towards Demetrias: whereinto Euphranor, a Macedonian Captaine, was gotten before his comming, with ſuch forces, as were not only ſufficient to haue defended the Towne, if the Admirall had layed ſiege to it, but to keepe the land about it from ſpoyle; or at leaſt (as they did) to make the enemie pay deare for all that he there got. This Euphranor had taken his iourney to Demetrias, by Meliboea; whether the Conſul (that he might not be quite without worke) had ſent his Lieutenant to beſiege it: and by the terrour of his appearing ſuddenly ouer their heads, cauſed the beſiegers to diſlodge in all haſte, ſetting their Campe on fire.

Such fortune attended on the Romans; or rather, ſo farre was their abilitie ſhort of their Enterpriſes; euer ſince their Conſul (whether daſtardly, or careleſly) moſt vnlike a good Commander, had let goe his hold of Macedon, by forſaking Dium: Yea, it is to be ſuſpected, that ſome greater harme befell them, or at leaſt, that they were in ſome greater danger, then is expreſſed in the broken remaining Hiſtorie of this Warre. For Martius perſwaded the Rhodians by Ageſipolis their Embaſſador, who came to him at Heraclea about other buſineſſe of leſſe importance, That they ſhould doe well to interpoſe themſelues as mediators, and ſeeke to finiſh the Warre. Now, although Polybius doe moſt probably coniecture, that this was rather a malicious deuice of Martius, craftily ſeeking to bring the Rhodians in danger (as anon it fell out) by their oppoſing the reſolution of the Senate; then that it proceeded from any true feare in him, either of Perſeus, or of Antiochus, who had then an army on foot: yet ſince he made ſhew of feare, it is like withall, that ſomewhat had happened, which might make his feare ſeeme not counterfeit. And ſo were the Rhodians moued to thinke of him; not only for that the extraordinary courteſie, both of him and of the Admirall, towards their Embaſſador, comming from proud natures, did argue diffidence, where there was no ambition to cauſe it; but much more, for that ſhortly after the Embaſſadors of Perſeus, & of Gentius the Illyrian, did ſet out their buſineſſe at Rhodes, not more with the ſtrength of a good fleet, which the Macedonian had gotten, than with the honor of ſome victory, wher in he had lately ſlaine great numbers of the Roman horſe. Thus much we find intimated: though the time, place, or other circumſtances of the fight, be not ſpecified. And hereto may be referred, the report of thoſe that were ſent from Rome to view the eſtate of Martius his army. For they found the Conſul wanting meat; the Admiral wanting men; &, for thoſe few that he had, wanting both mony and clothes: and Ap. Claudius the Pretor, who lay on the frontier of Illyria, ſo vnable to inuade Macedon, that contrariwiſe, he was in extreame danger, ſo as either he muſt quickly be ſent for thence, or a new army be ſent thither to him. Wherefore it may ſeeme, that ſome blow had bin taken on the Illyrian ſide, which made all to halt; or at leſt, that the Romans with greater loſſe, than is before ſpoken of, had been driuen from ſome of the Townes which they beſieged.

Polyb. Legat. 80.

Polyb. Legat. 87.

Now although it were ſo, that Martius in very few of his actions, behaued himſelfe like a man of war: yet in exerciſe of Cunning, which one hath moſt aptly termed, a crooked or ſiniſter kind of wiſdome, he dealt as a craftemaſter, with a reſtleſſe working diligence. This indeed neither proued his ſufficiencie, nor commended his honeſtie: ſince thereby he effected nothing to his owne benefit; and neuertheleſſe, out of enuie, vaine-glory, or ſuch delight as weake and buſie-headed men take, in creating inexplicable troubles, he directly made oppoſition to the good of his country. At ſuch time as Perſeus, by the ſucceſſe of his doings againſt Hoſtilius, had gotten much reputation, and was thought likely to inuade Theſſalie; Archo, Lycortas, and other good Patriotes among the Achaans, iudged it expedient for their Nation to helpe the Romans, as in a time of aduerſitie, whom in proſperity they loued not to flatter. Wherefore Archo propoſed a decree which paſſed: That the Achaans ſhould ſend their whole power into Theſſalie, and participate with

Polyp. Legat. 78. the Romans in all danger. So the armie was leuied; and Polybius, with others, ſent Embaſſadors vnto Martius, to certifie him therof, and know his pleaſure. Polybius found the Conſul buſied in ſeeking paſſage through Tempe into Macedon. Hee went along with the armie; and awaited the Conſuls leiſure till they came to Heraclea; where finding the time conuenient, hee preſented the Decree, and offered the ſeruice of his Nation, wherein ſoeuer it ſhould be commanded. Martius tooke this very kindly; but ſaid, that he needed now no maner of helpe. Forthwith Polybius diſpatched home his companions, to ſignifie thus much: tarrying himſelfe behind in the Campe. After a while, word was brought to Martius, that Ap. Claudius deſired, or rather imperiouſly required, of the Achæans, fiue thouſand men, to be ſent him into Epirus. It was manifeſt, that Appius had need of theſe men; and that if he were ſtrong in field, he might do notable ſeruice, by diſtracting the forces of Perſeus. But the Labarynthian head of Martius could not allow of ſuch plaine reaſon. He called vnto him Polybius, to whom hee declared, that Appius had no need of ſuch aide: and therefore willed him to returne home, and in any wiſe take order that the men might not be ſent, nor the Achæans bee put to ſuch needleſſe charges. Away went Polybius; muſing and vnable to reſolue, whether it were for loue to the Achæans, that the Conſul was ſo earneſt in this buſines; or rather for enuie, and to hinder App. Claudius from doing any thing, ſince himſelfe could doe nothing. But when Polybius was to deliuer his opinion in the Councell, touching this matter: then found he a new doubt, that more neerely concerned his owne ſelfe, and thoſe of his partie. For as he was ſure to incurre the great indignation of the Conſul, if he ſhould neglect what was giuen him in charge; ſo was it manifeſt on the other ſide, that the words by Martius vttered to him in priuat, would proue no good warrant for him and his friends, if openly they ſhould refuſe to helpe Claudius, alleaging that he had no need: In this caſe therefore, he had recourſe vnto the decree of the Senate: which exempted men from neceſſitie of doing what the Roman Commanders ſhould require, vnleſſe by ſpecial order from the Senate, the ſame were likewiſe appointed. So for lacke of warrant from the Senate, this demand of Appius was referred vnto the aduice of the Conſul: by whom it was ſure to be made fruſtrate. Hereby the Achæans were ſauers, of more then an hundred and twenty talents: though Polybius himſelfe ranne into danger of Appius his diſpleaſure; and for ſuch honeſt dealing in his Countries behalfe, was afterwards rewarded by the Romans with many a long yeares impriſonment.

Whether it were by the like policie of Martius, that King Eumenes grew cold in his affection to the Romans; or whether this King began when it was too late, to ſtand in feare, leſt the fire, which he himſelfe had helped to kindle, would ſhortly take hold on his owne lodging; or whether the regard of money were able to ouerſway al other paſſions; it is hard to determine: ſince they that had better means to know the truth, haue not preciſely affirmed any certaintie. One report is, that Eumenes did not ſo much as giue any helpe to Martius: but comming to haue ioyned with him, in ſuch friendly manner as he did with the former Conſuls, was not entertained according to his liking; and thereupon returned home in ſuch anger, that he refuſed to leaue behind him certaine horſe of the Gallogreekes, being requeſted to haue done it. If this were true; and that his brother Attalus tarrying behinde with the Conſul, did the Romans good ſeruice: then is the reaſon apparant, of the hatred, borne afterwards by the Senate to Eumenes, and the loue to Attalus. But it is more generally receiued; that Eumenes gaue a willing eare to Perſeus his deſire of accord, for meere deſire of gaine. And it might well bee, that couetouſneſſe drew him on, in the courſe, whereinto indignation firſt led him. Howſoeuer it befell; Perſeus cauſed Eumenes to be ſounded, and found him ſo tractable, that he was bold to ſolicite him by an Embaſſage. The tenour of his aduertiſements, both to Eumenes, and to Antiochus, was: That there could be no perfect loue betweene a King and a free Citie: That the Romans had quarrell alike to all Kings,

though they dealt with no more than one at a time, and vsed the helpe of one against another; That Philip was oppressed by them, with the helpe of Attalus; Antiochus, with the helpe of Philip and Eumenes; and now Perseus assailed, with helpe of Eumenes and Prusias. Herewith he willed Eumenes to consider, that when Macedon was taken out of their way, they would be doing with him in Asia, which lay next at hand; yea, that already they began to thinke better of Prusias, than of him. In like sort he admonished Antiochus, not to looke for any good conclusion of his warre with the Ægyptian, so long as the Romans could make him giue ouer, by denouncing their will and pleasure. Finally, he requested both of them, either to compell the Romans, to surcease from their war vpon Macedon; or else to hold them as common enemies vnto all Kings. Antiochus lay farre out of the Romans way: and therefore was little troubled with such remonstrances. Eumenes was more nearely toucht; and as hee felt part of this to be true, so had he reason to stand in doubt of the rest. Yet when he should giue answere; hee began to offer a bargaine of peace for money. He thought the Romans to be no lesse weary, than Perseus was afraid. Wherefore he promised, for his owne part, That if he might haue fifteene hundred Talents for withdrawing his hand from this Warre, then would he remaine a Neuter therein: and that for some greater quantitie of money (how much I finde not) he would also bring the Romans to condiscend vnto peace: and for assurance of his true meaning herein, he offered to giue hostages. Perseus liked well to receiue the hostages: but not to lay out the money; especially before hand, as was required. He would faine haue peace with Rome, and not with Eumenes only. For procuring of this, he promised to be at any reasonable cost: but hee would lay downe the money in the Temple at Samothrace: whence it should be deliuered vnto Eumenes, after that the peace was fully concluded and ratified. The Isle of Samothrace was Perseus his owne: and therefore Eumenes thought the money no nearer to him, being there, than if it remained in Pella. Besides, his labour deserued somewhat, howsoeuer the businesse might happen to succeed: so that needes hee would haue part of his wages in prest. Thus the two Kings did no more, than loose time; and Eumenes grew suspected of the Romans, as a Traytor.

After the same manner dealt Perseus with King Gentius the Illyrian. He had attempted this Illyrian before; who dealt plainely, and said, That without money he could not stirre. Hereunto Perseus loued not to hearken; thinking, that his Treasures would serue at the last cast, to deliuer him from all his feares. But when the Romans had gotten within Tempe, then did his feare vrge him to prodigalitie; so as he agreed to pay three hundred Talents, which Gentius demanded for a recompence. So the bargaine was soone made, and pledges on both sides deliuered for performance. This was openly done by Perseus; to the end that all his armie might haue comfort, by such accesse of strength to their partie. Presently vpon the bargaine made, Embassadors were sent to Rhodes, from both Perseus and Gentius: who desired the Rhodians, to take vpon them, as arbitrators, betweene Perseus and the Romans, and to bring the Warre to an end. The Rhodians thinking that Martius the Consul was no lesse desirous of peace than the Macedonian, arrogantly promised, that they, by their authoritie, would make peace; wishing the Kings to shew themselues conformable. But the Roman Senate, hearing prowd words to the same effect, from the Rhodian Embassadours; gaue an answere, as disdainefull, angrie, and menacing, as they could deuise: so as this vaine glorie of the Rhodians was throughly chastised; and more throughly should haue beene, if their submission had not beene as humble, as their follie was proud. Such vse of Gentius his friendship, made Perseus; without laying out one ounce of Silver. Now faine he would haue hastened this young and rash Illyrian to enter with all speed into the Warre: but then must the money be hastened away. Pantauchus, the Macedonian Embassadour, who remained with Gentius, exhorted him him daily to begin the Warre by land and sea, whilest the Romans were vnprouided. But finding what it was that made all to stay; he sent word to Perseus. Hereupon tenne Talents were sent to Pantauchus: who deliuered it to the yong King, as earnest of that which followed. More followed indeed; and sealed vp with the seale of the Illyrians; but carried by Macedonians, and not too fast. Before this money came into Illyria, Gentius had layed hands vpon two Roman Embassadors, and cast them into prison. Which Perseus no sooner heard, than he recalled his Treasure-bearers, and sent them with their loade to Pella; for that now the Illyrian was of necessitie to make warre with the Romans, whether hee were hyred thereto, or not.

Liu. lib. 44. Plutarch. in vit. Æmyl.

There came about the same time, through Illyria, to the aide of Perseus, vnder one Clondicus a pettie King, tenne thousand horse and tenne thousand foot, of the Gaules, which were (as Plutarch hath it) the Bastarnæ. These had before-hand made their bargaine, and were to receiue present pay at the first. At their entrie into the Kingdome, Perseus sent one to them; desiring their Captaines to come visit him, whome he promised to gratifie with goodly rewards; hoping that the multitude would take good words for payment. But the first question that their Generall asked, was, Whether the King had sent money to giue the souldiors their pay in hand, according to his bargaine? Hereto the messenger had not what to answere. Why then (said Clondicus) tell thy master, That the Gaules will not stirre one foot further, vntill they haue gold, as was agreed, and hostages. Perseus hereupon tooke counsaile: if to vtter his owne opinion, before men so wise that they would not contradict him, were to take counsaile. He made an inuectiue against the inciuilitie and auarice of the Bastarnæ: who came with such numbers, as could not but be dangerous to him and to his Kingdome. Fiue thousand horse of them hee said would be as manie as he should need to vse; and not so manie, that he should need to feare them. It had beene well done, if anie of his counsailors would haue told him, That there wanted not employment for the whole armie of them, since without anie danger to the Kingdome, they might be let out, by the way of Perrhæbia, into Thessalie: where wasting the Countrey, and filling themselues with spoile, they should make the Romans glad to forsake Tempe, euen for hunger and all manner of want; therein doing the King notable seruice, whether they wonne anie victorie, or not. This, and a great deale more, might haue beene alledged, if anie man had dared to giue aduice freely. In conclusion, Antigonus, the same messenger that had beene with them before, was sent againe, to let them know the Kings minde. He did his errand: vpon which followed a great murmure of those many thousands that had beene drawne so farre to no purpose. But Clondicus asked him now againe, Whether hee had brought the money along with him, to pay those fiue thousand, whome the King would entertaine. Hereto, when it was perceiued, that Antigonus could make no better answere, than shifting excuses; the Bastarnæ returned presently towards Danubius, wasting the neighbours parts of Thrace; yet suffering this craftie messenger to escape vnhurt: which was more than he could haue well expected.

Thus dealt Perseus, like a carefull Treasurer, and one that would preserue his money for the Romans, without diminishing the summe. But of this painefull Office he was verie soone discharged by L. Æmylius Paulus the new Consul: who in fifteene dayes after his setting forth from Italie, brought the Kingdome of Macedon to that end, for which GOD had appointed ouer it a King so foolish and so cowardly.

§. VIII.

Of L. ÆMYLIVS PAVLVS the Conſul. His iourney. He forceth PERSEVS to diſcampe. He will not hazard battaile with anie diſaduantage. Of an Eclypſe of the Moone. ÆMYLIVS his ſuperſtition. The Battaile of Pydna. PERSEVS his flight. He forſakes his Kingdome: which haſtily yeelds to ÆMYLIVS. PERSEVS at Samothrace. He yeelds himſelfe to the Roman Admirall; and is ſent priſoner to ÆMYLIVS.

BY the Warre of Macedon, the Romans hitherto had gotten much diſhonour. Which, though it were not accompanied with anie danger, yet the indignitie ſo moued them, that either * they decreed that Prouince to L. Æmylius Paulus, without putting it, as was otherwiſe their manner, to the chance of lot, betweene him and his fellow Conſul; or at leaſt were gladder that the lot had caſt it vpon him, than that ſo worthy a man was aduanced to the dignitie of a ſecond Conſulſhip. Hee refuſed to propound vnto the Senate anie thing that concerned his Prouince; vntill by Embaſſadours, thither ſent to view the eſtate of the Warre, it was perfectly vnderſtood, in what condition both the Roman forces, and the Macedonian, at the preſent remained. This being throughly knowne to be ſuch, as hath beene alreadie told; the Senate appointed a ſtrong ſupplie, not onely to the Conſul, but vnto the Nauie, and likewiſe to the Armie that lay betweene Illyria and Epirus; from which App. Claudius was remoued, and L. Anicius ſent thither in his place. Æmylius, before his departure from Rome, making an Oration to the People, as was the cuſtome, ſpake with much grauitie and authoritie. Hee requeſted thoſe that thought themſelues wiſe enough to manage this Warre, either to accompanie him into Macedon, and there aſſiſt him with their aduice; or elſe to gouerne their tongues at home, and not take vpon them to giue directions by heareſay, and cenſure by idle reports: for he told them plainely, That he would frame his doings to occaſions; not to the expectation of the multitude. The like ſpeech of his father L. Æmylius, who died valiantly in the Battaile of Cannæ, might well be liuing in ſome of their memories: which was enough to make them conforme themſelues the more gladly vnto the inſtructions giuen by a wiſe and reſolute Conſul.

All his buſineſſe within the Citie being diſpatched, Æmylius was honourably attended, at his ſetting forth on his iourney; with an eſpeciall hope of men, that he ſhould finiſh the Warre: though that he ſhould finiſh it ſo ſoone and happily, was more then could haue beene hoped or imagined. He came to Brunduſium: whence, when the winde came faire, he ſet ſayle at breake of day, and arriued ſafely at the Iſle of Corcyra before night. Thence paſſed he to Delphi: where, hauing done ſacrifice to Apollo, after the fift day he ſet forwards to the Campe; and was there in fiue dayes more. So are there but fiue of the fifteene dayes remaining, in which he finiſhed the Warre.

Perſeus lay ſtrongly encamped at Dium; hauing ſpared no labour of men and of women to fortifie the bankes of Enipeus, where it was fordeable in drie weather: So as there was little hope, or none, to force him; and conſequently, as little poſſibilitie to enter that way into Macedon. One great inconuenience troubling the Romans, and much diſabling them to make attempt vpon Dium; was lacke of freſh water. For there were tenne myles betweene Dium and Tempe; all the way lying betweene the Sea ſhoare and the foot of Olympus, without any Brooke or Spring breaking forth on that ſide. But Æmylius found preſent remedie for this, by digging Wells on the ſhoare; where hee found ſweet Springs: as commonly there is no shoare that wants them, though they rise not aboue the ground. Want of this knowledge was enough to hinder Martius from taking vp his lodging anie nearer to the enemie, than the Towne of Heraclea, on the Riuer of Peneus; where he had watering at pleasure, but could performe no seruice of anie worth. Yet when the Roman Campe had such meanes to lye close to the Macedonian, as it presently did; the passage onward, being defended as hath beene shewed, seemed no lesse difficult than before. Wherefore it was necessarie to search another way: which by enquirie was soone found out. There was a narrow passage ouer Olympus, leading into Perrhæbia; hard of ascent, but slenderly guarded, and therefore promising a faire journey. Martius either had not been informed hereof; or durst not attempt it: or perhaps could not get his souldiors to make the aduenture; they fearing least it would proue such a piece of worke, as had beene their march ouer Ossa into Tempe. But Paulus was a man of greater industrie, courage, and abilitie, to command. He had reformed, euen at his first comming, many disorders in the Roman Campe: teaching the souldiors, among other good lessons, to be obedient and readie in execution; without troubling themselues, as had beene their manner, to examine the doings and purposes of their Generall. And now he appointed about fiue thousand men to this Enterprise: whereof he committed the charge vnto Scipio Æmylianus and Q. Fabius Maximus, his owne sonnes by nature, but adopted; the one of them, by a sonne of Scipio the African; the other, by one of the Fabij. Scipio tooke with him some light-armed Thracians and Cretans; but his maine strength was of Legionaries. For the Kings guard, vpon the mountaine, consisted in a manner wholly of Archers and Slingers: who, though, at some distance, they might doe notable seruice against those that should climbe vp vnto them; yet when the darkenesse tooke away their ayme, they were like to make a bad nights worke, being to deale with those that were armed to fight at hand. To conceale the businesse about which they went, Scipio and Fabius tooke a wrong way, towards the fleet; where victuals were prouided for their journey: it being noysed, that they were to runne along the coast of Macedon by sea, and wast the Countrey. All the while that they were passing the Mountaines (which was about three dayes) the Consul made shew of a meaning to set vpon Perseus where hee lay, rather to diuert the Kings attention from that which was his maine Enterprise, than vpon any hope to doe good, in seeking to get ouer Enipeus. The Chanell of Enipeus, which receiued in Winter time a great fall of waters from the Mountaines, was exceeding deepe and broad; and the ground of it was such, as though at the present it lay welneare all drie, yet it serued not for those that were weightily armed to fight vpon. Wherefore Æmylius employed none saue his Velites; of whom the Kings light armature had aduantage at farre distance, though the Romans were better appointed for the close. The Engines from off the Towers which Perseus had raysed on his owne banke, did also beat vpon the Romans, and gaue them to vnderstand, that their labour was in vaine. Yet Æmylius persisted as he had begun; and continued his assault, such as it could be, the second day. This might haue serued to teach the Macedonian, that some greater worke was in hand: since otherwise a good Captaine, as Æmylius was knowne to be, would not haue troubled himselfe with making such brauadoes, that were somewhat costly. But Perseus looked onely vnto that which was before his eyes: vntill his men, that came running fearefully downe the Mountaine, brought word into the Campe, That the Romans were following at their backes. Then was all full of tumult; and the King himselfe no lesse (if not more) amazed than anie of the rest. Order was forthwith giuen to dislodge: or rather without order, in all tumultuous haste, the Campe was broken vp, and a speedie retreat made to Pydna. Whether it were so, that they which had custodie of the passage were taken sleeping, or whether they were beaten by plaine force; Scipio and Fabius had very good successe in their journey. It may well be, that they slept vntill the Romans

came ſomewhat neare to them; and then taking alarme, when their arrowes and ſlings could doe little ſeruice, were beaten at handie ſtroakes: ſo as the different relations that are cited by Plutarch out of Polybius, and an Epiſtle of Scipio, may each of them haue beene true. Thus was an open way cleared into Macedon: which had beene effected by Martius in the yeare fore-going; but was cloſed vp againe, through his not proſecuting ſo rich an opportunitie.

Perſeus was in extreame doubt what courſe to take, after this vnhappy beginning. Some gaue aduice, to manne his Townes, and ſo to linger out the Warre: hauing beene taught by the laſt yeares example, how reſolute the people were in making defence. But farre worſe counſaile preuailed: as generally it doth in turbulent and fearefull deliberations. The King reſolued to put all at once to hazard of battaile: fearing belike to put himſelfe into anie one Towne, leaſt that ſhould be firſt of all beſieged; and he therein (as cowardly natures alwayes are jealous) not ouer-carefully relieued. This was euen the ſame that Æmylius, or anie inuador, ſhould haue deſired. So a place was choſen neare vnto Pydna, that ſerued well for the Phalanx, and had likewiſe on the ſides of it ſome peeces of higher ground, fit for the archers and light armature. There he abode the comming of the enemie; who ſtayed not long behind him. As ſoone as the Romans had ſight of the Kings Armie; which, with greater feare than diſcretion, had haſted away from them, forſaking the Campe that was ſo notably well fortified: they deſired nothing more, than to giue battaile immediately; doubting leaſt otherwiſe the King ſhould change his minde, and get further off. And to this effect Scipio brake with the Conſul; praying him not to looſe occaſion by delay. But Æmylius told him, That hee ſpake like a young man; and therefore willed him to haue patience. The Romans were tyred with their journey; had no Campe wherein to reſt themſelues; nor anie thing there, ſaue onely the bare ground whereon they trode. For theſe and the like reſpects, the Conſul made a ſtand: and ſhewing himſelfe vnto the Macedonian, who did the like, in order of battaile; gaue charge to haue the Campe meaſured out and entrenched behinde the Armie; whereinto, at good leyſure, hee fell backe, without anie manner of trouble. After a nights reſt, it was hoped, both by the Romans, and by the Macedonians, that the matter ſhould be determined; each part thinking their owne Generall too blame, for that they had not fought the ſame day. As for the King, he excuſed himſelfe by the backwardneſſe of the enemie; who aduanced no further, but kept vpon ground ſeruing ill for the Phalanx: as on the other ſide, the Conſul had the reaſons before ſhewed, which he communicated to thoſe about him the next day.

That euening (which followed the third of September, by the Roman account) C. Sulpicius Gallus, a Colonel, or Tribune of a Legion, who had the former yeare beene Prætor, foretold vnto the Conſul, and (with his good liking) vnto the armie, an Eclipſe of the Moone, which was to be the ſame night: willing the ſouldiors not to be troubled therewith, for that it was naturall, and might be knowne long before it was ſeene. It was the manner of the Romans, in ſuch Eclipſes, to beat Pannes of Braſſe and Baſons, as wee doe in following a ſwarme of Bees; thinking, that thereby they did the Moone great eaſe, and helped her in her labour. But this prognoſtication of Sulpicius conuerted their ſuperſtition into admiration of his deepe skill, when they ſaw it verified. Contrariwiſe, the Macedonians howled and made a great noyſe as long as the Eclipſe laſted: rather perhaps becauſe it was their faſhion, than for that they were terrified therewith, as with a prodigie betokening their loſſe; ſince their deſire to fight was no whit leſſened by it. I will not here ſtand to diſpute, Whether ſuch Eclipſes doe ſignifie, or cauſe anie alteration in ciuile affaires, and matters that haue ſmall dependance on naturall complexion: for the argument is too large. More worthie of obſeruation it is, how ſuperſtition captiuates the wiſdome of the wiſeſt, where the helpe of true Religion is wanting. Æmylius, though hee were ſufficiently inſtructed concerning this defect of the Moone, Moone, that it was no ſupernaturall thing, nor aboue the reach of humane vnderſtanding, ſo as he ſhould need to trouble himſelfe with anie deuout regard thereof: yet could he not refraine from doing his dutie to this Moone, and congratulating with ſacrifice her deliuerie, as ſoone as ſhe ſhone out bright againe: for which, hee is commended euen by Plutarch, a ſage Philoſopher, as a godly and religious man. If Sulpicius perhaps did not aſſiſt him in this fooliſh deuotion; yet is it like, that he, being a Senatour, and one of the Councell for Warre, was partaker the next morning in a Sacrifice done to Hercules; which was no leſſe fooliſh. For a great part of the day was vainely conſumed, ere Hercules could be pleaſed with anie Sacrifice, and vouchſafe to ſhew tokens of good lucke in the entrailes of the beaſts. At length, in the bellie of the one and twentieth Sacrifice, was found a promiſe of victorie to Æmylius; but with condition, That hee ſhould not giue the onſet. Hercules was a Greeke, and partiall, as nearer in alliance to the Macedonian than to the Roman. Wherefore it had beene better to call vpon the new Goddeſſe, lately canonized at Alabanda; or vpon Romulus, founder of their Citie, on whom the Romans had beſtowed his Deitie; or (if a God of elder date were more authenticall) vpon Mars the Father of Romulus, to whome belonged the guidance of militarie affaires; and who therefore would haue limited his fauour, with no iniunctions contrarie to the rules of Warre.

Now concerning the Battaile; Æmylius was throughly perſuaded, that the King meant to abide it: for that otherwiſe hee would not haue ſtayed at Pydna, when, as a little before, his leyſure ſerued to retyre whither hee liſted, the Romans being further off. In regard of this, and perhaps of the tokens appearing in the Sacrifices, the Conſul thought that hee might wait vpon aduantage, without making anie great haſte. Neither was it to bee neglected, that the morning Sunne was full in the Romans faces: which would be much to their hinderance all the forenoone. Since therefore Perſeus kept his ground, that was commodious for the Phalanx, and Æmylius ſent forth part of his men to bring in Wood and Fodder; there was no likelyhood of fighting that day. But about tenne of the clocke in the morning, a ſmall occaſion brought to paſſe that, which whereto neither of the Generalls had ouer earneſt deſire. A horſe brake looſe at watering; which two or three of the Roman ſouldiers followed into the riuer, wading after him vp to the knees. The Kings men lay on the further banke; whence a couple of Thracians ranne into the water, to draw this horſe ouer to their owne ſide. Theſe fell to blowes, as in a priuate quarrell; and one of the Thracians was ſlaine. His countrimen ſeeing this, haſted to reuenge their fellowes death, and followed thoſe that had ſlaine him ouer the riuer. Hereupon company came in, to helpe on each part, vntill the number grew ſuch, as made it paſt a fray, and cauſed both the armies to be carefull of the euent. In fine, each of the Generalls placed his men in order of battaile, accordly as the maner of his Countrie, and the armes, wherewith they ſerued, did require. The ground was a flat leuell, ſaue that on the ſides a few hillocks were raiſed here and there; whereof each part might take what aduantage it could. The Macedonians were the greater number, the Romans the better ſouldiers, and better appointed. Both the King and the Conſul encouraged their men with liuely words: which the preſent condition could bountifully afford. But the King hauing finiſhed his Oration, and ſent on his men, withdrew himſelfe into Pydna: there to doe ſacrifice, as hee pretended, vnto Hercules. It is the leſſe maruaile, that hee durſt aduenture battaile, ſince hee had bethought himſelfe of ſuch a ſtratageme, whereby to ſaue his owne perſon. As for Hercules, hee liked not the ſacrifice of a coward: whoſe vnſeaſonable deuotion could be no better than hypocriſie. For hee that will pray for a good Harueſt, ought alſo to Plow, Sowe, and Weede his Ground. When therefore the King returned to the battaile, hee found it no better than loſt: and he, in looking to his owne ſafetie, cauſed it to be loſt altogether, by beginning the flight.

The

The acts of this day, ſuch as we finde recorded, are, That the Roman Elephants could doe no manner of good; That the Macedonian Phalanx did ſo ſtoutly preſſe onwards, and beat off all which came before it, as Æmylius was thereat much aſtoniſhed; That the Peligni ruſhing deſperately on the Phalanx, were ouer-borne, many of them ſlaine, and the ſquadrons following them ſo diſcouraged herewith, as they retired apace towards an hill. Theſe were the things that fell out aduerſe to the Romans; and which the Conſul beholding, is ſaid to haue rent his coat-armor for griefe. If the King with all his power of horſe, had in like manner done his deuoyre; the victorie might haue bin his owne. That which turned the fortune of the battaile, was the ſame which doubtleſſe the Conſul expected, euen from the beginning: the difficultie, or almoſt impoſſibilitie, of holding the Phalanx long in order. For whileſt ſome of the Romanes ſmall battallions preſſed hard vpon one part of it, and others recoyled from it; it was neceſſarie (if the Macedonians would follow vpon thoſe which were put to the worſe) that ſome files hauing open way before them, ſhould aduance themſelues beyond the reſt that were held at a ſtand. This comming ſo to paſſe, admoniſhed the Conſul, what was to bee done. The long pikes of the Macedonians were of little vſe, when they were charged in flanke by the Roman Targettiers; according to direction giuen by Æmylius, when hee ſaw the front of the Enemies great battaile become vnequall, and the rankes in ſome places open, by reaſon of the vnequall reſiſtance which they found. Thus was the vſe of the Phalanx prooued vnauaileable againſt many ſmall ſquadrons, as it had beene formerly in the battaile of Cynoſcephalæ: yea, this forme of embattailing was found vnſeruiceable againſt the other, by reaſon, that being not euerie where alike diſtreſſed, it would breake of it ſelfe; though heere were little ſuch inconuenience of ground, as had beene at Cynoſcephalæ*. * Chap. 4. § 14.

Perſeus, when he ſaw his battaile begin to route, turned his bridle preſently, and ranne amaine towards Pella. All his horſe eſcaped, in a manner, vntouched, and a great number followed him; the little harme which they had taken, witneſſing the little good ſeruice which they had done. As for the poore foote; they were left to the mercie of the Enemie: who ſlew aboue twentie thouſand of them; though hauing little cauſe to be furious, as hauing loſt, in that battaile, onely ſome fourteſcore, or ſixſcore men at the moſt. Some of the foot, eſcaping from the execution, ouertook the king & his company in a wood; where they fel to railing at the horſemen, calling them cowards, traytors, and ſuch other names, till at length they fell to blowes. The King was in doubt left they had ill meaning to himſelfe: and therefore turned out of the common way, being followed by ſuch as thought it good. The reſt of the company diſperſed themſelues: euery one as his owne occaſions guided him. Of thoſe that kept along with their King, the number began within awhile to leſſen. For hee fell to deuiſing vpon whom hee might lay the blame of that daies misfortune, which was moſt due to himſelfe: thereby cauſing thoſe that knew his nature, to ſhrinke away from him, how they could. At his comming to Pella; he found his Pages and houſhold ſeruants, readie to attend him, as they had bin wont. But of his great men that had eſcaped from the battaile, there was none appearing in the Court. In this melancholike time, there were two of his Treaſurers that had the boldneſſe to come to him, and tell him roundly of his faults. But in reward of their vnſeaſonable admonitions, he ſtabbed them both to death. After this, none whom he ſent for would come at him. This boded no good. Wherefore ſtanding in feare, left they that refuſed to come at his call, ſhould ſhortly dare ſome greater miſchiefe; he ſtole out of Pella by night. Of his friends he had with him onely Euander (who had beene employed to kill Eumenes at Delphi) and two other. There followed him likewiſe about fiue hundred Cretians: more for loue of his money, than of him. To theſe he gaue of his plate, as much as was worth about fiftie talents, though shortly he coozened them of some part thereof; making shew as if hee would haue redeemed it; but neuer paying the money. The third day after the battaile hee came to Amphipolis; where hee exhorted the townesmen to fidelitie, with teares; and his owne speech being hindered by teares, appointed Euander to speake what himselfe would haue vttered. But the Amphipolitans made it their chiefe care, to looke well to themselues. Vpon the first fame of the ouerthrow, they had emptied their towne of two thousand Thracians that lay there in garrison: sending them foorth vnder colour of a gainefull employment, and shutting the gates after them. And now to bee ridde of the King; they plainly bade Euander be gone. The King hearing this, had no minde to tarrie: but embarking himselfe and the treasure which hee had there, in certaine vessells that hee found in the riuer Strymon; passed ouer to the Isle of Samothrace: where he hoped to liue safe, by priuiledge of the religious Sanctuarie therein.

These miserable shifts of the King make it the lesse doubtfull, how all the kingdome fell into the power of Æmylius, within so few dayes after his victorie. Pydna which was neerest at hand, was the last that yeelded. About sixe thousand of the souldiours, that were of sundrie Nations, fled out of the battaile into that Towne; and prepared for defence: the confused rabble of so many strangers hindering all deliberation and consent. Hippius who had kept the passage ouer Ossa against Martius, with Pantauchus, who had beene sent Embassadour to Gentius the Illyrian, were the first that came in: yeelding themselues and the Towne of Berœa, whither they had retired out of the battaile. With the like message came others from Thessalonica, from Pella, and from all the Townes of Macedon, within two dayes: the losse of the head bereauing the whole bodie of all sense and strength. Neither did they of Pydna stand out any longer, when they knew that the King had forsaken his Countrey: but opened their gates vpon such tearmes, that the sacke of it was granted to the Roman armie. Æmylius sent abroad into the Countrey, such as hee thought meetest, to take charge of other Cities: hee himselfe marching towards Pella. Hee found in Pella no more than three hundred talents; the same whereof Perseus had lately defrauded the Illyrian. But within a little while hee shall haue more.

It was soone vnderstood, that Perseus had taken Sanctuarie, in the Temple at Samothrace: his owne letters to the Consul, confirming the report. He sent these letters by persons of such meane condition; that his case was pitied, for that hee wanted the seruice of better men. The scope of his writing was, to desire fauour: which though hee begged in tearmes ill beseeming a King; yet since the inscription of his Epistle was, King PERSEVS to the Consul PAVLVS; the Consul, who had taken from him his Kingdome, and would not allow him to retaine the Title, refused to make answere thereunto. So there came other letters, as humble as could bee expected: whereby hee craued and obtained, that some might bee sent to conferre with him about matters of his present estate. Neuertheless in this conference, hee was marueilous earnest, that he might bee allowed to retaine the name of King. And to this ende it was perhaps, that hee had so carefully preserued his treasure, vnto the very last: flattering himselfe with such vaine hopes as these; That the Romans would neither violate a Sanctuarie, nor yet neglect those great riches in his possession; but compound with him for money, letting him haue his desire to liue at ease, and be called King. Yea it seemes that hee had indeede, euen from the beginning, a desire to liue in this Isle of Samothrace: both for that in one of his consultations about the war, he was dehorted by his friends, from seeking to exchange his Kingdome of Macedon, for * such a paltrie Iland; and for that hee offered to lay vp the money which Eume- nes demanded, in the holy Temple that was there. But hee findes it otherwiſe. They vrge him to giue place vnto neceſſitie, and without more adoe, to yeeld to the diſcretion and mercie of the people of Rome. This is ſo farre againſt his minde, that the conference breakes off without effect. Preſently there arriues at Samothrace Cn. Octauius the Roman Admirall, with his fleet: who aſſayes, as well by terrible threats, as by faire language, to draw the King out of his lurking hole; wherein, for feare of impriſonment, he had impriſoned himſelfe. When all would not ſerue, a queſtion was mooued to the Samothracians; How they durſt pollute their Temple, by receiuing into it one that had violated the like holy priuiledge of Sanctuarie, by attempting the murder of King Eumenes at Delphi? This went to the quicke. The Samothracians, being now in the power of the Romans, take this matter to heart; and ſend word to the King, That Euander, who liues with him in the Temple, is accuſed of an impious fact committed at Delphi, whereof vnleſſe he can cleare himſelfe in judgement, hee muſt not be ſuffered to prophane that holy place, by his abiding in it. The reuerence borne to his Majeſtie, now paſt, makes them forbeare to ſay, that Perſeus himſelfe is charged with the ſame crime. But what will this auaile, when the miniſter of the fact being brought into iudgement, ſhall (as is to be feared) appeach the author? Perſeus therefore willeth Euander to haue conſideration of the little fauour that can bee expected at the Romans hand, who are like to bee preſidents and ouerſeers of this judgement: ſo as it were better to die valiantly, ſince none other hope remaines, than hope to make good an ill cauſe; where, though he had a good plea, yet it could not helpe him. Of this motion Euander ſeemes to like well: and either kills himſelfe, or hoping to eſcape thence, by deferring the time as it were to get poyſon wherewith to end his life, is killed by the Kings commandement. The death of this man, who had ſtucke to Perſeus in all times of need, makes all the Kings friends that remained hitherto, to forſake him: ſo as none are left with him, ſaue his wife and children, with his Pages. It is much to be ſuſpected, that they which leaue him vpon this occaſion, will tell perillous tales, and ſay, That the King hath loſt the priuiledge of this holy Sanctuarie, by murdering Euander therein. Or if the Romans will affirme ſo much, who ſhall dare to gainſay them? Since therefore there is nothing but a point of formalitie, and euen that alſo lyable to diſpute, which preſerues him from captiuitie; hee purpoſeth to make an eſcape, and flye, with his Treaſures, vnto Cotys his good friend, into Thrace. Oroandes, a Cretian, lay at Samothrace with one ſhippe; who eaſily was perſwaded to waft the King thence. With all ſecrecie the Kings money, as much as could bee ſo conueyed, was carried aboord by night; and the King himſelfe, with his wife and *children (if rather it were not true, that hee had with him onely Philip his elder ſonne, who was onely by adoption his ſonne, being his *brother by nature) with much adoe got out at a window by a rope, and ouer a mudde wall. At his comming to the Sea ſide, hee found no Oroandes there: the Cretians had played a Grettan tricke, and he was gone with the money to his owne home. So it began to waxe cleare day, whileſt Perſeus was ſearching all along the ſhoare: who had ſtayed ſo long about this, that hee might feare to be intercepted ere hee could recouer the Temple. Hee ranne therefore amaine towards his lodging: and thinking it not ſafe to enter it the common way, leſt hee ſhould bee taken; hee hid himſelfe in an obſcure corner. His Pages miſſing him, ranne vp and downe making enquirie; till Octauius made Proclamation, That all the Kings Pages, and Macedonians whatſoeuer, abiding with their maſter in Samothrace, ſhould haue their liues and libertie, with all to them belonging, which they had either in that Iſle, or at home in Macedon, conditionally, That they ſhould preſently yeeld themſelues to the Romans. Hereupon they all came in. Likewiſe Ion, a Theſſalonian, to whom the King had giuen the cuſtodie of his children, deliuered them vp to Octauius. Laſtly, Perſeus himſelfe, with his sonne Philip, accusing the gods of Samothrace, that had no better protected him; rendered himselfe, and made the Roman victorie complete. If hee had not trusted in those gods of Samothrace, but employed his whole care in the defence of Macedon, without other hope of liuing, than of raigning therein; hee might well haue brought this Warre to an happier end. Now, by diuiding his cogitations, and pursuing, at once, those contrarie hopes of sauing his Kingdome by armes, and himselfe by flight; hee is become a spectacle of miserie, and one among the number of those Princes, that haue beene wretched by their owne default. Hee was presently sent away to Æmylius; before whom hee fell to the ground so basely, that hee seemed thereby to dishonour the victorie ouer himselfe, as gotten vpon one of abject qualitie, and therefore the lesse to bee esteemed. Æmylius vsed to him the language of a gentle Victor: blaming him, though mildly, for hauing, with so hostile a minde, made Warre vpon the Romans. Hereto good answere might haue beene returned by one of better spirit. As for Perseus, hee answered all with a fearefull silence. Hee was comforted with hope of life, or (as the Consul tearmed it) almost assurance; for that such was the mercie of the People of Rome. After these good words, being inuited to the Consuls Table, and respectiuely entreated, hee was committed prisoner to Q. Ælius.

Such end had this Macedonian Warre, after foure yeeres continuance: and such end therewithall had the Kingdome of Macedon; the glorie whereof, that had sometime filled all parts of the World then knowne, was now translated vnto Rome.

GENTIVS, King of the Illyrians, taken by the Romans.

ABout the same time, and with like celeritie, Anicius the Roman Prætor, who succeeded vnto App. Claudius; had the like successe against King Gentius the Illyrian. Gentius had an Armie of fifteene thousand; with which hee was at Lissus, readie to assist King Perseus as soone as the money should come, whereof hee had receiued onely tenne Talents. But Anicius arrested him on the way; fought with him; ouercame him; and draue him into Scodra*. This Towne was verie defensible by nature, besides the helpe of fortification; and strongly manned with all the force of Illyria; which, assisted with the Kings presence, made it seeme vnpossible to bee wonne, in any not a very long time. Yet Anicius was confident in his late victorie; and therefore presented his Armie before the walles, making countenance to giue an assault. The Illyrians, that might easily haue defended themselues within the Towne, would needes issue foorth and fight. They were, it seemes, rather passionate than couragious: for they were beaten; and thereupon foorthwith began amazedly to treat about yeelding. The King sent Embassadours; by whom, at first, hee desired truce for three dayes, that he might deliberate concerning his estate. It ill became him, who had layed violent hand on the Roman Embassadours, to haue recourse to such mediation. But hee thought his owne fault pardonable, in as much as hitherto there was no greater harme done by him, than the casting of those Embassadours into prison; where they were still aliue. Hauing obtained three dayes respite, hee passed vp a Riuer, within halfe a myle of the Roman Campe, into the Lake of Scodra, as it were to consult the more priuately; though indeede, to hearken whether the report were true, that his brother Caruantius was comming to his rescue. Finding that no such helpe was toward, it is wonder, that he was so foolish as to returne into Scodra. Hee sent messengers craving accesse vnto the Prætor: before whom hauing lamented his folly past (which, excepting the dishonestie, was not so great as his folly present) hee fell downe humbly, and yeelded himselfe to discretion. All the Townes of his Kingdome, together with his wife, children, brother, and friends, were presently giuen vp. So this Warre ended in thirtie dayes: the People of Rome not knowing that it was begun; vntill Perpenna, one of the Embassadors that had beene imprisoned, brought word from Anicius how all had passed.

Sco-

How the Romans behaued themselues in Greece and Macedon after their victory ouer PERSEVS.

NOw began the Romans to swell with the pride of their fortune; and to looke tyrannically vpon those that had beene vnmannerly toward them before, whilest the Warre with Perseus seemed full of danger. The Rhodian Embassadours were still at Rome, when the tidings of these victories were brought thither. Wherefore it was thought good to call them into the Senate, and bid them doe their errand againe. This they performed with bad grace; saying, that they were sent from Rhodes to make an ouerture of peace; forasmuch as it was thought, that this Warre was no lesse grieuous to the Romans themselues, than to the Macedonians and many others: but that now they were very glad, and in behalfe of the Rhodians did congratulate with the Senate and People of Rome, that it was ended much more happily than had beene expected. Hereto the Senate made answere, That the Rhodians had sent this Embassage to Rome, not for loue to Rome, but in fauour of the Macedonian; whose partizans they were, and should so be taken. By these threats, and the desire of some (couetous of the charge) to haue Warre proclaimed against Rhodes; the Embassadours were so affrighted, that in mourning apparell, as humble suppliants, they went about the Citie; beseeching all men, especially the great ones, to pardon their indiscretion, and not to prosecute them with vengeance for some foolish words. This danger of Warre from Rome being knowne at Rhodes, all that had beene any whit auerse from the Romans in the late Warre of Macedon, were either taken and condemned, or sent prisoners to Rome; excepting some that slue themselues for feare, whose goods also were confiscated. Yet this procured little grace; and lesse would haue done, if olde M. Cato, a man by nature vehement, had not vttered a milde sentence, and aduertised the Senate, That in decreeing Warre against Rhodes, they should much dishonour themselues, and make it thought, that * rather the wealth of that Citie, which they were greedie to ransacke, than any iust cause, had moued them thereto. This consideration, together with their good deserts in the Warres of Philip and Antiochus, helped well the Rhodians: among whome, none of any marke remained aliue, saue those that had beene of the Roman Faction. All which notwithstanding, many yeeres passed, ere by importunate suit, they could bee admitted into the societie of the Romans: a fauour which till now, they had not esteemed, but thought themselues better without it, as equall friends.

* Cæsar in orat. apud Salust. de Coniurat. Catilinæ.

With the like, or greater seueritie, did the Romans make themselues terrible in all parts of Greece. Æmylius himselfe made progresse through the Countrey; visiting all the famous places therein, as for his pleasure: yet not forgetting to make them vnderstand what power hee had ouer them. More than fiue hundred of the chiefe citizens in Demetrius were slaine at one time by those of the Roman faction, and with helpe of the Roman souldiers. Others fled, or were banished, and their goods confiscated. Of which things, when complaint was made to the Consul; the redresse was such, as requited not the paines of making supplication. His friends, that is to say, those which betrayed vnto the Romans the liberty of their Countrey, hee feasted like a King, with excessiue cheere, yet so, that he had all things very cheape in his Campe: an easie matter, since no man durst be backward in sending prouisions, nor set on them the due price. Embassadours likewise were sent from Rome; some, to giue order for settling the estate of Macedon, towards which they had more particular instruction from the Senate than was vsuall in such cases; and some, to visit the affaires of Greece. The Kingdome of Macedon was set at liberty by Æmylius and the Embassadours, his assistants, who had order therefore from the Senate. But this liberty was such as the Romans vsed to bestow. The best part of it was, That the Tribute which had beene payed vnto the Kings, was lessened by halfe. As for the rest; the Countrey was diuided into foure parts, and they forbidden commerce one with the other. All the Nobilitie were sent captiue into Italy, with their wiues and children, as many as were aboue fifteene yeeres old. The ancient Lawes of the Countrey were abrogated; and new giuen by Æmylius. Such mischiefe the Senate thought it better to doe, at the first alteration of things in this Prouince, and in the time of Conquest, than otherwise to leaue any inconuenience that should bee worse in the future. But concerning the Greekes, that were not subiects to Rome; the things done to them could deserue no better name than meere tyrannie, yea and shamelesse periury; were it not so, that the familiar custome, among Princes and great Estates, of violating Leagues, doth make the Oathes of confederation seeme of no validitie. The Embassadors that were sent to visit the Greekes, called before them all such men of note, from euery quarter, as had any way discouered an vnseruiceable disposition towards the Romans. These they sent to Rome; where they were made sure enough. Some of these had sent letters to Perseus, which fell at length into the Romans hands: and in that respect, though they were no subiects, yet wanted there no colour, for vsing them as traytors, or at least as enemies. But since onely two men were beheaded, for hauing beene openly on the Macedonian side; and since it is confessed, that the good Patriotes were no lesse afflicted in this inquisition, than they that had sold themselues to the King: this manner of proceeding was inexcusable Tyrannie. With the Achæans these Embassadors were to deale more formally: not so much because that Common-wealth was strong (though this were to bee regarded by them, hauing no Commission to make or denounce Warre) and like to proue vntractable, if manifest wrong were offered; as for that there appeared no manner of signe, by letters, or otherwise, whereby any one of the Achæans could be suspitiously charged to haue held correspondence with the Macedonian. It was also so, that neither Callicrates, nor any of his adherents, had beene employed by the Nation, in doing or offering their seruice to the Romans, but onely such as were the best Patriotes. Yet would not therefore the Embassadors neglect to vse the benefit of the time: wherein, since all men trembled for feare of Rome, the season serued fitly to ranke the Achæans with the rest. And hereto Callicrates was very vrgent: fearing, and procuring them to feare in behalfe of him and his friends, that if some sharpe order were not now taken, hee and his fellowes should bee made to pay for their mischieuous deuices, ere long time passed. So the Embassadours came among the Achæans: where one of them, in open assembly of the Nation, spake as Callicrates had before instructed him. Hee said, that some of the chiefe among them, had with money and other meanes befriended Perseus.

This

This being so; he desired that all such men might be condemned, whom, after sentence giuen, he would name vnto them. After sentence giuen (cried out the whole assembly) what iustice were this? name them first, and let them answere; which if they cannot well doe, we will soone condemne them. Then said the Roman boldly, that all their Prætors, as many as had led their armies, were guiltie of this crime. If this were true, said Xenon, a temperate man, and confident in his innocence; then should I likewise haue beene friend to Perseus: whereof, if any man can accuse me, I shall throughly answere him, either here presently, or before the Senate at Rome. Vpon these words of Xenon the Embassador laid hold, and said that euen so it were the best way, for him and the rest to purge themselues before the Senate at Rome. Then began he to name others, and left not vntill he had cited aboue a thousand; willing them to appeare, and answere before the Senate. This might euen be tearmed the captiuitie of Greece; wherein so many of the honestest and worthiest men were carried from home, for none other cause than their loue vnto their Country; to be punished according to the will of those, who could not endure, that vertue, and regard of the publike libertie, should dwell together in any of the Greekes. At their comming to Rome, they were all cast into prison, as men already condemned by the Achæans. Many Embassages were sent from Achaia (where it is to be wondred, that any such honest care of these innocent men could bee remaining: since honestie had beene thus punished as a vice, in so many of the worthiest among them) to informe the Senate, that these men were neither condemned by the Achæans, nor yet held to bee offendors. But in stead of better answere it was pronounced; That the Senate thought it not expedient for the Countrie, that these men should returne into Achaia. Neither could any sollicitation of the Achæans, who neuer ceased to importune the Senate for their libertie, preuaile at all; vntill after seuenteene yeeres, fewer than thirtie of them were enlarged, of whom that wise and vertuous man Polybius, the great Historian was one. All the rest were either dead in prison, or hauing made offer to escape, whether vpon the way before they came to Rome, or whether out of jayle, after that they were committed thereto, suffered death as malefactors.

This was a gentle correction, in regard of what was done vpon the Epirots. For the Senate being desirous to preserue the Macedonian Treasure whole; yet withall, to gratifie the Souldiours, gaue order, That the whole Countrey of Epirus should be put to sacke. This was a barbarous and horrible cruelty; as also it was performed by Æmylius with mischieuous subtiltie. Hauing taken leaue of the Greekes, and of the Macedonians, with bidding them well to vse the libertie bestowed vpon them by the people of Rome; he sent vnto the Epirots for tenne of the principall men out of euery Citie. These he commanded to deliuer vp all the Gold and Siluer which they had; and sent along with them, into euery of their Townes, what companies of men he thought conuenient, as it were to fetch the money. But he gaue secret instruction to the Captaines, that vpon a certaine day by him appointed, they should fall to sacke, euery one the Towne whereinto hee was sent. Thus in one day were threescore and tenne Cities, all confederate with the Romans, spoiled by the Roman Souldiors; and besides other acts of hostility in a time of peace, a hundred and fiftie thousand of that Nation made slaues. It may be granted, that some of the Epirots deserued punishment, as hauing fauoured Perseus. But since they, among this people, that were thought guilty of this offence, yea, or but coldly affected to the Romanes, had been already sent into Italie, there to receiue their due; and since this Nation, in generall, was not onely at the present in good obedience, but had, euen in this warre, done good seruice to the Romans: I hold this act so wicked, that I should not beleeue it, had any one Writer deliuered the contrarie. But the truth being manifest by consent of all; it is the lesse marueilous, that GOD was pleased to make Æmylius childlesse, euen in the glorie of his triumph, how great soeuer otherwise his vertues were.

In

In such manner dealt the Romans, after their victory, with the Greekes and Macedonians. How terrible they were to other Kingdomes abroad; it will appeare by the efficacie of an Embassage sent from them to Antiochus; whereof before wee speake, we must speake somewhat of Antiochus his foregoers, of himselfe, and of his affaires about which these Embassadours came.

§. XI.

ANTIOCHVS the Great, after his peace with the Romans, did nothing that was memorable in the short time following of his raigne and life. He died the six and thirtieth yeere after he had worne a Crowne, and in the seuenteenth or eighteenth of Ptolemie Epiphanes: while hee attempted to rob the Temple of Bel, or (according to Iustine) of Iupiter. Hee left behinde him three sonnes, Seleucus Philopator, Antiochus Epiphanes, Demetrius Soter; and one daughter, Cleopatra, whom hee had giuen in marriage to Ptolemie Epiphanes, King of Ægypt. Seleucus the fourth of that name, and the eldest of Antiochus his sonnes; raigned in Syria twelue yeeres, according to Eusebius, Appian, and Sulpitius: though Iosephus giue him but seuen. A Prince, who as hee was slothfull by nature; so the great losse which his father Antiochus had receiued, tooke from him the meanes of managing any great affaire. Of him, about three hundred yeeres before his birth, Daniel gaue this judgement, Et stabit in loco eius vilissimus & indignus decore regio. And in his place (speaking of Antiochus the Father of this man) shall start vp a vilde person, vnworthy the honor of a King. Vnder this Seleucus, those things were done which are spoken of Onias the High Priest, in these words, and other to the same effect: What time as the holy Citie was inhabited with all Peace, because of the godlinesse of ONIAS the Priest, it came to passe, that euen the King did honor the place, and garnished the Temple with great gifts. And all that is written in the third Chapter of the second of Macchabees, of Simon of Beniamin, who by Apollonius betrayed the Treasures of the Temple: and of Heliodorus sent by the King to seize them; of his miraculous striking by God, and his recouery at the prayers of Onias; of the Kings death, and of his successor Antiochus Epiphanes. It is therefore from the raigne of this King, that the bookes of the Macchabees take beginning. Which bookes seeme not to bee deliuered by one and the same hand. For the first booke, although it touch vpon Alexander the Great, yet it hath nothing else of his storie, nor of the acts of his successors, till the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, the brother and successor of this Seleucus; from whom downward to the death of Simon Macchabeus (who died in the hundred threescore and seuenteenth yeere of the Greekes in Syria) that first booke treateth. The Author of the second book, although he take the Story somewhat further off, by way of a Proæme, yet hee endeth with the hundred and one and fiftieth yeere of the Grecian raigne, and with the death of Nicanor, slaine by Iudas: remembring in the fourth Chapter the practice of Iason the brother of Onias, who after the death of Seleucus, preuailed with Antiochus Epiphanes, his successor for the Priesthood. It is also held by Iansenius and other graue Writers, that it was in the time of this Onias, that Arius King of the Spartans sent Embassadors to the Iewes, as to their brothers and kinsmen. Which intelligence betweene them and the Greekes, Ionathan the brother and successor of Iudas, remembreth in the Preamble of that Epistle, which he himselfe directed to the people of Sparta by Numenius and Antipater his Embassadours, whom hee employed at the same time to the Senate of Rome; repeating also the former Letters word by word, which Arius had sent to Onias the High Priest, whereto Iosephus addes, addes, that the name of the Lacedæmonian Embassador was Demoteles, and that the Letters had a square Volume, and were sealed with an Eagle holding a Dragon in her clawes.

Now to this Seleucus, the fourth of that name, succeeded Antiochus Epiphanes, in the hundred and seuen and thirtieth yeere of the Greekes in Syria. Hee was the second sonne of the Great Antiochus: and he obtained his Kingdome by procuring the death of the King his brother; which also hee vsurped from his brothers sonne.

Ptolemie Philometor, his Nephew by his sister Cleopatra, being then very yong, had been about seuen yeeres King of Ægypt.

Ptolemie Epiphanes, the Father of this King Philometor, had raigned in Ægypt foure and twenty yeeres; in great quiet, but doing little or nothing that was memorable. Philip of Macedon, and the great Antiochus, had agreed to diuide his Kingdome between them, whilest he was a childe. But they found such other busines, ere long, with the Romans, as made them giue ouer their vniust purpose; especially Antiochus, who gaue, with his daughter in marriage, vnto this Ptolemie, the Prouinces of Cœlosyria, Phœnice, and Iudæa, which hee had wonne by his victory ouer Scopas, that was Generall of the Ægyptian forces in those parts. Neuertheless, Ptolemie adhered to the Romans: whereby hee liued in the greater securitie. Hee left behind him two sons; this Ptolemie Philometor, and Ptolemie Phiscon, with a daughter, Cleopatra. Cleopatra was wife to the elder of her brethren, and after his death to the yonger, by whom shee was cast off, and her daughter taken in her stead. Such were the marriages of these Ægyptian Kings.

Ptolemie Philometor, so called (that is, the louer of his mother) by a bitter nickname, because he slew her, fell into hatred with his subiects, and was like to be chased out of his Kingdome, his yonger brother being set vp against him. Physcon hauing a strong party, got possession of Alexandria; and Philometor held himselfe in Memphis, crauing succour of King Antiochus his vncle. Hereof Antiochus was glad: who vnder colour to take vpon him the protection of the young Prince, sought by all meanes possible to possesse himselfe of that Kingdome. He sent Apollonius the sonne of Mnestheus Embassadour into Ægypt, and vnder colour to assist the Kings Coronation, hee gaue him instructions to perswade the Gouernours of the yong King Philometor, to deliuer the King his Nephew with the principall places of that Kingdome into his hands; pretending an extraordinary care and desire of his Nephewes safety and well doing. And the better to answere all argument to the contrarie, he prepared a forcible armie to attend him. Thus came he alongst the coast of Syria to Ioppe, and from thence on the sudden he turned himselfe towards Ierusalem, where, by Iason the Priest (a Chaplin fit for such a Patron) hee was with all pompe and solemnitie receiued into the Citie. For though lately, in the time of Seleucus, the brother and predecessour of Epiphanes, that impious Traitour Simon of the Tribe of Beniamin, Ruler of the Temple, when hee would haue deliuered the treasures thereof to Apollonius Gouernor of Cœlosyria and Phœnicia, was disappointed of his wicked purpose by miracle from heauen; the said Apollonius being strucken by the Angel of God, and recouering againe at the prayer of Onias: yet sufficed not this example to terrifie others from the like vngodly practices. Presently vpon the death of Seleucus, this Iason, the brother of Onias, seeking to supplant his brother, and to obtaine the Priesthood for himselfe, offered vnto the King three hundred and threescore talents of siluer, with other rents and summes of money. So hee got his desire, though he not long inioyed it.

This naughty dealing of Iason, and his being ouer-reached by another in the same kinde, calls to minde a by-word taken vp among the Achæans, when as that mischieuous Callicrates, who had beene too hard for all worthie and vertuous men, was beaten at his owne weapon, by one of his owne condition. It went thus:

One

One fire than other burnes more forcibly,
One Wolfe than other Wolues does bite more sore;
One Hawke than other Hawkes more swift does fly.
So one most mischieuous of men before,
CALLICRATES, false knaue as knaue might be,
Met with MENALCIDAS more false than he.

And euen thus fell it out with Iason: who within three yeeres after, was betrayed, and ouerbidden by Menelaus the brother of Simon, that for three hundred talents more obtained the Priesthood for himselfe: Iason thereupon being forced to flie from Ierusalem, and to hide himselfe among the Ammonites.

From Ierusalem, Antiochus marched into Phœnicia, to augment the numbers of his men of warre, and to prepare a Fleet for his expedition into Ægypt; with which, and with a mighty armie of land-forces, He went about to raigne ouer Ægypt, that he might haue the dominion of two Realmes, and entred Ægypt with a mighty company, with Chariots and Elephants, with Horsemen, and with a great Nauie, and moued warre against PTOLEMÆVS King of Egypt, but PTOLEMÆVS was afraid of him, and fled, and many were wounded to death. He wan many strong Cities, and tooke away the spoyles of the Land of Egypt. Thus was fulfilled the Prophecie of DANIEL: Hee shall enter into the quiet and plentifull Prouinces, and he shall do that which his Fathers haue not done, nor his Fathers Fathers. Neuer indeed had any of the Kings of Syria so great a victorie ouer the Ægyptians, nor tooke from them so great riches. For hee gaue a notable ouerthrow to the Captaines of Ptolemie, betweene Peluſium and the hill Caſſius, after which he entred, and sackt the greatest and richest of all the Cities of Ægypt, Alexandria excepted, which he could not force. In conclusion, after that ANTIOCHVS had smitten Egypt, hee turned againe, and went vp towards Israel and Ierusalem with a mighty people, and entred proudly into the Sanctuary, and tooke away the golden Altar, and the Candlestick for the light, and all the instruments thereof, and the table of the Shew-bread, and the Powring Vessels, and the Bowles, and the golden Basons, and the Vaile, and the Crownes, and the golden Apparell. Hee tooke also the Siluer and the Gold, and the precious Iewels, and the secret Treasures: and when he had taken away all, he departed into his owne Land, after he had murdered many men.

It was about the beginning of the Macedonian warre, that Antiochus tooke in hand this Egyptian businesse. At what time he first layd claime to Cœlosyria; iustifying his title by * the same allegations which his father had made; and stiffely auerring, that this Prouince had not beene consigned ouer to the Egyptian, or giuen in dowrie with Cleopatra. Easie it was to approue his right vnto that which he had already gotten, when he was in a faire way to get all Egypt. The Achæans, Rhodians, Athenians, and other of the Greekes, pressed him, by seuerall Embassages, to some good conclusion. But his answere was; that if the Alexandrians could be contented to receiue their King his Nephew Philometor, the elder brother of the Ptolemies, then should the warre be presently at an end; otherwise not. Yet when hee saw, that it was an hard peece of worke to take Alexandria by force: hee thought it better to let the two brothers consume themselues with intestine warre, than by the terrour of his armes, threatning destruction vnto both of them, to put into them any desire of comming to agreement. He therefore withdrew his forces for the present; leauing the Ptolemies in very weake estate; the yonger, almost ruinated by his inuasion; the elder hated and forsaken by his people.

Polyb.Legat.81. 82.&c.

But how weake soeuer these Egyptians were, their hatred was thought to bee so strong, that Antiochus might leaue them to the prosecution thereof; and follow, at good leisure, his other businesse at Ierusalem or elsewhere. So after the sacke of Ierusalem, he rested him awhile at Antioch; and then made a iourney into Cilicia, to suppresse the Rebellion of the Tharsians and other in those parts who had bin giuen, as it were, by way of dowry, to a Concubine of the Kings, called Antiochis. For

Gouernour

Gouernour of Syria in his abſence, he left one Andronicus, a man of great authoritie about him. In the meane while Menelaus the brother of Simon, the ſame who had thruſt Iaſon out of the Prieſthood, and promiſed the King three hundred talents for an Income, committing the charge of the Prieſthood to his brother Lyſimachus, ſtole certaine veſſels of gold out of the Temple: wherof he preſented a part to Andronicus the Kings Lieutenant, and ſold the reſt at Tyre, and other Cities adioining. This he did, as it ſeemeth, to aduance the payment of the three hundred talents promiſed; the ſame being now by Soſtratus eagerly demanded. Hereof when Onias the Prieſt (formerly diſpoſſeſſed by Iaſon) had certaine knowledge, being mooued with zeale, and deteſting the ſacriledge of Menelaus, hee reprooued him for it; and fearing his reuenge, he withdrew himſelfe into a Sanctuary at Daphne.

Daphne was a place of delight adioyning as a ſuburb to Antioch. In compaſſe it had about ten miles: wherein were the Temples of Apollo and Diana, with a Groue, ſweete Springs, banquetting places, and the like; which were wholly, in a maner, abuſed to luſt, and other ſuch voluptuouſneſſe. Whether it were well done of Onias, to commit himſelfe to the protection of Apollo and Diana, or to claime priuiledge, from the holines of a ground conſecrated to any of the Heathen gods, I will not ſtand to diſcourſe. Only I ſay for mine owne opinion; that the inconuenience is far leſſe, to hold this booke as Apocryphall; than to iudge this fearefull ſhift which Onias (though a vertuous man) made for his life, either commendable, or allowable, as the booke ſeemes to doe. As for this refuge, it could not ſaue the life of the poore old man: for MENELAVS taking ANDRONICVS apart, prayed him to ſlay ONIAS. So when he came to ONIAS, he counſelled him craftily, giuing him his right hand with an oath, and perſwading him to come out of the Sanctuary; ſo he ſlew him incontinently without any regard of righteouſneſſe. Mac.li.2.c.4. Hereof when complaint was made to Antiochus after his returne out of Cilicia, Hee tooke away ANDRONICVS his garment of purple, and rent his clothes, and commanded him to be led throughout the Citie, and in the ſame place where hee had committed the wickedneſſe againſt ONIAS, hee was ſlaine as a murderer. Mac.2.c.4.v.38 In taking reuenge of this innocent mans death, I ſhould haue thought that this wicked King had once in his life-time done Iuſtice. But preſently after this, at the ſuit of one Ptolemie, a traytor to Ptolemie Philometor, he condemned innocent men to death; who iuſtly complained againſt Menelaus, and his brother Lyſimachus, for a ſecond robbing of the Temple, and carrying thence the veſſels of gold remaining. Hereby it is manifeſt, that he was guided by his owne outragious will, and not by any regard of iuſtice: ſince he reuenged the death of Onias, yet ſlue thoſe that were in the ſame cauſe with Onias; Who, had they told their cauſe, yea, before the Scythians, they ſhould haue been heard as innocent. Verſ.47. By reaſon of ſuch his vnſteadineſſe, this King was commonly termed Epimanes, that is, madde, in ſtead of Epiphanes, which ſignifieth Noble or Illuſtrious.

After this, Antiochus made preparation for a ſecond voyage into Ægypt, and then were there ſeene throughout all the Citie of Ieruſalem, forty dayes long, horſemen running in the ayre with robes of gold, and as bands of Speare-men, and as troupes of Horſemen ſet in aray, encountring and courſing one againſt another. Mac.2.c.5.v.1. Of theſe prodigious ſignes, or rather forewarnings of GOD, all Hiſtories haue deliuered vs, ſome more, ſome leſſe. Before the deſtruction of Ieruſalem by Veſpaſian, a ſtarre in the forme of a ſword appeared in the Heauens directly ouer the City, after which there followed a ſlaughter like vnto this of Epiphanes, though farre greater. In the Cymbrian warres, Pliny tells vs, that Armies were ſeene fighting in the ayre from the morning till the euening. Plin.lib.2.c.57.

In the time of Pope Iohn the eleuenth, a fountaine powred out blood in ſtead of water, in or neare the Citie of Genoa; ſoone after which the Citie was taken by the Saracens, with great ſlaughter. Of theſe and the like prodigious ſignes, Vipera hath collected many, and very remarkable. But this one ſeemeth to me the moſt memorable, becauſe the moſt notorious. Off-ſpring

Off-spring of the Cæsars, as well naturall as adopted, toke end; whereof this notable signe gaue warning.

Sueton.Galba. When Liuia was first married to Augustus, an Eagle let fal into her armes a white Henne, holding a Lawrell branch in her mouth. Liuia caused this Henne to bee carefully nourished, and the Lawrell branch to be planted: Of the Henne came a faire encrease of white Poultrie, and from the little branch there sprang vp in time a Groue of Lawrell: so that afterwards, in all Triumphs, the Conquerours did vse to carrie in their hands a branch of Bayes taken out of this Groue; and after the Triumphs ended, to set it againe in the same ground: which branches were obserued, when they happened to wither, to foreshew the death of those persons who carried them in triumph. And in the last yeere of Nero, all the broodes of the white Hennes died, and the whole Groue of Bayes withered at once. Moreouer, the heads of all the Cæsars Statues, and the Scepter placed in Augustus his hand, were stricken downe with lightning. That the Iewes did not thinke such strange signes to bee vnworthy of regard; it appeares by their calling vpon GOD, and praying, that these tokens might turne to good.

Now, as the first voyage of Antiochus into Ægypt was occasioned by discord of the two brethren therein raigning: so was his second Expedition caused by their good agreement. For the elder Ptolemie being left in Memphis, not strong enough to force his brother, who had defended Alexandria against all the power of their vncle; thought it the best way to seeke entrance into that royall Citie, rather by perswasion than by armes. Physcon had not as yet forgotten the terrour of the former siege: the Alexandrines though they loued not Philometor, yet loued they worse to liue in scarcitie of victuals (which was already great among them, and like to grow extreme) since nothing was brought in from the Countrey; and the friends of the yonger brother saw no likelihood of good issue to bee hoped for without reconciliation. These good helpes, and aboue all these, the louing disposition of Cleopatra, who then was in Alexandria, encouraged Philometor in his purpose. But that which made him earnestly desirous to accomplish it, was the feare wherein hee stood of his vncle. For though Antiochus were gone out of Ægypt with his armie; yet had hee left behinde him a strong garrison in Pelusium; retaining that Citie, which was the Key of Ægypt, to his owne vse. This consideration wrought also with Physcon, and with those that were about him; so as by the vehement mediation of Cleopatra their sister, the two brethren made an end of all quarrels.

When the newes of this accord was brought to Antiochus, hee was greatly enraged: for notwithstanding that hee had pretended no other thing than the establishment of the King Philometor his nephew, and a meaning to subiect his yonger brother vnto him, which he gaue in answere to all Embassadours; yet he now prepared to make sharpe warre vpon them both. And to that end hee presently furnished and sent out his Naue towards Cyprus, and drew his land Armie into Cœlosyria, readie to enter Ægypt the Spring following. When he was on his way as farre as Rhinocorura, he met with Embassadours sent from Ptolemie. Their errand was partly to yeeld thankes to Antiochus for the establishing of Philometor in his Kingdome; partly to beseech him, That hee would rather bee pleased to signifie what hee required to haue done in Ægypt, which should bee performed, than to enter it as an enemie with so puissant an Armie. But Antiochus returned this short answere, That he would neither call backe his Fleete, nor withdraw his Armie, vpon any other condition, than that Ptolemie should surrender into his hands together with the Citie of Pelusium, the whole Territory thereto belonging: and that hee should also abandon and leaue vnto him the Ile of Cyprus, with all the right that he had vnto either of them for euer. For answere vnto these demands, hee set downe a day certaine, and a short one. Which being come and past, without any accord made, the Syrian Fleete entred Nilus, and recouered as well those places ces which appertained to Ptolemie in Arabia, as in Ægypt it selfe; for Memphis, and all about it, receiued Antiochus, being vnable to resist him. The King hauing now no stoppe in his way to Alexandria; passed on thitherwards by easie journeyes.

Of all these troubles past, as well as of the present danger wherein Ægypt stood, the Romans had notice long agoe. But they found, or, were contented to finde, little reason for them to intermeddle therein. For it was a ciuill warre: and wherein Antiochus seemed to take part with the juster cause. Yet they gaue signification, that it would be much displeasing vnto them, to haue the Kingdome of Ægypt taken from the rightfull owners. More they could not, or would not doe; being troubled with Perseus; and therefore loth to prouoke Antiochus too farre. Neuertheless, the Ægyptian Kings being reconciled, and standing joyntly in neede of helpe against their Vncle, who prepared and made open warre against them both: it was to be expected, that not onely the Romans, but many of the Greekes, as being thereto obliged by notable benefits, should arme in defence of their Kingdome. Rome had beene sustained with food from Ægypt, in the warre of Hannibal; when Italy lying waste, had neither corne, nor money wherewith to buy sufficient store. By helpe of the Ægyptian, had Aratus laide the foundation of that greatnesse, whereto the Achæans attained. And by the like helpe, had Rhodes beene defended against Demetrius Poliorcetes. Neither were these friendly turnes, which that bountifull house of the Ptolemies had done for sundry people abroad, ill followed, or seconded, by other as bad in requitall: but with continuance of sutable beneficence, from time to time encreased. Wherefore the two brothers sent abroad confidently for ayde; especially to the Rhodians and Achæans, who seemed most able to giue it effectually. To the Romans, Physcon and Cleopatra had sent, a yeere since: but their Embassadours lay still in Rome. Of the Achæans they desired in particular, that Lycortas the braue warriour might bee sent to them, as Generall of all the Auxiliaries, and his sonne Polybius, Generall of the Horse. Hereunto the Achæans readily condescended: and would immediatly haue made performance; if Callicrates had not interposed his mischieuous arte. Hee, whether seeking occasion to vaunt his obsequiousnesse to the Romans; or much rather enuying those Noble Captaines, whose seruice the Kings desired; withstood the common voyce; which was, That their Nation should, not with such small numbers as were requested, but with all their power, be ayding vnto the Ptolemies. For it was not now (hee saide) conuenient time to entangle themselues in any such businesse, as might make them the lesse able to yeeld vnto the Romans, what helpe soeuer should bee required in the Macedonian warre. And in this sentence, hee with those of his faction, obstinately persisted; terrifying others with bigge wordes, as it were in behalfe of the Romans. But Polybius affirmed, that Martius the late Consull had signified vnto him, that the Romans were past all neede of helpe: adding further, that a thousand foote, and two hundred horse, might well bee spared, to the ayde of their Benefactours, the Ægyptian Kings, without disabling their Nation to performe any seruice to the Romans; for as much as the Achæans could without trouble, raise thirtie or fortie thousand Souldiours. All this notwithstanding, the resolution was deferred from one meeting to another; and finally broken, by the violence of Callicrates. For when it was thought that the Decree should haue passed; hee brought into the Theater where the assembly was held, a Messenger with letters from Martius; whereby the Achæans were desired to conforme themselues to the Roman Senate; and to labour as the Senate had done, by sending Embassadours to set Ægypt in peace. This was an aduice against all reason. For the Senate had indeed sent Embassadours to make peace; but as in a time of greater businesse elsewhere, with such milde wordes, that nothing was effected. Wherefore it was not likely, that the Achæans should doe any good in the same kinde. Yet Polybius and his friends, durst not gaine-say the Romane Councell; which had force of an injunction. So the Kings were left in much distresse; disappointed of their expectation. But within a while was Perseus ouercome: and then might the Embassador sent from the Romane Senate, performe as much as any Armie could haue done.

Audience had beene lately giuen by the Senate, vnto those Embassadors of Physcon and Cleopatra; which hauing stayed more then a whole yeere in the City, brought nothing of their businesse to effect vntill now. The Embassadours deliuered their message in the name of those that had sent them: though it concerned (which perhaps they knew not) Philometer, no lesse than his Brother and Sister.

In this Embassage of Ptolemie, now requesting helpe from Rome; appeared a notable change of his fortune, from such as it had beene before three or foure yeeres last past. For in the beginning of these his troubles, which beganne with the Macedonian Warre; either he, or Eulæus, or Lenæus (vpon whom the blame was afterwards layd) which had the gouernment of him, thought his affaires in such good estate, that not onely he determined to set vpon Antiochus, for Cœlesyria; but would haue interposed himselfe betweene the Romans and Perseus, as a competent Arbitratour; though it fell out well, that his Embassadour was by a friend perswaded to forget that point of his errand. From these high thoughts, hee fell on the sudden, by the rebellion of his brother and subiects, to liue vnder protection of the same Antiochus. And now at such time as by atonement with his brother and subiects, hee might haue seemed to stand in no neede of such protection, hee hath remaining none other helpe whereby to saue both his Kingdome and life, than what can bee obtained by their intercession which were imployed against him. This miserable condition of him, his brother and sister shewed it selfe, euen in the habit of those Embassadours. They were poorely clad; the haire of their heades and beardes ouer-growne, as was their manner in time of affliction; and they carried in their handes, branches of Oliue. Thus they entred into the Senate; and there fell, groueling and prostrate vpon the floore. Their garments were not so meane and mournefull, nor their lookes and Countenances so sad and dejected, but that their speech was than either of the other farre more lamentable. For hauing told in what danger their King and Countrey stood; they made a pitifull and grieuous complaint vnto the Senate, beseeching them to haue compassion of their estate, and of their Princes, who had alwayes remained friendly and faithfull to the Romans. They saide that the people of Rome had so much heeretofore fauoured this Antiochus in particular, and were of such account and authority, with all other Kings and Nations; as if they pleased but to send their Embassadours, and let Antiochus know, that the Senate was offended with his vndertaking vpon the King their Confederate; then would he presently raise his siege from before Alexandria, and with-draw his Armie out of Ægypt, into Syria. But that if the Senate protracted any time, or vsed any delay; then should Ptolemie and Cleopatra, be shortly driuen out of their Realmes, and make repaire to Rome, with shamefull dishonour to the Senate, and people thereof, in that, in the extreme dangers of all their fortunes, they had not vouchsafed to relieue them.

Polyb. Legat. 72.

The Lords of the Senate moued with compassion, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lenus, C. Decimius, and A. Hostilius, as Embassadors to determine and end the warre betweene those Kings. In commission they had first to find King Ptolemie, and then Antiochus, and to let them both vnderstand, that vnlesse they surceased, and gaue ouer Armes, they would take that King no more for a friend to the Senate, and people of Rome, whom they found obstinate, or vsing delay. So these Romans, together with the Alexandrine Embassadours, tooke their leaue, and went onward their way within three dayes after.

Whilest

Whileſt Popilius and his fellowes were on their way toward Ægypt, Antiochus had tranſported his Armie ouer Luſine, ſome fortie myles from Alexandria. So neere was hee to the end of his journey, when the Roman Embaſſadors met him. After greeting and ſalutations at their firſt encounter, Antiochus offered his right hand to Popilius: but Popilius filled it with a Role of paper; willing him to reade thoſe Mandates of the Senate, before hee did anie thing elſe. Antiochus did ſo; and hauing a little while conſidered of the buſineſſe, hee tolde Popilius, That hee would aduiſe with his friends, and then giue the Embaſſadours their anſwere. But Popilius, according to his ordinarie blunt manner of ſpeech, which hee had by nature, made a Circle about the King with a Rod which he held in his hand, willing him to make him ſuch an anſwere as hee might report to the Senate, before hee moued out of that Circle. The King aſtoniſhed at this ſo rude and violent a Commaundement, after hee had ſtayed and pawſed awhile, I will be content (quoth he) to doe whatſoeuer the Senate ſhall ordaine. Then Popilius gaue vnto the King his hand, as to a Friend and Allie of the Romans.

Thus Antiochus departed out of Ægypt, without anie good iſſue of his coſtly Expedition; euen in ſuch manner as Daniel* had propheſied long before: yea, fulfilling euerie particular circumſtance, both of returning, and of doing miſchiefe to Ieruſalem after his returne; like as if theſe things had rather beene hiſtorified than fore-told by the Prophet. As for the Roman Embaſſadours, they ſtayed awhile, and ſettled the Kingdome of Ægypt, leauing it vnto the elder brother, and appointing the younger to raigne ouer Cyrene. This done, they departed towards Cyprus; which they left, as it had beene, in the power of the Ægyptian, hauing firſt ſent away Antiochus Fleet, which had alreadie giuen an ouerthrow to the Ægyptian ſhips.

Dan.cap.11. verſ.29,30.&41

§. XII.

How the Romans were dreadfull to all Kings. Their demeanour towards EVMENES, PRVSIAS, MASANISSA, and COTYS. The end of PERSEVS and his children. The inſtabilitie of Kingly Eſtates. The Triumphs of PAVLVS, ANICIVS, and OCTAVIVS. With the Concluſion of the Worke.

BY this peremptorie demeanour of Popilius, in doing his Meſſage, and by the readie obedience of King Antiochus to the will of the Senate; wee may perceiue how terrible the Romans were growne, through their conqueſt of Macedon. The ſame Popilius had beene well contented, a yeare before this, to lay aſide the roughneſſe of his naturall condition, and to giue good language to the Acheans and Ætolians, when hee went Embaſſadour to thoſe people of Greece, that were of farre leſſe power than the King Antiochus. Likewiſe, Antiochus had with good words, and no more than good words, diſmiſſed other Embaſſadours which came from Rome, in ſuch ſort, as they complained not, much leſſe vſed anie menacing tearmes, though hee performed nothing of their requeſt. But now the caſe was altered. So found other Kings as well as Antiochus.

Eumenes ſent to Rome his brother Attalus, to gratulate the victorie ouer Perſeus, and to craue helpe or countenance of the Senate againſt the Gallogreekes, which moleſted him. Verie welcome was Attalus, and louingly entertained by moſt of the Senatours: who bade him be confident, and requeſted of the Senate his brothers Kingdome for himselfe; for it should surely be giuen him. These hopefull promises tickled Attalus with such ambition, that hee eyther approued, or seemed to approue the motion. But his honest nature was soone reclaymed by the faithfull counsaile of Stratius a Physician; whome Eumenes had sent to Rome of purpose to keepe his brother vpright. So, when hee came into the Senate, hee deliuered the errand about which hee had beene sent; recounted his owne seruices done to the Romans in the late Warre,* wherewithall he forgat not to make of his brother as good mention as he could: and finally requested, That the Townes of Ænus and Maronea might be bestowed vpon himselfe. * By his omitting to sue for his brothers Kingdome, the Senate conceiued opinion, that he meant to craue another day of audience for that businesse alone. Wherefore, to make him vnderstand how gracious hee was, they not onely graunted all his desire; but in the presents which they gaue to him (as was their custome to Embassadours that came with an acceptable message) they vsed singular magnificence. Neuertheless, Attalus tooke no notice of their meaning; but went his way, contented with what they had alreadie graunted. This did so highly displease the Senate, that whilest hee was yet in Italie, they gaue order for the libertie of Ænus and Maronea: thereby making vneffectuall their promise; which otherwise they could not, without shame, reuoke. And as for the Gallogreekes, which were about to inuade the Kingdome of Pergamus; they sent Embassadours to them, with such instructions, as rather encouraged than hindered them in their purpose. The displeasure of the Senate beeing so manifest; Eumenes thought it worthie of his labour to make another voyage to Rome. Hee might well blame the follie of his second voyage thither, for this necessitie of the third: since, by his malice to Perseus, he had layed open vnto these ambitious Potentates the way to his owne dores. No sooner was he come into Italie, than the Senate was readie to send him going. It was not thought expedient to vse him as an enemie, that came to visit them in loue: neyther could they, in so doing, haue auoided the note of singular inconstancie: and to entertaine him as a friend, was more than their hatred to him, for his ingratitude, as they deemed it, would permit. Wherefore they made a Decree, That no King should be suffered to come to Rome; and by vertue thereof sent him home, without expence of much further complement.

Liu.lib.45.

Polyb.Legat. 93.

Polyb.ibid.

Prusias King of Bithynia had beene at Rome somewhat before; where he was welcommed after a better fashion. Hee had learned to behaue himselfe as humbly as the proud Romans could expect or desire. For entring into the Senate, hee lay downe, and kissed the threshold, calling the Fathers his gods and sauiours: as also hee vsed to weare a Cap, after the manner of slaues newly manumised, professing himselfe an enfranchised bondman of the People of Rome. Hee was indeede naturally a slaue, and one that by such abiect flatterie kept himselfe safe; though doing otherwise greater mischiefe than anie wherewith Perseus had beene charged. His errand was, besides matter of complement, to commend vnto the Senate the care of his sonne Nicomedes, whome he brought with him to Rome, there to receiue education. Further petition he made, to haue some Townes added to his Kingdome: whereto, because the graunt would haue beene vniust, he receiued a cold answere. But concerning the Wardship of his sonne, it was vndertaken by the Senate: which, vaunting of the pleasure lately done to Ægypt, in freeing it from Antiochus, willed him thereby to consider, what effectuall protection the Romans gaue vnto the children of Kings, that were to their patronage commended.

But aboue all other Kings, Masanissa held his credit with the Romans good. His quarrels were endlesse with the Carthaginians: which made the friendship of the Romans to him the more assured. In all controuersies they gaue iudgement on his ſide: and whereas hee had inuaded the Countrey of Emporia, holding the Lands, but vnable to winne the Townes; the Romans (though at firſt they could finde no pretext, whereby to countenance him in this oppreſſion) compelled finally the Carthaginians both to let goe all their hold, and to pay fiue hundred Talents to the Numidian, for hauing hindered him of his due ſo long. Now indeede had Rome good leyſure to deuiſe vpon the ruine of Carthage: after which, the race of Maſaniſſa himſelfe was ſhortly by them rooted vp. But heereof the olde King neuer dreâmed. Hee ſent to Rome one of his ſonnes, to congratulate the victorie ouer Perſeus; and offered to come thither himſelfe, there to ſacrifice for joy vnto Iupiter in the Capitol. His good will was louingly accepted; his ſonne rewarded; and hee entreated to ſtay at home.

Cotys the Thracian ſent Embaſſadours, to excuſe himſelfe touching the aide by him giuen to Perſeus, for that the Macedonian had him bound by hoſtages; and to entreat, That his ſonne, which was taken with the children of Perſeus, might be ſet at libertie for conuenient ranſome. His excuſe was not taken; ſince hee had voluntarily obliged himſelfe to Perſeus, by giuing hoſtages, without neceſſitie: Yet was his ſonne giuen backe to him ranſome-free; with admonition, to carrie himſelfe better toward the Romans in time following. His Kingdome lay betweene Macedon and ſome barbarous Nations; in which reſpect, it was good to hold him in faire tearmes.

As for thoſe vnhappie Kings, Perſeus and Gentius, they were ledde through Rome, with their children and friends, in the Triumphs of Æmylius and Anicius. Perſeus had often made ſuite to Æmylius, that hee might not be put to ſuch diſgrace: but hee ſtill receiued one skornefull anſwere, That it lay in his owne power to preuent it; whereby was meant, that hee might kill himſelfe. And ſurely, had hee not hoped for greater mercie than hee found, hee would rather haue ſought his death in Macedon, than haue beene beholding to the courteſie of his inſolent enemies for a wretched life. The iſſue of the Roman clemencie, whereof Æmylius had giuen him hope, was no better than this: After that hee, and his fellow King, had beene ledde in chaynes through the ſtreetes, before the Chariots of their triumphing Victors, they were committed to priſon, wherein they remained without hope of releaſe. It was the manner, that when the Triumpher turned his Chariot vp towards the Capitol, there to doe ſacrifice, hee ſhould command the captiues to be had away to priſon, and there put to death: ſo as the honour of the Vanquiſher, and miſerie of thoſe that were ouercome, might be both together at the vtmoſt. This laſt ſentence of death was remitted vnto Perſeus: yet ſo, that hee had little joy of his life; but eyther famiſhed himſelfe, or (for it is diuerſly reported) was kept watching perforce by thoſe that had him in cuſtodie; and ſo died for want of ſleepe. Of his ſonnes, two died; it is vncertaine how. The youngeſt called Alexander (onely in name like vnto the Great, though deſtined ſometimes perhaps by his father, vnto the fortunes of the Great) became a Ioyner, or Turner, or, at his beſt preferment, a Scribe vnder the Roman Officers. In ſuch pouertie ended the Royall Houſe of Macedon: and it ended on the ſuddaine; though ſome eightſcore yeares after the death of that Monarch, vnto whoſe ambition this whole Earth ſeemed too narrow.

If Perſeus had knowne it before, that his owne ſonne ſhould one day bee compelled to earne his liuing by handie-worke, in a painefull Occupation; it is like, that he would not, as in a wantonneſſe of Soueraignetie, haue commaunded thoſe poore men to be ſlaine, which had recouered his treaſures out of the ſea, by their skill in the feat of diuing. He would rather haue been verie gentle, and would haue conſidered, that the greateſt oppreſſors, and the moſt vndertroden wretches, are all ſubject vnto One high Power, gouerning all alike with abſolute command.

But such is our vnhappinesse; in stead of that blessed counsaile, Doe as yee would be done vnto, a sentence teaching all moderation, and pointing out the way to felicitie; wee entertaine that arrogant thought, I will be like to the Most High: that is, I will doe what shall please my selfe. One hath said truly:

Iuuenal. Sat. 10. -- ∪ ∪ -- Et qui volunt occidere quenquam
Posse volunt ——

Euen they that haue no murdrous will,
Would haue it in their power to kill.

All, or the most, haue a vaine desire of abilitie to doe euill without controule: which is a dangerous temptation vnto the performance. GOD, who best can judge what is expedient, hath graunted such power to verie few: among whome also, verie few there are, that vse it not to their owne hurt. For who sees not, that a Prince, by racking his Soueraigne authoritie to the vtmost extent, enableth (besides the danger to his owne person) some one of his owne sonnes or nephewes to root vp all his progenie? Shall not many excellent Princes, notwithstanding their brotherhood, or other neerenesse in bloud, be driuen to flatter the Wife, the Minion, or perhaps the Harlot that gouernes one, the most vnworthie of his whole house, yet raigning ouer all? The vntimely death of manie Princes, which could not humble themselues to such flatterie; and the common practice of the Turkish Emperours to murder all their brethren, without expecting till they offend; are too good proofes hereof. Hereto may be added, That the heire of the same Roger Mortimer, who murdered most traiterously and barbarously King Edward the second; was, by reason of a marriage, proclaimed, in time not long after following, heire apparent to the Crowne of England: which had he obtained, then had all the power of Edward fallen into the race of his mortall enemie, to exercise the same vpon the Line of that vnhappie King. Such examples of the instabilitie whereto all mortall affaires are subject; as they teach moderation, and admonish the transitorie Gods of Kingdomes, not to authorize, by wicked precedents, the euill that may fall on their owne posteritie: so doe they necessarily make vs vnderstand, how happie that Countrie is, which hath obtained a King able to conceiue and teach, That *GOD is the sorest and sharpest Schoolemaster, that can be deuised, for such Kings, as thinke this world ordained for them, without controlment to turne it vpside-downe at their pleasure.

*The true Law of free Monarchies.

Now, concerning the Triumph of L. Æmylius Paulus; it was in all points like vnto that of T. Quintius Flaminius: though farre more glorious, in regard of the Kings owne person, that was led along therein, as part of his owne spoyles; and in regard likewise both of the Conquest and of the Bootie. So great was the quantitie of Gold and Siluer carried by Paulus into the Roman Treasurie, that from thenceforth, vntill the ciuill Warres, which followed vpon the death of Iulius Cæsar, the Estate had no need to burthen it selfe with anie Tribute. Yet was this noble Triumph likely to haue beene hindered by the souldiors; who grudged at their Generall, for not hauing dealt more bountifully with them. But the Princes of the Senate ouer-ruled the People and Souldiors herein, and brought them to reason by seuere exhortations. Thus Paulus enjoyed as much honour of his victorie as men could giue. Neuertheless, it pleased GOD to take away from him his two remayning sonnes, that were not giuen in adoption: of which, the one died fiue dayes before the Triumph; the other, three dayes after it. This losse hee bore wisely: and told the People, That hee hoped to see the Commonwealth flourish in a continuance of prosperitie; since the joy of his victorie was requited with his owne priuate calamitie, in stead of the publike.

About

About the ſame time, Octauius the Admirall, who had brought Perſeus out of Samothrace: and Anicius the Prætor, who had conquered Illyria, and taken King Gentius priſoner; made their ſeuerall triumphs. The glory of which magnificent ſpectacles; together with the confluence of Embaſſages from all parts; and Kings, either viſiting the Imperiall Citie, or offering to viſit her, and doe their duties in perſon; were enough to ſay vnto Rome, Sume ſuperbiam, Take vpon thee the Maieſtie, that thy deſerts haue purchaſed.

BY this which we haue alreadie ſet downe, is ſeene the beginning and end of the three firſt Monarchies of the world; whereof the Founders and Erectours thought, that they could neuer haue ended. That of Rome which made the fourth, was alſo at this time almoſt at the higheſt. We haue left it flouriſhing in the middle of the field; hauing rooted vp, or cut downe, all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the world. But after ſome continuance, it ſhall begin to loſe the beauty it had; the ſtormes of ambition ſhall beat her great boughes and branches one againſt another; her leaues ſhall fall off, her limbes wither, and a rabble of barbarous Nations enter the field, and cut her downe.

Now theſe great Kings, and conquering Nations, haue bin the ſubiect of thoſe ancient Hiſtories, which haue beene preſerued, and yet remaine among vs; and withall of ſo many tragicall Poets, as in the perſons of powerfull Princes, and other mightie men haue complained againſt Infidelitie, Time, Deſtinie, and moſt of all againſt the Variable ſucceſſe of worldly things, and Inſtabilitie of Fortune. To theſe vndertakings, the greateſt Lords of the world haue beene ſtirred vp, rather by the deſire of Fame, which ploweth vp the Aire, and ſoweth in the Winde; than by the affection of bearing rule, which draweth after it ſo much vexation, and ſo many cares. And that this is true, the good aduice of Cineas to Pyrrhus proues. And certainly, as Fame hath often beene dangerous to the liuing, ſo is it to the dead of no vſe at all; becauſe ſeparate from knowledge. Which were it otherwiſe, and the extreme ill bargaine of buying this laſting diſcourſe, vnderſtood by them which are diſſolued; they themſelues would then rather haue wiſhed, to haue ſtolne out of the world without noiſe; than to be put in minde, that they haue purchaſed the report of their actions in the world, by rapine, oppreſſion, and crueltie, by giuing in ſpoile the innocent and labouring ſoule to the idle and inſolent, and by hauing emptied the Cities of the world of their ancient Inhabitants, and filled them againe with ſo many and ſo variable ſorts of ſorrowes.

Since the fall of the Roman Empire (omitting that of the Germanes, which had neither greatneſſe nor continuance) there hath been no State fearefull in the Eaſt, but that of the Turke; nor in the Weſt any Prince that hath ſpred his wings farre ouer his neſt, but the Spaniard; who ſince the time that Ferdinand expelled the Moores out of Granado, haue made many attempts to make themſelues Maſters of all Europe. And it is true, that by the treaſures of both Indies, and by the many Kingdomes which they poſſeſſe in Europe, they are at this day the moſt powerfull. But as the Turke is now counterpoiſed by the Perſian, ſo in ſtead of ſo many Millions as haue been ſpent by the Engliſh, French, and Netherlands in a defenſiue war, and in diuerſions againſt them, it is eaſie to demonſtrate, that with the charge of two hundred thouſand pound continued but for two yeares or three at the moſt, they may not only be perſwaded to liue in peace, but all their ſwelling and ouerflowing ſtreames may be brought backe into their naturall channels and old bankes. Theſe two Nations, I ſay, are at this day the moſt eminent, and to be regarded; the one ſeeking to roote out the Chriſtian Religion altogether, the other the truth and ſincere profeſſion thereof, the one to joyne all Europe to Aſia, the other the reſt of all Europe to Spaine.

For the reſt, if we ſeeke a reaſon of the ſucceſſion and continuance of this boundleſſe ambition in mortall men, we may adde to that which hath bin already ſaid;

That

That the Kings and Princes of the world haue alwayes laid before them, the actions, but not the ends of those great Ones which præceded them. They are alwayes transported with the glorie of the one, but they neuer minde the miserie of the other, till they find the experience in themselues. They neglect the aduice of GOD, while they enioy life, or hope it; but they follow the counsell of Death, vpon his first approach. It is he that puts into man all the wisdome of the world, without speaking a word; which GOD with all the words of his Law, promises, or threats, doth not infuse. Death, which hateth and destroyeth man, is beleeued; GOD, which hath made him and loues him, is alwayes deferred. I haue considered (saith SALOMON) all the workes that are vnder the Sunne, and behold, all is vanitie, and vexation of spirit: but who beleeues it, till Death tells it vs? It was Death, which opening the conscience of Charles the fift, made him enjoyne his sonne Philip to restore Nauarre; and King Francis the first of France, to command that justice should be done vpon the Murderers of the Protestants in Merindol and Cabrieres, which till then he neglected. It is therefore Death alone that can suddenly make man to know himselfe. He tells the proud and insolent, that they are but Abiects, and humbles them at the instant; makes them crie, complaine, and repent, yea, euen to hate their forepassed happinesse. He takes the account of the rich, and proues him a begger; a naked begger, which hath interest in nothing, but in the grauell that filles his mouth. He holds a Glasse before the eyes of the most beautifull, and makes them see therein, their deformitie and rottennesse; and they acknowledge it.

O eloquent, just and mightie Death! whom none could aduise, thou hast perswaded; what none hath dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou onely hast cast out of the world and despised: thou hast drawne together all the farre stretched greatnesse, all the pride, crueltie, and ambition of man, and couered it all ouer with these two narrow words, Hic iacet.

Lastly, whereas this Booke, by the title it hath, calles it selfe, The first part of the Generall Historie of the World, implying a Second and Third Volume; which I also intended, and haue hewne out; besides many other discouragements, perswading my silence; it hath pleased GOD to take that glorious Prince out of the world, to whom they were directed; whose vnspeakeable and neuer enough lamented losse, hath taught me to say with IOB, Versa est in Luctum Cithara mea, & Organum meum in vocem flentium.

¶ To the Reader.

THe vſe of Chronologicall Tables is needfull to all Hiſtories, that reach to anie length of time; and moſt of all, to thoſe that are moſt generall: ſince they cannot, like Annales, yearely ſet downe all Occurrences not coherent. This heere following, may ſerue as an Index to the preſent Part of this Worke; pointing vnto the ſeuerall matters, that hauing fallen out at one time, are farre disioyned in the Relation. Certainely it is not perfect: neither doe I thinke, that anie can be. For howſoeuer the yeares of the firſt Patriarchs may ſeeme to haue beene well-neere compleat, yet in the raignes of the Kings of Iuda and Iſrael, wee finde manie fractions, and the laſt yeare, or yeares, of one King reckoned alſo as the formoſt of another. The ſame is moſt likely to haue fallen out in manie other; though not ſo preciſely recorded. Hereto may be added the diuerſe and imperfect formes of the yeare, which were in vſe among ſundrie Nations: cauſing the * Summer Moneths, in proceſſe of ſome Ages, to fall into the Winter; and ſo breeding extreme confuſion in the reckoning of their times. Neither is it a ſmall part of trouble, to chuſe, out of ſo manie, and ſo vtterly diſagreeing computations, as haue alreadie gotten authoritie, what may probably be held for truth. All this, and a great deale more, is to be alleaged, in excuſe of ſuch error as a more intentiue and perfect Calculator ſhall happen to finde herein. It may ſerue to free the Booke, and likewiſe the Reader (if but of meane iudgement) from anie notorious Anachroniciſme; which ought to ſuffice. The Booke indeed will need it, euen in that regard; not onely for ſome errors of the Preſſe, in the numbring of yeares, but for ſome haſtie miſ-reckonings of mine owne; which I deſire to haue hereby reformed, in hope that the printing of this Table ſhall not want carefull diligence. The Reader, if he be not offended with the reſt, ſhall finde reaſon to be pleaſed with this, as tending wholly to his owne eaſe.

* See Lib. 2. Chap. 3. §. 6.

The Titles ouer the Columnes, haue reference to that which followes vnder them; as will readily be conceiued. Where two Titles, or more, are ouer the head, as | Rome / Nabonaſſar | there doe the numbers vnderneath anſwere proportionably, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower. For example: The walls of Ieruſalem were finiſhed in the 319. yeare from the building of Rome, and in the 314. from NABONASSAR. In like manner it is to be vnderſtood, That IEHOSOPHAT began his raigne in the 3774. of the IVLIAN Æra, in the 3092. of the World, and in the 99. yeare of the Temple. This needes not more illuſtration; nor indeede ſo much, to thoſe that are acquainted with workes of this kinde. To auoid prolixitie, I haue forborne to inſert thoſe yeares, which I finde not ſigned with ſome regardable accident: as with the birth or death of ſome Patriarch; the beginning of ſome Kings Raigne; ſome change of Gouernment; ſome Battaile fought; or the like. So, of the 13. yeares wherein SYLVIVS CAPETVS raigned ouer the Latines, I note onely the firſt; that is, omitting all betweene the 4. of IEHOSOPHAT, wherein CAPETVS began, vnto the 17, wherein SYLVIVS AVENTINVS ſucceeded, and wherein IEHORAM firſt raigned with IEHOSOPHAT his father. For I thought it vaine to haue filled vp a Page with 12. lines of idle cyphers; numbring forth 2. 3. 4. 5. and ſo ſtill onwards, till I had come to the firſt of AVENTINVS, and 17. of IEHOSOPHAT. In ſetting downe the Kings, there is noted ouer the head of euerie one, what place he held in order of Succeſſion; as whether he were the firſt, ſecond, fift, ſeuenth, or ſo forth, in ranke, of thoſe that raigned in his Countrey, without notable interruption. Before the name is the firſt yeare of his raigne; at the end, or foot of the name (as the ſpace giues leaue) is the whole number of yeares in which he raigned; in the ſpaces following vnderneath are thoſe yeares of his, which were concurrent with the beginning of ſome other King, or with the yeare of anie remarkable accident. Where two numbers, or more, are found before one Kings name, there is it to be vnderſtood, that the ſame yeare belonged, not onely to the King then beginning, but vnto ſome one, or more, of his

his fore-goers: as the first yeare of IEHORAM King of Israel was the same with the second of his brother AHAZIA, and the 22. of his father AHAB. So, where two or three names are found in one space; as in the 3077. yeare of the World, ZIMRI, TIBNI, and OMRI: it is meant, that euerie one of them raigned in some part of the same yeare; which is reckoned the second of ELA, and the first of OMRI. Particularly, vnder the yeares of the Ægyptian Kings are set downe the yeares of those DYNASTIES, which it was thought meet to insert; as likewise, otherwhiles, the day of the moneth vpon which NABONASSARS yeare began: which, how it varied from other yeares, may be found in the place last aboue cited.

Concerning the Æra, or accompt of yeres, from IPHITVS, who began the Olympiads, from Rome built, from NABONASSAR, and the like; as much as was thought conuenient hath beene said, where due place was, in the Booke it selfe: so as it remaineth onely to note, that vnder the title of Olympiads is set downe first the number of the Olympiad, and beneath it, the yeare of that Olympiad: as that CYRVS began his raigne in Persia, in the 55. Olympiad, and the first yeare thereof.

Now, for that the yeares of the World, of the Olympiads, of Rome, of NABONASSAR, and other, had not beginning in one month, but some of them in March, some in April, some about Midsummer, and some at other times: the better to expresse their seuerall beginnings, some painefull Chronologers haue diuided them proportionably in their seuerall Columnes; opposing part of the one yeare to part of the other: not (as I haue here done) cutting all ouerthwart with one streight line, as if all had begun and ended at one time. But this labour haue I spared, as more troublesome than vsefull; since the more part would not haue apprehended the meaning, and since the learned might well be without it. It will onely be needfull to obserue, that howsoeuer the Æra of the Olympiads be 24. yeares elder than that of Rome, and 29, than that of NABONASSAR, yet the raigne of some King may haue begun at such a time of the yeare as did not sute with this difference. But hereof I take little regard. The more curious will easily finde my meaning: the vulgar will not finde the difficultie. One familiar example may explane all. Queene ELIZABETH began her raigne the 17. of November, in the yeare of our LORD 1558: Shee was crowned; held a Parliament; brake it vp; threw downe Images; and reformed manie things in Religion; all in her first yeare: yet not all in that yeare 1558, but the greater part in the yeare following; whether we begin with the first of Ianuarie, or with the 25. of March. The like may be otherwhiles found in this Table; but so, as the difference is neuer of a whole yeare.

The IVLIAN Period, which I haue placed, as the greater number, ouer the yeares of the World, was deuised by that honorable and excellently learned IOSEPH SCALIGER: being accommodated to the IVLIAN yeares, now in vse among vs. It consisteth of 7980 yeares; which result from the multiplication of 19. 28. and 15, that is, of the Cycle of the Moone, the Cycle of the Sunne, and the yeares of an Indiction. Being diuided by anie of these, it leaues the number of the present yeare; or if no fraction remaine, it shewes the last yeare of that Cycle to be current. For example: in the 4498. of this Period, when was fought the great battaile of Cannæ, the Prime or Golden number was 14, the Cycle of the Sunne 18, and consequently the Dominicall letter F. as may be found by diuiding the same number of the IVLIAN Period 4498, by 19. for the Prime, by 28. for the Cycle of the Sunne. This IVLIAN Period, after the present accompt, alwayes exceedes the yeares of the World by 682. Besides the former vses, and other thence redounding, it is a better Character of a yeare, than anie other Æra (as From the beginning of the World, From the Floud, From Troy taken, or the like) which are of more vncertaine position.

More I shall not need to write, as touching the vse or explication of these Tables. Neither was thus much requisite to such as are conuersant in workes of this kinde: it sufficeth if hereby all be made plaine enough to the vulgar.
